A

COMMENTARY

UPON

THE PROPHET EZEKIEL.

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

WILLIAM,

BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE, LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY;

PRIMATE OF ALL ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN;

AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY-COUNCIL.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,

IN pursuance of my design to explain the prophetical writings, I humbly offer to your Grace the following Commentary upon the Prophet Ezekiel; the depth of whose thoughts and expressions might justly deter me from undertaking a work of so much difficulty: but, begging your Grace's and my reader's pardon if I have been guilty of lesser mistakes, I hope, at least, that I have avoided committing any dangerous errors, by carefully following those directions, which the text itself, and the labours of several judicious commentators upon it, have suggested to me; having had likewise the assistance of some very learned friends, who have been pleased to communicate their thoughts to me upon the most difficult passages of it.

The most remarkable difficulties of this prophecy relate to the description of the temple, represented to the Prophet in a heavenly vision. By the general consent of interpreters, this vision, in its mystical sense, sets forth a model or pattern of the catholic church of Christ, viewed in its state of perfection; of its largeness and extent, its strength and compactness, its beauty and order, and all those other qualifications, which are proper to edify and adorn this spiritual house of the living God, the pillar and basis of truth.

Our church, in conformity with that of the first and purest ages, hath always been careful to maintain those principles of catholic unity and charity, which, if they were generally embraced and received, would render the Christian church like that Jerusalem which was a figure of it, a city at unity in itself. And since it hath pleased the Divine Providence to appoint your Grace as a wise master-builder to preside over it, we may hope, that under his Majesty's most gracious protection, and your Grace's auspicious conduct, it may receive new accessions of strength and edification; and, according to the obliging words of the late royal promise, be not only in a safe, but likewise in a flourishing condition.

That becoming zeal which your Grace expressed against those dangerous opinions which every where spread and abound, in your excellent speech at the opening of the convocation, as it gave great satisfaction to all those who had the honour to hear it; so it may justly be looked upon as a certain indication of your continual care and concern for the advancement of true piety and religion among us.

That God, who hath advanced your Grace to this high station, may long continue you in it, and may prosper all your pious designs for the promoting his glory, and the good of his church, as it is the united prayer of that great body of the clergy placed under your Grace's jurisdiction, so it is of none more earnestly than of him who begs leave to subscribe himself,

My Lord,

Your Grace's most dutiful and obedient servant,

WILLIAM LOWTH.

PREFACE.

EZEKIEL was a prophet of the priestly order, carried away into Babylon with several other Jews in Jehoiachin's captivity, and therefore dates his prophecies by the years of that captivity. Clemens Alexandrinus tells us, some thought him contemporary with Pythagoras, and that they had conversed together in Babylon, (Strom. lib. i. n. 15.) This opinion he rejects as inconsistent with the age of Pythagoras, whom he supposes to have flourished about the sixty-second Olympiad, (ibid. n. 21.) which was near sixty years after Ezekiel was carried into Babylon. The late learned Bishop of Worcester, in his chronological account of Pythagoras's life, supposes him born about nine years after Ezekiel's coming to Babylon, and that Pythagoras himself came to Babylon at eighteen years of age; but there is no proof that ever he conversed with Ezekiel. Though it appears by the testimony of Hermippus, in Josephus, (lib. i. cont. Appion. n. 22.) that he had conversation with some Jews; and learned men have observed, that there is great resemblance between several of his symbols, and some of the precepts of the Jewish law.

But whatever became of Pythagoras, the accounts of whose life are very uncertain; it is certain that Ezekiel, being at Babylon, directed many of his prophecies to his fellow-exiles there, who, as St. Jerome observes in his preface to Ezekiel, repined at their ill fortune, and thought their countrymen, who remained in Judea, in a much better condition than themselves. The prophet, with regard to those circumstances, sets before their eyes that terrible scene of calamities which God would bring upon Judea and Jerusalem, which should end in the utter destruction of the city and temple. He recounts the heinous provocations of the Jews, which brought down these heavy judgments upon them, in strong and lively colours; his style exactly answering the character the Greek rhetoricians give of that part of oratory they call Δείνωσις, which Quinctilian defines to be "oratio quæ rebus asperis, indignis et invidiosis vim addit," (lib. vi. cap. 3.) its property being to aggravate things in themselves monstrous and odious, and represent them with great force and efficacy of expression. For the same reason Rapin, in his treatise of Eloquence, calls Ezekiel's style le terrible, as having something in it that strikes the reader with a holy dread and astonishment.

Josephus (lib. x. Antiq. cap. 6.) divides this prophecy into two books; but it is generally supposed, that he took that part of the prophecy which contains a description of the temple, beginning at the fortieth chapter, for a distinct book from the rest, as treating altogether of a different subject.

St. Jerome hath more than once observed (Præfat. in Ezek. et in Prolog. Galeato), that the beginning and latter part of this prophecy is more than ordinary difficult and obscure, and may justly be reckoned among the Δυσνοητὰ, or things in Scripture which are hard to be understood. To contribute what I could to the clearing of these difficulties, I have took the liberty of transferring into the following Commentary whatever I thought useful for that purpose in the elaborate work of Villalpandus, a book which is in very few hands; and in the later observations of Bernardus L'Amy, in his learned book de Tabernaculo Fœderis.

But I must not conceal the kind assistance I have received upon this and former occasions, from that great master of Divine and human learning, the Right Reverend Father in God, Edward, Lord Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield; and I gladly embrace the opportunity of making my grateful acknowledgments to his Lordship in this public manner, for his many and constant favours.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

The first chapter contains a description of God's appearing in a glorious manner to Ezekiel, in order to the giving him a commission to execute the prophetical office.

Ver. 1. Now it came to pass.] The Hebrew text reads, And it came to pass; but it is usual in that language to begin a discourse or book with the particle vau, or and; (see Jonah i. 1. and the beginning of most of the historical books of the Old Testament;) which particle is very properly translated in those places, Now it came to pass: so that there is no ground for the fancy of Spinosa, who would conclude from hence, that this book of Ezekiel is but a fragment of a larger book, and contained several prophecies now lost, which were in order of time before those set down in these and the following chapters.

In the thirtieth year.] It is a great question, from whence this computation of time commences. The most probable answers are, first, that of Scaliger, who supposes this thirtieth year to be meant of the years of Nabupolassar's reign; who, as he tells us from Berosus, quoted by Josephus, (lib. i. contr. App.) reigned twenty-nine years complete: so the thirtieth year, here mentioned, was the last year of his reign and life; and is likewise the thirteenth year current of his son Nebuchadnezzar's reign, who reigned so many years together with his father. (See Scaliger's Canon Isagog. p. 281. 294. his Prolegom. ad lib. de Emend. Temporum, and his notes on the Greek Fragments, at the end of those books.)

But there is one considerable objection against this opinion of Scaliger, that, according to Berosus's account, as his words are quoted in another place of Josephus, (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 2.) Nabupolassar reigned only twenty-one years: the Greek text reading, by a little variation, εἴκοσι ἓν for εἴκοσι ἐννέα. Which is the same number of years assigned to Nabupolassar in the æra Nabonassari, and agrees better with Berosus's own story; viz. that when he had committed the command of the army to his son, and sent him on an expedition to Syria and Phœnicia, he died in a short time after.

Villalpandus, in like manner, makes this computation to commence from the beginning of Nabupolassar's reign. (See his commentary upon Ezek. xl. 1.) He allows nineteen years for his reign, distinct from that of his son, and supposes Nebuchadnezzar to reign two years with his father; which, indeed, agrees with the Scripture computation. (See the note on Jer. xxv. 1.) But, according to that very account, the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity will be coincident with the thirteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign: for the nineteenth year of the same reign is assigned for the destruction of Jerusalem, Jer. lii. 12. which was about six years afterward. So this computation will make Jehoiachin's captivity to have happened not in the thirtieth, but in the thirty-second year, reckoning from the beginning of Nabupolassar's reign.

A more probable answer to this difficulty, is that which the Chaldee paraphrast, Archbishop Usher, A. M. 3409. Dr. Prideaux, ad an. A. C. 594. and other learned men, follow; viz. that these thirty years are to be reckoned from the time when Josiah and all the people of Judah entered into that solemn covenant mentioned 2 Kings xxii. 3. which was in the eighteenth year of Josiah; (ibid.) from which time the same learned writers compute the forty years of Judah's transgression, mentioned iv. 6.

As I was among the captives by the river Chebar.] Those which were carried away with Jehoiachin, king of Judah.

Digitized by Microsoft®

(See the next verse.) These were placed in towns or villages that lay upon the river Chebar in Mesopotamia, called by Ptolemy and Strabo, Chaboras, or Aboras; and by Pliny, (lib. i. cap. 26.) Cobaris.

Ver. 2. Which was in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity.] This was coincident with the thirteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign: for Jehoiachin was carried captive in the eighth year of his reign. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 12.) The Hebrew writers use several computations of the beginning of the Babylonish captivity. (See the note upon Jer. xxv. 11.) That under Jehoiachin, wherein Ezekiel was made a captive, is the computation he always follows in the succeeding parts of his prophecy. (See viii. 1. xx. 1. xxix. 1. 17. xxxi. 1. xxxiii. 1. xl. 1.)

Ver. 3. The word of the Lord came expressly, &c.] The word of the Lord signifies any sort of revelation, whether by vision, such as is related in the following verses, or by a voice, as ii. 3.

And the hand of the Lord was there upon him.] He felt sensible impressions of God's power and Spirit. (Compare iii. 14. 22. viii. 1. xxviii. 1. xl. 1. 1 Kings xviii. 46. 2 Kings iii. 15.)

Ver. 4. And I looked, and, behold, a whirlwind came out of the north.] God's anger and judgments are often compared to a whirlwind. (See Isa. xxi. 1. Jer. xxiii. 19. xxv. 32. Psal. lviii. 9.) It is described here as coming out of the north, because of the northerly situation of Babylon with respect to Judea. (Compare Jer. i. 13. iv. 6. vi. 1. and xliii. 3. of this prophecy.)

A great cloud, and a fire infolding itself, and a brightness was about it.] The Divine presence is usually described in Scripture as a bright light, or flaming fire, breaking out of a thick cloud. (See Psal. xviii. 2. l. 3. xcviii. 2, 3.) God also is described as a consuming fire, when he comes to execute his judgment upon sinners, Deut. iv. 24. (Compare ver. 13. of this chapter.) Fire infolding itself is the same as appearing in folds, like one wreath within another.

And out of the midst thereof as the colour of amber.] Compare viii. 2. Fire resembles the colour of amber, especially the lower parts of it: so in that vision of Christ, described Rev. i. 13, &c. it is said, ver. 15. that his feet, or lower parts, were like unto fine brass, or rather unto amber, as Dr. Hammond rightly explains the word χαλκολίβανος.

Ver. 5. Also out of the midst thereof came the likeness of four living creatures.] Compare Rev. iv. 6. where our English translation improperly renders the word Ζῶα, beasts; whereas it should be rendered living creatures, the better to distinguish them from the antichristian beast, always expressed in that book by Θηρίον. These living creatures were four cherubims, that carried or supported God's throne in the following vision: it may be in allusion to the triumphal chariots of the eastern kings, which were drawn by several sorts of beasts; the cherubims, as they were placed in the temple, being called God's chariot, 1 Chron. xxviii. 18.

They had the likeness of a man.] Their shape was erect, like the form of a man.

Ver. 6. And every one had four faces.] Of a man, of a lion, of an ox, and of an eagle; (ver. 10.) each of them resembled the cherubims, which overshadowed the mercy-seat in the temple. (See x. 20.) The Jewish tabernacle was a pattern of heavenly things, (Heb. viii. 5. Wisd. ix. 8.) and the encampment of the twelve tribes about the tabernacle in the wilderness, was a representation of the angelical ministry about the throne of God in heaven. So there is an analogy between the cherubims, as they attended the Divine presence in the holiest of all, and as here described, in a figure of their heavenly ministry, and the body of the Jewish nation placed round about the tabernacle, and divided into four standards, and a several ensign allotted to each standard, as you may read Numb. ii. 2, 3. 10. 18. 25. What those ensigns were, that text does not express; but the Jewish writers unanimously maintain that they were a lion for the tribe of Judah, an ox for the tribe of Ephraim, a man for the tribe of Reuben, and an eagle for the tribe of Dan; under which variety each of these four cherubims is here represented. (Compare Rev. iv. 6.) And in that text the four living creatures denote some part of the Christian church, as appears by comparing that place with Rev. v. 8, 9. Here likewise may be an allusion to the four cherubims in Solomon's temple; for he placed two others of larger dimensions, one on each side of the ark; and of the two cherubims, which Moses had placed in the tabernacle. (Compare 1 Kings vi. 24. with Exod. xxv. 17. 20.)

And every one had four wings.] See ver. 11.

Ver. 7. And their feet were straight feet.] Like a man's, without such a middle joint as beasts have, the use of which is to secure them against weariness, to denote their steadiness and resolution in executing all God's commands.

The sole of their feet was like the sole of a calf's foot.] A creature remarkable for its treading firm and sure. These living creatures are a sort of hieroglyphics, made up of several shapes, but yet they resembled most that of an ox or a calf; and therefore were called cherubims, that word signifying an ox; in which sense it is taken x. 14. of this prophecy, where the face of a cherub is equivalent to the face of an ox, at ver. 10. of this chapter.

And they sparkled like the colour of burnished brass.] Compare Dan. x. 6. Rev. i. 15. The appearance of their feet was bright and flaming. (See ver. 13. and Psal. civ. 4.) The seraphims have that name from their bright and flaming colour.

Ver. 8. And they had the hands of a man under their wings.] Compare x. 8. Isa. vi. 6. This denotes the prudence and dexterity of their management: the hand being peculiar to mankind among all living creatures, and the chief instrument of all artificial operations.

They four had their faces and their wings.] They had all the same appearances and proportions; or had wings equal to their faces.

Their wings were joined one to another.] See ver. 11.

They turned not when they went.] They needed not to turn their bodies that their faces might stand the way they were to go; for go which way they would they had a face that looked that way. This signifies, that nothing ever diverted them from fulfilling God's commands; see the note on x. 11. where these living creatures are represented as coming near to a square figure, which is equal on all sides, the emblem of firmness and constancy.

Ver. 10. They four had the face of a man, and of a lion on the right side, &c.] See the note on ver. 6. Grotius and Villalpandus by the word face understand the shape or appearance, and explain the words to this sense: That these living creatures were like a man with respect to their visage, or their upper parts; they resembled a lion with respect to their back parts; their wings were like the wings of an eagle, and their feet like those of an ox. But this exposition does not well agree with what is said here, that the face of the lion was on the right side, and that of the ox on the left; or, as Castalio translates it, and I think to a better and clearer sense, That the face of the man and the lion were on the right side, and the face of the ox and eagle on the left. And by comparing the several parts of this description, their figure may be rather concluded to be quadruple; and as the wheels were made to turn every way, so the living creatures could move towards any point without turning about: to signify, as I observed before, the steadfastness of their motions and purposes. (Compare ver. 15. 19, 20. of this chapter with x. 11, &c.)

Ver. 11. Their wings were stretched upwards.] In a posture of flying, to shew their readiness to execute God's commands; (compare ver. 24. with x. 16.) or they were stretched to cover their faces, as the seraphims are represented Isa. vi. 2. (Compare ver. 23. of this chapter.) Some translate the former part of the verse thus: Their faces and their wings were stretched upwards, to denote a posture of attention, and as if they were hearkening to the voice of God's word, as the angels are represented, Psal. ciii. 20.

Two wings of every one were joined one to another.] Being thus stretched out, they touched one another, or the wings of one living creature touched those of another, as the wings of the cherubims did over the mercy-seat. (See 1 Kings vi. 27.)

And two covered their bodies.] See Isa. vi. 2. Grotius, upon ver. 6. of this chapter, assigns a reason why, in that text of Isaiah, and Rev. iv. 6. each seraphim hath six wings assigned him, whereas the living creatures here have but four; viz. the seraphims in these texts make use of two of their wings to cover their faces, out of reverence to the Divine presence, before which they stand; whereas here the living creatures are supposed to stand under the throne, as supporting it. (Compare x. 19.)

Ver. 12. And they went every one straight forward.] See ver. 9.

Whither the spirit was to go, there they went.] That is, that spiritual or angelical power, which was the principle of all their motions. (See ver. 20.)

And they turned not as they went.] See ver. 17.

Ver. 13. Their appearance was like burning coals of fire, &c.] The angels are always described of a bright and flaming colour. (See ver. 4. 7.) But here the coals of fire and the lightning, breaking forth out of the fire, denote God's vengeance coming in flaming fire to destroy the city and temple of Jerusalem. (Compare x. 2. Psal. xviii. Rev. iv. 5. 12.)

Ver. 14. And the living creatures ran and returned, as the appearance of lightning.] The swiftness of their motions every way resembled the flashes of lightning. (Compare Matt. xxiv. 27. Zech. iv. 10.)

Ver. 15. And behold one wheel [or the same sort of wheel] upon the earth by the living creatures, with his four faces.] Or, on his four sides; that is, on the four sides or faces of the square body as it stood: so that a wheel was before every one of the living creatures on the outside of the square. So Dr. Lightfoot expounds the words, in his Description of the Temple, (chap. 38.) The sentence may be translated thus: Behold, one wheel upon earth by the living creatures to each of the creatures with the four faces; so the word learbang is used, ver. 10. The word wheel is certainly used collectively for each wheel; as the cherub stands for cherubims, ix. 3. x. 4. and living creature signifies the four living creatures, ibid. ver. 15. 19. That there were four wheels, according to the number of the living creatures, is plain, by comparing this verse with the sixteenth and nineteenth, and with x. 9. The wheels are represented here as standing upon the earth, or near the earth: at other times they appeared as being lifted up above it. (See ver. 20, 21. and x. 17.)

Ver. 16. The appearance of the wheels was like unto the colour of a beryl.] Azure, the colour of the sky, mixed with a bright green. (Compare Dan. x. 6.)

Their appearance and their work was, as it were, a wheel in the middle of a wheel.] As it were one wheel put across within another, like two circles in a sphere, cutting one another at right angles, to signify the stability and uniformity of their motions, and the subserviency of one part of Providence to another. (See the following verse, and the note upon ver. 9.)

Ver. 17. When they went, they went upon their four sides.] Each wheel consisted of four semicircles, crossing one another, as appears by the foregoing verse; and each of them had its proper motion.

They returned not when they went.] They never went backward; (see x. 11.) to signify, that Providence doth nothing in vain, but always accomplishes its end. So God speaks of his word and decree, Isa. lv. 11. It shall not return unto me void; but shall accomplish that which I please. To return by the way that he went, is a proverbial speech, signifying a man's missing his aim, or not accomplishing his designs. (See 1 Kings xiii. 9. 2 Kings xix. 33.)

Ver. 18. As for their rings [or streaks], they were so high that they were dreadful.] Their circumference was so vast, as to cause a terror in the prophet that beheld them: to signify the vast compass of Providence, which reacheth from one end to another mightily; (Wisd. viii. 1.) or, as St. Paul expresseth it, the height and depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable his judgments are, and his ways past finding out! (Rom. xi. 33.) Dr. Lightfoot translates it, And they were reverend; that is, they were observant of that presence and glory upon which they waited, and watchful to obey its commands.

And their rings were full of eyes about these four.] And so were also the living creatures themselves; (compare x. 12.) to signify, that all the motions of Providence are directed by a consummate wisdom and foresight. To the same sense the angels, who are the instruments of Providence, are called the eyes of the Lord, Zech. iv. 10. Rev. v. 6.

Ver. 19—21. And when the living creatures went, the wheels by them, &c.] Both the living creatures and the wheels were animated by the same principle of understanding and motion, to signify with what readiness and alacrity all the instruments of Providence concur in carrying on its great designs and purposes. (Compare x. 16, 17.)

Ver. 20. The wheels were lifted up over against them.] That is, the wheels, which were placed just by them: (see ver. 15. 19.) the word leumatham is rendered besides them, x. 19. xi. 22.

For the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels.] That is, the spirit of each living creature, as the word is used in ver. 22.

Ver. 22. And the likeness of the firmament upon the heads of the living creatures was as the colour of the terrible crystal.] Over the heads of all the living creatures, or of this whole vision of living creatures, (compare x. 15. 20.) was the likeness of a clear sky or firmament, where the Divine glory appeared as upon a throne. (See ver. 26. x. 1. and compare Rev. iv. 2, 3.) By the terrible crystal is meant such as dazzles the eyes with its lustre.

Ver. 23. And under the firmament were their wings straight.] The sense is the same with that of ver. 11. denoting that two of the wings of each living creature were stretched upward, out of reverence to the Divine presence, or to express their readiness to obey his commands; (see ver. 11. 24.) and with the two other they covered their bodies.

Ver. 24. And when they went, I heard the noise of their wings like the noise of many waters, &c.] To denote the terribleness of the judgments which they were to execute upon Jerusalem and the whole Jewish nation. (Compare xliii. 2. Dan. x. 6. Rev. i. 15.)

As the voice of the Almighty.] It resembled great and dreadful thunder. (Compare Job xxxvii. 4, 5. Psal. xxix. 3. lxviii. 33.) St. Jerome, in his note upon the place, tells us, that the LXX. translate these words, φωνὴν τοῦ Λόγου, The voice of the Λόγος, or second person in the blessed Trinity: which words are now in the Alexandrian copy. The Vatican copy is defective, but the Alexandrian copy runs thus: ὡς φωνὴν ἱκανοῦ. ἐν τῷ πορεύεσθαι αὐτὰ φωνὴ τοῦ λόγου, ὡς φωνὴ τῆς παρεμβολῆς. As the voice of the Almighty. When they went [there was] the voice of speech, like the voice of a host. This reading shews that the LXX. designed to translate the following words by φωνὴ τοῦ λόγου, where we read, The voice of speech: and then the word λόγος may probably be taken in its ordinary signification: though we may certainly conclude that this was the appearance of the second person of the blessed Trinity, both because he appears under the resemblance of a man, (ver. 26.) and from what hath been said upon this subject in the note upon Isa. vi. 1.

The voice of speech, like the noise of a host.] Like the confused murmur of an army; either to denote the army of the Babylonians that should besiege the city, or to signify the angels, who are called God's host.

And when they stood, they let down their wings.] They put themselves in a posture of hearkening to God's voice; and as it were quietly waiting to receive his commands. (See the next verse.)

Ver. 25. And there was a voice from the firmament when they stood.] The Vulgar Latin renders it, When there was a voice they stood, in an attentive posture. (Compare Psal. ciii. 20.)

Ver. 26. And above the firmament was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone.] God is described in Scripture as dwelling in light, and clothing himself with it. (Compare Exod. xxiv. 10. Psal. civ. 2. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Rev. iv. 2, 3.) So the throne of God here described was made up of light, resembling the colours and brightness of a sapphire.

And upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as of the appearance of a man above upon it.] When Moses and the elders saw the God of Israel, (Exod. xxiv. 8.) or the glory of God, as the Targum explains it, they saw no determinate figure, but an inconceivably resplendent brightness, that they might not think God could be represented by any image. (Deut. iv. 16.) But in this vision the form and shape of a man is directly represented to Ezekiel, as a præludium, or figure, of the incarnation. (See the note on Jer. i. 4.)

Ver. 27. And I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it, &c.] The upper part of this appearance was of an amber colour outwardly, but appeared more flaming inwardly; the lower part of a deeper red, encompassed with a bright flame, to represent God's coming to take vengeance of the Jews. (See the notes on ver. 4.)

In most of our English Bibles the stops are placed wrong in this verse; whereas the whole verse should be pointed thus: And I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it, from the appearance of his loins even upwards, and from the appearance of his loins even downwards, I saw as it were the appearance of fire, &c. The words should be thus pointed, as appears by comparing them with viii. 2.

Ver. 28. As the appearance of the cloud, &c.] The light reflected from this vision had the appearance of a rainbow, a token of God's covenant of mercy, (Gen. ix. 11, &c.) to denote that God, in the midst of judgment, would remember mercy, and not utterly destroy his people. (Compare Rev. iv. 3.) Especially this vision being an evident representation of the Word that was to be made flesh, whose incarnation is the foundation of God's covenant of mercy with mankind: a rainbow, the symbol and token of mercy, was a very fit attendant upon that glorious vision. (Compare Rev. x. 1.)

This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord.] This is a description of that glorious vision wherein God appeared, and whereby he made manifest his attributes and perfections.

And when I saw it, I fell upon my face.] As struck down with fear and astonishment. (Compare iii. 23. xi. 2. Dan. viii. 17. Rev. i. 17.) Prostration was also a posture of adoration used upon any token of the Divine presence. (See Gen. xvii. 3. Numb. xiv. 5. xvi. 4.)

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter contains Ezekiel's commission for executing his prophetical office, and instructions given him for the discharge of it.

Ver. 1. AND he said unto me, Son of man.] This expression is commonly understood to signify the same with a common and ordinary man, as it is usually expounded in that text, Psal. viii. 4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him? So here most commentators understand it as applied to the prophet, to put him in mind of his frailty and mortality, and of the infinite distance between God and man. In which sense it is supposed to be taken when spoken of Christ in the New Testament, implying his great humility in assuming our nature, and appearing no otherwise than an ordinary man: and so the Hebrew phrase Ben Adam is plainly used, when it is opposed to Ben Isch; and is rightly translated men of low degree, or mean men, Psal. lxix. 2. Isa. ii. 9.

But some critics have observed, that the phrase son of man, is likewise taken for a man of dignity or character, as in Psal. lxxx. 17. The man of thy right hand, and the son of man, whom thou madest so strong for thyself. And Psal. cxlvi. 3. Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. And there is no incongruity in supposing that Christ himself may be called the Son of man, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, by way of eminence, as a title denoting him to be that great person whom God promised to raise up to be a Prince and a Saviour of his people. And so the title of son of man may be given to the prophet in the text, as one set apart for the prophetical office: in like manner as Daniel is called son of man, viii. 17. who in the next chapters hath the title of a man greatly beloved, (ix. 23. x. 11.)

Stand upon thy feet.] Put thyself into a posture of attending to what I say. (See ver. 2. and compare Dan. x. 11.)

Ver. 2. And the Spirit entered into me, &c.] God's Spirit revived me and gave me new life and vigour, that I could attend to what was said unto me. (See the note on iii. 24. and compare ver. 12. 14. of that chapter.)

Ver. 3. To a rebellious nation.] The Hebrew word is goiim, nations, the word which is commonly used to denote the heathens, intimating that the Jews had outdone the wickedness of the heathens. (See v. 6, 7.)

Ver. 4. For they are impudent children, and stiff-hearted.] The original might be more significantly rendered, They are children impudent in their countenance, and hardened in their hearts. They are so far hardened in wickedness as to have cast off all shame, and even the very outward show of modesty.

Ver. 5. And they, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, shall know that there hath been a prophet among them.] Whether they will regard what is said by thee or not; (see iii. 27.) yet the event answering thy predictions shall render thy authority unquestionable, and them inexcusable for not hearkening to the warnings thou hast given them. (See xxxiii. 33.)

Ver. 6. And thou, son of man, be not afraid of them.] The prophets and messengers of God are often exhorted to take courage, and are promised a proportionable assistance in the discharge of their office, without fearing any man's person, or standing in awe of any man's greatness. (See iii. 8, 9. Jer. i. 8. 18. Matt. x. 28.) Such a presence of mind is expressed by παῤῥησία, boldness, in the New Testament; and is spoken of as a peculiar gift bestowed upon the first preachers of the gospel: (see Acts iv. 13. 29. Eph. vi. 19. Phil. i. 20.) called the spirit of might, or courage, Col. i. 11. 2 Tim. i. 7. And they had need of great presence of mind, who are to reprove men hardened in sin, who are always impatient of reproof, and become the enemies of those who tell them such truths as they have no mind to hear.

Though briers and thorns be with thee.] Such as study to vex and torment thee. (Compare Micah vii. 4.) The prophets often denote the wicked by briers and thorns. (See the note on Isa. ix. 18.)

And thou dost well among scorpions.] Who would sting thee to death, and are as venomous as the worst of serpents. (Compare Matt. iii. 7. xxiii. 33.)

Be not afraid of their words, neither be dismayed at their looks.] Be not afraid of their threats wherewith they would affright thee; neither be afraid of their looks wherewith they would browbeat thee.

Ver. 8. Open thy mouth, and eat what I give thee.] The knowledge of Divine truths is often expressed by the metaphors of bodily food and nourishment. (See Isa. lv. 1, 2. Josh. vi. 27.) So to eat the words of this prophecy, signifies to commit them to memory, to meditate upon them and digest them. (Compare Rev. x. 10.)

Ver. 9. Behold, a hand was sent unto me, &c.] I saw a hand stretched out towards me, as from that Divine person which appeared to me in the shape of a man, i. 26. (Compare viii. 3. Jer. i. 9. Dan. x. 10.)

And, lo, a roll of a book was therein.] Wherein was contained the contents of the following prophecy. (Compare Rev. v. 1.)

The ancient way of writing was upon long scrolls of parchment rolled upon sticks. (See Isa. viii. 1. Jer. xxxvi. 1.)

Ver. 10. And he spread it before me.] That I might understand the contents of it.

And it was written within and without.] It was written on both sides, both that which was innermost when it was rolled up, and on the outside also: to denote a large collection of prophecies. (Compare Rev. v. 1.)

And there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe.] All the prophecies contained therein consisted of God's judgments and mournful events, without any mixture of mercy, at least with respect to the Jews of the present age.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet hath more particular instructions given him for the discharge of his office; and is encouraged to undertake it by a promise of God's especial assistance.

Ver. 1. EAT this roll.] See ii. 8, 9.

Ver. 2. So I opened my mouth.] I readily complied with God's command, which this vision figuratively expressed. (Compare Jer. xxv. 17.)

Ver. 3. Cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this roll.] The belly often signifies in Scripture the mind, or secret thoughts. (See Job xxxii. 18. Prov. xviii. 8. xx. 27. John vii. 38.) So here the expressions denote the laying up this prophecy in his memory. (See ver. 10. and the note on ii. 8.)

It was in my mouth as honey for sweetness.] I took delight in having God's secret counsels communicated to me, and in delivering his commands to my brethren; and was pleased with the hopes of being an instrument of their conversion, and the amendment of some of them: but yet this pleasure was afterward very much allayed by the heavy tidings I was to be the messenger of, and the ill treatment I was to expect. (See ver. 14. compare Jer. xv. 16, 17. Rev. x. 10.)

Ver. 5. For thou art not sent to a people of a strange speech.] It would be a great addition to the burden of thy office, if thou wert sent as a prophet to a foreign nation, and to a people whose language thou couldest not understand, nor they thine, as Jonah was.

Ver. 6. Surely, had I sent thee to them, they would have hearkened unto thee.] And yet in all appearance those strangers would have hearkened to thy preaching sooner than the house of Israel will, as the Ninevites did to Jonah's. (Compare Matt. xii. 41. xi. 21.) The particles im lo are very well rendered surely: they are the form of an oath, the words, As I live, being understood. (Compare v. 11. xvii. 19. Numb. xiv. 28.)

Ver. 7. For they will not hearken unto me.] They have so long resisted the means of grace that I have offered them by the former prophets, (see Jer. xxv. 4.) that there is less hopes of their conversion, than if they were infidels. (Compare Matt. v. 13.)

Ver. 8. Behold, I have made thy face strong against their faces.] I have given thee courage and assurance proportionable to the hardiness and impudence of those thou hast to deal with. (See ii. 6. Isa. l. 7.)

Ver. 10. All the words that I shall speak unto thee, receive in thy heart.] See the note on ii. 8.

Ver. 12. Then the Spirit took me up.] Carried me from the place where I was before, when I saw the vision mentioned i. 3, 4. (See the note on viii. 3.)

And I heard behind me the voice as of a great rushing.] I heard a voice so loud, that it shook the earth like thunder. (See John xii. 27, 28.)

Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place.] Whatever place God honours with his especial presence, is equivalent to his temple, and there the angels always attend upon the Divine Majesty, to give him the honour due unto his name. (Compare Gen. xxviii. 13. 16. 19.) The words imply, that though God should forsake his temple, (see the note on ix. 3.) and destroy the place that is called by his name, yet his presence will make a temple of every place, and multitudes of the heavenly host will always be ready to do him service.

Ver. 13. I heard also the noise of the wings of the living creatures.] See the note on i. 20.

The noise of the wheels over against them.] That is, besides them, as the Hebrew phrase is elsewhere rendered. (See the note on i. 20.)

Ver. 14. So the Spirit lifted me up.] See ver. 12. and the note on viii. 3. xxxvii. 1.

And I went in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit.] The joy that I first conceived in receiving the Divine message, was quickly turned into grief and anguish of mind. (See ver. 15.)

And the hand of the Lord was strong upon me.] I was unable to resist the impulses of God's Spirit. (See i. 4. viii. 1. Jer. xx. 9.)

Ver. 15. Then I came to them of the captivity of Tel-abib, that dwelt by the river of Chebar.] These seem to be a distinct colony of captives from those that are mentioned i. 3. (See ver. 23. of this chapter.) The king of Babylon carried away the Jews by several captivities: some in the first year of his reign; (Dan. i. 1.) some in the seventh; (Jer. lii. 28.) then followed Jeconiah's captivity in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar, (2 Kings xxiv. 12.) when Ezekiel himself was carried captive.

And I remained there among them astonished seven days.] Having my spirit wholly cast down and amazed under the apprehension of these terrible judgments which were to come upon my nation, and of which I was to be the messenger. (Compare Jer. xxiii. 9. Habak. iii. 16.) Seven days was the space of time appointed for mourning. (See Gen. l. 10. 1 Sam. xxxi. 13. Job ii. 3. Ecclus. xxii. 12.)

Ver. 17. I have made thee a watchman to the house of Israel.] Prophets have the title of watchmen given to them: (see Isa. lvi. 10. Jer. vi. 17.) like watchmen placed on the tower, (see Habak. ii. 1.) they by their prophetical spirit foresee the evils coming upon the ungodly, and are bound to give people timely notice to avoid them by a sincere repentance. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 18. When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die.] This is, unless he repent, a condition generally to be understood in such-like threatenings. (See xviii. 27.)

And thou givest him not warning, &c.] We are to distinguish a prophet's immediate commission to go to any particular person in God's name, from such a general charge to inform others of their duty, which is incumbent upon all pastors and teachers. These latter can only give men general warnings, unless where they have received such informations as are a sufficient ground for a particular reproof.

The same wicked man shall die in his iniquity.] He shall die in a state of sin, and be condemned to those punishments to which death translates sinners. (See John viii. 24. and the note upon xviii. 4.)

But his blood will I require at thy hand.] Thou shalt be accountable for the loss of his soul, just as a man's blood is laid to the charge of him that is any way accessory to his death. (Compare Gen. ix. 5.)

Ver. 19. But thou hast delivered thy soul.] Thou art clear from the guilt of his sin. (Compare Acts xx. 26.)

Ver. 20. And I lay a stumbling-block before him.] I caused his iniquity to become his ruin, as the word micshol is translated, xviii. 30.

Ver. 22. And the hand of the Lord was there upon me.] See ver. 14. i. 3.

Arise, Go into the plain.] As a place more retired and fitter for contemplation.

Ver. 23. The glory of the Lord stood there.] See i. 28.

As the glory which I saw by the river of Chebar.] This part of that river seems distant from that place where the former vision was shewed him. (Compare ver. 15. with i. 3.) Then the Spirit entered into me, and set me upon my feet, and spake with me. The words are literally to be translated thus: Then the Spirit entered into me, and set me upon my feet; and he spake unto me: for the last verb is in the masculine gender, and the two former in the feminine. In like manner the fifth verse of the eleventh chapter should be read, And the Spirit of the Lord fell upon me, and he said unto me. The Spirit or power of God which the prophet felt within him, (called likewise the hand of the Lord, ver. 14. 22. of this chapter, and viii. 1.) being distinguished here from the Divine glory or Schechinah, which the prophet saw, as it is very plainly, ii. 2. And the Spirit entered into me, when he spake unto me.

Go, shut thyself within thy house.] Hereby to represent the siege of Jerusalem. (See iv. 1, &c.)

Ver. 25. They shall put bands upon thee, &c.] Thou shalt be confined to lie so many days upon thy right side, and so many upon the left, as if thou wert bound and not able to stir. (See iv. 8.) The LXX. and the Vulgar Latin read, Bands shall be put upon thee: and it is very common in the Hebrew language to take the verb transitive in an impersonal sense. (See the notes on Isa. xliv. 18.)

Thou shalt be dumb, and shalt not be to them a reprover.] Ezekiel's dumbness might proceed from two causes: excess of grief, as we read ver. 15. of this chapter, that he remained astonished seven days: wherein he was a type or figure of the condition of the Jews, when they were to be astonied one with another, (iv. 17.) Another cause of his silence might be by way of reproof to them for disbelieving what he had before delivered by the commands of God. (See the note on xxxii. 22. xxiv. 17.) And because they regarded not the words which God commanded him to speak to them, he was directed to instruct them only by signs, such as are those emblems of the siege contained in the next chapter.

Ver. 27. But when I speak with thee [or, to thee], I will open thy mouth.] But when I bid thee declare my commands by word of mouth, thou shalt have free liberty to speak. (See xi. 25.)

He that heareth, let him hear; and he that forbeareth, let him forbear.] The sum of what thou shalt say unto them is this: To let them know that this is the last warning God will give them; and therefore let them take it as such, and either give heed to what is said to them, or neglect it at their utmost peril. (Compare 1 Cor. xiv. 38. Rev. xxii. 11.)

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

Under the emblem of a siege, and of the straitness of provision during the siege, is shewed the miseries the Jews shall suffer when the city is besieged: and by the prophet's lying upon his right and left side a certain number of days, is declared of how long continuance those sins were which God did visit upon that people.

Ver. 1. TAKE thee a tile, and lay it before thee.] The prophets often foreshew impending judgments by significative emblems, being of greater force and efficacy than words. So Jeremy was commanded to go down to the potter's house, and see how frequently vessels were marred in his hands, (chap. xviii.) and to take one of those earthen vessels and break it in the sight of the elders of the Jews, (chap. xix.) that they might thereby be sensibly taught the greatness of God's power, and their own frailty. So here God commands the prophet to take a tile, or such a slate as the mathematicians draw lines or figures upon, and there make a portraiture of Jerusalem, thereby to represent it as under a siege. We may observe that God often suits prophetical types and figures to the genius and education of the prophets themselves. So the figures which Amos makes use of are generally taken from such observations as are proper to the employment of a shepherd or a husbandman. Ezekiel had a peculiar talent for architecture; so several of his representations are suitable to that profession. And they that suppose the emblem here made use of to be below the dignity of the prophetical office, may as well accuse Archimedes of folly for making lines in the dust.

Ver. 2. And lay siege against it, &c.] Make a portraiture of a siege, and of such warlike preparations as are necessary to it.

Ver. 3. Moreover, take thou unto thee an iron pan.] A plate or slice, as the margin reads. This may either represent the walls of Jerusalem, which were to be broken down, in order to the taking of it, as the following words may be thought to imply; or else some of those works which the besiegers cast up for their own defence: so this is another representation of the siege mentioned ver. 1.

This shall be a sign to the house of Israel.] Ezekiel often expressed God's purposes by signs. (See xii. 2. 12. xxiv. 24. 27. and the notes upon ver. 17. of this chapter.)

Ver. 4. Lie also on thy left side.] Lie on that side without stirring or moving thyself. (See ver. 8.)

According to the number of the days thou shalt lie upon it thou shalt bear their iniquity.] By lying on one side thou shalt signify God's forbearing their punishment for so many years: so the words are commonly explained; but in my opinion not agreeably to the genuine sense of the phrase, To bear one's iniquity. [The word nasa, to bear, when it is joined with sin, or iniquity, doth sometimes signify to forgive, or forbear the punishment due to sin, particularly Psal. xxv. 18. and is sometimes rendered by ἀφίημι in the LXX. but it usually denotes bearing or suffering punishment; (see Lev. xvi. 22.) especially when it is joined with laying on iniquity, as it is here. (See ver. 4, 5.) And we find the circumstances under which Ezekiel was here placed, were all of them penal.] As also that other expression of laying iniquity upon any, imports the imputing the guilt of it, or inflicting the punishment due unto it. So here the prophet does in vision bear the punishment due to the idolatry of Israel and Judah, which had continued, the one for three hundred and ninety, the other for forty years.

The circumstances of this vision prove, that the prophet did really perform what is here related; or else it could not have been a sign unto the house of Israel, (ver. 3.) unless they themselves had been eye-witnesses of it. (Compare xii. 7. 11.) The chief objection against this opinion is, that there is not the distance of four hundred and thirty days between this vision and that which is next related; (viii. 1.) but that may be answered by supposing this to be an intercalary year, which may be supposed to have happened often in the Jewish computation of time, whose years consisted at most but of three hundred and sixty days, or, as some think, were lunar years, reduced by intercalations to the solar form. (See Dr. Prideaux, Script. Hist. par. i. p. 281.) [Concerning the form of the Jewish year, see many useful observations on Mr. Marshal's treatise upon the Seventy Weeks, par. ii. chap. 4.]

Ver. 5. Three hundred and ninety days.] The most probable computation of this time is, to date its beginning from Jeroboam's first setting up the idolatrous worship of the golden calves, to the last captivity of the Jews, in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign. (See Jer. lii. 30.) This seems to have made an entire riddance of the natives of the land, and consequently to be the finishing stroke of the Jewish captivity. Both Judah and Israel being now entirely carried away, whereas before that time many of the ten tribes lived in their own habitation. (See 2 Chron. xxix. 14. xxxi. 11. 18. xxxii. 33. Ezra vi. 17.)

Ver. 6. Thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days.] This series of time may probably be computed from the eighteenth year of Josiah, at which time the king and people entered into a solemn covenant to serve and worship God, so that the idolatry they were afterward guilty of received a new aggravation, as being a breach of this solemn covenant, the greater part of the people being still idolatrous in their hearts. (See the notes on Jer. iii. 6. 10.) The thirtieth year, mentioned in the beginning of this prophecy, is supposed to take its date from the eighteenth year of Josiah, which makes it probable that the prophet refers to the same era in this place.

Scaliger and some others begin these forty years from Jeremiah's mission as a prophet, which was in the thirteenth year of Josiah, from which time till the last year of Zedekiah, when the city and temple were destroyed, is just forty years. [The learned bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, in his defence of Christianity, chap. 3. sect. 1. explains the forty days of Judah's transgression of the years wherein Judah had exceeded Israel in idolatry under the reign of Manasses. The sins committed at that time filled up the measure of Judah's transgressions. See 2 Kings xxi. 11—13. xxiii. 26. xxiv. 3. Jer. xv. 4.]

I have appointed each day for a year.] Days frequently stand for years in the prophetical accounts of time. See Numb. xiv. 34. After the number of forty days (each day for a year), shall you bear your iniquities, even forty years. Dan. ix. 24. The days of the seventy weeks must necessarily be understood in the same sense, so as to make up the sum of four hundred and ninety years. And the one thousand two hundred and sixty days mentioned Rev. xi. 3. are, according to the genius of the prophetical style, to be understood of so many years.

Ver. 7. Therefore thou shalt set thy face towards the siege of Jerusalem.] When thou liest in one posture, as is commanded thee, ver. 4. 6. thou shalt still have the portraiture of the siege of Jerusalem before thy face; (ver. 1.) or setting thy face towards the siege of Jerusalem, may signify looking earnestly, or with a threatening visage towards it; as the prophet is said to set his face against a place, when he prophesies against it. (See vi. 2.)

And thy arm shall be uncovered.] Or, stretched out. Their habits were anciently contrived, so that the right arm was disengaged from the upper garments, that they might be the more ready for action. So ancient statues and coins represent heroes with their right arm bare, and out of the sleeve of their garments. Thus God is said to make bare his arm, Isa. lii. 10. where he is represented as subduing his adversaries, and bringing salvation to his people.

And thou shalt prophesy against it.] By signs and not by words. (See the note on iii. 26.)

Ver. 8. I will lay bands upon thee.] See iii. 25.

Till thou hast ended the days of thy siege.] The three hundred and ninety days mentioned ver. 5. 9. were designed not only to signify the years of Israel's sin, but the continuance of the siege of Jerusalem. That siege lasted, from the beginning to the ending of it, seventeen months, as appears from 2 Kings xxv. 1—4. But the king of Egypt coming to relieve the city, was the occasion of raising the siege for some time, as appears from Jer. xxxvii. 3. So that it may reasonably be gathered from the authority of the text joined to the circumstances of the story, that the siege lasted about thirteen months, or three hundred and ninety days. (See Archbishop Usher's Annals, ad An. Mundi 3415.)

Ver. 9. Take thou also unto thee wheat and barley, &c.] In time of scarcity it is usual to mix a great deal of the coarse kinds of grain with a little of the better sort, to make their provisions last the longer. Thus Ezekiel was commanded to do, to signify the scarcity and coarse fare the inhabitants should endure in the siege of the city.

According to the number of the days thou shalt lie upon thy side, three hundred and ninety days shalt thou eat thereof.] During which time the siege lasted, (see ver. 8.) The forty days mentioned ver. 6. seem not to be reckoned into this account. These denoted Judah's sin of forty years' continuance, from the eighteenth year of Josiah, (ver. 6.) And as they were superadded to the three hundred and ninety days of the siege, they may signify the days spent in plundering the city, and burning the temple, and carrying away the remnant of the people: Jerusalem was taken on the ninth day of the fourth month, (Jer. lii. 6.) and on the tenth day of the fifth month the temple was burnt; (ver. 12.) and so we reasonably conjecture, by the eighteenth of that month, which was the fortieth from the taking of the place, the whole city was burnt, and the few Jews which were left were carried into captivity.

Ver. 10. And the meat which thou shalt eat shall be by weight, twenty shekels a day.] In sieges it is common to stint every one to a certain allowance, by which means they can guess how long their provisions will last; twenty shekels is but ten ounces, a short allowance for a day's sustenance. (See ver. 16. Jer. xxxvii. 21.)

From time to time shalt thou eat it.] This shall be thy daily allowance during the whole three hundred and ninety days.

Ver. 11. The sixth part of a hin.] Which is something above a pint and a half of our measure. (See Bishop Cumberland's account of Jewish Weights and Measures, placed at the end of many English Bibles.)

Ver. 12. And thou shalt eat it as barley-cakes.] Such as people make in haste, when they have not time for preparing a set meal. (See Exod. xii. 39.) This represents the hurry and disorder of a siege.

And thou shalt bake it with dung, &c.] To signify the scarcity of all sorts of fuel. (See ver. 15.)

Ver. 13. Even thus shall the children of Israel eat their defiled bread among the gentiles, &c.] Their circumstances in their captivity shall not permit them to observe the rules of their law relating to unclean meats, and they will be constrained to partake of meats, part of which hath been offered unto idols. (Compare Dan. i. 8. Hos. ix. 1.) Bread is often used in the Hebrew for all sorts of food. (See Gen. xliii. 31.)

Ver. 14. Behold, my soul had not been polluted, &c.] I have always carefully observed the distinction between meats clean and unclean: I beseech thee, command me not now to eat any thing so contrary to my former practice.

Neither came there abominable flesh into my mouth.] The Hebrew word piggul, abominable, is properly used of such meats as are forbidden by the law. (See Lev. vii. 18. xix.

7. Isa. lxv. 4.) Such as are those here mentioned. (See the texts quoted in the margin of our Bibles.)

Ver. 16. I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem.] The siege shall produce a scarcity of bread in Jerusalem, (2 Kings xxv. 3.) and deprive you of the chief support of man's life. (Compare Lev. xiv. 13. xxvi. 26. Isa. iii. 1.)

They shall eat their bread by weight, and with care, &c.] See ver. 10, 11. When they have consumed their last allowance, they shall be in great care where to get more for the next meal; and some of you be forced to eat the flesh of their nearest relation. (See v. 10.)

Ver. 17. And be astonished one with another, and consume away in your iniquities.] Look one upon another as persons under astonishment for the greatness of your calamities, and pining away or dying a lingering death through famine and other hardships. (See xxiv. 23.)

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet is commanded to shave his hair, and then consume it, to signify thereby God's judgment upon Jerusalem for her repeated provocations, by famine, sword, and dispersion.

Ver. 1. TAKE thee a sharp knife, take thee a barber's razor.] The latter expression explains the former: hair being an ornament, and baldness a token of sorrow, thereupon shaving denotes a great calamity or desolation. (Compare Isa. vii. 20.) Maimonides (More Nevoch. lib. ii. cap. 46.) observes upon this place, that the priests were forbidden to shave their heads, (see xliv. 20.) and not allowed to do it in the time of mourning; (Lev. xxi. 5.) from whence that author concludes, that what the prophet has here commanded, was performed only in vision. But there is no need of such an evasion to answer that difficulty. For the immediate command of God to any prophet, is a sufficient discharge from any obligations of the ceremonial law. So Elijah offered sacrifice upon Mount Carmel, (1 Kings xviii. 20.) contrary to the rule of the law, Deut. xii. 5.

Then take the balances, &c.] To signify the exactness of the Divine justice.

Ver. 2. And thou shalt burn a third part in the midst of the city.] Of that portraiture of the city which the prophet was commanded to make, vi. 1. this signifies the destruction of the inhabitants within the city by famine and pestilence. (See ver. 12. vii. 12.)

And thou shalt take a third part, and smite it about with a knife.] To shew that a third part of the inhabitants shall be slain with the sword, just after they have escaped out of the city. (See ver. 12.) This was remarkably fulfilled in the slaughter of Zedekiah's sons, and the rest of his retinue, Jer. lii. 10.

And a third part thou shalt scatter in the wind, and I will draw out a sword after them.] The rest shall be dispersed to all the four winds. (See vi. 8.) And even my vengeance shall pursue many of them in their dispersions. (See ver. 12. and compare Lev. xxvi. 33. Jer. xxiv. 10. xliv. 12. Amos ix. 4.)

Ver. 3. And bind them in thy skirts.] The Hebrew reads, in thy wings; to signify that they should be placed under the Divine protection. (See Psal. xci. 4.) This denotes those that should be left in the land under Gedaliah, Jer. xl. 5, 6.

Ver. 4. Then take of them again, and cast them into the midst of the fire.] This denotes the conspiracy which Ishmael formed against Gedaliah, and the calamities that followed thereupon.

For thereof shall come a fire forth into all the house of Israel.] This was the occasion of the utter ruin of that poor remainder of the Jews which were left in their native country. Thereupon some of them went down into Egypt, where they were all consumed, according to Jeremiah's prophecy against them: (see xliv. 11, &c.) and the rest that remained in the land were entirely carried away captive by Nebuzar-adan. (See Jer. lii. 30.)

Ver. 5. This is Jerusalem, I have set it in the midst of the nations.] This Jerusalem thou dost now prophesy against, was placed in the midst of the heathen nations; it made a figure among them for the sake of my temple, and the visible tokens of my presence there. (See xvi. 14. 1 Kings viii. 41, 42.) It was a city set on a hill, on purpose that it might be a pattern of religion and virtue to them. (Compare Matt. v. 14.)

Ver. 6. And she hath changed my judgments into wickedness.] Or, She hath rebelled against my judgments, for the sake of wickedness; that is, to fulfil her wicked desires: for so the verb marah is rightly translated xx. 8.

More than the nations.] She hath sinned against a clearer light and greater convictions. (Compare xvi. 48. Matt. xii. 41, 42.)

For they have refused my judgments.] The reason why the heathen have rejected my laws, is because they have kept constant to the religion of their forefathers: whereas the Jews have forsaken that religion which their forefathers received from me. (See the next verse.)

Ver. 7. Because you have multiplied more than the nations.] The French translation reads, Because thou hast multiplied thy wickedness: some such word ought to be added to supply the sense.

Neither have done according to the judgments of the nations round about you.] Or rather, According to the manner of the nations round about you: as the very same phrase is translated, xi. 12. You have not been so constant and zealous for the true religion as they are in a false one. (Compare xvi. 47. Jer. ii. 10, 11. Micah iv. 5.)

Ver. 9. And I will do unto thee that which I have not done.] As your sins have particular aggravations above those other nations, so your punishment shall be proportionably greater. (See Dan. ix. 12. Lam. iv. 6. Amos iii. 2.)

And I will not do any more the like.] The punishments you shall suffer shall be more remarkable for their greatness than those I shall at any time inflict upon other nations. The punishment due to the sins of Israel and Judah, which the prophet was to bear for four hundred and thirty days by way of type or vision, may probably signify a judgment to continue for such a length of time as is not yet expired; according to God's threatenings, that for their obstinacy and irreclaimableness, he would go on to punish them seven times more for their sins; (Lev. xxvi. 18. 28.) multiplying the length of their calamities by a sevenfold proportion. And taking the words in this large extent, so as to comprehend all the marks of God's indignation which have already lain upon that people for above sixteen hundred years, and how much longer they may continue we know not, it may truly be said, that none of God's judgments have been like it.

Ver. 10. Therefore the fathers shall eat the sons in the midst of thee.] A terrible judgment threatened by Moses, Lev. xxvi. 29. Deut. xxviii. 53. and afterward by Jeremy, xix. 9. and actually fulfilled in the famine that attended the siege of Jerusalem. (See Lam. ii. 20. iv. 10.)

And the whole remnant of them will I scatter into all the winds.] This is another judgment threatened against them by Moses, Deut. xxviii. 56. and remarkably fulfilled in this their last dispersion, when every known part of the world hath some share of them, and yet they live every where like strangers, only upon sufferance.

Ver. 11. Because thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things, and with all thy abominations.] Thou hast profaned my temple, by placing idols in it. (See vii. 20. viii. 5. xxiii. 38. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14.) Detestable things and abominations are words of the same signification, denoting idols. (See xi. 21.)

Therefore will I also diminish thee, neither shall mine eye spare, &c.] Or, I will destroy thee, (for so this word is used, Numb. xxvii. 4.) without shewing any pity or compassion. (See vii. 4. 9. viii. 18. ix. 10. xxiv. 14.)

Ver. 12. A third part of thee shall die by the pestilence, (see xiv. 22.) and with the famine, &c.] See ver. 2. vi. 12. Jer. xv. 2. xxi. 9.

And I will draw out a sword after them.] And thereby fulfil that threatening denounced against them, Lev. xxvi. 33. Compare likewise Deut. xxviii. 65. Amos ix. 4. All which places import, that God's anger should still pursue them even into the countries whither they were banished and carried captive. This was particularly fulfilled in those that went into Egypt; (ser Jer. xliv. 7.) and it was remarkably verified in the several persecutions and massacres they have undergone at different times, in most of the countries of Europe, in latter ages: of which see an account in Basnage's continuation of Josephus.

Ver. 13. I will cause my fury to rest upon them.] See the note on viii. 18. The words may be rendered thus, I will cause my fury towards them to rest, as the phrase is translated, xvi. 42. that is, my anger shall be appeased towards them, after I have executed due punishment upon their sins.

And I will be comforted.] This and the former expression is borrowed from men's passions, who find some ease and rest in their minds upon their venting them, and bringing offenders to condign punishment. So God is here described as feeling ease and satisfaction in executing his justice upon obstinate and incorrigible sinners. (Compare xvi. 42. xxi. 17. Isa. i. 24.)

They shall know that I the Lord have spoken it in my zeal.] Out of a just concern for mine own honour and authority which they have slighted and despised. (See xxxvi. 5, 6. xxxviii. 17.) The word may likewise be taken here for that passion of jealousy that is proper to a husband when his wife proves false to him, and is applied to God, when his people forsake his worship and serve idols. (See xvi. 35. 42. xxiii. 25.)

The covenant between God and his people is often represented under the notion of a marriage-contract: (see xvi. 8.) whereupon idolatry is called going a whoring after other gods, and committing adultery with sticks and stones. (Jer. iii. 9.)

Ver. 14. I will make them waste and a reproach among the nations, &c.] See Deut. xxviii. 37. 1 Kings ix. 7. Psal. lxxix. 4. Jer. xxiv. 9. Lam. ii. 15.

Ver. 15. So it shall be—an instruction to the nations.] They shall learn from such an example of vengeance, to hear me and be afraid of my judgments.

In furious rebukes.] See xxv. 17.

Ver. 16. When I shall send upon them the evil arrows of famine, &c.] God's judgments are elsewhere expressed by arrows. (See Deut. xxxii. 23. Psal. vii. 13. lxiv. 7. xci. 5.)

And I will break the staff of your bread.] See iv. 16.

Ver. 17. So I will send upon you famine and evil beasts.] Wild beasts multiply in a land when it is become uninhabited, (Exod. xxiii. 29.) This is likewise a punishment threatened against the Jews among other desolations. (See Lev. xxvi. 22. Deut. xxxii. 24. and compare xiv. 21. xxxiii. 27. xxxiv. 25. of this prophecy.)

And pestilence and blood shall pass through thee.] Blood signifies any unusual sort of death, and denotes here such a pestilence as will destroy multitudes. (Compare xiv. 19.) Or it may be equivalent to the sword which is joined with the pestilence, ver. 12. (See xxxviii. 22.)

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet continues to denounce God's severe judgments upon the Jews for their idolatry: but tells them that a remnant shall be saved, and by their afflictions shall be brought to a sense of their evil doings.

Ver. 2. SET thy face towards the mountains of Israel.] Direct thy face and thy speech towards the mountains in the land of Judea. (Compare iv. 7. xiii. 17. xx. 46. xxi. 2. xxv. 2. xxxviii. 2.)

Towards the mountains of Israel.] Judea was a hilly country. (See Josh. xi. 21. xx. 7.) So the whole land of Judea is expressed here and elsewhere by the mountains of Israel. (See xix. 9. xxxiii. 18. xxxiv. 14. xxxv. 12. xxxvi. 1. xxxvii. 22. Isa. lxv. 9. Micah vi. 1.) The prophets sometimes direct their discourse to the inanimate parts of the creation, thereby to upbraid the stupidity of men. (See Isa. i. 2.)

And prophesy against them.] As the most conspicuous parts of the land: but the judgments denounced extend to all the other parts of the country, as appears in the following verse.

Ver. 3. Thus saith the Lord God to the mountains and to the hills, to the rivers and to the valleys.] Every part of the country had been defiled with idolatry: the altars built for idol-worship were commonly placed upon mountains and hills. (See xvi. 16. 24. Jer. ii. 20. iii. 6.) The shady valleys and river-sides were likewise made use of for the same purpose; (ibid. ver. 23.) particularly for the sacrificing of children offered to Moloch. (See Isa. lvii. 5. Jer. vii. 31.) So the prophet denounces a general judgment against the whole country.

Ver. 4. Your altars shall be desolate, and your images

shall be broken, &c.] The verse is plainly taken from Lev. xxvi. 30. where Moses denounces the same judgments against the Jews upon their provocations. The word hamannim, images, is generally supposed to signify such as were erected to the honour of the sun, and is accordingly translated sun-images in the margin. (Compare 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4. Isa. xvii. 8.)

I will cast down your slain men before your idols.] So that their sin may be read in the manner of their punishment. (See Lev. xxvi. 30.)

Ver. 7. And ye shall know that I am the Lord.] An epiphonema, or conclusion of a severe denunciation often repeated by this prophet; importing, that the judgments God intended to bring upon the Jews, would make the most hardened and stupid sinners sensible that this was God's hand.

Ver. 8. I will leave a remnant, &c.] A gracious exception that often occurs in the prophets, when they denounce general judgments against the Jews: implying, that God will still reserve a remnant of that people to whom he will fulfil the promises made to their fathers. (See xiv. 22. and the notes upon Isa. iv. 2. Jer. xliv. 14.)

Ver. 9. And they that escape of you shall remember me among the nations.] Their afflictions shall bring them to the sense of themselves, and their duty to me. (See Hos. v. 15.)

Because I am broken with their whorish heart.] My patience is tired out with this people's idolatries, called in Scripture spiritual whoredom. (See the note on v. 13.)

God is here introduced as speaking after the manner of men, whose patience is tired out by the repeated provocations of others, especially when they see no hopes of amendment. (Compare Isa. xliii. 24.)

And with their eyes which go a whoring after their idols.] The eyes are the seat of lascivious inclinations. (See 2 Pet. ii. 14.) So in pursuance of the same metaphor, they are said to be enticed to idolatry; being often tempted to idolatrous worship, by the costliness of the images, and the fine show which they make. (See Jer. x. 4. 9. Dan. xi. 38.)

And they shall loathe themselves for the evils which they have committed.] They shall abhor themselves, as Job speaks xlii. 6. when they reflect upon their manifold provocations. (See vii. 16. xii. 16. xx. 43. xxxvi. 32.)

Ver. 10. And that I have not said in vain.] Or, without cause, as the word hinnam is more significantly translated, xiv. 22.

Ver. 11. Smite with thy hand, and stamp with thy foot, &c.] Join to thy words the gestures which are proper to express grief and concern at the wickedness of thy people, and for their calamities that will ensue. (Compare xxi. 12. 14. Numb. xxiv. 10.)

For they shall fall by the sword, &c.] See v. 12.

Ver. 12. He that is far off.] He that is out of the reach of the siege.

Ver. 13. When their slain men shall be round about their altars, &c.] See ver. 4, 5.

Upon every high hill in all the tops of the mountains, &c.] These were the noted places for idolatrous worship. (See Jer. ii. 20. Hos. iv. 13. and the notes upon ver. 3. of this chapter.)

And under every green tree, and under every thick oak.] The offering sacrifice in groves and shady places was another ancient rite of idolatry; (see the note on Isa. i. 29.) upon which account groves and images are often joined together by the sacred writers.

Ver. 14. Yea, more desolate than the wilderness towards Diblath.] Diblath was part of the desert in the borders of Moab. (See Numb. xxxiii. 46. Jer. xlviii. 22.)

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet denounces the irreversible judgment of captivity, and final desolation upon the Jews, for their idolatry and other heinous sins.

Ver. 2. UPON the land of Israel.] This comprehends the whole country of Judea. (Compare xii. 22. xiii. 9. xviii. 2.) Israel is often put for Judah after the captivity of the ten tribes: (see Micah i. 14. iii. 9, 10. Mal. i. 1. ii. 11.) they that were left of the ten tribes, joining themselves to the tribe of Judah. (See 2 Chron. xxx. 11. 18.) Dr. Prideaux supposes, that Manasses and his successors in the kingdom of Judah had the dominion of the whole land of Canaan, formerly divided into the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, as tributaries under the kings of Assyria. (See his Connexion of Scripture History, par. i. p. 34.)

The end is come upon the four corners of the land.] Upon the whole country. (Compare Numb. xxiv. 17.)

Ver. 4. Mine eye shall not spare thee, &c.] See v. 17.

And ye shall know that I am the Lord.] See vi. 17.

Ver. 5. An only evil, behold, is come.] Such an evil as shall comprehend all other calamities in it.

Ver. 6. An end is come.] A destruction which shall be fatal to a great part of those that go into captivity, as well as to those who are consumed in their own country. (See v. 12. vi. 8. Jer. xliv. 27.)

Ver. 7. The morning is come upon thee.] God's judgments shall overtake thee speedily and unexpectedly. (Compare Psal. xlvi. 9.) The expression alludes to the time when the magistrates use to give sentence against offenders, which was in the morning. (See the notes upon Jer. xxi. 12.)

Ver. 7. The time is come.] The time of God's vengeance, called elsewhere the day of the Lord. (Compare ver. 12. xxi. 25. xxx. 3. Jer. xvii. 7.)

And not the sounding again of the mountains.] The sound of war and tumults; not such a joyful sound as useth to echo from the mountains, by which the treaders of grapes express their satisfaction at the time of the vintage; which the Hebrew word hed or heidad, properly signifies. (See Isa. xvi. 9. Jer. xxv. 30. xlviii. 33.)

Ver. 10. The rod hath blossomed, pride hath budded.] Wickedness daily spreads and increases, till it becomes ripe for judgment.

Ver. 11. Neither shall there be any wailing for them.] In an utter destruction there shall none escape to bewail the calamities of their brethren; or they shall use no expressions of sorrow, as persons that are astonished under the greatness of their afflictions. (Compare xiv. 16. 22. Deut. xxviii. 28. 34.)

Ver. 12. Let not the buyer rejoice, nor the seller mourn.] The buyer will have no reason to rejoice, because he will not enjoy what he hath bought; nor the seller cause to mourn for the loss of his possessions, which the approaching captivity will for ever deprive him of.

Ver. 13. For the sel'er shall not return to that which is sold, although they were yet alive.] The year of jubilee shall be no advantage to the sellers, when once they are gone into captivity: for though they should live so long, yet they shall not enjoy the benefit of the law, (Lev. xxv. 13.) nor return any more to their possessions.

Neither shall any strengthen himself in the iniquity of his life.] And though they harden themselves in sin, and shut their eyes against the judgments which hang over their heads, these will at last unavoidably overtake them.

Ver. 14. They have blown the trumpet, (see Jer. vi. 1.) but none goeth to the battle.] Men's hearts fail them, as looking upon themselves as given up to destruction. (See ver. 17.)

Ver. 15. The sword is without, the pestilence and famine within.] See v. 2. 12.

Ver. 16. But they that are escaped of them shall escape.] Some few of them shall have the favour of escaping the common calamity, called elsewhere the escaped or the remnant, from whence is derived the phrase οἱ Σωζόμενοι in the New Testament, such as are or should be saved. (See the note on Isa. i. 9. Jer. xliv. 14.)

And shall be upon the mountains like doves in the valleys, &c.] When they flee from the enemy to the mountains, [compare Psal. xi. 1. Matt. xxiv. 16.] and are escaped out of the imminent danger that threatened them, they will then reflect upon their former provocations, and bemoan themselves, and their calamities the effects of them. (See vi. 9. and compare Isa. xxxviii. 14. lix. 11.)

All of them mourning.] St. Jerome renders it, All of them trembling: an epithet ascribed to doves, Hos. xi. 11. who are by nature exceeding timorous: this interpretation implies, that their guilt should make them very apprehensive of God's judgments, and fearful what should befal them.

Ver. 17. All hands shall be feeble, and all knees shall be weak as water.] Weakness and failing of spirits doth cause feebleness in the hands and knees. (Compare xxi. 7. Isa. xxxv. 3. Job iv. 3, 4.)

Ver. 18. Horror shall cover them.] Or, overwhelm them, as the phrase is translated Psal. lv. 6.

Shame shall be upon all faces.] The marks of confusion and misery, covering the face, or shaving the head, and making it bald, as it follows. (See the note on Isa. xv. 2.)

Ver. 19. They shall cast their silver into the streets, and their gold shall be removed.] Or, shall be accounted an unclean thing; so the margin renders the word leniddah, in the following verse: it shall be valued no more than dung or filthiness, as being made a prey to the conquerors.

They shall not satisfy their souls, nor fill their bowels.] Their wealth will not procure them the necessaries of life under the straits of famine, or miseries of bondage.

Because it is the stumbling-block of their iniquity.] They laid out their silver and gold in making ornaments for their idols. (Compare xiv. 2. xvi. 17. xliv. 12.)

Ver. 20. As for the beauty of his ornament, he set it in majesty, &c.] The expressions may most probably be understood of the glory and magnificence of the temple, called elsewhere the beauty of holiness. (Compare ver. 22.) This very place they have defiled with idolatry; (see v. 11.) therefore I have given it into the hands of the gentiles to profane and pollute it. For to that sense the marginal reading rightly translates the following words. The preter-perfect tense is often used by the prophets for the future; who, to denote the certainty of the event, speak of what is to come, as if it were already done. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 9.) The same sense is expressed in the following, I will give it into the hands of strangers, &c.

Ver. 21. To the wicked of the earth.] See ver. 24.

Ver. 22. My face also will I turn from them, &c.] I will not hear them when they cry to me in their distress: (see viii. 18.) but will deliver up the holiest part of the temple, where none but the high-priest used to enter, into the hands of the Chaldeans, that shall profane and plunder it.

Ver. 23. Make a chain.] The prophets foretold things by actions as well as by words. So Jeremiah is commanded to make bonds and yokes; (Jer. xxviii. 2.) and Ezekiel here to make a chain, to foreshew the approaching captivity, when king and people should be carried in chains to Babylon. (See 2 Kings xxv. 7. Jer. xl. 1.)

For the land is full of bloody crimes.] The innocent blood that has been shed in it cries aloud for vengeance. (See ix. 9. xxiii. 27. xxvi. 18.)

Ver. 24. Therefore will I bring the worst of the heathen.] The Chaldeans, who were at that time the great oppressors of the world, and a terror to all the countries round about them. (See xxviii. 7. xxx. 11.)

I will make the pomp of the strong to cease.] All the state and magnificence of the mighty men shall be brought to nothing. (Compare xxxviii. 28.)

And their holy places shall be defiled.] The word holy places being in the plural number, denotes the temple and all its outward courts, where the people assembled for the worship of God, and thereupon were accounted holy. (Compare ix. 7. xxi. 2. Psal. lxviii. 35. lxxiii. 17. Jer. li. 51.)

Ver. 26. Then shall they seek a vision from the prophet.] Men are desirous to hear what the event shall be in times of perplexity. (See xiv. 9. xx. 1. xxxviii. 17.)

But the law shall perish from the priest, and counsel from the ancients.] Jeremiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel himself, shall go into captivity. So there shall either be no prophet left among you, or, if there be any left, they shall not be favoured with Divine revelations. (See Lam. ii. 8.)

And counsel from the ancients.] Or the elders, as the word is elsewhere translated, (viii. 1. xiv. 1. xx. 1.) men of authority, and famous for wisdom, whose advice they asked in all cases of difficulty. (See Psal. cxix. 100. Isa. iii. 2.) In like manner the prophet, the priest, and the wise men, are joined together, Jer. xviii. 18.

Ver. 27. The king shall mourn, and the princes shall be clothed with desolation, and the hands of the people shall be troubled.] There shall be a general consternation of all ranks and degrees of men. They that are in authority shall want presence of mind to give counsel and directions, and the inferiors shall have no heart to put them in execution. The word prince is synonymous with the king, as may appear by comparing xii. 10. 12. xxi. 25.

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet is carried in vision to Jerusalem, and there shewed the idolatries committed by the Jews within the precincts of the temple.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, in the sixth year.] Of Jehoiachin's captivity. (See i. 2.)

And the elders of Judah.] Men of note for their age or authority: perhaps such as had been members of the greater or lesser consistories before their captivity. These elders came to me to inquire of the Lord concerning their present state of affairs. (Compare xiv. 1. 4. xxxiii. 31.) It is probable that they, together with the priests of the captivity, often met together to consult about the public affairs, or to make orders and rules for the better government of the people. So when Sharezer and Regemmelech came to Jerusalem to ask counsel of the prophets and priests about observing the fasts relating to their former calamities, (Zech. vii. 2, 3.) it is highly probable that they were sent by the elders and priests that met in Babylon for this purpose. (See Dr. Prideaux, Connex. of Script. Hist. par. i. p. 272.)

Sat before me.] This was the posture of those that came to hear the instructions of any prophet or teacher. (Compare xiv. 1. xx. 1. xxxiii. 31. 2 Kings iv. 38.) In after-times the teachers sat in a chair or eminent seat, and the hearers sat on lower forms at the feet of their masters. (See Luke x. 39. Acts xxii. 3.)

That the hand of the Lord fell upon me.] See note on i. 3.

Ver. 2. I beheld.] A divine of great learning and character thinks the Hebrew words should be understood of the time past, and translated I had beheld; and that we are not to suppose the prophet began to see this vision while the elders were before him, but related to them by God's direction what he had formerly seen in the fourth month, the season set apart for the worship of the idol Tamuz. (See the note on ver. 14.) This sense is confirmed by comparing the place with xi. 25. Then, or Thus I spake to them of the captivity, all the things that the Lord had shewed me.

And lo a likeness as the appearance of fire, &c.] See the note on i. 27.

Ver. 3. He put forth the form of a hand.] Just as the form of a hand appeared writing upon the wall, Dan. v. 5.

And the spirit lifted me up, and brought me in the vision of God to Jerusalem.] This expression, in the vision of God, (which is likewise used again at the end of the recital of this prophecy, xi. 24. and xl. 2.) may import that all this representation was performed only in vision; that is, by a lively representation to the mind, as if the prophet had been personally present at Jerusalem. In the same manner, Elisha was present with Gehazi when he took Naaman's present, 2 Kings v. 26. and heard the words that were spoken in the king of Syria's bedchamber, 2 Kings vi. 12. And St. Paul, though he was absent in body, yet was present in spirit at the church of the Colossians, beholding their order, &c. (Colos. ii. 5.) But the words may also signify a local translation of the prophet from Chaldea to Jerusalem. (Compare iii. 14. xl. 1.)

This latter interpretation is confirmed by the spirit's lifting him up between heaven and earth, and bringing him to Jerusalem, and afterward carrying him back into Chaldea, (xi. 24.)

To the door of the inner gate.] The entrance that goes into the inner court, called the court of the priests, where the altar of burnt-offerings stood. (See ver. 5.) The prophet stood at the outside of this door, and viewed the image here mentioned, placed in some outward verge of the temple; which yet was all accounted holy ground, and called in Scripture the mount of the Lord, or the holy mountain. (See vii. 24.)

Where was the image of jealousy, that provoketh to jealousy.] An image set up within the precincts of the temple, to provoke God to jealousy, by setting up a rival against him in the place dedicated to his own worship. (See the note on v. 11.)

Ver. 4. And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there.] To shew that that was the place of his peculiar residence.

Ver. 5. Northward at the gate of the altar.] Northward of the gate or entrance that was over against the altar.

Ver. 6. That I should go far off from my sanctuary.] That I should forsake it, and deliver it up to be polluted by the heathen, (vii. 21, 22.) which is significantly represented by the departing of the Divine Glory from the threshold of the temple, x. 18.

And thou shalt see greater abominations.] Because committed by persons of greater authority, and nearer the place of my immediate presence. (See ver. 11. 14. 16.)

Ver. 7. And he brought me to the door of the court.] This Dr. Lightfoot (of the Temple, chap. 28.) understands of the east gate of the inner court, called the gate of Nicanor, over which was the council-chamber where the Sanhedrin used to meet, and in some of the rooms near it they secretly practised idolatry, as God discovered to the prophet, (ver. 11.)

Behold a hole in the wall.] Through which I could look in, and see what abominations were committed there.

Ver. 8. Then said he unto me, Dig now in the wall.] This was done only by vision, to give the clearer proof and conviction of the idolatries there committed, by thus introducing him into the rooms where they were practised.

And, when I had digged in the wall, behold a door.] Which had been made up, and another more secret entrance contrived, that they might go in and out unobserved.

Ver. 9. And he said unto me, Go in, &c.] To give me the fullest conviction, I did not only peep through the hole, mentioned ver. 8. but went into the very room where these idolatries were committed.

Ver. 10. So I went in and beheld—every form of creeping things and abominable beasts pourtrayed upon the walls round about.] Pictures were as much prohibited by the law as carved images. (See Numb. xxxiii. 53.)

The worshipping serpents and other brute creatures were idolatries practised in Egypt, and upon that account particularly forbidden by Moses, Deut. iv. 17, 18.

Ver. 11. And there stood before them seventy men of the ancients of the house of Israel.] Those probably were the members of the Sanhedrin, or great council of the Jews. (See the note on Jer. xxvi. 19.) The place of this idolatry was near the council-chamber where they used to sit. (See ver. 7.)

Ver. 12. Hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark?] See ver. 7, 8.

For they say, The Lord seeth us not, the Lord hath forsaken the earth.] They either deny the being and providence of God, (see ix. 9.) or else they say in their hearts, God hath cast us off, and withdrawn his wonted protection from us. They seem to have been of the same mind with King Ahaz, who resolved to worship the gods of the Syrians, his conquerors. (2 Chron. xxviii. 23.) So these men worshipped the idols of their neighbours, whom they saw more prosperous than themselves.

Ver. 14. Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the Lord's house, which was towards the north.] Which was over against the temple: Dr. Lightfoot (ubi supra) distinguishes this door from that mentioned ver. 5. that this was the upper north gate, and that the lower; this being just over against the temple itself, whereas that was opposite to the altar.

And, behold, there sat women weeping for Tamuz.] St. Jerome, by Tamuz, understands Adonis, which learned men suppose the same with Osiris. (See Vossius, de Idololatria, lib. ii. cap. 4. 10.) By Osiris is generally understood the sun. [We may rather understand by Osiris, the god that the Egyptians supposed to preside over the fruits of the earth, which were then cut and gathered in: this being called the death of Osiris, was celebrated with mourning and lamentations. (See Dr. Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 24. sect. 1.) This gives a plain account why this solemnity was kept in the month of Tamuz, answering to part of our June and July, because the harvest was finished in those hot countries by or before that time.]

This idolatry was derived from the Egyptians, and afterward the Phœnicians and Greeks improved it by the addition of a new fable, viz. of Venus's mourning for the death of Adonis.

The fourth month of the Jews, which answered part of our June and July, was called Tamuz, from a feast dedicated to this idol in that month. The Egyptian year consisted but of three hundred and sixty-five days, without any bissextile, which was afterward added in the Julian year. By this means they lost a day every four years; which in process of time made a great change in the beginning of their year, and a variation in their festivals, which must consequently remove from one season of the year to another. It is therefore probable that under the idolatrous kings of Judah, who brought in the worship of Tamuz, this festival fell in the month that answered the fourth month of the Jews, and gave that month this name; in which month Ezekiel probably saw this vision. (See the note on ver. 2. and Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntagm. ii. cap. 11.)

Ver. 16. At the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar.] Near the entrance into the temple, where the brazen altar stood, in the middle of the court, before the house of the Lord. (See 2 Chron. viii. 7. 2 Kings xvi. 14.)

Were about five-and-twenty men with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east, &c.] So they turned their backs to God Almighty, and their faces towards the sun. Perhaps Hezekiah may allude to some such idolatrous practice, in that confession of his, 2 Chron. xxix. 6. Our fathers have done evil in the sight of the Lord, and have forsaken him, and turned away their faces from the habitation of the Lord, and turned their backs.

They turned their back to God, and not their face; as Jeremy expresses their contempt towards him, ii. 27. xxxii. 33. (Compare xxiii. 35. of this prophecy.) For this reason the people were commanded to come in at the north or southern gates of the outward court of the temple, when they came to worship, that they might not, at their return, turn their backs upon God. (See xlvi. 9.) God ordered the holy of holies in his temple to be placed towards the west, in opposition to this species of heathen idolatry, which consisted in worshipping the rising sun. And the Jews always turned their faces towards the temple, when they worshipped. (See Dr. Spencer, de Legib. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 2. sect. 4.)

Ver. 17. For they have filled the land with violence, and have returned to provoke me to anger.] Or, again they provoke me to anger. (See the note on Isa. vi. 13.) After their repeated acts of injustice and oppression (see xxii. 6, 7.) they add new aggravations to their wickedness, by committing these heinous provocations of idolatry.

And lo, they put the branch to their nose.] Those that translate the words to this sense, suppose them to relate to some custom among the idolaters, of dedicating a branch of laurel, or some other tree, to the honour of the sun, and carrying it in their hands at the time of their worship. But this text is one of those which the rabbins reckon among the Tikkun Sopherim, or such as have been corrected by their scribes and learned men; and the original reading, say they, was appi, to my nose, or face, instead of the present reading appam. According to which reading the sense will be, and they put a stink to my nose; that is, they put an open affront upon me, by turning their back parts to me in the place dedicated to my worship.

To this sense the LXX. render it, αὐτοὶ ὡς μυκτηρίζοντες, They are as those that mock me, or publicly affront me.

Dr. Lightfoot upon John xv. 6. renders the place, They put the branch to my wrath, or to their wrath: that is, they add more fuel to my wrath, which will burst out like a flame to consume them; just as if one should lay a heap of dry sticks upon a fire. (Compare xv. 6.)

[These religious rites were called among the Greeks, ὀσχοφόρια, θαλλοφόρια, δενδροφόρια. See Dr. Spencer, de Legib. Hebr. lib. iv. cap. 5.]

Ver. 18. Therefore will I also deal in fury.] God's unalterable decree of executing vengeance upon them for their heinous iniquities, is described like the fury of an enraged person, which cannot be appeased but by bringing the offender to condign punishment. (See v. 13. xvi. 42. xxiv. 13.)

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.

This part of the vision represents the destruction of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, beginning with those that were nearest the temple.

Ver. 1. He also cried in mine ears with a loud voice.] To denote the terribleness of God's judgments. (See i. 24. Rev. xiv. 7. 9. 15.)

Cause them who have a charge over the city to come near.] The angels who had the charge of executing God's judgment upon the city. (Compare 2 Kings x. 24.)

Ver. 2. Six men came from the way of the upper gate, which lieth towards the north.] See the note on viii. 14. There is mention of the higher or upper gate of the Lord's house which Jotham built or repaired, called the new gate, 2 Kings xv. 35. Jer. xxvi. 10. But that is generally thought to be at the east side of the temple, and the same with that which was afterward called the gate of Nicanor; whereas this is supposed to be on the north side of the temple and altar, because there the sacrifices were ordered to be slain. (See Lev. i. 11. and the note upon the following words.) Six slaughtermen came like so many Levites, expecting an order from the chief sacrificing priest which beast to slay, and at what time.

And one man among them was clothed with linen.] That is, an angel, (see ver. 4. and compare xl. 3. xliii. 6.) who was to supply the place of the chief sacrificing priest. Angels, as ministering spirits always attending upon God's service, are sometimes described in the habit of priests. (See Rev. xv. 5, 6.) As God's ministers for the same reason have the title of angels given them, Rev. i. 20.

With a writer's inkhorn by his side.] To set a mark on those that were to be saved from the common destruction. But the LXX. translate the words, With a girdle of sapphire, or embroidery, upon his loins; which agrees better with what goes before, as being part of the priest's habit, (Exod. xxviii. 8. and the abovecited place in the Revelation.) And this interpretation of the phrase Dr. Castel follows, in his Lexicon, in the word keseth.

And they went and stood by the brazen altar.] To denote that the men ordained to destruction were offered up as so many sacrifices, to make an atonement to God's justice. The destruction of the wicked is elsewhere expressed by the name of a sacrifice. (See xxxix. 17. Isa. xxix. 2. xxxiv. 6.)

Ver. 3. And the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, whereupon he was, to the threshold of the house.] Ezekiel saw the glory of God depart out of the inner sanctuary to the threshold, or door of the temple; to shew that God would shortly forsake this temple. (Compare x. 4. 18, 19. xi. 23.) The word cherub stands for cherubims, as x. 2. We are to distinguish this apparition of the Divine Glory, which had its constant residence in the temple, from that which was shewed particularly to Ezekiel, i. 26. iii. 23. viii. 24. x. 1.

And he called to the man, &c.] The Logos, or second person of the blessed Trinity, gave his commands to the angel, mentioned ver. 3.

Ver. 4. Set a mark upon their foreheads.] Compare Rev. vii. 31. The expression alludes to the custom of the eastern nations to mark their servants in the forehead. (See Grotius upon that place of the Revelation.) The Vulgar Latin renders the words, Mark with the letter thau the foreheads; and it is very probable the ancient reading in the LXX. was ταῦ Σημεῖον, though the present copies read τὸ Σημεῖον. (See Huetius, Demonst. Evang. prop. 9.)

It was the general opinion of the fathers that the ancient Samaritan letter thau was made in the form of a cross; and St. Jerome (a very competent judge in this matter) does attest the same in his commentary on this place.

This opinion Scaliger rejects in his notes upon Eusebius's Chronicon, p. 109. but Bishop Walton defends it at large in his third Prolegomenon, n. 36. and the Dissertation upon the ancient Hebrew Sicles, in his Apparatus to the Polyglot Bible, p. 36. The Ethiopic letter tawi, or tau, still retains the form of a cross; and the learned Ludolphus supposes, that the Ethiopic letters were borrowed from the Samaritans. The Coptic letter of that sound is in the same form. The modern antiquaries do all agree, that the Samaritan thau was in the form of a Greek X. But whether their authority be sufficient to outweigh that of St. Jerome, must be left to the learned to judge. It is observable that the high-priest was anointed upon the forehead, in the form of an X, as Selden assures us, lib. ii. de Success. in Pontif. cap. 9.

[The words of the learned Montfaucon (Palæograph. Græc. lib. ii. cap. 3.) decide this controversy in favour of the ancients: "In nummis Samaritanis, quæ in musæis occurrunt, thau forma crucis exaratum frequentissime visitur: in quos si incidisset Scaliger, Origenis et Hieronymi testimonio refragatus non esset." He tells us, That in several Samaritan coins, to be found in the collections of medals, the letter thau is engraven in form of a cross, which, if Scaliger had seen, he would not have contradicted the testimony of Origen and Jerome upon this subject.]

Of the men that sigh and cry for all the abominations that are done in the midst thereof.] The irreclaimable temper of sinners that hate to be reformed, is just matter of grief to good men. (See Psal. cxix. 136. Isa. lvii. 18. Jer. xiii. 17. 2 Cor. xii. 21. 2 Pet. ii. 8.) And when the number of such mourners is not sufficient to divert God's judgments from a nation, they shall at least deliver their own souls. (See xiv. 14.)

Ver. 5. Let not your eye spare, &c.] See v. 11.

Ver. 6. Slay utterly, old and young, &c.] This denunciation was executed by the Chaldeans. (See 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17.)

And began at my sanctuary.] Judgment often begins at the house of God, (1 Pet. iv. 17.) because such persons sin against greater light and clearer convictions. (See Amos iii. 2. Luke xii. 47.)

Then they began with the ancient men that were before the house.] Who committed idolatry in the several courts and apartments belonging to the temple. (See viii. 11, 12. 16.)

Ver. 7. Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain.] God declares he will own the temple no longer for his place of residence, (see ver. 3.) as having been polluted with idolatry; (viii. 10, &c.) and therefore delivers up both the inner and outer courts belonging to it, (compare x. 3. 5.) to be polluted by blood and slaughter.

Ver. 8. And I was left.] The prophet thought himself preserved alone out of the common destruction, the slaughter was so great; although those who had a mark set upon them were certainly preserved, as well as he.

I fell upon my face.] In a posture of supplication to deprecate God's anger, (see Numb. xii. 5. xvi. 4. 22. 45.) and to beseech him not to make an utter destruction of those small remains that were left of the nation: Jerusalem being almost the only place which was not in the enemies' power. (See xi. 13.)

Ver. 9. The land is full of blood, and the city of perverseness.] See viii. 23.

The Lord hath forsaken the earth, &c.] See viii. 12.

CHAP. X.

The vision of the cherubims, which the prophet saw at the beginning of this prophecy, is here renewed; from whence coals are scattered over the city to denote its destruction by fire. At the end of the chapter the Divine Glory is described as still removing farther from the temple.

Ver. 1. IN the firmament that was above the head of the cherubims, &c.] See the note on i. 26.

As the appearance of the likeness of a throne.] And God sitting upon it. (Ibid.)

Ver. 2. Go in between the wheels, even under the cherubims.] Or, between the cherubims, as Noldius translates the phrase, numb. 3. 98. according to the explication given of it, ver. 7.

And fill thine hand with coals of fire from between the cherubims, and scatter them over the city.] For the coals of fire sparkled and ran up and down between the living creatures. (See i. 13.) This part of the vision was to represent the burning of the city. Coals of fire do elsewhere denote the Divine vengeance. (See Psal. cxx. 4. cxl. 10. Rev. viii. 5.)

Ver. 3. Now the cherubims stood on the right side of the house.] The cherubims which were part of the vision shewed to Ezekiel: (see ver. 1. and the note upon ix. 3.) they stood now in the inner court, on the north side of the house. (See ver. 18.) The Chaldee paraphrase understands it of the south side of the house; but then it is spoken with respect to those that came out of the temple. (See xlvii. 1.)

And the cloud filled the inner court.] This bright cloud seems to be an attendant upon that glory which was represented in this vision to Ezekiel: (viii. 4. x. 1.) or else the words may be understood of the cloud or Schechinah, removing from the inner sanctuary, and coming towards the door of the house. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 4. The glory of the Lord went up from the cherub, &c.] The words may better be translated thus, Now (or for) the glory of the Lord was gone up, &c. For the prophet repeats here what he had related before, ix. 3.

And the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory.] A bright cloud was the sign of God's presence, which first filled the tabernacle, (Exod. xl. 35.) afterward the temple, (1 Kings viii. 10.) where it fixed itself upon the mercy-seat, (Lev. xvi. 2.) From whence God is said so often to dwell between the cherubims. This glory now removed from that its residence in the inner sanctuary, and came down towards the porch of the temple, and fixed itself partly in the temple, and partly in the inner court adjoining to it, to denote God's being just about to leave the temple, and disown any relation to it. (See the note on viii. 3.) The Schechinah, or Divine Glory, is represented as a bright flame breaking out of a thick cloud: (see the note on Isa. vi. 1.) so both together make up the description of it.

Ver. 5. And the sound of the cherubims' wings was heard even to the utter court, &c.] See i. 24. The cherubims in Ezekiel's vision seem to have moved to attend upon the Schechinah, which now had took its residence at the threshold of the house. (Compare ver. 18, 19. xi. 22.)

Ver. 7. Who took it, and went out.] To signify the putting the command in execution.

Ver. 8. And there appeared in the cherubims the form of a man's hand.] See i. 8.

Ver. 9—12.] The same, in substance, which was described i. 16—18.

Ver. 11. To the place where the head looked they followed it.] Each wheel consisted of four semicircles, (see the note on i. 16, 17.) in correspondence to the four heads of each animal.

Ver. 13. It was cried to them in my hearing, O wheel!] Or, move round, as some render the word. They are put in mind of continually attending upon their duty; for the wheels and living creatures were animated with the same principle of understanding and motion. (See i. 19—21.)

Ver. 14. And every one had four faces, &c.] See i. 6. 10.

The first had the face of a cherub.] That is, of an ox; as appears by comparing this verse with chap. i. 10. The word cherub does originally signify an ox. (See Dr. Spencer, de Legib. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 3. sect. 1.) The several faces are here represented in a different order from the description given of them i. 10. of which difference this reason may be assigned. In the first chapter the prophet saw this vision coming out of the north, and advancing southward, (ver. 4.) where the face of a man, being placed on the south side, was first in view. The lion, being on the east part, was towards his right hand; the ox, being placed towards the west, was on his left; and the eagle was towards the north. This interpretation is justified from the situation of the standards of the several tribes, Numb. ii. 2. 10. 18. 25. where Judah, whose standard was a lion, was placed on the east side: Reuben, whose standard was a man, was placed on the south side: Ephraim, whose standard was an ox, was placed on the west side: and Dan, whose standard was an eagle, was placed on the north side. (See the note upon i. 6.) Here the prophet is supposed to stand by the porch of the temple, (see viii. 16.) westward of the Schechinah, as that was moving out of the inner court eastward; (see ver. 18, 19.) so the ox was first in his view, as being nearest to him.

Ver. 15. And the cherubims were lifted up.] To attend upon the Divine glory wherever it went, and particularly at its removal from the temple. (See ver. 5. 19.)

Ver. 16, 17.] See i. 19—21.

Ver. 18. Then the glory of the Lord departed from off the threshold of the house, and stood over the cherubims.] The Divine presence here makes a farther remove from the temple. (See ver. 4.) It now quite leaves the house itself, and settles upon the cherubims which stood in the court adjoining it: (ver. 3.)

Ver. 19. The cherubims lifted up their wings—the wheels also were beside them.] See i. 19. 26.

And every one of them stood at the door of the east gate of the Lord's house.] This is still a farther remove of God's presence from the temple; for the east gate was just at the entrance into the inner court before the temple. (See the note on viii. 7. and compare xliii. 4.)

Ver. 20. This is the likeness of the living creatures that I saw under the God of Israel, &c.] See i. 22, 23. 26.

And I knew that they were the cherubims.] Having often seen that form, which was carved in several places upon the walls, and doors, and utensils, of the temple. (1 Kings vi. 29. 35. viii. 29. 36.)

Ver. 21, 22.] See i. 8. 10. 12.

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.

God denounces his judgments upon those wicked men who remained in the city, and made a mock of the judgment of the prophets: he promises to favour those who are gone into captivity, and truly turn to him: intimating, likewise, that there shall be a general restoration of the nation in aftertimes. Then the Divine Glory leaves the city, denoting God's putting it out of his protection.

Ver. 1. MOREOVER, the spirit lifted me up.] See iii. 12. 14. viii. 3.

And brought me unto the east gate of the Lord's house.] Where the Divine glory had then placed itself, (x. 19.)

Five-and-twenty men.] The same probably that came thither to worship the sun, viii. 16.

Princes of the people.] Members of the great Sanhedrin. (Compare viii. 11. and see the note on Jer. xxvi. 10.)

Ver. 3. Which say, It is not near: let us build houses.] They were such as put the evil day far from them; (Amos vi. 3.) were not willing to believe that the judgments threatened would soon overtake them: (compare xii. 27.) and so securely went on in building new houses, and making such-like improvements.

This city is the caldron, and we are the flesh.] Jeremiah had foretold the destruction of Jerusalem under the figure of a seething caldron, Jer. i. 13. and Ezekiel himself uses the same metaphor, xxiv. 3, 4, &c. So these infidels made use of the same expression on purpose to deride the menaces of the prophets; as if they had said, If this city be a caldron, we had rather take our chance of being consumed in it, than leave our fine houses and other accommodations, and run the risk of war or captivity. (Compare ver. 7, 8. 11.)

Ver. 5. And the Spirit of the Lord fell upon me, and said unto me.] See the note on iii. 24.

Ver. 6. Ye have multiplied your slain in this city.] See xxii. 3, 4.

Ver. 7. Your slain, whom ye have laid in the midst of it, they are the flesh, and this city is the caldron.] The comparing of the city to a caldron may fitly be applied to the slain, whom you have butchered in your streets, and cut in pieces in the midst of it, just as pieces of flesh prepared for the caldron. (See xxiv. 6. and compare Micah iii. 3.)

But I will bring you out of the midst of it.] You shall not die there, but I will reserve you for another punishment. (See ver. 9. 11.)

Ver. 9, 10. I will bring you out of the midst thereof, and deliver you into the hands of strangers.] Ye shall be carried out of the city by the Chaldeans, and afterward be slain by them in the land of Hamath. (See Jer. xxxix. 6. 2 Kings xxv. 19—21.) Which is called the entrance of Hamath, 1 Kings viii. 65. 2 Kings xiv. 25. because it was just upon the borders of Judea.

Ver. 12. But have done after the manners of the heathen.] Have defiled yourselves with their idolatries. (See viii. 10. 14. 16.)

Ver. 13. Then I fell down upon my face, and cried with a loud voice, &c.] The prophet thought this an earnest of the common destruction which was coming upon all the inhabitants of the city, and thereupon he earnestly deprecated so severe a judgment. (See ix. 8.)

Ver. 15. Thy brethren, the men of thy kindred.] Those of thy kindred and acquaintance who are carried away captive with thee.

To whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem have said, Get ye far from the Lord, &c.] The Jews who were left in their own country, thought themselves more in God's favour, than those who were carried away captive; whom they looked upon as outcasts, and such as had no right either to the privileges of Jews, or the land of Judea. (See the note on Jer. xxiv. 5.)

Ver. 16. Yet will I be to them a little sanctuary.] The Jews were under God's immediate protection, expressed in Scripture by dwelling under the shadow of his wings. The phrase alluding to the wings of the cherubims covering the mercy-seat, and signifying God's presence among them, and protection over his people. Therefore, to comfort those who were under a state of exile and captivity, God tells them, that although they were deprived of the benefit of attending upon his sanctuary, and being placed under that protection, his presence there did import, yet he would supply that by being a constant refuge and defence to them in the countries where they were scattered. (Compare Psal. xxxi. 20. xci. 1. Isa. viii. 14.)

Ver. 17. I will even gather them from the people.] This may be in some degree fulfilled in those that returned from captivity, but the utmost completion of this and the following verses must be expected at the general restoration of the Jewish nation. (See the following notes, and compare xx. 4. xxviii. 25. xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24.)

Ver. 18. They shall take away all the detestable things thereof.] They shall live pure from all the pollutions of idolatry, wherewith the land had been formerly defiled. (See xxxvii. 23.)

Ver. 19. And I will give them one heart.] They shall serve me with one consent, (Zeph. iii. 9.) and not be distracted by the several idolatrous worships which were set up in opposition to God's true worship, when the ten tribes separated themselves from Judah. (Compare Psal. lxxxvi. 11. Jer. xxxii. 39. Hos. x. 2.)

I will put a new spirit within them.] These promises chiefly relate to the general conversion of the Jews; when God shall pour out upon them the spirit of grace, in order to their conversion, Zech. xii. 10. (Compare xxxvi. 26, 27. and see the notes upon Jer. xxiv. 7. xxxi. 33, 34. xxxii. 39.) Conversion is commonly spoken of in Scripture as if it were a new creation, because of the new dispositions and powers which accompany it. (See Psal. li. 10. 2 Cor. v. 17. Gal. vi. 15. and the note upon xviii. 31.)

I will take the stony heart out of their flesh.] Men's insensibility as to religious matters, is often ascribed to the hardness of their hearts, being such as will receive no impression. Here God promises to give them teachable dispositions, and to take away the veil from their heart, as St. Paul expresses it, speaking of this subject, 2 Cor. iii. 16. The same temper being indifferently expressed, either by blindness, or hardness of heart.

Ver. 20. They shall be my people.] They shall never apostatize any more from me to serve idols, but shall constantly adhere to my worship; and I will own them as my people, those who are under my immediate protection. (Compare xiv. 11. xxxvi. 28. xxxviii. 27. Jer. xxx. 22.)

Ver. 21. But as for them whose heart goeth after the heart of their detestable things, &c.] The prophet speaketh of idols, called here their detestable things, as ver. 18. the prophet mentions the heart of their detestable things, as if their idols had an understanding and appetites, because their worshippers applied to them as such, and because evil spirits, who were worshipped in and by them, were pleased with the devotions in that manner paid to them.

I will recompense their way upon their own heads.] See ver. 9, 10. and the notes upon xx. 38.

Ver. 22.] See i. 19. 26. x. 19.

Ver. 23. And the glory of the Lord went up from the midst of the city.] God's presence was before departed from the temple, (x. 19.) and now it quite left the city, to signify that he would acknowledge no longer his relation to either, but deliver them up to be profaned by heathens.

And stood upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city.] That is, the Mount of Olives; from whence it is described returning, when God shall again make the city and temple the seat of his presence. (See xliii. 2. Zech. xiv. 4.)

Ver. 24. Afterward the spirit took me up, &c.] See the notes on viii. 3.

And brought me in vision by the Spirit of God into Chaldea.] Returned me back into Chaldea, in the same manner as it carried me away from thence, being still under the power of a Divine ecstacy, and the immediate influences of God's Spirit.

Ver. 25. Then I spake to them of the captivity, &c.] See the note on viii. 2.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.

Ezekiel being commanded to remove his household-stuff, and to take his sustenance with quaking and trembling, is a type of the captivity both of king and people, and of the consternation which their calamities will bring upon them; he afterward reproves the infidelity of those who disbelieved his prophecies.

Ver. 2. SON of man.] See ii. 1.

Thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house.] See ii. 3. 6, 7. The prophet applies himself to those of the captivity among whom he dwelt. They saw Jerusalem still inhabited, and under the government of its own king. And as they that were left at home insulted over the exiles; (see xi. 15.) so these repined at their own ill fortune, and thought those who dwelt at Jerusalem in a much better condition than themselves. Therefore the following parables are designed to shew, that they who are left behind to endure the miseries of a siege, and the insults of a conqueror, will be in the worse condition of the two.

St. Jerome, in his preface to Ezekiel, observes, this was the temper of those captives to whom Ezekiel prophesied; "Iis, qui cum eo captivi fuerant, prophetavit, pœnitentibus quod ad Jeremiæ vaticinium se ultro adversariis tradidissent, et viderent adhuc urbem Hierosolymam stare, quam ille casuram esse prædixerat."

Which have eyes, and see not, &c.] Who will not make use of that sense and understanding that God hath given them. (See Isa. vi. 9. Jer. v. 21.)

Ver. 3. Prepare thee stuff for removing, &c.] Get all thy goods together, and pack them up as those do that move from one house to another. Do this openly and at noonday, that they may all see and take notice of it. The prophets often prophesied by signs, as being of greater force and efficacy than words. (See iv. 1.)

Ver. 4. Thou shalt go forth at even in their sight, as they that go forth into captivity.] As men do that would go off by stealth: to signify also that Zedekiah and his retinue should escape out of the city by night, (2 Kings xxv. 4.)

Ver. 5. Dig thou through the wall in their sight.] To shew that the king shall make his escape by the same means. (See ver. 12.)

Ibid. and Ver. 6. And carry out thereby. In their sight thou shalt bear it upon thy shoulders—in the twilight.] This which the prophet was commanded to carry out in the twilight, was something different from the goods he removed in the day-time; (see ver. 4. 7.) and therefore must mean necessary provision for his present subsistence.

Thou shalt cover thy face, that thou see not the ground.] As Zedekiah shall do; that he might not be discovered.

I have set thee for a sign to the house of Israel.] See ver. 12. and iv. 3.

Ver. 9. Hath not the house of Israel, the rebellious house, said to thee, What doest thou?] They inquire, by way of derision and contempt, what these signs mean. (Compare ii. 5. xvii. 12. xx. 49. xxiv. 19.)

Ver. 10. This burden concerneth the prince in Jerusalem.] King Zedekiah. (See vii. 27.)

Ver. 12. And the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight.] He shall be glad to carry what he can with him in the dusk of the evening, and his retinue shall make a private way to get out of the city, that they may not be discovered. (See Jer. xxxix. 4.)

He shall cover his face, &c.] That nobody may know or discover him, till he is got beyond his enemies' camp.

Ver. 13. My net also will I spread upon him, &c.] Though he thinks to escape, yet I will bring his enemies upon him, who shall encompass him, and stop his flight, as when a wild beast is entangled in a net. (2 Kings xxv. 5—7. and compare xvii. 20. xix. 8. xxxii. 3. of this prophecy.)

Yet he shall not see it, though he shall die there.] Having his eyes put out before he came thither. (Ibid.) Josephus tells us, (Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 10.) that Zedekiah thought this prophecy inconsistent with that of Jeremiah, (xxxiv. 3.) That Zedekiah's eyes should see the eyes of the king of Babylon; and therefore believed neither. But they both actually came to pass, as the sacred story assures us: the king of Babylon passing sentence upon him at Riblah, as one that had broke the oath and covenant he had made with him, and then putting out his eyes, and carrying him to Babylon.

Both of them the words of infidels, who turn the grace of God into wantonness, and take encouragement from his patience and long-suffering to despise his threatenings, as if they would never be fulfilled. (Compare Isa. v. 19. Amos vi. 18. 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4.)

Ver. 23. The days are at hand.] The same is elsewhere expressed, by the day of the Lord is at hand: (see Joel ii. 1. Zeph. i. 14.) the time when God will shew his wrath, and make his power and justice known to the world. (See ver. 25.)

Ver. 25. For there shall be no more any vain vision, &c.] The false prophets, who foretold peace and safety, shall see their prophecies so confuted by the events quite contrary to what they foretold, that they will never pretend any more to publish new prophecies. (Compare xiii. 23.)

CHAP. XIII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet denounces God's judgments against false prophets who made a gain of their profession, and encouraged men to go on in their sins, by giving them false visions of peace and security; and at the same time disheartened the truly pious, and discouraged them from continuing in the ways of holiness.

Ver. 2. SAY thou unto them that prophesy out of their own hearts.] The true prophets often denounce God's judgments against the false ones; laying to their charge many misdemeanours in their private conversation, and upbraiding them for unfaithfulness in the office they undertook of guiding and directing men's consciences. (See xxii. 25. 28. Jer. vi. 14. xxiii. 11, &c. xxviii. 14. xxix. 8. 22, 23. Micah iii. 5.)

Ver. 4. O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes in the deserts.] Deceitful workers, as the apostle styles such persons, 2 Cor. xi. 13. who craftily insinuate false doctrines into weak and unstable minds; and withal hungry and ravenous, and such as greedily catch at any appearance of advantage. (Compare xxii. 25.)

Ver. 5. Ye have not gone up into the gaps.] Or, stood in the gap, or breach, as it is expressed xxii. 30. Psal. cvi. 23. Which place alludes to the intercession which Moses made for the Israelites, whereby he withheld God's hand, as it were, when it was just stretched out to take vengeance upon the people for their heinous sin in making the golden calf. (See Exod. xxxii. 10, 11.)

The phrase is taken from those that put a stop to the enemy when he is just entering in at a breach. In like manner, it was the office and duty of those prophets, if they had truly been what they pretended, by their prayers and intercessions, to put a stop to God's vengeance when it was just ready to be poured out upon a sinful people.

Nor made up a fence for the house of Israel.] Or, made up a wall, as the Vulgar Latin translates it. Another expression taken from those that are besieged, and if a breach be made in a wall, presently make it up, or build up a new one within it; to prevent the enemy from entering, and becoming masters of the city. The word geder, fence, signifies any other sort of fortification. (See Psal. lxii. 3. lxxxix. 40.)

To stand in the battle, in the day of the Lord.] When God shall come like a leader, or general, at the head of his army, i. e. his judgments, to execute vengeance upon his enemies. (Compare Jer. xxv. 30. Joel ii. 11.)

Ver. 6. They have seen vanity and lying divinations.] Concerning peace and prosperity. (See ver. 10. and xii. 23, 24.)

And they have made others to hope that they would confirm the word.] Or, that the word should be confirmed; the transitive verb being often taken in an impersonal sense. (See the note on Isa. xliv. 18.) Their speaking with so much assurance made others confidently expect that the event should answer their predictions; and sometimes even imposed upon the true prophets for a time; as Hananiah did upon Jeremiah. (See Jer. xxviii. 6.)

Ver. 9. They shall not be in the assembly of my people.] They shall not be members of the church here, nor partake of the communion of saints in heaven. The Hebrew word sod, signifies a secret assembly or privy-council; such as are acquainted with the most inward thoughts and secret intent of a prince; and from thence it is applied to God's chosen people, those that are acquainted with the whole counsel of God, and whom he instructs by the secret directions of his Holy Spirit. (See Psal. xxv. 14. Jer. xxiii. 18.) So the prophet tells these men that pretended to know so much of the secrets of the Almighty, that they should never be of the number of those favourites of heaven, to whom God will reveal himself and his counsels.

Neither shall they be written in the writing of the house of Israel.] The sense is much the same with that of the foregoing sentence; the expressions being an allusion to the registers that used to be kept of the members of any city or corporation, the privileges of which society none can pretend to, but they whose names are entered into such registers. (Compare Exod. xxxii. 32. Psal. xlix. 28. Ezra ii. 62. Luke v. 20. Phil. iv. 2. Heb. xii. 23.) It may be, these false prophets foretold a speedy return to the exiles; whereupon God tells them that they shall never live to see it, nor shall their names be entered into the register of those that return home. (See Nehem. vii. 5.)

Neither shall they enter into the land of Israel.] They shall never see their own country again, nor shall they have a share among the true Israelites. (See the note on xx. 38.)

Ver. 10. They have seduced my people, saying, Peace, and there was no peace.] They have deceived my people, by telling them that none of those judgments should overtake them, which Jeremy and the other true prophets threatened them with, and they have spoke peace to men's consciences upon false grounds and principles. (See Jer. iv. 10. vi. 14. xxxiii. 14. 17.)

And one built a wall, and, lo, others daubed it with untempered mortar.] Instead of providing such a fence and bulwark, as might secure the people against the judgments that threaten them, (see ver. 5.) they have made a slight wall without any mortar, or cement, to bind and strengthen it; that is, they have applied slight and palliating remedies to public calamities, which will never give true peace to men's consciences, nor stand them in any stead, when God visits for their iniquities. Just as if an unskilful builder should undertake to set up a wall, and his fellow-workmen should daub it with untempered mortar. (See ver. 11, 12. 16.)

Ver. 11. There shall be an overflowing shower; and ye, O great hailstones, shall fall, &c.] God's judgments are often compared to storms and tempests, the artillery of heaven. (See xxxviii. 22. Job xxvii. 20. Psal. xi. 6. xviii. 13, 14.) Especially when he executes his judgments by a victorious army. (See Isa. xxix. 6. xxxviii. 2. Jer. iv. 13. compare Ecclus. xlix. 9.)

Ver. 13. I will rend it with a stormy wind in my fury, &c.] Under these metaphors is probably foretold the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army. Thus the Chaldee paraphrase expounds it: I will bring a mighty king with the force of a whirlwind, and destroying people as it were an overflowing storm, and powerful princes like great hailstones.

Ver. 14. So will I break down the wall, and bring it down to the ground, &c.] The Chaldee explains this verse to the same sense: I will destroy the city wherein ye have uttered these false prophecies: which exposition is confirmed by the following words, And ye shall be consumed in the midst thereof; that is, you shall be destroyed in the same common calamity.

And ye shall know that I am the Lord.] See vi. 7.

Ver. 15. The wall is no more, nor they that daubed it.] The Chaldee expounds it, The city is no more, nor the false prophets.

Ver. 16. See visions of peace, and there is no peace.] See Jer. vi. 10. viii. 11.

Ver. 17. Set thy face against the daughters of thy people that prophesy.] Direct thy discourse against those she-pretenders to prophecy. (Compare xx. 46. xxi. 2.) God did sometimes bestow the gift of prophecy upon women. (See Exod. xv. 20. Judg. iv. 4. 2 Kings xxii. 14.) This encouraged others of that sex to pretend to the same gift. (Compare Rev. ii. 20.)

Ver. 18. Woe to the women that sow pillows to all armholes, &c.] The learned Gataker, in his Cinnus, p. 200. thinks the words may more properly be rendered, That put (or fasten) pillows to all armholes; so he understands the same word, Job xvi. 15. I have put sackcloth upon my skin. As the prophet compares the deceitful practices of the false prophets to the daubing of a wall, so he represents the artifices of these female seducers, by sowing pillows under their hearers' elbows, that they might rest securely in their evil ways; and by covering their faces with veils, or kerchiefs, or ornaments proper to women, thereby to keep them in blindness and ignorance.

To the head of every stature.] Of every age, both great and small: so the Greek word Ἡλικία, used by the LXX. here, signifies age as well as stature. (See Dr. Hammond upon Matt. vi. 27.)

To hunt souls.] That they may drive them into those nets and snares that they have laid for them, and make them their prey. (Compare xxv. 25. Micah ii. 7. 2 Pet. ii. 14.)

Will ye hunt the souls of my people, and will ye save the souls alive that come to you?] Or, will ye promise life unto those that come to you? (see ver. 19. 22.) that is, will ye make a prey of men's souls, by deluding them with fair hopes and promises?

Ver. 19. And will ye pollute me among my people?] Will ye profane my name, by making use of it to give credit to your own dreams and lies? (See ver. 7.)

For handfuls of barley, and for pieces of bread.] For the meanest reward. (See Prov. xxviii. 21.) So greedy are they of making gain to themselves. (Compare xxii. 25. Micah iii. 5.)

To slay the souls that should not die, &c.] Thus they threatened death to those that yielded themselves to the Chaldeans in Jeconiah's captivity; and yet God preserved them alive. (See Jer. xxix. 5, 6.) And they have encouraged those that remain at Jerusalem with promises of peace and safety, who shall all be destroyed. (See v. 12.) Or the words may be meant in general of discouraging the godly, and confirming the wicked in their evil ways. (See ver. 22. and compare Jer. xxiii. 14. 17.)

To slay and to make alive, signify here to promise men life, or threaten them with death. (See ver. 22.) So the prophet saith he came to destroy the city, xliii. 3. that is, to pronounce the sentence of destruction upon it. And the priest is said to make the leper unclean, Lev. xiii. 3. that is, to pronounce him unclean, as our translation rightly expresses the sense.

Ver. 20. Wherewith ye hunt the souls to make them fly.] To make them run into those nets and snares that you have laid for them. (See ver. 18.) The metaphor is continued from the manner of hunting and pursuing living creatures, by that means to drive them into the toils prepared for them.

I will tear them from your arms.] I will make your cheats and impostures appear so evidently, that nobody shall be in danger of being seduced by you any more. (See ver. 23.)

Ver. 22. Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, &c.] As you have deluded the wicked with vain hopes, (see ver. 10.) so you have disheartened the righteous with groundless fears, (ver. 19. and compare xxii. 25.)

CHAP. XIV.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet denounces God's judgments against those hypocrites who pretended to be his worshippers, and at the same time secretly practised idolatry. He afterward sets forth God's mercy towards the Jews, in sparing a few of that sinful nation, and those no better than the rest that were destroyed, when he might in justice have involved all of them in one common destruction.

Ver. 1. THEN came certain of the elders of Israel, &c.] See viii. 1.

Ver. 3. These men have set up their idols in their heart, and put the stumbling-block of their iniquity before their face.] They are not only idolaters in their heart, but they have actually set up idols and worshipped them; and thereby have fallen into that great sin of deserting me and my worship. (See vii. 19.)

Should I be inquired of at all by them?] Though they have the impudence to come to ask counsel of God, (see vii. 26.) they shall not receive a favourable answer, but such a one as their hypocrisy deserves. (See the following verse, and compare xxxvi. 37.)

Ver. 5. That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart.] That I may deal with them according to their deserts, and thereby convince them that I am a searcher of hearts, and know the inward and secret wickedness of their thoughts.

Ver. 6. From all your abominations.] Your idolatries. (See viii. 10. xvi. 2.)

Ver. 7. Or of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel.] The stranger within thy gates, as it is expressed in the fourth commandment. These, though they were not all of them circumcised, yet devoted themselves to the service of the one true God, for which reason they are styled the worshippers of God, Acts xvi. 14. xviii. 7.

Who separates himself from me.] Who turns apostate from me and my service; for men cannot serve God and idols; he having declared himself a jealous God, that will not admit any rival in his worship. (See Josh. xxiv. 19.)

I, the Lord, will answer him by myself.] I will punish him immediately by my own hands. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 8. And I will set my face against that man.] I will make him a mark of mine indignation. (See xv. 7. Jer. xliv. 11.)

And I will make him a sign and a proverb.] I will make him a signal and remarkable instance of my vengeance. (Compare Numb. xxvi. 10. Deut. xxviii. 38.)

And will cut him off from the midst of my people.] By a sudden death, attended with extraordinary circumstances. (See Lev. xx. 6. 17, 18.)

Ver. 9. And if a prophet be deceived.] This is to be understood of the false prophets, whose practices are reproved throughout the whole foregoing chapter.

I, the Lord, have deceived that prophet.] I have suffered him to be deceived. (See the note on Isa. lxiii. 17.) I have given him up to strong delusions, as a just judgment upon him for going after idols, and setting up false pretences to inspiration. (See xiii. 2. 7. 23. 1 Kings xxii. 23. Jer. iv. 10. and compare 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12.) Or the words may be explained to this sense: I will disappoint the hopes and expectations of those prophets, who seduce my people by speaking peace to them: (xiii. 10.) for I will bring upon them those evils, which they with great assurance have declared should never come to pass. To this purpose it follows, I will stretch out my hand upon him, &c. i. e. I will send such a judgment upon him, as I inflicted upon Hananiah the false prophet, Jer. xxviii. 16, 17.

Ver. 10. The punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh to him.] Because both parties are equally guilty of going astray from me, and seeking after idols, and other unlawful means of divination. (See ver. 11. and compare 2 Kings i. 3, 4.)

Ver. 11. That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me.] The judgments I inflict upon the false prophets, and those that consult them, shall be an instruction to my people to keep close to me and my worship, and not hanker after the idolatrous practices of the neighbouring nations.

But that they may be my people, &c.] See the note on xi. 20.

Ver. 13. When the land trespasseth grievously, &c.] Or, When a land. The design of this and the following verses is to shew, that when the inhabitants of a land have filled up the measure of their iniquities, and God ariseth to execute judgment upon them, the few righteous that are left among them shall not be able by their prayers and intercessions to deliver the nation from the judgments decreed against it. They shall but deliver their own souls; as we see in the case of Sodom, where there was no righteous but Lot and his family; those just persons saved themselves, but no intercession could avail to save the city. (See the following verse.)

And break the staff of the bread thereof.] See iv. 16.

Ver. 14. Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it.] All of them persons eminent for their piety: Noah and his family were saved out of the universal deluge, and obtained a promise from God that he would never destroy the world so again, Gen. viii. 21. Daniel interceded with God for the whole nation of the Jews, and obtained a promise of their restoration, Dan. ix. Job was appointed by God to make intercession for his three friends, Job xlii. 8. But when God's irreversible decree is gone out against a nation, even the prayers of such men will be ineffectual towards their deliverance. (Compare Jer. xv. 1.)

We may observe how early the fame of Daniel's piety was spread over Chaldea, who was at this time not above thirty years of age; it being but thirteen years ago since he was carried captive to Babylon, when he was very young. (See Dan. i. 1. 4, &c.)

Ver. 15. If I cause noisome beasts to pass through the land.] See v. 17.

Ver. 17. Or if I bring a sword upon the land.] If I deliver it into the hands of a cruel and bloody enemy. (See v. 12. vii. 15. xxi. 9. 16.) The conqueror's sword is often called the sword of the Lord, in the prophets; because they are the executioners of God's judgments. (See Isa. x. 15. Jer. xxv. 9. xlvii. 6.)

And say, Sword, go through the land.] So God is said to call for a sword upon Gog, xxxviii. 21.

So that I cut off man and beast from it.] The men are destroyed by the sword, and the cattle are drove away by the enemy; or else consumed by pestilence arising from the air's being corrupted through the stench of dead bodies. (Compare xxv. 13. xxix. 8. xxxii. 13. Hos. iv. 3. Zeph. i. 3.)

Ver. 19. Or if I send a pestilence upon that land.] See v. 12.

And pour out my fury upon it in blood.] With great destruction of men's lives, as the Chaldee paraphrase explains it. (Compare xxxviii. 22.)

Ver. 21. How much more [should there be an utter destruction] when I send my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem, &c.] See v. 12. vi. 12. xii. 16. Jer. xv. 2. The particles aph ki, are very properly translated here, How much more; in which sense they are plainly taken, 2 Sam. iv. 11. Prov. xi. 31. xxi. 15.

that shall be brought forth.] Notwithstanding these four sore judgments, some shall escape, and be brought into Chaldea, to be your companions in captivity. (Compare vi. 8. Jer. lii. 29, 30.)

Both sons and daughters.] See ver. 16. 18. 20. of this chapter.

And ye shall see their ways and their doings.] Their afflictions shall bring them to a due sense of their former iniquities, and they shall humbly confess their own sins, and the sins of those who were consumed in the destruction of the city; whereby it will appear that I have not punished them beyond what their sins have deserved. (See vi. 9. xx. 43. xxxvi. 31.)

And ye shall be comforted concerning the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem.] This will compose your minds, and make you give glory to God, and acknowledge his judgments to be righteous, though they touch you very nearly in the destruction of your friends and country.

Ver. 23. And ye shall know that I have not done without cause, &c.] See the note on vi. 10.

CHAP. XV.

ARGUMENT.

Under the parable of a vine, which when it is barren, is unfit for any use, is shewed the utter rejection of Jerusalem.

Ver. 2. WHAT is the vine-tree more than any other tree, or than a branch which is among the trees of the forest?] The latter part of the verse may be better translated thus, If it be as a branch which is among the trees of the forest; i. e. if it prove unfruitful. (See Dr. Lightfoot upon John xv. 6.) The Jewish church is often compared to a vine in the sacred writers. (See Isa. v. 1. Psal. lxxx. 8, &c.)

Ver. 3. Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work, &c.] The wood of a vine is of no use for building, or making any utensil. The works of that kind which Pliny takes notice of, Nat. Hist. lib. xiv. cap. 1. are rather to be looked upon as rarities, than as things of common use.

Ver. 4. Behold, it is cast into the fire for fuel.] The only use that dead vine-branches can be put to. (See John xv. 6.)

The fire devoureth both the ends of it, and the midst of it is burnt.] A fit representation of the present state of Judea, when both its extremities were consumed by the ravages of a foreign enemy, and the midst of it, where the capital city stood, is ready to be destroyed: just as the fire still spreads towards the middle part of a stick, when once both ends are lighted.

Ver. 7. And they shall go out from one fire, and another fire shall devour them.] Flying from one evil, another shall overtake them. Fire sometimes signifies any judgment or calamity inflicted by God. (See Amos i. 4, &c. and the note upon Jer. vii. 20.)

CHAP. XVI.

ARGUMENT.

God sets forth his free love towards the church and nation of the Jews, represented here by Jerusalem, under the emblem of a person that should take up an exposed infant, breed her up, and afterward marry her. He then upbraids their monstrous ingratitude in departing from his worship, and being polluted with heathenish idolatries; which the prophet illustrates by the resemblance of a lewd woman, that proves false to a kind and indulgent husband. For which God threatens to deal with her as abused husbands used to deal with wives convicted of adultery. Notwithstanding all these provocations, he promises in the end to shew them mercy. The metaphor of describing idolatry as spiritual adultery, often made use of in the prophets, is here, and in the twenty-third chapter, pursued with great force, and in a lively way of representation: both chapters being a remarkable instance of that vehemence of expression, which the rhetoricians call by the name of Δεινότης.

Ver. 2. CAUSE Jerusalem to know her abominations.] This might probably be done by way of letter, as Jeremiah signified the will of God to the captives at Babylon, (Jer. xxix. 1.) God particularly upbraids Jerusalem for her iniquities, because it was the place he had chosen for his peculiar residence, and yet the inhabitants had defiled that very place, nay, and the temple itself, with idolatry; the sin particularly denoted by the word abomination. (See viii. 10. xiv. 6.)

Ver. 3. Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan.] As your fathers sojourned in the land of Canaan, before they came to have any right or property in it; so you, their posterity, have all along resembled the manners of Canaan, more than those of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, your ancestors.

Thy father was a Hittite, and thy mother an Amorite.] Those are said to be our parents in the Scripture dialect, whose manners we resemble. (See ver. 45. of this chapter; Matt. iii. 7. John viii. 44.) There is an expression of the same import in the History of Susannah, ver. 56. that seems to be copied from this text, O thou seed of Canaan, and not of Judah, beauty hath deceived thee, and lust hath perverted thy heart.

Ver. 4, 5. In the day when thou wast born, &c.] The prophet describes the forlorn condition of the Israelites in Egypt under the similitude of a new-born infant, exposed in its native filthiness, without any friend to pity his condition, or take the least care of it.

Ver. 6. I said unto thee, when thou wast in thy blood, Live.] Whilst as yet nobody took so much care of thee as to wash thee from thy native filthiness, (ver. 4.) I took pity on thee; as a traveller that passes by, and sees an infant lie exposed; and I provided all things necessary for thy support.

Ver. 7. I have caused thee to multiply, &c.] The prophet describes the people's increasing in Egypt under the metaphor of a child's growing to woman's estate. (Compare Exod. i. 7.)

Ver. 8. Behold, thy time was the time of love, &c.] I thought it now a proper time to betroth thee to myself: the Jews' deliverance out of Egypt is elsewhere described as the time of God's espousing them to himself. (See Jer. ii. 2, &c. Hos. ii. 15. 19.) And his entering into a covenant with them, is commonly represented by a marriage-contract. (See Isa. liv. 5. Jer. iii. 1. 14. and Bishop Patrick's Preface to his Commentary on the Canticles.)

I spread my skirt over thee.] I took thee under my protection, as a husband doth the wife. (See Ruth iii. 9.)

And covered thy nakedness.] Enriched thee with the goods and possessions of the Egyptians and Canaanites. (See ver. 10, 11, &c.)

Ver. 9. Then I washed thee with water—and anointed thee with oil.] I added every thing that could contribute to thy beauty and ornament. The anointing with oil was reckoned a necessary ingredient in a festival dress. (See Ruth iii. 3. Isa. lxi. 3. Matt. vi. 17.)

Ver. 10. I shod thee with badgers' skins, &c.] Or, with sandals of a purple colour, as Bochart expounds the word tahash. This and the following verses allude to those parts of women's attire, which serve not only for use, but for ornament too; and import that God did not only provide the Jews with necessaries, but likewise with superfluities.

I girded thee with fine linen.] This manufacture Egypt was famous for: (see xxvii. 7.) it was one of the principal ornaments of women, (see Isa. iii. 16.) as well as of great men.

Ver. 11. I put bracelets upon thy hands, and a chain about thy neck.] These were ornaments that none but persons of better quality used to wear. (See Gen. xxiv. 47. Prov. i. 9.)

Ver. 12. And I put a jewel on thy forehead.] The same which is called a nose-jewel, Isa. iii. 21. where the words might as well be translated, a jewel for the face or forehead. (Compare likewise Gen. xxiv. 47.)

And a beautiful crown upon thy head.] Crowns or garlands were used in times of public rejoicing; from whence is derived that expression of St. Paul, A crown of rejoicing; 1 Thess. ii. 19. (Compare Isa. xxxv. 10.) Virgins were sometimes adorned with crowns: (see Baruch vi. 9.) and they were commonly put upon the heads of persons newly married. (See Cant. iii. 11.)

Ver. 13. Thou didst eat fine flour, honey, and oil.] Thy country afforded all manner of plenty and delicacies. (Compare Deut. xxxii. 13, 14.)

And didst prosper into a kingdom.] Thou wast advanced to be the seat of a kingdom, and the city of the great King of heaven and earth, Psal. xlviii. 2.

Ver. 14. And thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty.] For the magnificence of the temple, called the Beauty of Holiness, and honoured with God's especial presence. (Compare Lam. ii. 15. Psal. xlviii. 2.)

Ver. 15. But thou didst trust in thy own beauty, and playedst the harlot, because of thy renown.] Women that are proud of their beauty are easily tempted to lewdness, if they have not a strict guard upon themselves: so you abused those honours and advantages which I had bestowed upon you, and made them an occasion of forsaking me your benefactor, and serving idols. You presumed upon that very favour which I had shewed to Jerusalem, in choosing it for the place of my residence; as if that would secure you from my vengeance, let your idolatries and other wickedness be never so great. (See Jer. vii. 4. Micah iii. 11.)

And playedst the harlot.] Idolatry is commonly described by the metaphor of spiritual adultery, as hath been already observed. (See the note on ver. 8. and compare xxiii. 3. 8. 11. Isa. lvii. 8. Jer. ii. 20. iii. 2. 6. 20.)

Ver. 16. And of thy garments thou didst take, and deckedst thy high places, &c.] This was a great aggravation of their ingratitude, that they applied those very blessings, which God had given them, to the worship of idols. (Compare Hos. ii. 8.)

And deckedst thy high places with divers colours.] Or, madest high places, or images of divers colours; as the LXX. explain the sense. Thou madest little shrines, chapels, or altars for idols, and deckedst them with hangings of divers colours, ver. 18. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 7.) The word bamah is sometimes used for an altar, because altars were commonly set upon eminent places. (See ver. 24, 25.) In that sense the Chaldee paraphrase understands it, Jer. xlviii. 35. and so it may be best understood, xx. 29. of this prophecy.

The like things shall not come, neither shall it be so.] I will utterly destroy those idolatries, and those that commit them.

Ver. 17. Thou hast also taken thy fair jewels of my gold, and my silver—and madest to thyself images of men.] The wealth I had bestowed upon thee thou hast laid out in doing honour to idols: (see vii. 19. Hos. ii. 8. 13.) and particularly in setting up images to deified heroes. (See xxiii. 14, 15.)

Ver. 18, 19. And thou hast set mine oil and mine incense before them; my meat also which I gave thee, fine flour, and oil, and honey, &c.] Thou offeredst these my creatures as a meat-offering unto idols. The meat-offering is called an offering of a sweet savour, because of the frankincense that was put upon it. (See Lev. ii. 2.) The oblation here mentioned differs from those offered to God in one particular; viz. that honey was mixed with it, which God had expressly forbidden to be used in his service, (Lev. ii. 11.)

Ver. 20. Moreover thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters—and these thou hast sacrificed unto them to be devoured.] These inhuman sacrifices were offered to the idol Moloch, in the valley of Hinnom. (See ver. 36. xx. 26. 31. xxiii. 37. Jer. vii. 31.)

Whom thou hast borne to me.] Being married to me by a spiritual contract, ver. 8. (Compare xxiii. 4.) The children whom I blessed thee with are mine, being entered into the same covenant with their parent, and devoted to my service. (See Deut. xxix. 11, 12.)

Ver. 21. Thou hast slain my children to cause them to pass through the fire, &c.] See the note on Jer. xxxii. 35. By children are meant here the first-born, who are set apart to be God's property in a peculiar manner, Exod. xiii. 2. and yet even these they sometimes sacrificed to their idols. (See Micah vi. 7.)

To cause them to pass through the fire.] The verb henebir, translated to cause them to pass through the fire, signifies also to dedicate, and denotes the first-born unto God, (Exod. xiii. 12.) So the words imply, that the Jews, instead of dedicating their first-born to God, as the law required, offered them up a sacrifice to the devil, that was worshipped in their idols.

Ver. 22. Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, &c.] That miserable condition from which I rescued thee, when I first took notice of thee, and set thee apart for my own people. (See ver. 3, &c. and compare ver. 43. 60.)

Ver. 24. Thou hast also built to thee an eminent place in every street.] Manasseh filled Jerusalem with idols, (see 2 Chron. xxxiii. 4, 5. 15.) many of which were worshipped upon high or eminent places. (Compare ver. 16. 31. and 2 Kings xxiii. 5. 12, 13.) The LXX. render the Hebrew word gab, a brothel-house; and it is certain that the worship of some of the heathen idols consisted in committing all manner of uncleanness. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 7. and the note upon ver. 26.)

Ver. 25. Thou hast also built thy high place at the head of every way, &c.] These and the following expressions allude to the practices of common harlots, who used to frequent the most public places, to allure passengers to them: (see Gen. xxxviii. 21. Prov. ix. 14, 15.) idolatry being in this chapter and elsewhere compared to the rage of lust. (See Isa. lvii. 5. Jer. ii. 23, 24. iii. 2.)

Ver. 26. Thou hast also committed fornication with the Egyptians, thy neighbours.] While the Israelites sojourned in Egypt, they learned to practise their idolatries. (See xx. 7, 8. Lev. xx. 3. Deut. xxix. 16, 17. Josh. xxiv. 14.) From Josiah's time the Jews were in a strict confederacy with the Egyptians, and, to ingratiate themselves with them, practised their idolatries. (Compare xxiii. 19—21. 40, 41.) And the worship of Tamuz, the idolatry they are upbraided with, viii. 14. was derived from the same country.

Great of flesh, and hast increased thy whoredoms.] Compare xxxiii. 20. The expressions may allude to the whoredoms which were committed in the worship of some of their idols. (See xxii. 9. Numb. xxxi. 16. Hos. iv. 4. Baruch vi. 43.)

Ver. 27. I have stretched out my hand over thee, and have diminished thine ordinary food.] I have abridged thee of many necessaries and conveniences, by giving thy country into the hand of thine enemies, as it follows.

And delivered thee into the will of them that hate thee, the daughters of the Philistines.] As a punishment of the idolatries which king Ahaz introduced among you. (See ver. 57. and 2 Chron. xxviii. 18, 19.) The daughters of the Philistines are put here for the Philistines, as the daughters of Samaria, Sodom, and the Syrians, stand for the people of those places, ver. 46, 47. 57. to carry on the allegory and comparison between them and Jerusalem, being all of them described as so many lewd women prostituting themselves to idols. (See ver. 41.) By the same metaphor Samaria and Sodom are called sisters to Jerusalem, ver. 46.

Which are ashamed of thy lewd way.] Those have not forsaken the religion of their country, as you Jews have done, nor have been so fond of foreign idolatries. (Compare v. 7. and Jer. ii. 11.) The Chaldee paraphrase explains the words to this sense: If I had sent my prophets to them, they would have been ashamed; but thou art not converted. (See ver. 47, 48.)

Ver. 28. Thou hast played the whore also with the Assyrians.] The Jews courted the alliance of their two potent neighbours, the Egyptians and Assyrians, as it served their present turn; and to ingratiate themselves with them, served their idols. (See Jer. ii. 18. 36.) This is particularly recorded of Ahaz. (See 2 Kings xvi. 10. 2 Chron. xxviii. 23.)

Ver. 29. Moreover, thou hast multiplied thy fornication in the land of Canaan unto Chaldea.] Or, with the land of Canaan, as Noldius translates the particle el, in his Concordance, p. 59. The sense is, Thou hast defiled thyself with all the idolatries of the heathen, beginning with those which were practised by the former inhabitants of Canaan, and, by degrees, learning new species of idolatry derived from distant countries, such as Chaldea was reckoned. (See Jer. v. 15. and compare this verse with xxiii. 16, 17. 2 Kings xvii. 16, 17. xxi. 3, &c. xxiii. 5, &c.)

Ver. 30. How weak is thine heart.] Not only unstable as to good resolutions, but even restless and unsettled in evil practices; still hankering after some new kind of idolatry, and resolved to indulge a wandering appetite. (See ver. 28, 29.)

Ver. 31. In that thou buildest thine eminent place.] See ver. 16. 24.

And hast not been as a harlot, in that thou scornest hire.] Or, to prostitute thyself for hire; as some translate the words.

Ver. 33. But thou givest thy gifts to all thy lovers.] The Jews are often upbraided for making leagues with idolaters, and courting their favours by presents, and by complying with their idolatries. (See Isa. xxx. 6. lvii. 5. 9. Jer. ii. 18. 25. 36. and the notes upon these texts.)

Ver. 36. And by the blood of thy children.] See ver. 20. Jer. ii. 34.

Ver. 37. Behold, therefore, I will gather all thy lovers.] Those allies whose friendship thou hast courted by complying with their idolatries. (See xxiii. 9. 22. Jer. ii. 25. iv. 30. xxii. 20. Lam. i. 8. Hos. ii. 10.)

With all them that thou hast hated.] Compare ver. 41. Such were Edom, Moab, and Ammon; who always bore a spite to the Jews, and insulted over their calamities. (See xxv. 3. 8. 12.)

And will discover thy nakedness unto them.] They shall see thee carried away captive, stripped and bare, (see ver. 39.) without any covering to thy nakedness, according to the barbarous custom of conquerors. (See the notes on Isa. iii. 17. xx. 4.) The words allude to the punishment that used to be inflicted upon common harlots and adulteresses, which was to strip them naked, and expose them to the world. (Compare xxiii. 29. Jer. xiii. 22. 26. Hos. ii. 3.)

Ver. 38. And will judge thee as women that break wedlock.] Whose punishment was death by the law, Lev. xx. 10. Deut. xxii. 22.

And shed blood.] See ver. 20, 21. 26. This was likewise a capital crime. (See Exod. xxi. 12.) In these two parts of Jerusalem's character, she was a type of the antichristian whore, who was likewise drunk with the blood of the saints, (Rev. xvii. 5, 6.)

And I will give thee blood in fury and jealousy.] I will make an utter destruction of thine inhabitants: (see xiv. 19.) or, I will pour out the blood of thy slain like water, (Psal. lxxix. 3.) Jealousy is the rage of a man, (Prov. vi. 34.) Such indignation will God shew against the idolatry of his own people, who hath declared himself a jealous God, and very tender of his honour, which is highly injured by the worship of idols, set up as his rivals. (See the note on v. 13.)

Ver. 39. They shall throw down thine eminent places.] They shall destroy all the high walls and fortifications; the expression alludes to the high places dedicated to idolatrous worship. (See ver. 24. 31.)

They shall strip thee of thy clothes, &c.] They shall first plunder thee before they carry thee away captive. (See ver. 37. and xxiii. 26.)

Ver. 40. And they shall bring a company against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones.] The Chaldean army shall beat down thy walls and houses with stones flung out of battering engines. (See Jer. xxxiii. 4.) The expression alludes to the punishment inflicted upon adulteresses, which was stoning. (See John viii. 5.) The particular sort of death which they were to suffer, is not expressed in the law; so the conjecture of Grotius upon that place of St. John is not improbable, that in the latter times, as wickedness increased, the Sanhedrin exchanged the milder punishment of strangling, used before, for the severer death of stoning.

And thrust thee through with their swords.] See v. 12. xxiii. 10. 47. xxiv. 21.

Ver. 41. And they shall burn thy houses with fire.] The punishment allotted to an idolatrous city, Deut. xiii. 16. The words may likewise allude to the punishment of burning, anciently inflicted upon harlots. (See Gen. xxxviii. 24.)

And execute judgment upon thee in the sight of many women.] The Syrians, Philistines, and other neighbouring nations. (See ver. 37. and the notes upon ver. 27.) The judgment I will execute upon thee shall be for an instruction to other nations, how they follow thine ill practices. (See xxiii. 48.)

And I will cause thee to cease from playing the harlot.] See xxiii. 27.

Ver. 42. So will I make my fury towards thee to rest, and my jealousy shall depart from thee, &c.] See ver. 38. and the note upon v. 13.

Ver. 43. Because thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth.] See ver. 22.

And thou shalt not commit this lewdness above all thine abominations.] Thou shalt not add these manifold and shameless practices of idolatry to all thy other wickedness. But the words may be rendered, Neither hast thou laid to heart all these thine abominations.

Ver. 44. Behold, every one that useth proverbs, shall use this proverb against thee, &c.] They that love to apply the memorable sayings of former ages to the present times, shall apply that common saying to thee, That the daughter follows her mother's steps, and Jerusalem is no better than the Amorites, whose land they inhabit, and whose manners they imitate. (See ver. 3.)

Ver. 45. Thou art thy mother's daughter, that loatheth her husband and her children.] Both these qualities are the property of a harlot, and were verified in the Jews, who abhorred God their husband, (ver. 8.) and cast off all natural affection to their children, sacrificing them in the fire to the honour of their idols, (ver. 20.)

And thou art the sister of thy sisters.] Samaria and Sodom. (Ver. 46.) The worship of Moloch was generally practised by the ten tribes, whose metropolis was Samaria, (see 2 Kings xvii. 17.) as it was by the Ammonites, who derived their original from Lot, an inhabitant of Sodom. (See 1 Kings xi. 7.) Great and crying sins are compared to those of Sodom. (See Isa. i. 9. iii. 9. Matt. xi. 23. Rev. xi. 8.)

Your mother was a Hittite, &c.] See ver. 3.

Ver. 46. And thine elder sister is Samaria, she and her daughters that dwell at thy left hand, &c.] Samaria is called the elder sister to Jerusalem, as being the capital city of the kingdom of Israel, a more large and potent kingdom than that of Judah, of which Jerusalem was the metropolis. She likewise led the way to that idolatry which afterward infected the whole nation, forsaking the worship which God had appointed in his temple, and setting up the idolatry of the golden calves. Samaria lay northward of Jerusalem, and Sodom southward; which two quarters of the world are expressed by the right and left, in the Hebrew language, being placed in such a position to those that set their faces eastward. So the phrase is to be understood, Gen. xiii. 9. If thou wilt go to the left hand, I will go to the right; where the Targum expounds the words, If thou wilt go to the north, I will go to the south. The same way of speaking is still used in the ancient British or Welsh language, as Archbishop Usher observes in his Primord. Eccl. Britan. p. 306. edit. fol.

Samaria and Sodom are described as metropoles, or mother-cities: so their daughters may be expounded not only of the inhabitants of each city, but likewise of the lesser towns which were anciently under the jurisdiction of the greater. (Compare xxvi. 4. 6. Jer. xlix. 2.)

Ver. 47. Yet thou hast not walked after their ways, &c.] See v. 7.

Thou hast corrupted more than they, &c.] See ver. 48. 51.

Ver. 48. Sodom thy sister hath not done as thou hast done.] Their sins were not committed with such aggravations of ingratitude; nor did I use such powerful methods to convince them of their wickedness, as I have done towards you. (Compare v. 6. Matt. x. 15. xi. 24.)

Ver. 49. Behold, this was the iniquity of Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness.] Sodom abused that plenty which God gave them to pride and idleness, which gave rise to those enormities which they afterward were guilty of. The Scripture takes notice of the fruitfulness of the soil where Sodom stood. (Gen. xiii. 10.)

Neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy.] Pride and luxury make men expensive in their own way of living, and regardless of the wants and miseries of others. (See Luke xvi. 20, 21.)

Ver. 51. Neither hath Samaria committed half thy sins.] The ingratitude of Jerusalem was greater than that of Samaria, because God had placed his name there, whose worship she forsook, and profaned the temple by placing idols in it; which was a degree of idolatry beyond any thing the ten tribes had been guilty of. (See v. 11. vii. 20. viii. 6. 15. xxiii. 38, 39. xliii. 8. 2 Kings xvi. 14. xxi. 7. 9.)

Thou hast justified thy sisters in all thine abominations.] Thou hast made them appear less guilty. (See Jer. iii. 11.) Another aggravation of thy sin consists in this, that thou wouldest not take warning by the judgments God brought upon them. (See ibid. ver. 8.)

Ver. 52. Thou also which hast judged thy sisters, bear thine own shame.] Because wherein thou hast judged them, or declared them deservedly punished, thou hast condemned thyself, having been guilty of the same sins, and those accompanied with greater aggravations.

Ver. 53. When I shall bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom, and her daughters, &c.] When the fulness of the gentiles shall come into the church, some of whom may be compared with Sodom for wickedness, (see Isa. i. 9.) then will I also remember you, who are my ancient people. St. Paul tells us, that the Jews will be provoked to emulation by the gentiles coming into the church, and thereby induced to acknowledge the truth. (See Rom. xi.

11, 12. 15. 25. 31.) The conversion of the gentiles is expressed in Jeremy, by returning the captivity of Moab, Ammon, and Elam, (xlviii. 47. xlix. 6. 39.) and by the Egyptians, Assyrians, Ethiopians, and Syrians, bringing presents to God, and acknowledging themselves his servants, in the prophecy of Isaiah, (xviii. 7. xix. 24, 25. xxiii. 18.) And by the same analogy we are to understand the returning of the captivity of Sodom here, of the gentiles coming into the church.

Ver. 54. That thou mayest bear thine own shame, &c.] In the mean time thou shalt bear the shame and punishment due to thy sins, and shalt be some sort of comfort to thy neighbours, in being a companion with them in punishment, as thou hast been in wickedness.

Ver. 55. When Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate, then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate.] When the prophets foretell the general conversion and restoration of the Jewish nation, they always join Judah and Israel together, as equal sharers in that blessing. (See xxxvii. 16. 22. and the notes there.)

Ver. 56, 57. For thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thy mouth in the day of thy pride, before thy wickedness was discovered.] These words should be joined together in the same verse or sentence: God saith to Jerusalem, that in the height of her prosperity, before her wickedness so fully appeared to the eyes of the world, by the extraordinary judgments brought upon her, she did not reflect upon the terrible vengeance which befel Sodom, and was designed for an example or warning to those that should afterward live ungodly, (2 Pet. ii. 6.)

Ibid. and Ver. 58. As at the time of thy reproach of the daughters of Syria, &c.] The words begin a new sentence, which may be translated more perspicuously thus, joining them to the following verse: But when it was the time of thy becoming the reproach of the daughters of Syria, &c. The particle kemo sometimes signifies when. (See Noldius, p. 431.) The words, with regard to what goes before, import thus much: In thy prosperity thou didst despise those who are no worse than thyself; but since thou hast been insulted and invaded by thy neighbours, both Syrians and Philistines, whom God hath made use of as executioners of his judgments upon thee, thou hast been a remarkable instance of his vengeance, and God's hand hath been heavy upon thee for all thine idolatries and abominations. The words relate to the frequent inroads the Syrians and Philistines made into Judea in the time of king Ahaz. (See 2 Kings xvi. 5. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.)

Ver. 59. I will even deal with thee as thou hast done, which hast despised the oath in breaking the covenant.] That solemn oath and covenant you entered into with me to be my people, and serve no other God besides: see Deut. xxix. 12. 14. which is likewise represented in this chapter, and many other places, under the solemnity of a marriage-contract. Hereupon God threatens her, that since she had broken her oath and promise, he should not think himself obliged to make good any of the promises of favour and protection which he had made to her, but would give her up to ruin and desolation. (See Numb. xiv. 34.)

Ver. 60. Nevertheless I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth.] I will have some regard for you, because you were formerly my people, by virtue of the covenant I made with you at your coming out of Egypt: (compare ver. 4. 22. of this chapter, and Hos. ii. 15. xi. 1. Jer. ii. 2.) at which time God chose them to be his peculiar people. (See Exod. xix. 5, 6.)

And I will establish with thee an everlasting covenant.] Such a one as shall never be abolished, viz. that of the gospel. (See Jer. xxxii. 40. and the note upon that place.)

Ver. 61. Then shalt thou remember thy ways, and be ashamed.] The Jews shall be touched with a deep sense and remorse for their former provocation, as a necessary preparation for their conversion. (Compare xx. 43. xxxvi. 21. Jer. xxxi. 9. l. 5. and see the notes upon those places.)

When thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder and thy younger.] See ver. 53.

And I will give them to thee for daughters.] Jerusalem thus restored shall be a type of that heavenly Jerusalem, which is the mother of us all, (Gal. iv. 26.) And even in the times of the apostles there was a particular deference paid to the church of Jerusalem, as the mother-church of the Christian world. (See Rom. xv. 26, 27.) Accordingly she is styled the mother of all churches, by the Second General Council, in their Synodical Epistle: (see Theodoret. Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. 9.) a title which the church of Rome now assumes, without any pretence from Scripture or antiquity.

But not by thy covenant.] Not by virtue of that covenant mentioned ver. 60. you have forfeited all your title to its privileges, ver. 59. but by virtue of that new covenant which I will make with you, through the Messias. (See Jer. xxxi. 31.)

Ver. 62. And thou shalt know that I am the Lord.] I will be then as conspicuous in my mercies, as I was before in my judgments. (See the note on vi. 7.)

Ver. 63. That thou mayest remember, and be confounded.] Be confounded at the remembrance of thy former wickedness. (See ver. 61.)

And never open thy mouth more, because of thy shame.] The mercies of the gospel in calling sinners to repentance, and accepting them, notwithstanding their many imperfections, do unanswerably confute all claim or pretence to merit. (See Rom. iii. 19.)

CHAP. XVII.

ARGUMENT.

Under the parable of two eagles and two vine-branches, the prophet figuratively expresses the carrying away Jehoiachin into captivity by the king of Babylon, who made Zedekiah king in his stead. He afterward revolted from the king of Babylon, whose vassal he was, and entered into an alliance with the king of Egypt. For this breach of his oath and fidelity, God threatens to make him captive to that very king from whom he had revolted.

Ver. 2. PUT forth a riddle.] i. e. A continued metaphor, or figurative speech, still pursuing the allegory of an eagle and vine in the several parts of the parable: this perhaps may make the hearers more attentive to what thou speakest.

Ver. 3. An eagle with great wings.] That is, the king of Babylon. (See ver. 12.) Conquerors are elsewhere represented by eagles, who are birds of prey, and remarkable for their swiftness. (See Deut. xxviii. 49. Jer. iv. 13. Hos. viii. 1.)

Long winged.] The LXX. and other interpreters translate the word from the Chaldee sense of it, of a great size; to avoid the repetition of the same sense over again.

Came to Lebanon, and cropped off the highest branch of the cedar.] i. e. Invaded Judea, or invested Jerusalem, and took king Jehoiachin captive. (See ver. 12. and compare Jer. xxii. 23.)

Ver. 4. And carried it into a land of traffic.] Babylon and the country about it, being the seat of a universal monarchy, must needs have been a place of great trading. Strabo takes notice, that the merchants who travelled by land to Babylon, went through the country of the Arabians called Scenitæ; (lib. xvi. p. 747.) and vessels of great burden came up to the walls of it from the Persian Gulf up the Euphrates. (See Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. vi. cap. 26.)

Ver. 5. He took also of the seed of the land.] Of the king's seed, as it is explained ver. 13. i. e. Zedekiah.

And planted it in a fruitful field; he placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow-tree.] Judea was a fruitful country, and well watered; (see Deut. viii. 7.) where Zedekiah flourished as a willow-tree, that thriveth best in a moist ground. (See Isa. xliv. 4.)

Ver. 6. And it grew and became a spreading vine of low stature, whose branches turned towards him, and the roots thereof were under him.] Though he flourished, yet he enjoyed but a tributary kingdom under the king of Babylon, and acknowledged him as his lord and sovereign. (See ver. 14.)

Ver. 7. There was also another great eagle, &c.] Pharaoh king of Egypt, with whom Zedekiah made an alliance; whereupon that king sent an army to raise the siege of Jerusalem. (See 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. Jer. xxxvii. 5. 7.)

This vine did bend her roots towards him, and shot forth her branches towards him, &c.] Zedekiah desired the king of Egypt's assistance and protection. Some render the words thus, Shot forth her branches under him from the furrows where she was planted, that he might water it.

Ver. 8. It was planted in a good soil, &c.] The words are to the same purpose with ver. 5. to shew that Zedekiah's condition was so good under the king of Babylon, that he needed not to have broke his oath, out of a desire to better it; whereby he involved himself and his country in ruin. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 20. and the note upon Jer. xvii. 25.)

Ver. 9. Shall he not pull up the roots thereof? &c.] Nebuchadnezzar, in return for this perfidiousness, shall destroy him and his family. (See 2 Kings xxv. 7.)

Even without great power.] God will appear visibly on the Chaldeans' side, so there will be no need of great force to subdue their enemies. (See Jer. xxi. 4. xxxvii. 10.)

Ver. 10. Shall it not utterly wither when the east wind toucheth it?] The prophet compares the Chaldean army to a parching wind, that blasts the fruits of the earth, withers the leaves of the trees, and makes every thing look naked and bare. (See xix. 12. Isa. xxvii. 8. Jer. iv. 11. Hos. xiii. 15.)

Ver. 12. Say now to the rebellious house.] See ii. 5. xii. 9.

Know ye not what these things mean?] Will ye not apply your minds to understand what God speaks to you? And that, whether he directs his speech to you in plain words, or delivers his mind in riddles and parables? (See xii. 2. 9. xx. 49.)

And hath taken the king thereof, and the princes thereof.] Jeconiah, and all his princes and offices. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 12.)

Ver. 13. And hath taken of the king's seed—and hath taken an oath of him.] Hath made Zedekiah swear an oath of fealty to him. (See 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13.)

He hath also taken the mighty of the land.] As hostages for the performance of the covenants agreed between him and Zedekiah.

Ver. 14. That the kingdom might be base, &c.] Zedekiah by this means became only a tributary king, (compare xxix. 14.) and consequently not in so honourable a condition as his predecessors had been; but yet this was the only means under the present circumstances to support himself and his government.

Ver. 15. But he rebelled against him in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people.] See the note on ver. 7. Egypt was a country that abounded in horses, of which there was great scarcity in Judea. (See 1 Kings ix. 28. Isa. xxxi. 1. xxxvi. 9.)

Shall he prosper? &c.] This was not only a violation of his oath and covenant, but likewise a breach of that part of the Jewish law, (Deut. xvii. 16.) which expressly forbade their king to fetch horses out of Egypt, or strengthen himself with the alliance of that people.

Ver. 16. In the midst of Babylon he shall die.] Whither he shall be carried prisoner. (See xii. 13.)

Ver. 17. Neither shall Pharaoh with his mighty army make for him.] See Jer. xxxvii. 7.

By casting up mounts.] See Jer. xxxii. 7.

Ver. 18. When, lo, he hath given his hand.] In token of entering into a mutual league and covenant. (See Isa. xli. 13.) Particularly it was a ceremony used when an inferior made profession of his subjection to his superior: see 1 Chron. xxix. 24. Jer. l. 15. Lam. v. 6. where we read that the princes and mighty men submitted themselves to Solomon the king; but in the original it is, they gave the hand under Solomon.

Ver. 20. And I will spread my net upon him.] See xii. 13.

And will plead with him there for his trespass.] God is said to plead with men, when he places their sins before their eyes, and convinces them of their disobedience by manifest tokens of his vengeance. (See xx. 36. xxxviii. 22.)

Ver. 21. And all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword.] See xii. 14.

Ver. 22. I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar, and will set it.] The prophet, pursuing the same metaphor, foretells the restoration of the royal family of David, in such terms as might in some degree be fulfilled at the return from the captivity, when Zerubbabel, of the lineage of David, had a shadow of kingly authority among the Jews, and by his means their church and constitution was again restored. But the words do more properly belong to Christ and his kingdom, which shall be extended over all the world.

I will crop off from the young twigs a tender one.] This description may fitly be applied to our Saviour, in respect to the low estate to which the family of David was then reduced, with great humility acknowledged by his mother, Luke i. 48. The meanness of his outward condition and appearance is represented by the prophet Isaiah, under the same expressions, (liii. 2.)

Ver. 23. In the mount of the height of Israel will I plant it.] The temple stood upon Mount Moriah, (2 Chron. iii. 1.) thence styled God's holy mountain; which expression is often used in the prophets to denote the Christian church; which is described as a city set on a hill, and conspicuous to all the world. (See xx. 40. and the note upon Isa. ii. 2.)

And it shall bring forth boughs, and bear fruit.] The living members of the church are compared to fruitful trees, and flourishing branches. (See Psal. i. 3. xcii. 2. John xv. 5. 8.)

And under it shall dwell all fowl of every wing.] i. e. Of every kind. A powerful, especially if it be an easy government, is a shelter and security to all its subjects. (Compare xxxi. 6. Dan. iv. 12.) Such shall be the kingdom of Christ to all that submit themselves to his laws.

Ver. 24. And all the trees of the field shall know that I the Lord have brought down the high tree, have exalted the low tree, &c.] Christ's kingdom shall by degrees exalt itself above all the kingdoms of the world; and shall at length put an end to them, and itself continue unto all eternity. (See Dan. iv. 35. 44. vii. 27. Luke i. 33. 1 Cor. xv. 24.)

I the Lord have spoken it, and have done it.] The prophets often speak of future events as if they were already accomplished, to assure us that they shall certainly come to pass. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 9.)

CHAP. XVIII.

ARGUMENT.

The calamities which ushered in and attended the captivity of the Jews, were expressly threatened as punishments of the idolatries and other sins of their ancestors. (See Jer. xv. 4.) This made the Jews of the present age complain of God's dealing hardly with them, in punishing them for the sins of their forefathers. This chapter contains an answer to the objection, importing that even under their captivity they should find their condition better or worse, according as they behaved themselves; and withal laying before them God's eternal rules of justice, with regard to the rewards and punishments of the next life, when he will judge every man according to his works, and every man shall bear his own burden.

Ver. 2. WHAT mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel?] With respect to the desolations made in it by sword, famine, and pestilence. (See vi, 2, 3, &c. vii. 2.)

The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge.] i. e. The present generation is punished for the offences committed by their forefathers, particularly for the sins committed in the time of Manasseh, king of Judah. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 26. Jer. xv. 4. xxxi. 29. Lam. v. 7.) This proverb had likewise a profane sense implied in it, and insinuated that the present age was not remarkably worse than those that had gone before it, and so did not deserve to be made an extraordinary example of God's vengeance.

Ver. 3. As I live, saith the Lord, ye shall not have occasion to use this proverb any more in Israel.] I will make such a visible discrimination between the righteous and the wicked, between those that tread in the steps of their forefathers, and those who take warning by their examples, that you shall not have any farther occasion to use this proverb among you. God expressly threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, both in the Old and New Testament; (see Exod. xx. 5. Matt. xxiii. 35.) but this is to be understood only with respect to the temporal punishments of this world (and these he doth not always inflict in an exact proportion to the demerits of those that suffer), not with respect to the eternal punishments of the next. See Bishop Sanderson's third Sermon upon 1 Kings xxi. 29. "The Scripture takes notice of a certain measure of iniquity, which is filling up from one generation to another, till at last it makes a nation or family ripe for destruction. And although those persons on whom this vengeance falls, suffer no more than their own personal sins deserved; yet, because the sins of former generations, which they equal or outdo, make it time for God utterly to destroy them, the punishments due to the sins of many ages and generations are said to fall upon them." (See Matt. xxiii. 35, 36. Dr. Sherlock, of Providence, chap. 8.)

Ver. 4. Behold, all souls are mine.] As they are all equally my creatures, so my dealings with them shall be without prejudice or partiality.

The soul that sinneth, it shall die.] Death is the wages of sin, and all men being sinners, the sentence of temporal death passes equally upon them all. But as life signifies in general all that happiness which attends God's favour, so death denotes all those punishments which are the effects of the Divine displeasure: (see 2 Sam. xii. 13.) under which are comprehended the miseries of the next world; and these shall be allotted to men according to their deserts, without any regard to the faults of their ancestors, which shall not then be laid to their charge, or taken into account to aggravate their guilt. The words dying, and death, are often used in the New Testament for the punishments of the next world: (see particularly Rom. viii. 13.) and they are expressed by the second death, Rev. xx. 14. an expression used among the Jews, and found in the Targum upon Deut. xxxiii. 6.

As the prophets instruct men in the practice of inward and evangelical righteousness, and in order to it speak slightingly of the mere external duties of religion; (see Isa. i. 11, &c. Jer. vii. 22, 23.) so they raise men's minds to look beyond the temporal promises and threatenings of the law, to the eternal rewards and punishments of another life. (See Isa. lxvi. 24. Dan. xii. 2.) In both which respects they prepared men's minds for the reception of the gospel when it should be revealed.

Ver. 6. And hath not eaten upon the mountains.] Idolatrous worship was commonly performed upon mountains or high places: (see vi. 13. xvi. 16. 44. xx. 28.) and eating part of the sacrifice, was properly maintaining communion with the idol to whom it was offered. (See Exod. xxxiv. 15. 1 Cor. x. 20, 21.)

Neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house of Israel.] Lifting up the eyes, is a posture of religious worship or adoration. (See Deut. iv. 19. Psal. cxxi. 1. cxxiii. 1.)

Ver. 7. Hath restored to the debtor his pledge.] God commanded the Jews not to detain any pledge they took from a poor man all night; which was, in effect, to enjoin them to lend to the poor without either pawn or usury. (See Exod. xxii. 25, 26. Deut. xxiv. 12, 13.)

Ver. 8. He that hath not given upon usury, neither hath taken any increase.] Usury, when it is exacted from the poor, hath been generally cried out upon as no better than oppression, and is particularly forbidden by the law. (See Exod. xxii. 15. Lev. xxv. 35, 36. Nehem. v. 1. 7. Jer. xv. 10.) It is probable that this sort of usury is chiefly here meant, because it is joined with oppression, violence, and want of charity.

Ver. 9. He shall surely live.] See the note on xx. 11.

Ver. 13. His blood shall be upon him.] His destruction is owing wholly to himself. (See xxxiii. 4.)

Ver. 19. Yet say ye, Why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father?] The Jews still appealed to their own experience, as the ground of their complaint mentioned ver. 2.

When the son hath done that which is lawful and right —he shall surely live.] In like manner, if ye had forsaken your fathers' sins, you might have escaped those judgments I denounced against your fathers. (See the note upon Jer. xvii. 25.) But since ye have continued in their abominations, the punishments due to them justly come upon you.

Ver. 20. The soul that sinneth, it shall die.] See the notes upon ver. 3, 4.

Ver. 22. They shall not be mentioned to him.] Or, remembered against him: God is said in Scripture to remember men's sins, when he punishes them; (see Jer. xiv. 10. Hos. viii. 13.) and to forget them when he pardons them, (Jer. xxxi. 34. Amos viii. 7.)

Ver. 23. Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? &c.] In conformity to this doctrine, the New Testament instructs us, that God would have all men to be saved, and is not willing that any should perish, (1 Tim. ii. 4. 2 Pet. iii. 9.)

Ver. 24. All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned.] For, Better had it been for him not to have known the way of righteousness, than after he hath known it, to turn aside from the holy commandment, (2 Pet. ii. 21.) Such a one sins against a clearer light and greater convictions, and withal is guilty of the greatest ingratitude, in doing despite unto the Spirit of grace.

Ver. 25. Yet ye say, The way of the Lord is not equal, &c.] The declarations I have so often repeated concerning the eternal rewards and punishments allotted to the righteous and the wicked, are sufficient to vindicate the justice of my proceedings against all your objections.

Ver. 26, 27. When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, &c.] It is an opinion that prevails among the Jews even till this day, that at the day of judgment a considerable number of good actions shall overbalance men's evil ones. (See xxxiii. 13.) So they thought it a hard case for a man, who had been righteous the far greatest part of his life, if he did at last commit iniquity, that his former righteousness should avail him nothing. In opposition to this doctrine, God here declares, that a righteous man sinning, and not repenting, should die in his sins; and that a wicked man, upon his repentance, should save his soul alive.

Ver. 30. Therefore I will judge you, O house of Israel, every one according to his ways.] You complain of the injustice of my ways or proceedings; but if I judge you according to the desert of your ways, you will certainly be all found guilty, and nothing but repentance and true contrition can avert that ruin your sins threaten you with.

Ver. 31. And make you a new heart, and a new spirit.] The prophets often exhort the Jews to an inward purity and holiness, thereby to take them off from relying upon an outward legal righteousness, and an exactness in the observance of the ritual parts of the law. (See the note upon ver. 4.) By thus instructing them in a more excellent way of serving God, than the ceremonial law did directly prescribe, they prepared their minds for receiving those truths which the gospel would more fully discover. God promises, xxxvi. 26. to give them a new heart, and to put within them a new spirit; here he exhorts them to make themselves a new heart, and a new spirit. Which difference of expression is thus to be reconciled, that although God works in us to will and to do, and is the first mover in our regeneration, yet we must work together with his grace, at least willingly receive it, and not quench or resist its motions. (See the note upon Jer. xxxi. 18.)

CHAP. XIX.

ARGUMENT.

Under the parable of a lion's whelps, the prophet describes the sad catastrophe of the two kings of Judah, Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim; and under the figure of a vine, he represents the desolation and captivity of the whole people.

Ver. 1. TAKE thou up a lamentation for the princes of Israel.] The expression alludes to the mournful ditties used at funerals. (Compare xxvi. 17. xxvii. 2.) Such a lamentation the prophet is directed to apply to the mournful estate of the royal family of Judah; particularly with respect to Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim.

Ver. 2. What is thy mother?] The prophet proposes a question that may be applied to each prince distinctly.

What is thy mother? a lioness, &c.] The land of Judea, thy native country, (see ver. 10.) is become cruel and bloody; (compare Psal. xxxiv. 10. Nahum ii. 11, 12.) and hath taught her princes and rulers to govern by cruelty and oppressions. (See vii. 23. xxii. 27. Jer. xxii. 17. Zeph. iii. 3.)

Ver. 3. She brought up one of her whelps: it became a young lion.] Compare ver. 6. This is meant of Jehoahaz, who followed not the good example of his father Josiah, but the evil practices of the wicked kings his predecessors. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 32.)

Ver. 4. The nations also heard of him, &c.] Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, hearing his ill character, deposed him, and made him a prisoner. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 33. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4.)

He was taken in their pit.] The expression alludes to those pitfalls and snares which are made to take wild beasts.

Ver. 5. Then she took another of her whelps.] Jehoiakim was set up king in his brother's stead, by the king of Egypt, who, by his victory over Josiah, had made himself master of Judea: (2 Kings xxiii. 33, 34.) but yet Pharaoh seems to have done this by the joint consent of the people, who had before set up Jehoiakim's younger brother, without asking the king of Egypt's consent.

Ver. 6. He went up and down among the lions, &c.] He learned and practised all the methods of tyranny and oppression. (See Jer. xxii. 13. 17. xxxvii. 2.)

Ver. 7. And he knew their desolate places.] Or, He knew their palaces, as the word armenoth is translated, Amos i. 7. And the word almenoth here used is equivalent to armenoth. (See Isa. xiii. 22.) Jehoiakim made himself master of the riches and pleasant seats of the great men of the land.

Ver. 8, 9. Then the nations set against him on every side, &c.] The Chaldeans, and their neighbours and allies, invaded Judea, and afterward besieged Jerusalem, and took Jehoiakim prisoner. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 2. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6.)

And spread their net over him: he was taken in their pit.] See ver. 4. and compare xii. 13.

Ver. 9. That his voice should no more be heard upon the mountains of Israel.] The words allude to a lion's seeking his prey upon the mountains. Ezekiel often expresses the land of Israel by the mountains of Israel. (See the note upon vi. 2.)

Ver. 10. Thy mother is like a vine in thy blood, &c.] The country of Judea, from whence the royal family have their original, was like a fruitful vine in a flourishing condition. (See xvii. 5, 6.)

Ver. 11. And she had strong rods for the sceptres of them that bare rule.] From her sprung sovereign princes, who were themselves very powerful, and made their people appear considerable among their neighbours. A rod or sceptre is an emblem of authority. (See Isa. ix. 4. x. 5. Jer. xlviii. 17.)

Her stature was exalted among the thick branches.] Compare xxxi. 3. Dan. iv. 11.

Ver. 12. But she was plucked up in fury.] God in his anger removed her out of her land. (Compare Psal. iii. 5. Jer. xii. 14.)

The east wind dried up her fruits.] See xvii. 10.

Her strong rods are broken and withered.] Her kings and princes were subdued and made captives.

The fire consumed them.] God's anger destroyed them, as fire consumeth the branches of a tree when it is withered. (See xv. 4.) God's wrath is often compared to fire. (See xxx. 8.)

Ver. 13. And now she is planted in the wilderness, in a dry and thirsty land.] A great part of her people are carried captive, where their condition is as much different from what it was formerly, as the condition of a tree is when it is removed out of a rich soil into a dry and barren ground. The Jews suffered several captivities before that final one which ended in the destruction of their temple and government. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 12. Jer. lii. 28. Dan. i. 3.)

Ver. 14. And fire is gone out of a rod of her branches, which hath devoured her fruit, &c.] Zedekiah's breaking his oath of fealty to the king of Babylon, hath been the occasion of the utter destruction of the royal family, and the entire ruin of the government. (See xvii. 18, 19. 2 Kings xxiv. 20.)

This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation.] This is matter of present lamentation, and shall be so to aftertimes.

CHAP. XX.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter contains a rehearsal of the rebellions and idolatries of the Jews, from their going out of Egypt to that very day. The prophet afterward foretells their conversion and restoration. The last five verses contain a prophecy against Jerusalem.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in the seventh year, &c.] Of Jehoiachin's captivity. (Compare i. 2. viii. 1.) All the prophecies recorded from the eighth chapter to this probably belong to the sixth year of that captivity.

Certain of the elders of Israel came to inquire of the Lord, &c.] See the note on viii. 1.

Ver. 3. I will not be inquired of by you.] You shall not receive such an answer as you expect, but such as your hypocrisy deserves. (See ver. 31. xiv. 3, 4.)

Ver. 4. Wilt thou judge them?] Wilt thou plead for them? as our margin reads, or defend their cause? But the words may perhaps be more significantly translated, Wilt thou not judge them? i. e. Wilt thou not reprove or condemn them? Noldius observes in his Concordance, p. 233. that he, the particle of interrogation, which answers the Latin particle an, is often equivalent to the negative annon, and is to be translated, Is it not? (See ver. 30. of this chapter, and xxxviii. 17.) In which sense it is understood by our translators, 2 Sam. xxiii. 17. and so it should be rendered 1 Sam. ii. 27. Did I not plainly appear to the house of thy father? &c.

Son of man.] See ii. 1.

Ver. 5. In the day when I lifted up my hand to the seed of the house of Jacob.] When I entered into a solemn covenant with them, pursuant to the oath which I had sworn to their fathers. (See Exod. vi. 8.) Lifting up the hand was a ceremony used in taking an oath, (see Gen. xiv. 22.) and thereupon applied to God himself, Deut. xxxii. 40. The same expression is used ver. 6. 15. 23. 42. of this chapter. The same ceremony in taking an oath is mentioned by Homer, Εὔχετο χεῖρας ἀνασχών.

And made myself known unto them.] By appearing unto Moses, and shewing myself present among them by the wonders I wrought for their deliverance.

Saying, I am the Lord your God.] I am the God whom you ought to serve, and none else. (See Exod. xx. 2, 3.)

Ver. 6. Into a land which I had espied for them.] I performed the office of a spy, before those that were sent to search out the land, Numb. xiii. 16. and chose it out of all others to bestow it upon them. So God is said to go before them to search out a place to pitch their tents in, Deut. i. 33. Numb. x. 33. The expressions in both places import, that every step the people took, till their settlement in the land of Canaan, was under the immediate care and conduct of Providence.

Flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands.] Judea is often called a land flowing with milk and honey, both upon account of its own fruitfulness, the seed sown frequently bringing forth a hundred-fold; (see Gen. xxvi. 12. Matt. xiii. 8.) and also from God's particular blessing upon it. (See Deut. xi. 12.) The great numbers of inhabitants which it nourished is an evident proof of its fertility.

(See the note on Jer. xxxiii. 22.) It might justly be called the glory of all lands, because it was the place of God's especial residence. (See Psal. xlviii. 2. Dan. xi. 16. 41. 45.)

Ver. 7. Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes.] Lift not up your eyes to idols. (See xviii. 6.) One of the chief allurements to the worship of images is, that, by way of indulgence to men's imaginations, they exhibit a visible object of adoration. This was what the Israelites were so fond of, when they said to Aaron, "Make us gods to go before us," Exod. xxxii. 1.

And defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt.] The Israelites, while they dwelt in Egypt, learned the idolatries of that country. (See xxiii. 3. 8. Lev. xvii. 7. xviii. 3. Deut. xxix. 16. Josh. xxiv. 14.) Some learned men suppose that the golden calf was copied from the Egyptian idolatry. (See Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntagm. lib. i. cap. 4.)

Ver. 8. Then I said, I will pour out my fury upon them, —in the midst of the land of Egypt.] Such a threatening as this is no where recorded in Scripture, no more than that which follows, ver. 23. of this chapter. Without question God might have justly cut them off in Egypt, for the idolatries and other sins they had there committed, and never exerted his power for their deliverance.

Ver. 9. But I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted, &c.] This is elsewhere assigned as the reason why God did not punish the Israelites according to their deserts: viz. because it would turn to God's dishonour in the judgment of the heathen world, as if he were not able to make good those gracious promises he had given them. (See xxxvi. 21, 22. Exod. xxxii. 12. Numb. xiv. 13, &c. Deut. ix. 28.) This was a proper consideration to check the vain presumption of the Jews, who imagined that God's gracious dealings with them were owing to their own deserts. (See ver. 44. of this chapter, and xxxvi. 22.)

Ver. 11. And I gave them my statutes.] A favour not afforded to other nations. (See Deut. iv. 8. Psal. cxlvii. 20.) Such a treasure as David prizes above thousands of gold and silver, Psal. cxix. 72.

Which if a man do, he shall even live in them.] By life is meant, in the Old Testament, all that happiness which is contained in the literal sense of the promises belonging to that covenant. (Compare ver. 25. Deut. xxx. 15, &c. Psal. lxix. 32. Amos v. 4.) Under these were mystically comprehended the promises of a better life, wherein God will bestow upon his servants the peculiar marks of his favour. (See Psal. xvi. 11.) These promises were made over to the Jews, upon condition of their punctual obedience to the whole law: (Lev. xviii. 5. xxvi. 3, &c. Deut. xxvii. 26.) and several persons, under that dispensation, are styled blameless, by reason of the sincerity of their obedience, though it was not perfect or unsinning. (See Luke i. 6. Philip. iii. 6.) But if we understand the forementioned condition in its rigorous sense, as implying an exact and unsinning obedience, and as the word life contains the promise of eternal life under it, which promise the Jews expected and hoped to obtain: (see Matt. xix. 16, 17. Acts xxxvi. 6, 7.) I say, the condition of the old covenant thus expounded, as it was impossible to be performed, so no person could lay claim to eternal life by virtue of any promise therein contained. From whence St. Paul infers the necessity of seeking to Christ, and laying hold of the promises of his gospel, for the obtaining justification and eternal life. (Gal. iii. 12. 21.)

Ver. 12. Moreover I gave them my sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, &c.] The setting apart the seventh day for God's worship, was a sign of his setting apart the Jews to be his peculiar people, and the worshippers of the true God, who in six days made heaven and earth, and rested the seventh day. (See Exod. xxxi. 13. 17. Nehem. ix. 14.) The sabbath likewise was instituted as a memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt, and the rest they enjoyed afterward. (See Deut. v. 15.)

Ver. 13. But the house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilderness.] See Numb. xiv. 22. Psal. lxxviii. 40. xcv. 8—10.

And my sabbaths they greatly polluted.] Particularly in their going to gather manna on that day, against my express command, confirmed by an extraordinary descent of the manna on the day foregoing, (Exod. xvi. 25, &c.)

Ver. 14. But I wrought for my name's sake, &c.] See ver. 9.

Ver. 15. Yet also I lifted up my hand to them in the wilderness, that I would not bring them into the land which I had given them.] I solemnly swore (see ver. 5.) they should not enter into that rest which I had designed for them. (See Numb. xiv. 28. Psal. xcv. 11. cvi. 26.)

Ver. 16. For their heart went after their idols.] They still had a hankering after the idolatries they had learned in Egypt, to which they added new idols, which they had seen in the countries through which they travelled; viz. the idols of the Midianites, Amorites, &c. (See Numb. xv. 39. xxv. 2. Deut. xxix. 16, 17. Amos v. 25, 26. compared with Acts vii. 42.)

Ver. 17. Nevertheless mine eyes spared them, &c.] See Psal. lxxviii. 38.

Ver. 18. But I said unto their children in the wilderness, Walk ye not in the statutes of your fathers, &c.] This refers to the many pathetical exhortations contained in the book of Deuteronomy, particularly those in the twenty-ninth, thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second chapters, which were uttered after that rebellious generation were all consumed, according as God had threatened them: (see Numb. xiv. 32, 33. xxvi. 64, 65.) and were designed as warnings to succeeding generations. (See Deut. xxxi. 16. 21.)

Ver. 21. Notwithstanding the children rebelled against me.] See Numb. xxi. 5. xxv. 2. Deut. ix. 24. xxix. 18, 19. xxxi. 27. Psal. lxxviii. 32.

They polluted my sabbaths.] Profaning the sabbath and committing idolatry are often joined together: (see ver. 16. 24. xxii. 8, 9. xxiii. 37, 38. 1 Maccab. i. 45.) one great end of instituting the sabbath being to preserve the Jews from falling into idolatry. (See ver. 12.)

Then I said, I will pour out my fury upon them, &c.] God did punish the posterity of that rebellious generation very severely for their sins, particularly for their idolatry and fornication in the matter of Peor, Numb. xxv. 5. 9.

Ver. 23. I lifted up my hand unto them also in the wilderness, that I would scatter them among the heathen, &c.] St. Jerome observes upon the place, that we do not read of any particular threatening denounced against the children of that rebellious generation. But the words may relate to those general denunciations against their disobedience, which we find recorded, Lev. xxvi. Deut. xxviii. xxix. 20, &c. xxxi. 17. xxxii. 22, &c.

Ver. 25. Wherefore I gave them also statutes, that were not good, &c.] This some understand of the ceremonial law, as if it were given purely to be a check and restraint to that perverse people, consisting of numerous rites and observances, many of which had no intrinsic goodness in them. But I conceive the statutes here spoken of to be of a different nature from those mentioned ver. 11. because they have a quite contrary character given them; therefore I take the words to import, that God, in a just judgment for their disobedience to his own laws, gave them up to a reprobate mind, and suffered them to walk after the idolatrous and impious customs of the heathens round about them. And whereas, by obeying the laws and ordinances which he had given them, they might have lived happily, (ver. 11.) they became slaves to the vile and cruel practices of the heathen idolatries, so as to offer up their very children in sacrifice to idols, to the utter destruction of themselves and their posterity, (ver. 26.) This will appear to be the sense of the text, if we compare it with ver. 39. and with Deut. iv. 28. xxviii. 36. Jer. xvi. 13. in which texts God threatens them as a punishment for their neglect of his worship, to disperse them into the heathen countries, and thereby deprive them of an opportunity of serving him in public, and expose them to the peril of being seduced to idols. Just as David complains to Saul of the hardship of his exile, that it did lay him open to the temptation of serving the heathen gods, (1 Sam. xxvi. 19.)

Ver. 26. And I polluted them in their own gifts.] I suffered them to pollute themselves (so the form hiphil is elsewhere used in the sense of permission: see the note on Isa. lxiii. 17.) in those very gifts which by the law they were to dedicate to my service. (See ver. 31. and xvi. 20, 21.)

In that they caused to pass through the fire all that opens the womb.] In offering their first-born sons in sacrifice to Moloch; the expression of passing through the fire is explained in the note upon Jer. xxxii. 35.

That I might make them desolate.] Their sin brought its own punishment along with it, destroying the hopes of families, and bringing them to utter desolation.

To the end that they might know that I am the Lord.] See the note upon vi. 7.

Ver. 27, 28. Yet in this your fathers have blasphemed me, &c.] Or, Moreover in this, &c. The prophet proceeds to speak of other instances of idolatry which their fathers were guilty of after their settlement in the land of Canaan; and in which their posterity imitated them.

Then they saw every high hill, and all the thick trees, &c.] Offering sacrifice upon mountains or high places was a piece of service at first performed by the Jews to the true God, before the temple was built: (see 1 Kings iii. 2.) and afterward was permitted for that purpose by godly kings, who were zealous in putting down all sorts of idolatry. (See 1 Kings xv. 14. xxii. 43. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 17.) But by degrees those places became appropriated to idolatrous worship, and upon that score are severely condemned. (See vi. 13. xviii. 6. 2 Kings xxiii. 5. Isa. lvii. 5.)

There they presented the provocation of their offering; there also they made their sweet savour.] This is to be understood of their meat-offerings, being distinguished from their sacrifices already mentioned. The word in the Hebrew is mincha, which might more properly be rendered bread-offering, as appears by the several kinds of it reckoned up Lev. ii. and answers to the mola or fartum of the Romans. The meat-offering was particularly styled an offering of a sweet savour; (see xvi. 19.) but being offered to idols, it became abominable, and was turned into a provocation.

Ver. 29. What is the high place whereunto ye go? &c.] The word Bamah signifies an altar as well as a high place: (see the note on xvi. 16.) so the sense seems to be, What name is this altar called by, which you frequent? meaning, it is likely, the very altar belonging to the temple; is it not called Bamah at this very time? which word properly denotes a high place. An evident token that idolatry is so much practised among you, that it hath occasioned the changing the very names of the places and things dedicated to God's worship. So that instead of the word Mizbeach, the name which God appropriated to his own altar, the place is usually called Bamah, a name taken from an idolatrous custom. Or the words may be expounded of some noted high place, which the Jews frequented to perform their idolatrous worship: and then the sense will be to this purpose: What is this high place, or Bamah, which you frequent? Who bid you call it so? I named my altar Mizbeach; but this place had its name from the heathen idolatry, and it still retains it.

Ver. 30. Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers? &c.] The reproof would be more vehement if the words were rendered thus, Are ye not polluted after the manner of your fathers, and do ye not commit whoredom? &c. i. e. Do ye not walk in your fathers' sins and idolatries? notwithstanding all the warnings I have given you, and the severe instances of my displeasure against their practices, which ought to have terrified you from following their ill example. The particle of interrogation often implies a negative in it, as hath been observed upon the fourth verse of this chapter; to which sense the Vulgar Latin renders this verse, Certe in viis patrum vestrorum polluimini, &c.

Ver. 31. For when you offer your gifts, &c.] See ver. 26.

And shall I be inquired of by you?] See ver. 3.

Ver. 32. And that which comes into your mind shall not be at all, &c.] We find by the Scripture history that the Jews had all along a fond desire of worshipping the gods of their neighbours, and could not bear that imputation of singularity which their peculiar way of worship exposed them to. They thought likewise by this means to live more undisturbedly among the heathens, whither they were led captive. God tells them here, that he will prevent this purpose of theirs from taking effect. And we find, from the very time of their return from the Babylonish captivity, they have been very cautious of committing idolatry, and scrupulous of making the least approaches towards it.

Ver. 33. Surely with a mighty hand, and stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over you.] I will no longer try to reclaim you by the gentle methods of patience and forbearance, but will govern you as masters do ill servants, by stripes and corrections, and by this means cure you of your hankering after the heathen customs and idolatries.

Ver. 34. And I will bring you out from the people, and gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered with a mighty hand, &c.] This some understand of God's bringing his people out of the countries of the Moabites, Ammonites, and other neighbouring nations, whither many of them were carried captive, or went as voluntary exiles before the general captivity, by the Chaldeans. (See Jer. xii. 14. xl. 11.) But I conceive it is rather to be understood of the general restoration of the Jewish nation from the several parts of the world where they are dispersed; an event often spoken of in the prophets. (See ver. 38. 41. and compare this and the following verses with several passages in the thirty-fourth, thirty-sixth, and thirty-seventh chapters of this prophecy.)

Ver. 35. And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people.] The wilderness of the people may be equivalent to the country where they sojourn; (ver. 38.) so as to signify either the several dispersions of the Jewish nation, or rather some particular place or country through which they are to pass, in order to their return into their own land. The dissolution of a government is expressed in Scripture by a wilderness state. (See xix. 13.) The Jews going into captivity, are said to go out of the city, and dwell in the field: (Micah iv. 10.) and the church under persecution is represented as flying into the wilderness, (Rev. xii. 14.) The phrase does likewise allude to the wilderness through which the Jews passed to the land of Canaan, in order to the trial of the obedient, and the destruction of the rebellious. (Compare ver. 36. 38. xxxviii. 8. and Hos. ii. 14.)

And there will I plead with you face to face.] I will convict you of your crimes, so that you shall not be able to deny your guilt, but shall humbly acknowledge that you have deserved those punishments I have, or shall bring upon you. (Compare xvii. 20. xxxviii. 22. and see the note upon Jer. ii. 9.)

Ver. 36. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt.] This relates to that solemn sentence, confirmed by an oath, whereby God irreversibly doomed the rebellious Israelites to perish in the wilderness, and never to enter into the land of promise. (Numb. xiv. 28. &c.)

Ver. 37. And I will cause you to pass under the rod.] I will take an exact account of you, as a shepherd does of his flock, and will sever between the good and the bad, between the sheep and the goats. (See xxxiv. 17.) The expression alludes to the custom of the shepherds, who number their cattle by striking every one of them with a rod. (See Lev. xxvii. 32. Jer. xxxiii. 13.)

And I will bring you into the bond of the covenant.] I will make you sensible that I have not forgotten my promises to your fathers, though you have forgotten your obligations to me, and the engagements implied in your entering into covenant with me. The words may be rendered, I will bring you into the discipline of the covenant; the Hebrew verbs yasar and asar being of promiscuous signification; and then the sense will be, I will revenge upon you the quarrel of my covenant, (Lev. xxvi. 25.) and assert my authority over you, by bringing you under chastisement, in order to your correction. (See Amos iii. 2.)

Ver. 38. And I will purge out from among you the rebels.] I will separate the righteous from the wicked, (see ver. 37.) in order to destroy the latter, as I did the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness. (Numb. xiv. 29, 30.) Compare Ezek. xi. 21. xxxiv. 17. 20. Dan. xii. 1. Amos ix. 9, 10. where it is expressly said, that only those shall be delivered, who are written in the book of the living.

I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn; and they shall not enter into the land of Israel.] See the note on ver. 35. The word country in the singular number may be equivalent to countries in the plural, ver. 41. The sentence alludes, as the former does, to the judgment denounced upon the rebellious Israelites, that their carcasses should fall in the wilderness, and themselves never enter into the land of Canaan; which shall be only a portion for the righteous among them. This text, among many others, favours the opinion maintained by several authors, both ancient and modern, that the Jews, upon their conversion, shall return into their own land. (Compare xi. 14. xxviii. 25. see the note there, xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24.)

Ver. 39. As for you, O house of Israel.] You of the present generation.

Go ye, serve ye every one his idols, &c.] An ironical permission, full of indignation and rebuke, sharply upbraiding them for despising those many warnings God had given them: and implying, that he was now resolved to forsake them, and give them up to strong delusions, as a just judgment for their abuse of the means of grace so long offered to them, and still rejected by them. (Compare Amos iv. 4. Psal. lxxxi. 11, 12. Rom. i. 28. 2 Thess. ii. 11. and see the note upon ver. 25. of this chapter.)

But pollute ye my name no more with your gifts, and with your idols.] Whilst you offer your gifts, and make a present of your children to idols, (see ver. 26. 31.) do not call yourselves any longer my servants, nor pretend to pay your devotions in my temple, and thereby bring a reproach upon my name and worship. (See xxiii. 37—39.)

Ver. 40. For in my holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel.] In the Christian church, called God's holy mountain, in allusion to the temple at Jerusalem, built upon Mount Moriah. (See the notes upon xvii. 23. Isa. ii. 2.) The prophet speaks here of the Jews as converted and united to the Christian church; though some learned men are willing to believe, that, upon their conversion and return to their own country, certain privileges shall belong to the earthly Jerusalem, as the metropolis of that nation. (See Isa. lxv. 18, 19. lxvi. 20. Jer. iii. 17. Joel iii. 17, &c.)

There shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve me.] There shall be no more any such separation among you, as was when the ten tribes forsook the worship of God at Jerusalem. (See xxxvii. 22, 23.)

There will I accept them, and there will I require your offerings and the first-fruits of your oblations, &c.] Requiring signifies the same with accepting, by a metonymy of the cause for the effect; just as seeking is sometimes used for finding. (See Isa. lxv. 1.) In the same sense God is said not to require such instances of worship, in which he takes no delight, (Isa. i. 11.) Offerings signify in general every thing devoted to God's service, so as to comprehend tithes under it, (Numb. xviii. 21. 26.) The first-fruits were offered out of the fruits of the earth which were first ripe: of this kind was a sheaf of the corn, which was first reaped, (Lev. xxiii. 10.) part of the dough which was first baked, (Numb. xv. 20.) and, in general, the first of all the ripe fruits, Numb. xviii. 12, 13. (Compare xliv. 30. with this text.) This was computed to amount to the sixtieth part of the whole produce, (see Ezek. xlv. 13.) The prophet here expresses the Christian worship by those religious oblations, which were proper to his own time; as the other prophets frequently describe the state of the Christian church by representations taken from the Jewish temple and service. (See Isa. xix. 19. lvi. 7. lx. 7. lxvi. 23.) And even the primitive Christians brought oblations out of the first-fruits of their increase, for the support of God's ministers and service, out of which the elements of the eucharist, and the love-feast which followed it, were provided; as appears from several testimonies of the ancient fathers, particularly of Irenæus, (lib. iv. cap. 32. 34.) who generally interpret those words of Christ, (Matt. v. 23.) If thou bring thy gift to the altar, &c. of the sacrament of the Lord's supper.

Ver. 41. I will accept you with your sweet savour.] This is mentioned in opposition to the sweet savour of their offerings to idols: (ver. 28.)

When I bring you out of the people, and gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered.] Or, as it may better be translated, When I have brought you out of the people, &c. (Compare xi. 17. xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24. xxxviii. 8.)

And I will be sanctified in you before the heathen.] I will procure honour to my name by the wonderful works, whether of justice or mercy, which I will shew towards you. (Compare xxviii. 22. 25. xxxvi. 23. xxxviii. 23. xxxix. 27.)

Ver. 42. And ye shall know that I am the Lord.] An epiphonema often used in this prophet by way of conclusion of some severe denunciation: (see vi. 7.) but in this and the forty-fourth verse, and some other places, added after the promises of grace and favour, by which God makes his power known unto the world, as well as by his judgments. (See xxxvi. 23. xxxviii. 23.)

When I shall bring you [or, shall have brought you] into the country for which I lifted up my hand.] See ver. 5.

Ver. 43. And there shall ye remember your ways and your doings.] The prophets suppose that the conversion and restoration of the Jews shall be accompanied with a general repentance, and a deep remorse for their former misdoings. (See xvi. 61. and the note there.)

And ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight.] See vi. 7. xvi. 63. xxxvi. 31.

Ver. 44. When I have wrought with you for my name's sake, &c.] When I have exerted my power in your deliverance, moved thereto not by any deserts of yours, but purely out of regard to my own honour, and the promises made to your fathers. (See xxxvi. 22.)

Ver. 46. Set thy face towards the south.] Direct thy looks and thy speech (see iv. 7. vi. 2.) towards the land of Israel, and particularly towards Jerusalem, which lay southward of Chaldea. (See i. 4. xxi. 2.)

Drop thy word towards the south.] The gift of prophecy is compared to rain, or the dew of heaven, which makes every thing fruitful. (See Deut. xxxii. 2.) Such is the benefit of sound doctrine wherever it is received. (Compare Job xxix. 22, 23. Micah ii. 6.)

And prophesy against the forest of the south field.] By the forest of the south field is meant Jerusalem; the word forest being taken metaphorically in the prophets for a city; because its stately buildings resemble tall cedars standing in their several ranks. (Compare Jer. xxi. 14. xxii. 7. Zech. xi. 1.)

Ver. 47. I will kindle a fire in thee, and it shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree.] Fire is often taken in a general sense for God's severe judgments: (compare xix. 13. xxii. 21. 31. xxx. 8.) but it may here particularly denote the destruction of Jerusalem by fire; which the text saith shall devour both the green trees and the dry; i. e. the righteous as well as the wicked. (See xxi. 3.) The righteous are elsewhere compared to green and flourishing trees, and the wicked to dry and withered ones, such as are only fit for the fire. (See Psal. i. 3. Luke xxiii. 31. John xv. 5, 6.)

And all faces from the south to the north shall be burnt therein.] The destruction shall reach from one end of the land to the other. (See xxi. 2. 4.)

Ver. 49. Ah Lord God! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?] They make this an argument for disregarding what I say, that I use so many similitudes and metaphorical expressions, that they cannot discover my meaning. (Compare xii. 9.) Whereupon God commands him in the next chapter to speak the same thing in plain terms.

CHAP. XXI.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet, under the emblem of a sharp sword, foretells the destruction of Judea, and particularly of Jerusalem, and the country of the Ammonites, by the armies of Nebuchadnezzar.

Ver. 2. SET thy face towards Jerusalem.] See xx. 46.

Drop thy word towards the holy places.] i. e. Towards the sanctuary or temple, and the several courts belonging thereto. (See the note on vii. 24.)

Ver. 3. I will draw forth my sword out of his sheath.] The sword of the king of Babylon, the instrument of my vengeance. (See ver. 19. and xiv. 17.)

And will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked.] The command given by God, (ix. 6.) is to slay young and old, both maids, little children, and women; i. e. those that have not been guilty of idolatry and the other national sins, as well as those that have. Only the few mourners mentioned ix. 4. have a promise to escape. God's absolute dominion will justify any temporal calamity he thinks fit to bring upon men; and every man is so much a sinner, that no evil which befals him in this world, can be thought unjust with respect to God that inflicts it. But yet, when God punisheth men immediately by himself, as he did in the destruction of the old world, and of Sodom, it may be expected he should put a difference between the righteous and the wicked; as Abraham argues with him upon this subject, Gen. xviii. 23. 25.

Ver. 4. Against all flesh from the south to the north.] See xx. 47.

Ver. 5. It shall not return any more.] Into its sheath, as the sense is more fully expressed, ver. 30. till it has executed my commands.

Ver. 6. Sigh therefore with the breaking of thy loins, &c.] Shew all the tokens of grief and concern; (compare ver. 13. 17.) and let the sense of these impending judgments so deeply affect thee, as to make thee stoop, like one that is perfectly bowed down under the weight of them. (Compare Psal. xxxv. 14. xxxviii. 5. Isa. xxi. 3.) God's judgments, as they were represented to the minds of the prophets, did very often affect them with dreadful apprehensions; especially when they concerned their own people. (See Jer. xxiii. 9. Dan. viii. 28. Habak. iii. 16.)

Before their eyes.] Before the eyes of the elders of Israel, (mentioned xx. 1.) or of the Jewish captives, who could not but be touched with a tender sense of the calamities ready to befal their brethren in Judea.

Ver. 7. Every heart shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble, &c.] Men's hearts and strength shall fail them for fear. (See vii. 17.)

Ver. 10. Should we then make mirth?] Men that are hardened in sin are apt to laugh at God's judgments, and at those who give warning of them. This may be applied to those who spake peace unto the people, when there was no peace, (xiii. 10.)

It contemneth the rod of my son, as every tree.] It makes no distinction between the sceptre and common wood; between the branches of the royal family, descended from David and Solomon, whom I honoured with the title of being my sons, (2 Sam. vii. 14. Psal. lxxxix. 26.) and the meanest of the people. (See ver. 12. 25—27. xix. 11. 14.)

Ver. 11. It is furbished, to give it into the hand of the slayer.] Of the king of Babylon, the executioner of God's judgments upon Judea. (Ver. 19.)

Ver. 12. It shall be upon my people, it shall be upon all the princes of Israel.] Both princes and people shall be involved in one common destruction. Concerning the princes of Israel, see the note upon xxii. 6.

Smite therefore upon thy thigh.] Use all the outward expressions of grief and mourning. (Compare ver. 6. 14. 17. vi. 11. xxxi. 19.)

Ver. 13. Because it is a trial.] As all great calamities are styled, (Job ix. 23. 2 Cor. viii. 2. Heb. xi. 36.)

And what if the sword contemn even the rod?] The sceptre and royal family. (See ver. 10.)

It shall be no more, saith the Lord.] See ver. 27.

Ver. 14. Smite thy hands together.] See Numb. xxiv. 10. and ver. 12. of this chapter.

And let the sword be doubled the third time.] The expression may import, first, the slaughter made at the siege; then those that were slain at the taking of the city; in which number may be reckoned the sons of Zedekiah, as also the chief priests and principal officers of state, who were taken and put to death immediately afterward: (see ver. 14. and 2 Kings xxv. 7. 18—21.) to these may be added, in the third place, those who were slain with Gedaliah, (Jer. xli. 2, 3.) But perhaps the expression, Let the sword be doubled a third time, may mean no more than if the prophet had said, Let the stroke be repeated twice and thrice, i. e. oftentimes. So that phrase is used Job xxxiii. 29. All these things worketh God twice and thrice with man, where our translation very fitly expresses the sense oftentimes. A form of speech much like those elsewhere used, For three transgressions and for four, Amos i. 3. Give a portion to seven, yea also to eight, Eccles. xi. 2.

It is the sword of the great men that are slain, which entereth into their privy chambers.] Whither they went to hide themselves. (See 1 Kings xxii. 25.)

Ver. 15. I have set the point of the sword against all their gates.] The word ibchath, translated the point; is to be found but in this one place of the Bible, and so is variously rendered by interpreters. Dr. Castell understands it of the destruction made by the sword, from the use of the word in the Ethiopic language.

It is made bright.] The Hebrew reads here and ver. 10. It is made like lightning; the same metaphor which we read in Virgil, Æn. iv.

——"Vaginaque eripit ensem
Fulmineum."

He drew his sword, which did like lightning blaze.

It is wrapped up for the slaughter.] Or rather, It is sharpened for the slaughter, as the Chaldee translates menuttah, which is derived from the noun net, signifying an iron pen or stiletto.

Ver. 16. Go thee one way or other.] The words are directed to the sword, implying that God hath given it a large commission to go through the land without any restraint. (See xiv. 17.)

On the right hand, or on the left.] Either to the south, or to the north, (ver. 4.) Those two quarters of the world being expressed in the Hebrew language by the right and left. (See the note on xvi. 46.)

Ver. 17. I will also smite my hands together.] To express my just indignation at their provocations. (See ver. 14. xxii. 13.)

And I will cause my fury to rest.] See the note on v. 13.

Ver. 19. Appoint thee two ways, that the sword of the king of Babylon may come.] God foreshews his prophet that the king of Babylon, coming with his army into Syria, and finding that the Ammonites had entered into a confederacy with Egypt, as well as Zedekiah, he was in doubt against which of the two people he should first make war, and committed the decision of this matter to his arts of divination, described ver. 21.

Ver. 20. That the sword may come to Rabbath of the Ammonites.] Rabbath, otherwise called Rabbah, (xxv. 5.) was the chief city of the Ammonites. (See 2 Sam. xii. 26. Jer. xlix. 2.)

In Jerusalem the defenced.] Which had been strongly fortified, first by David, (2 Sam. v. 9.) then by Solomon, (1 Kings ix. 24.) afterward by Hezekiah, (2 Chron. xxxii. 5.) and then by Manasseh, (ibid. xxxiii. 14.)

Ver. 21. For the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way—to use divination; he made his arrows bright.] This way of divining by arrows is thus described by St. Jerome in his commentary upon this place: "They wrote on several arrows the names of the cities they intended to assault; and then putting them altogether promiscuously in a quiver, they drew them out thence as lots are drawn; and that city whose name was writ on the arrow first drawn, was the city they first made war upon." Perhaps from this custom the verb hatsah, or hatsats, from whence hets, an arrow, is derived, comes to signify the parting or dividing any thing by lot, in which sense it is used Job xli. 6. Prov. xxx. 27.

He made his arrows bright.] Or rather, he mingled his arrows, as the Vulgar Latin translates it; which sense of the verb kilkal agrees better with the description of this kind of divination already given; and therefore is preferred by Dr. Pocock, who confirms this exposition from the Arabic use of the word. See his notes in Specim. Hist.

Arab. p. 329. where he treats at large of this manner of divination.

He consulted with images.] The Hebrew reads seraphim, which word, as it signifies some image or visible representation of a deity, so consequently it must be taken in an ill sense for an idolatrous worship, in which sense it is certainly used 1 Sam. xv. 23. 2 Kings xxiii. 24. Zech. x. 2. Dr. Spencer takes a great deal of pains to prove that the word is sometimes taken for a sort of Divine oracle, and is equivalent to the urim, by which the high-priest received an answer when he consulted God upon emergent occasions. (See his third book De Legibus Hebr. Dissert. ult. de Urim et Thummim.)

He looked in the liver.] This was another noted sort of divination, which was taken from lucky or unlucky tokens which appeared in the entrails of the sacrifices when they were slain, called aruspicina by the Romans.

Ver. 22. At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem.] When the king of Babylon stood at the head of two ways, (ver. 21.) to consult which of the two he should take, the tokens that were shewed him, persuaded him to march with his army to the right, i. e. towards Jerusalem.

To appoint captains, to open the mouth in slaughter, to lift up the voice with shouting.] Whose office it was to encourage the army to fall upon their enemies, and destroy them. (See Jer. l. 15.)

To cast a mount.] See Jer. xxxii. 24.

Ver. 23. And it shall be unto them as a false divination in their sight, to them that have sworn oaths.] The king of Judea and his courtiers will despise all these preparations of war, though directed against them, as if they were grounded upon the false arts of divination; whereas it is indeed God himself that directs the march of the Chaldean army, to revenge the perjury which Zedekiah and his counsellors were guilty of, in breaking that solemn oath of fealty which he made to the king of Babylon. (See xvii. 13. 15.)

But he will call to remembrance iniquity, that they may be taken.] Nebuchadnezzar will remember Zedekiah's breach of his oath, and revenge himself by taking the city, and making him and his subjects prisoners of war.

Ver. 24. Because ye have made your iniquity to be remembered—ye shall be taken with the hand.] Because your sins cry to heaven for vengeance, ye shall fall into the hands and power of the king of Babylon.

Ver. 25. And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel.] The words are directed to Zedekiah, whom the prophet calls profane and wicked, chiefly with respect to his breaking that solemn oath uttered in the name of God, whereby he had engaged himself to be tributary to the king of Babylon. (See xvii. 19.) With God is no respect of persons; in like manner, when the prophets speak to kings in the name of God, they lay aside those titles and expressions of respect which are otherwise due to the regal dignity. (See 1 Sam. xiii. 13. 1 Kings xviii. 18. 2 Kings iii. 13, 14.)

Whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end.] The day of whose calamity is near at hand, when his and his people's iniquity shall receive their just doom. (Compare vii. 6. xxx. 3. xxxv. 5.)

Ver. 26. Remove the diadem, and take off the crown.] The words crown and diadem are equivalent, and put to signify the kingly ornaments of dignity. (See Isa. lxii. 3.) Indeed the crown is elsewhere taken for the emblem of sovereignty, and the diadem or mitre for the proper ornament of the priesthood, and so the Chaldee paraphrase expresses the sense of the verse in these words, Remove the mitre from Seraiah the chief priest, and I will take away the crown from Zedekiah the king. But I conceive this sense does not so well agree with the design of the place, where the judgment threatened is spoken only of Zedekiah.

This shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high.] Things shall not continue in their present state; as Zedekiah shall be brought down from his kingly dignity, so another branch of that family (viz. Christ, see ver. 27.) shall be advanced, from an obscure original and low condition, to the supreme degree of sovereignty. (Compare xvii. 24.)

Ver. 27. I will overturn—it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him.] After that Zedekiah is deprived of his regal authority, there shall be no more kings of that family till Christ come, the King so often foretold and promised, who in due time shall reign upon the throne of his father David, and of whose kingdom there shall be no end, (Luke i. 32, 33.) After the captivity, some of the priests of the Assamonean race did assume the style and title of kings; but they not being of the tribe of Judah, could have no just right to that honour.

Until he come whose right it is.] In this sense the LXX. understand the word Shiloh, Gen. xlix. 10. translating it there, Ὡι ἀπόκειται, To whom it is reserved: as if that Hebrew word were equivalent to sheloh, whose it is, as the learned P. Fagius hath observed in his notes upon the Targum of that text.

Ver. 28. Thus saith the Lord God concerning the Ammonites, and concerning their reproach.] They insulted over the calamities of their brethren the Jews, for which they are often reproved very severely by the prophets, and threatened with the like judgments. (See xxv. 2. 6. Zeph. ii. 8. 10.)

Ver. 29. Whiles they see vanity unto thee, whiles they divine a lie unto thee.] While the soothsayers and pretenders to divination foretell nothing but happy events. (See xiii. 23. xxii. 28.)

To bring thee upon the necks of them that are slain.] To add thee to the number of those who are slain in Judea: (ver. 14, 15.) and make thy condition like theirs.

Of the wicked, whose day is come.] See ver. 25.

Ver. 30. Shall I cause it to return into his sheath?] See ver. 4, 5.

I will judge thee in the place where thou wast created.] Thou shalt not be carried captive, but shalt be destroyed in thine own land. (See ver. 32.)

Ver. 31. I will blow against thee in the fire of my wrath.] Compare xxii. 20—22.

Ver. 32. Thou shalt be no more remembered.] See xxv. 10.

CHAP. XXII.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter contains a catalogue or recital of the sins of Jerusalem, and of all orders and degrees of men in it; for which God threatens to inflict his severest judgments upon it.

Ver. 3. That her time may come.] See vii. 7.

Ver. 4. Thou hast caused thy days to draw near, and art come even unto thy years.] Thou hast filled up the measure of thine iniquities, and brought the time of vengeance upon thyself. (See vii. 10.)

Therefore have I made thee a reproach unto the heathen, &c.] See v. 14. xxi. 28. Deut. xxviii. 37. 1 Kings ix. 7.)

Ver. 5. Those that be near, and those that be far off, mock thee.] See xvi. 57.

Ver. 6. Behold, the princes of Israel, &c.] These were probably the members of the great Sanhedrin; or the king's counsellors and chief officers of state. (See Jer. xxvi. 10. xxxvi. 12.)

Ver. 7. In thee have they set light by father and mother.] Against which sin there is a solemn curse pronounced, Deut. xxvii. 16.

Ver. 8. Thou hast despised my holy things, and profaned my sabbaths.] Thou hast profaned the things dedicated to my service, and the times and places set apart for the same purpose. (Compare ver. 26. xxiii. 38. and Lev. xix. 30.)

Ver. 9. In thee are men that carry tales to shed blood.] That bear false witness against men in capital cases. (See Lev. xix. 16.)

And in thee they eat upon the mountains.] See xviii. 6.

Ver. 10. In thee have they discovered their fathers' nakedness.] Took their mother-in-law to wife, which St. Paul calls such fornication as is not named among the gentiles, 1 Cor. v. 1.

Ver. 12. In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood.] The judges have taken bribes, not only to pervert justice, but even to take away the lives of the innocent.

Ver. 13. Therefore I have smitten my hand at thy dishonest gain.] I have expressed mine indignation at these unjust practices. (See xxi. 14. 17.)

Ver. 14. Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong, in the days that I shall deal with thee?] On the contrary, All hearts shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble at the approach of God's judgments, xxi. 7.

I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it.] See xxiv. 14.

Ver. 15. And will consume thy filthiness out of thee.] I will purge thee in the furnace of afflictions, and take that method to consume thy dross, and put an end to thy idolatrous practices. (Compare ver. 18, 19, &c. xxiii. 27.)

Ver. 16. And thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself in the sight of the heathen.] Instead of being mine inheritance, and under my peculiar care and protection, thou shalt be cast out among the heathen, and there eat the fruit of thine own ways, and receive the just reward of thy wickedness. The margin of our Bibles reads, Thou shalt be profaned in thyself, &c. Which I think expresses the sense much better; taking the verb nihal in the same sense, wherein it is used vii. 24. and xxv. 3. of this prophecy; i. e. Thou shalt no longer enjoy the privileges of a city called by my name, and set apart for my residence, but shalt be laid open as common ground, to be profaned by infidels. (Compare Isa. xlvii. 6.)

Ver. 18—20. The house of Israel to me is become dross, &c.] Their filthiness may fitly be compared to the mixture of dross and baser metals with the pure silver; and as that is purified by being melted in a furnace or crucible, so Jerusalem, when it is set on fire, shall be the furnace wherein I will cast them and their wickedness to be consumed. (Compare Jer. vi. 28. 30.) God's severe judgments are expressed by the furnace of affliction, Isa. xlviii. 10. and compared to a refiner's fire, Isa. i. 25. Mal. iii. 2. because they are designed to purge men from that dross and corruption, which is too often the effect of ease and prosperity.

Ver. 21. I will gather you, and blow upon you in the fire of my wrath.] God's vengeance is often compared to fire. (See xx. 47.) But here it was so in a literal sense, when both city and temple were consumed by fire, (2 Kings xxv. 9.)

Ver. 24. Thou art the land that is not cleansed, nor rained upon in the day of indignation.] God had, in the foregoing verses, compared his anger to fire: in pursuance of which metaphor he adds, That if the wholesome advice and admonition of the prophets (compared to the dew or rain coming from heaven, xx. 46.) had been but duly received, they would have supplied the place of rain, and washed away the filth of the land: so that it needed not to have been purged or cleansed by fire. The Chaldee paraphrase expounds the sense thus, Thou art the land in which there have been no good works done to protect it in the day of God's curse or indignation.

Ver. 25. There is a conspiracy of the prophets in the midst of her.] i. e. Of the false prophets. (See the note upon Jer. xxix. 1.) These are often reproved for making a gain of their profession. (See Jer. vi. 13. Micah iii. 5. 11.)

They have devoured souls; they have taken the treasure and precious things, &c.] They make merchandise of men's souls; or else they take away their lives by false accusations, and then seize upon their substance. (Compare ver. 27. and Matt. xxiii. 14.)

Ver. 26. Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned my holy things.] The gifts and sacrifices offered in my service; either by offering them in an undue manner, as the sons of Eli did, (1 Sam. ii. 15.) or without due purification of themselves; or else eating them as common meats, without regard to the rules prescribed in the law, (Lev. xxi. xxii.)

They have put no difference between the holy and profane, &c.] They have not shewed any regard to the rules the Levitical laws lay down, whereby to distinguish betwixt what is holy or unholy, clean or unclean, and that both with respect to persons and things. And they are guilty of this neglect, in contradiction to an express charge given them concerning this matter, (Lev. x. 10.)

And have hid their eyes from my sabbaths.] They have not attended upon my public worship on the sabbath-days, (see 2 Chron. xxix. 7.) and thereby have encouraged my people in the neglect and profanation of that day. (See ver. 8.)

Ver. 27. Her princes in the midst of her are like wolves ravening the prey, &c.] The chief officers of state under the king: (see Jer. xxxvi. 12. xxxviii. 4.) not excluding the kings themselves, whose oppressions of their subjects the prophet elsewhere severely reproves. (See xix. 3. 6. xlv. 9.) All those, the text saith, stick at no method of injustice and oppression, whereby they may increase their substance, though it be by taking away the lives and estates of the innocent. (Compare Isa. i. 23. Micah iii. 1, &c. Zech. iii. 3.)

Ver. 28. And her prophets have daubed them with untempered mortar, &c.] Have daubed over the evil practices of the great men by palliating devices. (See xiii. 6. 10.)

Ver. 29. The people of the land have used oppression.] See Jer. v. 26. vi. 13.

Yea, they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully.] Contrary to an express prohibition of God's law, frequently repeated and urged upon them from the consideration that they themselves were strangers in Egypt. (See Exod. xxii. 21. xxiii. 9. Lev. xix. 33, 34.)

Ver. 30. And I sought for a man among them that should make up the hedge—but I found none.] This general complaint may be expounded with some restriction (such as is commonly understood in unlimited expressions). For we read ix. 4. that there were some that did sigh and cry to God, by way of deprecating his wrath, for the abominations done in Jerusalem. (See the like expression Jer. v. 1. and the note upon that place.)

That should make up the hedge, and stand in the gap, &c.] See xiii. 5.

Ver. 31. Their own way have I recompensed upon their heads.] See ix. 10. xi. 21. xvi. 43.

CHAP. XXIII.

ARGUMENT.

The idolatries of Samaria and Jerusalem are here represented under the metaphor of the lewd practices of two common harlots: for which crimes God denounces severe judgments against them both. The same metaphor is here made use of, which was pursued at large in the sixteenth chapter. (See the Argument there.)

Ver. 2. THERE were two women, the daughters of one mother.] Countries are commonly represented as mothers of their people, and the inhabitants as their children: so the daughters of Syria signify the inhabitants of that country, (xvi. 57.) Thus Samaria and Jerusalem are described in this chapter as sisters, the offspring of the same land or country. (Compare xvi. 46. Jer. iii. 7, 8. 10.)

Ver. 3. And they committed whoredoms in Egypt.] They learned to commit idolatry there. (See xx. 7, 8.) It has been already observed, that idolatry is often represented as spiritual adultery. (See xvi. 15, &c. and see the note upon xx. 8.)

They committed whoredoms in their youth.] The time when the Israelites were in Egypt, or were lately departed out of it, is called their youth in the prophets, because that was the time when God first owned them for his people. (See ver. 8. 19. xvi. 8. 22. 60. Jer. ii. 2. Hos. ii. 15.)

There were their breasts pressed, &c.] There they served idols, and there they corrupted their ways, as the Chaldee paraphrase expresses the sense. The Scripture commonly calls idolatrous churches and nations by the name of harlots; and, in like manner, honours those who preserve their allegiance to God pure and undefiled, with the title of chaste wives or virgins. (See 2 Cor. xi. 2. Rev. xiv. 4. xix. 7. xxi. 2.)

Ver. 4. And the names of them were Aholah the elder, and Aholibah her sister—Samaria is Aholah, and Jerusalem Aholibah.] The word Aholah signifies, Her tent or tabernacle; Aholibah denotes, My tent or tabernacle is in her. These two different appellations imply, that Samaria had indeed a tabernacle or place for public worship, but of her own devising, viz. the cities of Dan and Beth-el, where the golden calves were set up; whereas God's tabernacle first, and afterward his temple, was placed in Jerusalem. He placed his name there, or chose it for the place of his peculiar residence, (1 Kings viii. 29.) Why Aholah is called the elder sister, see the note on xvi. 46.

Ver. 5. And Aholah played the harlot when she was mine.] After she had lived in covenant with me, and attended upon my service and worship all the time of the judges, and of David and Solomon, she fell off from my service, and was the first that established idolatry by a law, and consented to Jeroboam's wicked device of setting up the golden calves.

And she doted on her lovers.] i. e. Her foreign allies, whose idolatries she was fond of, and hoped by that means to procure their friendship and assistance. (See the note on xvi. 33. 37.)

On the Assyrians her neighbours.] The king of Assyria was a very potent prince, and thereupon his alliance was courted both by the kings of Israel and Judah. (See 2 Kings xv. 29. xvi. 7. and ver. 12. of this chapter.)

Ver. 6. Which were clothed with blue, captains and rulers.] As women are apt to fall in love with comely young men well mounted and richly clothed; so the Israelites were enamoured with the state and bravery of the Assyrians, and thought themselves secure if they could but procure their alliance and friendship; and in order to it embraced their idolatries.

Horsemen riding upon horses.] Horses were scarce in Judea, which made the Jews apply themselves to the neighbouring countries for troops of horse in the time of any hostile invasion. (See Isa. xxx. 16. xxxi. 2. xxxvi. 8.)

Ver. 7. Thus she committed her whoredoms with them.] She defiled herself with her idols, as the sense is more plainly expressed at the end of the verse.

Ver. 8. Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt.] She added new idolatries to those she had formerly committed. (See ver. 3.)

Ver. 9. Wherefore I delivered her into the hand of her lovers.] God made these very Assyrians the executioners of his judgments upon the ten tribes: many of them being carried away captive by Pul, king of Assyria, (1 Chron. v. 25, 26.) afterward by Tiglath-pileser, (2 Kings xv. 29.) and at length the whole country was subdued and depopulated by Shalmaneser, (2 Kings xvii. 6.) The kings of Babylon were likewise styled kings of Assyria. (See 2 Kings xxii. 29. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11.) Lovers mean the same with allies, those whose friendship and assistance the Jews courted, by complying with them in their idolatries. (See xvi. 37.)

Ver. 10. These discovered her nakedness; they took her sons and her daughters.] They carried her and her children away captive, stripped and bare. (Compare ver. 29. and xvi. 37. 39.)

And slew her with the sword.] Compare ver. 47. and xvi. 40. Those that were not led captive were slain in the field of battle, or in the siege of Samaria, 2 Kings xvii. 5.

And she became famous among women.] The Hebrew reads, She became a name among women: as she had been formerly renowned among the heathen for her beauty; (xvi. 14.) so now she was every where talked of as a remarkable instance of God's vengeance, and set forth for an example to other cities and nations, to deter them from the like abominations. (See ver. 48. and xvi. 41.)

For they had executed judgment upon her.] See ver. 24.

Ver. 11. And when her sister Aholibah saw this, she was more corrupt in her inordinate love than she.] Jerusalem was so far from taking warning by the judgments inflicted upon Samaria, that she advanced to greater degrees of idolatry. (See ver. 14. xvi. 47. 51. Jer. iii. 8. and the notes upon those places.)

Ver. 12. She doted upon the Assyrians her neighbours, &c.] Compare ver. 1. The king of Judah, Ahaz, entered into a confederacy with the king of Assyria, hoping for relief from his power and the bravery of his army, and serving his idols to that end. (See 2 Kings xvi. 7. 11. 2 Chron. xxviii. 16. 23.)

Ver. 13. They took both one way.] Both of them were like common harlots, impudent in their idolatries, and irreclaimable. (Compare Jer. iii. 13.)

Ver. 14. When she saw men pourtrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans, &c.] These were probably the pictures of those deified heroes whom the Chaldeans worshipped as gods: such were Bel, Nebo, and Merodach, mentioned Isa. xlvi. 1. Jer. l. 2.

Ver. 15. Girded with girdles upon their loins.] A girdle was a mark of dignity, and worn as such by princes and men in authority. (See 1 Sam. xviii. 4. Isa. xxii. 21.)

In died attire upon their heads.] The Chaldeans, and afterward the Persians, wore a sort of turbans upon their heads, with different degrees of ornaments, according to their different qualities.

Ver. 16. And as soon as she saw them with her eyes, she doted upon them, and sent messengers unto them into Chaldea.] These images pleased her so much, that she sent to Babylon to learn the manner how their idols were to be worshipped. (See ver. 40, 41. and xvi. 17.) This probably relates to those times when a correspondence was maintained between the cities of Babylon and Jerusalem, after that Nebuchadnezzar had conquered Judea, and made it a tributary kingdom, in the beginning of the fourth year of Jehoiakim. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 1. Dan. i. 1, 2. and the notes upon Jer. xxii. 19.)

Ver. 17. And the Babylonians came to her into the bed of love, &c.] The metaphor of representing idolatry by the inordinate lust of adultery is still carried on.

And her mind was alienated from them.] She quickly grew weary of these too, as lewd women are of their former gallants, and look out for new ones. She broke her league and covenant with them, as St. Jerome very well expresses the sense; meaning that covenant which Jehoiakim made with Nebuchadnezzar, to be his tributary: (compare ver. 16. 22. 28.) and was afterward renewed by Zedekiah. (See xvii. 15.)

Ver. 18. So she discovered her whoredoms, &c.] The sense might better be expressed, After she had discovered, &c. the sense being still continued with the foregoing verse.

Then my mind was alienated from her, &c.] As she, by her idolatries, had broken all the bonds of duty and allegiance whereby she was engaged to me, a sin often compared to a wife's disloyalty towards her husband: so I withdrew my love and affection from her, and resolved to give her a bill of divorce, as the prophet Jeremy expresses it, and not own her any more as mine, as I had cast off her sister Samaria. (Compare Jer. iii. 8. vi. 8. Hos. ii. 2.)

Ver. 19. Yet she multiplied her whoredoms, in calling to remembrance the days of her youth, &c.] Though she was fond of new idolatries, she did not forget her old ones, even those which she had learned in Egypt. (See ver. 3.)

Ver. 20. For she doted upon their paramours, &c.] Upon the idols of Egypt, and the impure rites which accompany their idolatrous worship. (See the notes upon xvi. 26.) This may relate to the time when Zedekiah entered into a new confederacy with Egypt; (see ver. 21. and xvii. 15.) which made the people fond of admitting the Egyptian idolatries.

Ver. 22. I will raise up thy lovers against thee, from whom thy mind is alienated.] I will execute my judgments upon thee by those very Babylonians, whose alliance and idolatries thou hast been so fond of: (see ver. 9.) but since hast broken the league thou madest with them, contracting a new one with Egypt, and thereby hast provoked them to revenge thy perfidiousness. (See ver. 17.)

Ver. 23. The Babylonians, and all the Chaldeans, Pekod, and Shoa, and Koa, and all the Assyrians with them.] The inhabitants of the several provinces of the Babylonish monarchy. Pekod is mentioned as a province of Babylon, Jer. l. 21. St. Jerome upon the place understands these three words, Pekod, Shoa, and Koa, in an appellative sense, to denote so many titles or degrees of honour, as much as to say, governors, princes, and great men. In which sense the two former words, Pekod (or Pakud) and Shoa, are confessedly taken in Scripture; and Koa is supposed to be derived from the verb kaâng, which signifies printing marks in the flesh, (Lev. xix. 28.) and it was the custom of great men to distinguish themselves from their inferiors by such marks or prints. (See Dr. Spencer, de Legib. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 14. sect. 1.)

All of them desirable young men, &c.] As their riches and bravery made them appear amiable in your eyes, when you first courted their alliance, (ver. 12.) so they shall appear in the same splendid equipage, when they come to invade your country, and to besiege your city; but then their gallant appearance shall strike a terror and consternation into you.

Ver. 24. And they shall come against thee with chariots, waggons, and wheels, &c.] A like description of warlike preparations may be seen xxvi. 10. Jer. xlvii. 3. Nahum iii. 2, 3. Chariots are mentioned, both in sacred and profane writers, as of principal use in the ancient way of fighting.

And I will set judgment before them; and they shall judge thee according to their judgments.] I will deliver thee into their power, as the ministers of my justice, who shall make thy punishments bear a correspondence with thy guilt. (See ver. 45.)

Ver. 25. And I will set my jealousy against thee, and they shall deal furiously with thee.] They shall punish thee with that fury, with which a man in the rage of jealousy shall treat a wife that hath been unfaithful to him. (Compare xvi. 38.)

They shall take away thy nose, and thine ears, &c.] As husbands, in that case, render those women deformed, whose beauty hath been too pleasing to strangers; so shall the Chaldeans deface all the glories and ornaments of Jerusalem, and after they have slain and carried captive its inhabitants, shall set the city on fire, and reduce it to a heap of ashes. (Compare xvi. 41.)

Ver. 26. They shall also strip thee out of thy clothes, &c.] See ibid. ver. 37. 39.

Ver. 27. Thus will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee.] These severe judgments shall effectually deter thee from idolatry, and make thee abhor the least approaches towards it. (See xxii. 15.) Accordingly we find, that, after the captivity, the Jews never returned to their former idolatrous practices.

And thy whoredoms brought from the land of Egypt.] Where thou didst first learn idolatry, and ever since hast had an inclination towards it. (See ver. 3. 19.)

So that thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto them.] See xviii. 6.

Ver. 28. I will deliver thee into the hand of them whom thou hatest, &c.] The Chaldeans, that were thy lovers formerly; (ver. 22.) but since thou hast broken thy league and friendship with them, thy love is turned to hatred. (See ver. 17.)

Ver. 29. And they shall deal with thee hatefully, and shall take away all thy labour.] As thou hast requited their love with hatred, so shall they deal with thee; their hatred against thee shall be greater than their former love towards thee, which was the conclusion of Amnon's unlawful love to his sister, (2 Sam. xiii. 15.) This shall prompt them to take a full revenge upon thy perfidiousness, to consume all the fruits of thy labours, and to take away all the wealth thou hast gathered by thine industry.

And shall leave thee naked and bare.] See the note on xvi. 37.

Ver. 31—33. Therefore will I give her cup into thine hand—thou shalt be laughed to scorn, and had in derision. Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow, &c.] God's judgments are often compared to a cup of intoxicating liquors, because they astonish men, and bereave them of common judgment and discretion, and likewise expose them to the scorn and contempt of their enemies. (See Jer. xxv. 15, &c. xlviii. 26. Habak. ii. 16.)

Ver. 34. Thou shalt even drink it, and suck it out.] The sorest and heaviest of God's judgments shall fall to thy share; like those that drink a potion off to the bottom, where the most nauseous part of it is settled. (See Psal. lxxv. 8. Jer. li. 17.)

Thou shalt break the sherds thereof, and pluck off thine own breasts.] Thou shalt behave thyself as drunken people do, who first throw away, or break in pieces, the cup, and then are angry with themselves as the cause of their own misfortunes. The text mentions her breasts, as the parts which had a principal share in her guilt, according to the allegorical description here given of her idolatries. (See ver. 3. 21.)

Ver. 35. Because thou hast forgotten me, and cast me behind thy back.] Because thou hast not only forsaken my worship, but hast shewed the utmost contempt and aversion towards me, (see the note upon viii. 16.) thou shalt deservedly bear the punishment due to thine idolatries. (Compare ver. 17. 19. 30. 49.)

Ver. 36. Wilt thou judge Aholah and Aholibah?] See the note on xx. 4.

Ver. 37. That they have committed adultery, and blood is in their hands, &c.] They have committed adultery with their idols, as it follows, and have slain their children in sacrifice to them. (See xvi. 20, 21.)

Ver. 38. They have defiled my sanctuary in the same day, &c.] By coming within the precincts of it polluted with idolatry. (See the following verse, and xxii. 8.)

Ver. 39. And, lo, thus have they done in the midst of mine house.] The words may be expounded of their setting up idols in the very temple, and worshipping them there. (See 2 Kings xxi. 4.)

Ver. 40. And furthermore, that ye have sent for men to come from far, to whom a messenger was sent, &c.] See ver. 16. Their courting the alliances of foreign nations, by complying with their idolatries, is set forth under the representation of the several arts which harlots use to recommend themselves to new lovers. (Compare Isa. lvii. 7. 9. Hos. ii. 13.)

For whom thou didst wash thyself.] A custom generally practised by women before the time of their nuptials. (See Ruth iii. 3.)

And paintedst thy eyes.] Or thy face, as the phrase is translated 2 Kings ix. 30. (See the note upon Jer. iv. 30.)

Ver. 41. And sattest upon a stately bed, and a table prepared before it.] The expressions denote their sitting down with idolaters, and partaking of their sacrifices: the words altar and table are used promiscuously in the prophets, (see Mal. i. 7.) because all sacrifices were feasts made of offerings dedicated to God's service; so that he was properly the entertainer, and those that did partake of the sacrifices were his guests, that did eat at his table, in token of their being in covenant and friendship with him. What was consumed upon the altar was God's mess or portion, and is therefore called the bread of God, (see xliv. 7. Lev. xxi. 6.) and the food of the Lord, (Lev. iii. 11.) The remainder of the sacrifices his guests were entertained with, either by themselves, as in peace-offerings, or else by their proxies the priests, as in sin-offerings. (See Mr. Mede's Discourse of the Christian Sacrifice, chap. 7.) The Jews, as well as the Romans, lying upon beds or couches at their meals. (See Isa. lvii. 7.) So did other eastern nations. (See Esther i. 6.)

Whereupon thou hast set mine incense, and mine oil.] See xvi. 18.

Ver. 42. And the voice of a multitude being at ease was with her.] All sorts of expressions of joy were heard at these her meetings: such as music and dancing, which usually accompanied idolatrous festivals. (See Exod. xxxii. 6. 18, 19.)

And with the men of the common sort were brought the Sabeans from the wilderness.] The Sabeans. The word is translated drunkards in the margin: the word saba in the Hebrew, signifies to drink to excess, from whence comes the participle sebaim, drunkards, which comes very near in sound to the word Sabaim in the text. Strabo, in his tenth book of Geography, p. 471. speaking of the rites of Bacchus, mentions the word Σαβοῖ as used among others in the Bacchanal processions: which he supposes may have been derived, as well as several of their musical instruments, from the Barbarians, by which the Greeks denote the eastern countries. To the same purpose we find in Hesychius, Σάβος, Βακχεία. The prophet persists in comparing the idolatries of the Jews to the practices of lewd women, who prostitute themselves to all comers, even those of the meanest condition. Such were the Sabeans that came from the wilderness: i. e. from Arabia, called the Desert, where dwelt the posterity of Seba, mentioned Gen. x. 7. These were probably some of those idolatrous people dwelling in the wilderness, whom Jeremiah mentions, ix. 26. who polled the corners of their heads in honour of some idol whom they worshipped. (See the note upon that place.)

Which put bracelets upon their hands, and beautiful crowns upon their heads.] i. e. Upon the hands and heads of these two lewd women, Aholah and Aholibah. (See ver. 45.) Bracelets and crowns were ornaments proper to brides; (see xvi. 11, 12.) and were likewise presented by lovers to their mistresses. Crowns were likewise worn at public festivals, and times of rejoicing: (see Isa. xxxv. 10.) whereupon the Hebrew phrase is translated here and chap. xvi. by the LXX. Στέφανον καυχήσεως, a crown of rejoicing; an expression probably taken from hence by St. Paul, 1 Thess. ii. 19.

Ver. 43. Then said I unto her that was grown old in adulteries, &c.] The words import, that it was time for her to leave off her ill courses, that age and experience might sufficiently convince her of the follies of them; but withal they imply, that age and time seldom correct ill habits. The word her is taken collectively in this and the following verse, so as to include both the sisters. So the singular number is used, Psal. xii. 7. Thou shalt preserve him from this generation for ever; where our interpreters rightly observe in the margin, that the word him signifies every one of them.

Ver. 44. Yet they went in unto her, &c.] Both Samaria and Jerusalem defiled themselves with the idolatries of all the heathen round about them. (Compare ver. 7. 17.)

Ver. 45. And the righteous men, they shall judge them.] By righteous or just men some understand the Babylonians, who, though a wicked and idolatrous people, were the executioners of God's justice upon a nation that had sinned against a clearer light and greater convictions. So Nebuchadnezzar and other heathen princes are called God's servants, as being instruments of his providence. But the expression may in a more proper sense be understood of the prophets who foretold the judgments God would inflict upon Samaria and Jerusalem; such as Hosea, Amos, Jeremiah, &c. The prophets are said to execute those judgments which they foretell: so Ezekiel saith of himself, that he was sent to destroy the city; (xliii. 3.) i. e. to prophesy its destruction. To the same sense we read, Hos. vi. 5. I have hewed them by my prophets, I have slain them by the words of my mouth. (See the notes upon Isa. vi. 10. Jer. i. 10. v. 14.)

After the manner of adulteresses, and after the manner of them that shed blood.] See ver. 37. and xvi. 38.

Ver. 46. I will bring a company upon them, and give them to be removed and spoiled.] This is meant chiefly of the Babylonians, who should plunder and carry away captive a great part of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

Ver. 47. And the company shall stone them with stones, and despatch them with their sword.] See xvi. 40.

They shall slay their sons and their daughters, &c.] See ver. 25.

Ver. 48. Thus will I cause lewdness to cease out of the land.] See ver. 27.

That all women may be taught not to do after your lewdness.] See the notes upon ver. 10. and xvi. 41.

Ver. 49. And ye shall bear the sins of your idols.] Ye shall bear the punishment due to your sins of idolatry. To bear sin, or iniquity, is a noted expression in Scripture, signifying the undergoing the punishment due to it. (Compare ver. 35.)

CHAP. XXIV.

ARGUMENT.

By the figure of a boiling pot is shewed the destruction of Jerusalem and its inhabitants; and by Ezekiel's being forbidden to mourn for his wife is signified, that the calamities of the Jews shall be so astonishing, as to be beyond all expressions of sorrow.

Ver. 1. AGAIN, in the ninth year.] Of Jehoiachin's captivity. (See i. 2.)

Ver. 2. The king of Babylon set himself against Jerusalem this same day.] See Jer. lii. 4. 2 Kings xxv. 1.

Ver. 3. And utter a parable unto the rebellious house.] Add this emblem or parable concerning a boiling pot to the rest thou hast delivered to them: though they seem resolved not to give heed to what thou deliverest, either in plain words or figurative expressions. (Compare xvii. 12. xx. 49.)

Set on a pot, set it on, &c.] The destruction of Jerusalem is represented by a boiling pot or caldron, both by Jeremiah, i. 13. and by Ezekiel, xi. 3.

Ver. 4. Gather the pieces into it, even every good piece, &c.] Meaning the chief of the citizens, who should be destroyed together with the city. (See xi. 3.)

Ver. 5. Take the choice of the flock.] This belongs in sense to the former verse; so the LXX. translate the words, joining them with the foregoing sentence; With the choice bones taken out of the flock.

Burn also the bones under it.] The bones of those who have been unjustly slain in the midst of the city; (see xi. 7.) whose blood cries for vengeance against it, and kindles God's anger like fire.

And make it boil well.] To denote the city's being set on fire. (See ver. 10, 11.)

Ver. 6. Woe to the bloody city.] See xi. 6. xvi. 30. xxii. 3. xxiii. 37.

Even to the pot whose scum is therein.] Whose filthiness is not purged out of it. (See ver. 13.)

Bring it out piece by piece.] The principal men of the city (see ver. 4.) shall be carried out of the city by the Chaldeans, and afterward slain. (See xi. 7. 9.)

Let no lot fall upon it.] Conquerors used to cast lots what share of the vanquished they would save. (See 2 Sam. viii. 2. Joel iii. 3. Nahum iii. 10.) Here there will be no use of lots, for all the principal inhabitants shall be slain. (See Jer. xxxix. 6.)

Ver. 7. She set it upon the top of a rock, &c.] In a presumptuous manner, and with a high hand she shed it, as the Chaldee paraphrase expresses the sense; she was impudent and barefaced in her cruelties: she did not seek to cover or excuse them.

She poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with dust.] The words allude to the command of the law, Lev. xvii. 13. that they cover the blood of any beast or other living creature which was slain with dust; which precept was not only intended to prevent their eating of blood, but also to give men a sort of horror or aversion to the sight of bloodshed.

Ver. 8. I have set her blood on the top of a rock.] Her punishment shall be as notorious in the sight of the world as her sin was.

Ver. 9, 10. I will even make the pile for the fire great, &c.] The inhabitants shall be the materials prepared by their sins to be consumed like fuel in the fire.

Ver. 10. Spice it well.] The expression imports, that the Chaldeans shall be as much set upon destroying the city and inhabitants, as hungry people are greedy of devouring meat well spiced and dressed.

And let the bones be burnt.] The words denote an utter destruction, that the fire shall be so fierce as to consume the very bones as well as the flesh put into the caldron.

Ver. 11. Then set it empty upon the coals thereof, &c.] After an entire riddance of the inhabitants, the city itself shall be set on fire, and the place and its wickedness be consumed together in the flames.

Ver. 12. She hath wearied herself with lies.] The word teunim, never met with but in this place, is commonly derived from aven, which signifies trouble or vanity, and is a word frequently applied to idols, as particularly when Beth-el is styled Beth-aven, upon the account of the golden calf there set up, Hos. iv. 15. For these reasons I understand the expression here, She hath wearied herself with lies, of the people's multiplying their idolatries; idols being elsewhere called lies, and seeking relief sometimes from one idol, sometimes from another, but all in vain. (See xvi. 29, 30. xxiii. 16. 19. 40.)

And her great scum went not forth out of her, &c.] All the admonitions I gave her by my prophets, availed nothing to the purging her from her idolatries and other wickedness; so that now the fire must purge and consume her and her sins.

Ver. 13. In thy filthiness is lewdness.] Thou hast shewed thyself shameless and incorrigible in thine idolatries. (Compare xxiii. 29. 35.)

Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged, &c.] I did what was requisite on my part towards thy conversion, but thou refusedst to comply with those frequent calls and exhortations I gave thee; (see the note on Jer. xxxi. 18.) and therefore my Spirit shall not strive with thee any longer, but I will proceed to execute my judgments upon thee.

Till I cause my fury to rest upon thee.] See the note on v. 13. viii. 18.

Ver. 14. According to thy doings shall they judge thee.] See xxiii. 24.

Ver. 16. Behold, I take away the desire of thine eyes with a stroke.] Thy wife, the object of thy love and thy affection. (See ver. 18.)

Ver. 17. Bind the tire of thine head upon thee.] Use the ordinary dress upon thine head; whereas in the time of mourning it was customary sometimes to shave the head: (see Lev. xiii. 45. Jer. vii. 29. xvi. 6.) sometimes to cast dust upon it. (See Josh. vii. 6. 1 Sam. iv. 12.) The priests were particularly forbid to uncover their heads in the time of mourning. (See Lev. x. 6.)

And put on thy shoes upon thy feet.] Going barefoot was another expression of sorrow. (See 2 Sam. xv. 30.)

And cover not thy lips.] Covering the lips or face was another token of mourning. (See Lev. xiii. 45. Micah iii. 7. 2 Sam. xv. 30. Jer. xiv. 4.)

And eat not the bread of men.] Partake not of the mourning feasts that relations use to prepare for the funerals of their friends. (See the note on Jer. xvi. 5. 7.) Such were the Περίδειπνα and parentalia among the Greeks and Romans.

Ver. 18. So I spake to the people in the morning, and at even my wife died.] My wife died in the evening, and the next morning I declared what commands God had laid upon me, not to make any outward show or sign of mourning upon that occasion. (Compare xxxiii. 22.) The evening was the beginning of the day according to the Jews' reckoning. (See Gen. i. 5. Lev. xxiii. 32.)

Ver. 19. Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us?] They inquire by way of derision and contempt what these signs mean. (Compare xii. 9. xvii. 12. xx. 49.)

Ver. 21. Behold, I will profane my sanctuary, the excellency of your strength.] I will deliver my temple into the hands of the heathen, and they shall profane and destroy it. (See vii. 19, 20.) That temple wherein you placed your glory, and thought my residence there your greatest protection. (Compare ver. 25. and see Psal. lxxviii. 61. xcvi. 6. cv. 4. cxxxii. 8.)

The desire of your eyes, and that which your soul pitieth.] The beauty of holiness, as the temple is often called, whose destruction will affect you with a most tender compassion.

And your sons and your daughters whom ye have left, shall fall by the sword.] Whom ye left behind you in the city, when ye were carried captives: or who were left by the famine and pestilence. (See v. 12. xxiii. 47.)

Ver. 23. Ye shall not mourn nor weep.] These terrible judgments shall strike you with astonishment, and such a grief as is too great to be expressed by words or actions; according to the verse of the poet,

" Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent."

Small evils we complain of, greater strike us dumb.

But ye shall pine away for your iniquities, and mourn one towards another.] Ye shall waste away by a lingering grief, and by a silent lamentation over each other's calamities. (See iv. 2. 17. Lev. xxvi. 39.)

Ver. 24. Thus Ezekiel is unto you a sign.] His actions foreshew you what shall be your condition. (Compare iv. 3. xii. 6.) The holy writers in several places speak of themselves in the third person. (See Exod. vi. 26. 1 Sam. xii. 11. Matt. ix. 9.) So that this is an argument of very little force, when it is urged against Moses being the author of the Pentateuch.

And when this cometh, ye shall know that I am the Lord.] Comparing the prediction with the event, will convince the most obstinate, that the immediate hand of God is in the judgments which are come upon you. (See vi. 7. and compare John xiii. 19. xiv. 29. xvi. 4.)

Ver. 25. When I shall take from them their strength, the joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes, &c.] When I shall take from them all that is dear and valuable to them; their temple, an emblem of my special residence among them, and protection over them, whose beauty and magnificence was their peculiar glory, and the most grateful object of their sight; together with their sons and daughters, whereon they placed their affection. (See ver. 21.)

Ver. 26. That he that escapeth in that day, &c.] See xxxiii. 21, 22.

Ver. 27. In that day shall thy mouth be opened to him that is escaped, and thou shalt speak, and be no more dumb.] From this time to the time when the news comes of the city's being taken, thou shalt not prophesy any more to thine own people; but then will I give thee a new commission to speak, (see xxxiii. 22.) and that not by signs, as thou dost at present, but with freedom and plainness; the event so exactly answering thy predictions, shall give a new authority to what thou speakest. (See iii. 26. xxix. 21. and compare Ephes. vi. 19.)

And thou shalt be a sign unto them, &c.] They shall then be convinced, by experience, that thou didst foreshew by thy actions and behaviour all that should befal them. And this will likewise convince them of my foreknowledge and providence.

CHAP. XXV.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter contains God's judgments against the Ammonites, Edomites, and Philistines, for their hatred against the Jews, and insulting over them in the time of their distress. Archbishop Usher (in his Annals ad A. M. 3419.) and Josephus (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11.) place these events five years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ver. 2. SET thy face against the Ammonites.] See the note on vi. 2.

Ver. 3. Because thou saidst, Aha, against my sanctuary, &c.] The Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, though related in blood to the Jews, yet bore a constant hatred towards them, which they took all opportunities to shew, when the Jews were under any distress, and particularly at the time of their general captivity, and the destruction of their city and temple. For this they are often reproved by the prophets, and threatened with the like or severer judgments, and particularly the Ammonites. (See the note on xxi. 28.)

Ver. 4. I will deliver thee to the men of the east for a possession.] By the men of the east must be meant the Chaldeans. (See xxi. 19, 20.) Ammon is likewise reckoned among these countries, which God foretold by Jeremy should be delivered into the hands of the king of Babylon. (See Jer. xxv. 21.) By the east country is commonly meant Arabia in Scripture, as hath been observed in the notes upon Isa. xi. 14. but Syria and Chaldea, and the countries beyond it, are likewise called the east. (See Gen. xi. 2. Numb. xxiii. 7. Isa. ii. 6.) Chaldea, indeed, lay northward of Judea and the adjacent countries; (see l. 4.) but withal lying with a point towards the east, the Chaldeans and their confederates may not improperly be reckoned among the men of the east; just as Cyrus is sometimes described as coming from the east, and sometimes from the north, (Isa. xli. 25.) with respect to his forces, that consisted both of Medes that lay northward, and Persians that lay eastward of Babylon.

And shall drink thy milk.] Milk was the chief sustenance of those people, whose riches consisted chiefly in their stocks of cattle. Hence the Scythians are called Galactophagi, by Homer, Iliad. iii. and Galactopotæ by other writers. The LXX. render the sense very well, Shall drink or swallow thy fatness: the word heleb signifying not only milk, but likewise the fattest or choicest parts of any flesh or fruits. So it is used Gen xlv. 18. Ye shall eat the fat of the land; and Psal. lxxxi. 16. where our translation reads, The finest of the wheat, it is in the Hebrew, The fat of the wheat.

Ver. 5. And I will make Rabbah (see xxi. 20.) a stable for camels, &c.] Instead of being a city inhabited by men, it shall be a place for cattle, and particularly for camels to feed in, of which that and the neighbouring countries had great store. It is a proverbial expression for utter destruction, to say that grass grows where a town stood. (Compare Isa. xvii. 2. xxii. 10. xxxii. 14. Zeph. ii. 14, 15.)

Ver. 6. Because thou hast clapped thine hands, and stamped with thy feet.] Gestures that sometimes signify grief and indignation: (see vi. 11.) but are likewise used to express our joy and satisfaction. (Compare Job xxvii. 23. Jer. xlviii. 27. Lam. ii. 15.)

With all thy despite against the land of Israel.] See ver. 3.

Ver. 8. Because that Moab and Seir do say.] Seir is the same with Edom. (See xxxv. 2.) The prophet joins them together as guilty of the same crime, and then denounces particular judgments against each of them.

Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen.] They are no longer distinguished from their neighbours by the visible protection of the God whom they worship.

Ver. 9. Therefore will I open the side of Moab from the cities, &c.] I will make a passage for his enemies to invade his frontier cities, and from thence to possess themselves of the best of his country. Some translate the middle of the verse, From the cities, even from Ar, his [city] upon his frontiers. Ar was the coast or border of Moab, (Deut. ii. 18.)

The glory of the country.] The best part of all the country of Moab; the Hebrew word is tsebi, frequently spoken of Judea, as being in many respects the glory of all lands. (See xx. 6.)

Beth-jesimoth, Baal-Meon, and Kiriathaim.] See Numb. xxxii. 38. Josh. xiii. 20. Jer. xlviii. 25. Baal-Meon is called Beth-Meon in that place of Jeremy, and more fully Beth-Baal-Meon, Josh. xiii. 17. i. e. the house or temple of the idol Meon, by which Bishop Cumberland understands Menys or Osiris, the great deity of the Egyptians; in the first book and the second chapter of his treatise concerning Sanchoniathon's Phœnician History.

Ver. 10. Unto the men of the east.] See ver. 4.

That the Ammonites may not be remembered among the nations.] May make no figure among their neighbours, their strength being entirely broken.

Ver. 12. Because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance.] The Idumeans, being the posterity of Esau, bare an ancient grudge against the Jews, upon the account of their ancestor's losing his right of primogeniture, and the subduing of Edom by David afterward, (2 Sam. viii. 14.) Upon both these accounts they took hold of all opportunities of venting their spite towards the Jewish nation, particularly see 2 Chron. xxviii. 17. For this their behaviour they were in former times reproved by Amos, i. 11. and afterward by Obadiah, ver. 10. and by Ezekiel in this place, and xxxv. 5. The ill will that they shewed towards them at the time of their captivity, was very remarkable, as appears by those pathetical words of Psal. cxxxvii. 7. Remember the children of Edom, O Lord, in the day of Jerusalem; how they said, Down with it, down with it, even to the ground.

Ver. 13. I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and cut off man and beast from it.] See xxxv. 7—9. Jer. xlix. 17, 18. Zeph. ii. 9. Mal. i. 3, 4.

And I will make it desolate from Teman, and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.] Teman is a noted place in Idumea: (see Jer. xlix. 7. Amos i. 12.) to which Dedan is joined, ver. 8. (Compare Isa. xxi. 13, 14.) The Dedanites were originally Arabians, the posterity of Dedan, Abraham's grandson; but they seem afterward to have been incorporated with the Idumeans. (See the note upon that place of Jeremiah.)

Ver. 14. And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom by the hand of my people Israel.] The Jews themselves, whom the Edomites have so often insulted, shall be instruments of my vengeance upon Edom, and shall requite the wrongs they have received by subduing Idumea, which they did under the conduct of Judas Maccabæus. (See 1 Macc. v. 3. 2 Macc. x. 16, 17. compare Jer. xlix. 2.) And afterward the high-priest Hircanus made an entire conquest of this country. (See Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. p. 307.)

Ver. 15. Because the Philistines have dealt by revenge, &c.] The Philistines, being borderers upon the Jews, were their ancient enemies from the very time of the judges downward, more particularly in the time of Ahaz. (See 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.)

Ver. 16. Behold, I will stretch out my hand upon the Philistines.] I will subdue them by Nebuchadnezzar. (See ver. xxv. 20. xlvii. 1.)

And I will cut off the Cherethims.] The Cherethims, or Cherethites, are the same with the Philistines, or a tribe of that people. (See 1 Sam. xxx. 14. Zeph. ii. 5. and the notes upon Jer. xlvii. 4.)

And destroy the remnant of the sea-coast.] The same who are called the remnant of the Philistines, Amos i. 8. the remnant of Ashdod, Jer. xxv. 20. and the remnant of the country of Caphtor, Jer. xlvii. 4. (See the notes upon these two last places.)

CHAP. XXVI.

ARGUMENT.

This and the following chapter, with part of the twenty-eighth, foretell the destruction of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, who took it after a thirteen years' siege, (as Josephus relates out of Philostratus, and the Phœnicians' Annals: see his Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11. ad fin. lib. i. contr. Appion. p. 1046.) and in the thirty-second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, according to the Babylonish account. (See the note on xxix. 17.) By reason of which hard service, every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled, as our prophet speaks, xxix. 18. The same calamity is foretold by Isaiah, chap. xxiii. This siege forced the inhabitants to remove their effects into an island half a mile distant from the shore, where they built another city, called New Tyre. The learned Dr. Prideaux, in his Connex. of Script. Hist. par. i. p. 91. 484. hath observed, that this prophecy of Ezekiel, as well as the former one of Isaiah, was fulfilled in the destruction of old Tyre, a city that stood upon the continent, and which Nebuchadnezzar utterly destroyed; though he grants some expressions in both prophecies are applicable only to the last siege of that city, when it was conquered by Alexander the Great.

Ver. 1. IN the eleventh year, in the first day of the month.] The particular month not being named, some supply the word fifth, (as the word fourth is supplied, 2 Kings xxv. 3.) and understand it of the month following the taking of Jerusalem, at whose desolation Tyre rejoiced, (ver. 2.) But, as Archbishop Usher observes, ad A. M. 3416. the fifth month belongs to the twelfth year of Jehoiachin's captivity. So we may more probably understand the expression of the first month of the year: as the year of Evil-Merodach's reign, (2 Kings xxv. 27.) is rightly understood by our interpreters to be the year when he began to reign; so the tenth day of the month is necessarily to be understood of the first month, xl. 1. of this prophecy. And the inhabitants of Tyre may very well be supposed to insult over Jerusalem at any part of the time of her siege, which they saw must inevitably end in the taking of that city.

Ver. 2. She is broken that was the gates of the people.] There was a great confluence of people to Jerusalem from all parts at the solemn feasts of the year, as well of Jews as proselytes. (See John xiii. 20.)

She is turned unto me.] Her wealth is come into my stores. (Compare Isa. lx. 5.)

I shall be replenished now she is laid waste.] Tyre was a noted market for all sorts of trade: so when Jerusalem was taken and sacked, the spoil of the city was carried thither for sale, and, probably, several of the inhabitants being made captives, were sold there for slaves, a traffic the Tyrians dealt in very much, (xxvii. 13.) This interpretation may be confirmed by comparing it with Joel iii. 4—6. where the prophet upbraids the Tyrians for making merchandise both of the persons and substance of the Jews, when they came into their hands. To the same purpose we read Macc. iii. 41. that when Lysias came with great forces to subdue the Jews, the merchants of the country took silver and gold, and came into the camp, to buy the children of Israel for slaves.

Ver. 3. I will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up.] The Chaldeans and their confederates: (compare Jer. xxxiv. 1. li. 27.) whom the prophet compares to the waves of the sea, which come up with an irresistible force. (See Jer. li. 42.) Armies are elsewhere represented by an inundation, that carries all before it. (See Isa. viii. 7. Dan. ix. 26. xi. 22.)

Ver. 4, 5. I will scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock. It shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea.] I will make an entire riddance of her buildings, so that not so much as any dust or rubbish of them shall be left: (compare ver. 12.) and nothing shall be seen but the rocks upon the sea-shore, in the place where the city formerly stood. Nebuchadnezzar quite demolished old Tyre, and the stones and rubbish of it were afterward made use of by Alexander, to carry on a causey from the continent to the island where New Tyre stood, by which means he took that. (See Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra.) This latter city is since so decayed, that there are no remains of it left, but a few huts for fishermen to hang out their nets a drying upon the rocks, as it is related by travellers that have been upon the place. (See Maundrell's Travels, p. 48. and Huetius, Demonst. Evang. prop. vi. ad finem.)

Ver. 6. Her daughters which are in the field shall be slain with the sword.] By the daughters of Tyre are meant the lesser towns which are under her jurisdiction, as the mother-city and seat of the kingdom. (Compare xvi. 46. and Jer. xlix. 2.)

Ver. 7. Nebuchadnezzar, a king of kings.] Who hath kings for his vassals and tributaries. (See xvii. 14. 16. Dan. ii. 37.) The kings of Persia affected the same title afterward: (see Ezra vii. 12.) as the kings of Assyria had done before. (See Isa. x. 8. Hos. viii. 10.)

Ver. 8, 9. He shall make a fort against thee, and cast a mount against thee, &c.] This expression of a siege properly relates to old Tyre, which stood upon the continent, and was besieged and taken by Nebuchadnezzar.

Ver. 9. And with his axes he shall break down thy towns.] The word we render axes, signifies any instrument used in demolishing buildings. (See the note on Jer. xxxiii. 4.)

Ver. 10—12. By reason of the abundance of his horses, their dust shall cover thee, &c.] A lively description of the tumult and desolation that attend a conquering army making themselves masters of a great city. (Compare Nahum ii. 3, 4. 9. iii. 2, 3.)

Ver. 11. And thy strong garrisons shall go down to the ground.] Some render the word matseboth, thine images, and understand it of the images of their tutelar gods.

Ver. 12. They shall lay thy stones, thy timber, and thy dust in the midst of the water.] The sea shall overflow thy ruins. (See ver. 19.)

Ver. 13. And I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease, &c.] Great cities are full of all kind of gaiety and luxury; this shall be turned into a melancholy silence. (Compare Isa. xiv. 11. xxiii. 7. 16. Jer. vii. 34. xxv. 10.)

Ver. 14. I will make thee like the top of a rock, thou shalt be built no more.] This part of the prophecy was fulfilled upon New Tyre, whose inhabitants were quite destroyed by Alexander when he took the city, and afterward the city itself became desolate. (See ver. 5.)

Ver. 15. Shall not the isles shake at the sound of thy fall?] All those that are upon the sea-coast near thee shall be frightened at the news of thy destruction. (Compare xxvii. 28. xxxi. 16. Jer. xlix. 21.)

Ver. 16, 17. Then all the princes of the sea shall come down from their thrones, &c.] All the princes and rich merchants of Sidon, Carthage, and other maritime cities, that maintained a trade with Tyre, and got great wealth by that means; they whose merchants are princes, as Isaiah speaks of the merchants of Tyre, xxiii. 8. (compare ver. 2. 6. 10. of that chapter): they shall express a deep sense and concern for her misfortunes. (Compare xxvii. 30—32. xxxii. 10. Rev. xviii. 11. 17. 19.)

Shall come down from their thrones, and lay away their robes.] Such was the behaviour of the king of Nineveh at the time of his solemn humiliation, (Jonah iii. 6.)

They shall clothe themselves with trembling, &c.] They shall put on the habit of mourners, and sit upon the ground in a disconsolate condition. (See Job ii. 13. compare vii. 17.)

Ver. 17. The renowned city which was strong at sea, &c.] Tyre is called the strength of the sea, Isa. xxiii. 4. being strong at sea, both by its situation and the strength of its naval forces, upon which account it was formidable to all that had any trading upon the sea.

Ver. 18. Now shall the isles tremble at the day of thy fall.] See ver. 15. St. Jerome translates it, Now shall the ships tremble, &c. i. e. all seafaring men. (Compare xxvii. 29, 30. Isa. xxiii. 14.)

The isles that are in the sea shall be troubled at thy departure.] When thy people shall be carried captive. (See Isa. xxiii. 27.)

Ver. 19. When I shall bring up the deep upon thee, and great waters shall cover thee.] Thy walls being demolished, the sea shall come up and cover thy ruins: (see ver. 12.) or else the prophet compares the destruction of Tyre to a shipwreck. (See xxiii. 26.)

Ver. 20. When I shall bring thee down with them that descend into the pit, &c.] When thou shalt be thrust down into hell, as our Saviour speaks concerning Capernaum, Luke x. 15. and brought to utter desolation, like cities which have been long ago buried in ruins and oblivion. (Compare xxxii. 18. 24.)

When I shall set glory in the land of the living.] Compare this and the following verse with xxxv. 14. When I shall restore other cities conquered by the king of Babylon, to that flourishing condition they formerly enjoyed among the inhabitants of this world; so the land of the living signifies, xxxii. 23. 26, 27. 32. The word tsebi is in many places appropriated to Judea, as being in several respects the glory of all lands, (xx. 6.) but is sometimes applied to other countries. (See xxv. 9.) Some expositors understand it here of Judea, to this sense; That when God should return the captivity of the Jews, and restore them to those marks of his grace and favour, which distinguished them from all other nations, and made them the nearest resemblance of heaven that could be found upon earth: yet even then, as it follows—

Ver. 21. I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more.] Thou shalt be left in utter ruins and desolation, and a terrible example of my vengeance. The word balaloth, which our interpreters translate terrors, is generally joined with words importing utter destruction, and so the LXX. understood it here, and in other places of this prophecy. (See xxvii. 36. xxviii. 19. and compare Psal. lxxiii. 19. Isa. xvii. 14.)

Though thou be sought for, thou shalt never be found again.] An expression denoting utter destruction. (See Psal. xxxvii. 36. and compare ver. 5. 14.)

CHAP. XXVII.

ARGUMENT.

The same subject is continued, where the prophet, setting forth the great trade and riches of Tyre, foretells the irrecoverable fall thereof.

Ver. 2. TAKE up a lamentation for Tyrus.] This alludes to the mournful ditties used at funerals, wherein the præficæ, or mourning women, recounted every thing that was valuable or praiseworthy belonging to the deceased, and then lamented his loss. (See the notes upon Jer. ix. 17, 18.) In like manner, those that traded with Tyre should mourn over her, and bewail the loss of her riches and greatness. (Compare xxvi. 16, 17. and see ver. 32.)

Ver. 3. Thou that art situate at the entry of the sea.] A sea-port, fitted by situation for carrying on trade with many countries. (See Isa. xxiii. 1.)

Thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty.] Thou hast said in the pride of thy heart, (see xxviii. 2.) The strength of my navy and fortresses are every way complete and beautiful: (see ver. 4. 11.) and I am furnished with all accommodations that can make me considerable in the eyes of the world. (See ver. 10, 11. and xxviii. 12.)

Ver. 4. Thy borders are in the midst of the seas.] Taking the words in a strict sense, they are a description of New Tyre, which stood in an island. (Compare xxvi. 5.) The Tyrians are called the inhabiters of the island, Isa. xxiii. 2. But in the Hebrew phrase all places are called islands which lie upon the sea-coast. (See the note on Isa. xi. 11.)

Thy builders have perfected thy beauty.] The following verses shew, that the words are chiefly to be understood of the builders of their ships, wherein the chief strength and glory of the Tyrians was placed.

Ver. 5. They have made all thy ship-boards of fir-trees from Shenir.] The decks of thy ships were made of fir fetched from Mount Hermon, called anciently Shenir. (See Deut. iii. 9.)

Ver. 6. The company of the Ashurites have made thy benches of ivory.] The Assyrians have made the seats for the rowers of ivory, in a very costly manner.

This is the sense of the verse, if we follow the common reading: but Bochart, not without reason, supposes, that the word bath-ashurim is pointed wrong, and should be read bith-ashurim, and then the sentence must be translated, They have made thy seats of ivory enclosed in box, the expression being parallel to that of Virgil, Æn. x.

—— "Quale per artem
Inclusum buxo aut Orycia terebintho
Lucet ebur."

This sense the Chaldee follows.

Brought out of the isles of Chittim.] The isles of Chittim are the countries lying upon the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. (See Jer. ii. 10.)

Ver. 7. Fine linen with broidered work from Egypt was that which thou spreadest out for thy sail.] Fine linen was one of the principal commodities of Egypt: (see 1 Kings x. 28. Prov. vii. 16. Isa. xix. 9.) and was a habit used by persons of the best quality: (see Gen. xli. 42. Esther viii. 15.) which shews to what an excess of vanity the Tyrians were come, to use such costly manufactures for sails to their ships. Suetonius, in his life of Caligula, cap. 37. reckons this among several instances of that emperor's extravagance, that he furnished his pleasure-boats with costly sails, and other expensive ornaments.

Blue and purple from the isles of Elisha was that which covered thee.] Blue and purple are elsewhere reckoned among those colours which set off the richest attire. (See Exod. xxv. 4. Jer. x. 9.) The common clothing of the Tyrians was of these kinds, which were brought from the islands of the Egean Sea, particularly Coös, famed for purple among heathen authors. Elisha denotes the countries upon the coast of Greece; a part of Peloponnesus retains the name of Elis among the Greek writers.

Ver. 8. The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy mariners, &c.] Thou madest use of the people of other cities and countries, to undergo the servile office of being mariners or rowers, whilst thy own citizens pretended to the skill of steering thy ships, and professed the art of being pilots. Zidon was a famous sea-port town, the mother of Tyre; (see the note on Isa. xxiii. 12.) and Arvad, the same with Arpad or Arphad, (2 Kings xvii. 33. Isa. x. 9. Jer. xlix. 23.) called Aradus by the Greek and Latin authors, was an island and town in the neighbourhood of Tyre.

Ver. 9. The ancients of Gebal were thy calkers.] Thou employedst the inhabitants of Gebal for calking thy ships, as being remarkably skilful in that trade: Gebal was a province of Phœnicia near Tyre. (See Psal. lxxxiii. 8. 1 Kings v. 18.) The LXX. interpreters suppose it the same with the city Byblos, with whom agree Eusebius and St. Jerome, de Locis Hebraicis. So the Septuagint render the word in the forementioned text, 1 Kings v. 18. Dr. Grabe, indeed, does there, by way of emendation, read Γίβλιοι in the text, and place Βίβλιοι, the reading of the Alexandrian MS. in the margin: but that learned person did not then remember, that that very word was translated in the same manner in this place of Ezekiel.

Ver. 10. They of Persia, of Lud, and Phut.] Thy citizens being all given to trading, thou madest use of foreign soldiers for thine army when thy city was besieged. Lud and Phut are two nations elsewhere mentioned together. (See xxx. 5. Jer. xlvi. 9.) Our interpreters understand by them in these two places, the people of Lybia and Lydia. But Phut and Lubim being mentioned as distinct people, Nahum iii. 9. Phut probably signifies some part of Africa near Egypt; and Lud, or Ludim, the Abyssines. These people, though Africans, are joined with the Persians, xxxviii. 5.

They hanged up the shield and helmet in thee.] In thy garrisons, which they kept in time of peace.

Ver. 11. The men of Arvad (see ver. 8.) were with thine army upon the walls round about.] They defended thy walls when they were assaulted by the king of Babylon's army. (See the note upon xxvi. 8, 9.)

The Gammadims were in thy towers.] It is very uncertain what people are here meant by this name. Our learned Mr. Fuller supposes them people of Phœnicia. (See his Miscellanies, lib. vi. cap. 3.) Ludolphus conjectures they were Africans, in his Comment. in Histor. Æthiop. lib. i. cap. 22. The Chaldee paraphrase takes them to be Cappadocians. The Vulgar Latin renders the word Pygmies; but if we should grant there were such a people, as Ludolphus takes a great deal of pains to prove there were, yet they would not be fit to make use of for soldiers.—Gammadims: Dr. Spencer thinks they were images of the tutelar gods, like the lares among the Romans; and were not above a cubit in length. (See his additions to the books de Legib. Hebraicis.)

They have made thy beauty perfect.] See ver. 3.

Ver. 12. Tarshish was thy merchant.] Tarshish probably signifies a port of Spain, called by the Greek and Latin authors Tartessus, situate not far from the place where Cadiz now stands; famous of old for Hercules's pillars, being the utmost boundary of the ancient navigation. It comes from thence to signify any merchant-adventurers who traded in the Mediterranean Sea. (See the note upon Isa. ii. 16.) The commodities here mentioned, which these merchants traded in, being the product of Spain, confirms this exposition.

Ver. 13. Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, were thy merchants.] By Javan is to be understood Greece, in which sense Alexander is styled king of Javan or Greece, (Dan. viii. 21.) So the LXX. translate it here, and in that place of Daniel. And all Greece, except Peloponnesus, was anciently called Jonia. Tubal and Meshech are names usually joined together in Scripture. Bochart supposes them to be the same with those people afterward called Moschi and Tibareni, whose habitation was near the Euxine Sea.

They traded in the persons of men.] In buying and selling slaves in the markets. The Hebrew reads, In the souls of men; the word nephesh, soul, sometimes signifies a slave. (Compare Numb. xxx. 35. 1 Chron. v. 21. Rev. xviii. 13.) In which sense some understand the word, Gen. xii. 15.

And vessels of brass in thy markets.] Critics observe that the word nehosheth, commonly translated brass, does likewise signify steel; and so it is rendered by our interpreters, Psal. xviii. 34. a bow of steel is broken by my arms. And we may very well understand it so here; for the Chalybes, a people so called from their steel manufactures, lived near Pontus, in the neighbourhood of the Moschi and Tibareni; for which reasons steel is called the northern iron, Jer. xv. 12.

Ver. 14. They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs.] By Togarmah, Bochart understands Cappadocia: the LXX. read the word Θοργαμὰ, (Gen. x. 14.) which comes near in sound to Trogma, or Trocma, a part of Cappadocia.

Ver. 15. The men of Dedan were thy merchants.] The same learned person distinguisheth this Dedan from that mentioned ver. 20. This latter was of Abraham's posterity, whereas Dedan here spoken of was derived from that Dedan mentioned Gen. x. 7. the son of Raamah, or Rhegma. The posterity of this Dedan is probably placed near the Persian Gulf, where there was a city called afterward Rhegma; and so is fitly joined with many islands or countries lying upon the sea-coast, which are usually called islands, in the Hebrew phrase. (See the note on Isa. xi. 11.)

Many isles were the merchandise of thy hands, &c.] Those countries exported thy manufactures, the wares of thy making, as they are called in the following verse; and, by way of return for them, brought thee in ivory, and other rarities from India, whither they traded. They brought these for a present, says our translation, or rather by way of price or return for the commodities exported. The noun eshear commonly signifies a present or gift, but it is near in sound to the word sacar, that signifies a price or reward; and words of such near affinity are often used in a promiscuous sense. (See the note upon Jer. xxiii. 39. xx. 37. xxix. 7. and xxxvi. 15. of this prophecy.)

Ver. 16. Syria was thy merchant, &c.] The Syrians imported into thy haven precious stones, and all sorts of curious apparel, in lieu of which they carried abroad the wares of thy own making.

Ver. 17. They traded in thy market wheat of Minith, &c.] These were the commodities which the Jews imported to Tyre, chiefly the necessary provisions for food; the Tyrians having none of their own growth, the Jews supplied them therewith from their own, or the neighbouring countries. (See 1 Kings v. 9. 11. Ezra iii. 7. Acts xii. 20.)

Wheat of Minith.] This was a place belonging to the Ammonites, (see Judg. xi. 33.) noted for excellent wheat, great quantities of which the Jews brought to Tyre.

With Pannag.] A word never elsewhere to be found; supposed by some to be the name of a place; by others more probably taken for some rich ointment or gum.

And balm.] For which Gilead was famous. (See Jer. viii. 22.) There were balsam-trees about Jericho too, which Josephus describes, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 6. and de Bello Jud. lib. v. cap. 4. though some doubt whether that balsam were the same with the balm of Gilead.

Ver. 18. In the wine of Helbon.] Helbon is supposed the same part of Syria which is called Chalybonitis by Ptolemy. The same place which is now called Aleppo.

And white wool.] The word tsachar is never met with but here, and Judg. v. 10. where our translation reads white asses. Bochart explains the word here to signify wool of a bright purple colour, from the Arabic use of it. So purpureus in Latin is used for a bright colour in Virgil, Æn. i. "Lumenque juventæ purpureum." The LXX. and Chaldee render it wool from Miletus, a place famous for that commodity. The wool was died purple at Tyre, as appears from Virgil, Georg. lib. iii.

——"Quamvis Milesia magno Vellera mutentur, Tyrios incocta rubores."

Ver. 19. Dan also and Javan, going to and fro, &c.] By Dan St. Jerome understands the town which was afterward called Cæsarea Philippi, belonging to the tribe of Dan, which was near Tyre; whereas Javan, which likewise traded with Tyre, lay farther off. This is the sense of the words, if we follow the common translation; but Bochart thinks the words might be better translated, Dan also and Javan coming from Uzal occupied in thy fairs; to distinguish this Javan, which he supposes to be in the southern part of Arabia, from Greece, more commonly called by that name. (See ver. 13.) In conformity to this interpretation, the copies of the LXX. which we have now, read from Asel; though St. Jerome informs us, that the former part of the verse was wanting in the Septuagint, and supplied from Theodotion's translation.

Bright iron [i. e. steel] and calamus were in thy market.] Bochart confirms the foregoing interpretation from hence, that those of Javan are said to deal in aromatic gums, which are known not to grow in Greece, but in Arabia.

Ver. 20. Dedan was thy merchant.] This is probably to be understood of the posterity of that Dedan, who was Abraham's grandson. (See ver. 15. and xxv. 13.)

Ver. 21. Arabia, and all the princes of Kedar, they occupied with thee.] The Hebrew reads, They were the merchants of thy hands; i. e. they took off thy manufactures (see ver. 15.) in exchange for cattle, in which their substance did chiefly consist. (See Isa. lx. 7.) Kedar is a country in Arabia, often mentioned in Scripture, which received its name from Kedar, Ishmael's son, who settled there. (Gen. xxv. 13.)

Ver. 22. The merchants of Sheba and Raamah.] These were people of Arabia Felix, dwelling near the Persian Gulf. (See ver. 15. and xxiii. 42.) They traded in the rich products of their own country, which were spices, precious stones, and gold. (Compare 1 Kings x. 2. 11. Psal. lxxii. 15. Isa. lx. 6.) Bochart places Ophir, so famous for gold, in Arabia Felix. (See his Phaleg. lib. xi. cap. 27.)

Ver. 23. Haran, and Canneh, and Eden.] Haran is the place where Abraham dwelt when he came out from Ur of the Chaldees; (Gen. xi. 31.) called Charræ by the Romans, and noted for the defeat of Crassus. Canneh some suppose to be the same place that is called Calneh, Amos vi. 2. or Calno, Isa. x. 9. a city near Euphrates. Others take it for Ctesiphon, a noted city situate upon the river Tigris. Eden is joined with Haran, 2 Kings xix. 12. as it is here. Huetius supposes Paradise was called the garden of Eden, from the name of the country where it was placed, which was where the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates meet. (See his tract de situ Paradisi, cap. 2. n. 7.)

The merchants of Sheba.] There were two Shebas, as there were two Dedans; one descended from Raamah, (Gen. x. 7.) the other from Jockshan, Abraham's son, (Gen. xxv. 3.) As the twenty-second verse is explained of the former, so the latter may be understood here: they were both inhabitants of Arabia.

Chilmad.] Both the Chaldee and LXX. explain this by Carmania.

Ver. 24. In chests of rich apparel.] The word in the original translated chests, is ginge, which is elsewhere rendered treasuries. (See 1 Chron. xxviii. 11. Esther iii. 9.) From which word the Latin gaza is derived.

Bound with cords, and made of cedar.] Carefully packed up in chests of cedar, to give these clothes a fine scent, and preserve them from putrefaction.

Ver. 25. The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market.] Ships of Tarshish signify sometimes in Scripture any trading or merchant ships. (See the note on Isa. ii. 16.) And here I take it in this general sense: the prophet having already reckoned up the principal countries which traded with Tyre, now adds, in comprehensive terms, that all merchant-adventurers sung or spake great things of her riches, or as the word sharoth may be rendered, They ruled or governed in thy markets.

In the midst of the seas.] See ver. 4.

Ver. 26. Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters.] The prophet compares the condition of Tyre besieged by the enemy, to a ship overset by the winds, and just ready to sink under water. (See the like comparison, Isa. xxxiii. 23.) Great numbers are sometimes signified by great waters. (See Psal. xviii. 16. cxliv. 7. Jer. li. 42.)

The east wind hath broken thee in the midst of the seas.] As the violence of the east wind occasions many shipwrecks in the sea; (see Psal. xlviii. 7.) so the Chaldean army, compared elsewhere to an east wind, shall ruin thy strength and glory, and leave thee like a wreck cast upon the shore. (Compare xvii. 10. xix. 12.)

Ver. 27. Shall fall into the midst of the seas.] Shall be as utterly ruined and destroyed, as if they were sunk in a shipwreck: (see xxvi. 5. 14. 21.) or shall be killed in a sea-fight, while they defend the city. (See the following verse, and xxix. 8.)

Ver. 28. The suburbs shall shake at the sound of the cry of thy pilots.] The cry of thy wounded seamen shall make the inhabitants of the suburbs shake for fear, (xxvi. 15.)

Ver. 29. All that handle the oar—shall come down from their ships, &c.] Seafaring men finding no encouragement to follow their employment, now thy traffic is destroyed, shall lay aside their trade, and mourn over thee. (Compare xxvi. 16.)

Ver. 30. They shall cause their voice to be heard against thee.] Or rather, over thee, as the LXX. and Vulgar Latin translate it: in which sense the preposition nal is taken where persons are said to mourn over the dead, or the calamitous. (See xxviii. 12. 1 Kings xiii. 30. Hos. x. 5.)

And shall cast dust upon their heads, they shall wallow themselves in the ashes.] Expressions of the deepest mourning and lamentation. (See 1 Sam. iv. 12. Job ii. 12. Jer. vi. 26. Rev. xviii. 19.)

Ver. 31. And they shall make themselves utterly bald for thee.] Another expression of public sorrow. (See Jer. xlvii. 5. Micah i. 16.)

Ver. 32. And in their wailing they shall take up a lamentation for thee, &c.] The words allude to the public lamentations made at funerals. (See the notes upon Jer. ix. 17, 18. xxii. 18. and compare Rev. xviii. 18.)

Ver. 34. When thou shalt be broken by the seas, in the depth of the waters.] See ver. 26, 27. xxvi. 19. xxix. 8.

Ver. 35. All the merchants of the isles shall be astonished at thee, &c.] See xxvi. 15, 16.

Ver. 36. Thy merchants among the people shall hiss at thee.] By way of insulting and derision: (see 1 Kings ix. 8.) as men are apt to despise those in adversity, whom they courted and respected in prosperity. But the Chaldee paraphrase renders it, They shall be astonished: and this sense agrees better with the lamentations of the seafaring men mentioned in the foregoing verses.

Thou shalt be a terror, &c.] See xxvi. 21.

CHAP. XXVIII.

ARGUMENT.

In this chapter the prophet denounces God's judgments against the king of Tyre, for his pride and insolence: he likewise foretells the destruction of Zidon, and that the judgments threatened upon those and other heathen countries, Ammon, Moab, &c. shall in the end turn to the benefit of God's people.

Ver. 2. SAY to the prince of Tyrus.] Whose name was Ithobalus, according to the Phœnician annals, extracts out of which may be seen in Josephus, lib. i. contr. Appion, p. 1046.

I am a god, I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas.] Some princes have been so extravagant as to affect Divine honours: this seems to have been the temper of this vain man. The words are an insolent boast of self-sufficiency, as if he had said, I fear none, nor stand in need of any: I am seated in a place of impregnable strength: the seas surround me, that no enemy can assault me. So they represent the excessive pride and carnal security of this prince, who trusted in his own strength, and forgot his dependance upon God. The same crime was in like manner punished in the king of Egypt, (xxix. 3.) and afterward in Nebuchadnezzar himself, (Dan. iv. 30, 31.) So Babylon is represented as ascribing self-sufficiency to herself, and saying in her heart, I am, and there is none else besides me, (Isa. xlvii. 10.)

In the midst of the sea.] See xxvii. 4.

Yet thou art a man, and not God.] A weak, mortal man: an unequal match for the king of Babylon's forces. (See ver. 9. and Isa. xxxi. 3.)

Ver. 3. Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel.] The fame of Daniel's wisdom was quickly spread over Chaldea, upon his being advanced to several posts of honour and dignity by Nebuchadnezzar. (See Dan. ii. 48.) Queen Nitocris, who was Belshazzar's mother, gives Daniel a great character for his wisdom and other accomplishments, (Dan. v. 11, 12.) So here the prophet, in an ironical manner, upbraids the vain boasts which the prince of Tyre made of his wisdom, and the policy of those about him, as if it exceeded the endowments of Daniel, so famous, though a young man, for his skill in the several parts of knowledge, and the arts of government. The Phœnicians, of whom the Tyrians were a colony, (see the note on Isa. xxiii. 12.) valued themselves for their wisdom and ingenuity, as being the inventors of navigation, of letters, and sciences. (Compare Zech. ix. 2.)

Ver. 4. With thy wisdom and thy understanding thou hast gotten thee riches, &c.] Thy skill in navigation and trade has increased thy wealth. (See ver. 5. and Zech. ix. 3.)

Ver. 7. Behold, I will bring strangers upon thee, the terrible of the nations.] The Babylonians, who by their conquests have made themselves terrible to all the countries round about them. (See xxx. 11, 12.)

They shall draw their swords against the perfection of thy beauty.] They shall deface and destroy every thing which thou valuest as ornamental, or useful. (Compare ver. 12.)

Ver. 8. Thou shalt die the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas.] Thou and thy mariners shall be slain in a sea-fight, or shall be destroyed as those that are swallowed by the sea in a tempest. (See xxvi. 15. xxvii. 27, 28. 34.)

Ver. 9. Wilt thou yet say to him that slayeth thee, I am as God?] Mortality will certainly convince thee of thy folly in pretending to divinity. (Compare xxxii. 19.) So Plutarch tells us of Alexander, that he vainly affected to be thought Jupiter's son, and next in honour to Bacchus and Hercules: yet when he saw the blood run out of a wound he had received, which at the same time gave him much pain, he confessed that was not such blood as Homer said issued from the immortal gods, (lib. ii. de Alexandri Fortuna.)

Ver. 10. Thou shalt die the death of the uncircumcised.] Thou shalt die by such a remarkable judgment as God usually inflicts upon notorious offenders: thou shalt come to the same ill end as befals the other enemies of God and of his truth. (Compare xxxi. 18. xxxii. 19. 21. 23, 24, &c.) Circumcision being the rite which distinguished God's people from the heathen, uncircumcised is equivalent in sense to wicked or profane. So the Chaldee paraphrase renders it here, Thou shalt die the death of the wicked, and to the same purpose again, xxxi. 18. In the same sense we are to understand that expression, Lev. xxvi. 41. If their uncircumcised heart be humbled; and those of Jeremy, vi. 10. Their ear is uncircumcised: and, ix. 26. The house of Israel is uncircumcised in their heart.

Ver. 12. Take up a lamentation upon the king of Tyrus.] See xxvii. 32.

Thou sealest up the full sum of wisdom and perfect beauty.] In thine own opinion thou art the perfect pattern of wisdom, and all other excellences: (compare ver. 7.) the expression is taken from vessels and other repositories, which, when they are full, used to be sealed up in order to the preserving what is contained in them, (see Deut. xxxii. 4. Job xiv. 17.) The LXX. and Vulgar Latin render the former part of the verse, Thou art the seal of likeness; i. e. Thou art the image of God, or an exact impression taken from that great copy. The following verse shews that the expression alludes to Adam, when he was first created, and came pure out of the hands of his Maker. And then the following words in this verse are to be translated, Full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty: an exact description of the state of innocence. The word tacnith is translated pattern, xliii. 10. of this prophecy, and so it signifies, Exod. xxx. 32. to which sense the Targum there explains it: but our translation renders it composition.

Ver. 13. Thou hast been in Eden, the garden of God.] As thy situation was pleasant, so thou wast plentifully supplied with every thing that could contribute to make thy life pleasant and happy. A state of paradise does in common speech denote a condition every way complete and happy. (See Isa. li. 3.) But this expression, as well as the whole context, alludes to the complete happiness which Adam enjoyed in Paradise before his apostacy and fearful fall.

Every precious stone was thy covering, &c.] Like a great prince or monarch, thy crown was adorned with the choicest jewels, and thou wast arrayed with royal robes, enriched with gold and precious stones of all sorts. The stone probably alludes to the precious stones which were placed in the high-priest's breast-plate, as the next verse alludes to the cherubims over the mercy-seat. Accordingly the LXX. enlarge the number of the stones here mentioned from nine to twelve, and place them in the same order in which they are ranked, Exod. xxviii. 17, &c.

The workmanship of thy tabrets, and of thy pipes, was prepared in thee [or, for thee] in the day thou wast created.] The highest expressions of joy, such as are the sounding of all sorts of musical instruments, ushered thee into the world, according to the usual practice at the birth of great princes; and ever since thou hast been brought up in the choicest delicacies, which a royal palace or a luxurious city could furnish. (See xxvi. 13. Isa. xiv. 11.)

Ver. 14. Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth.] Anointing is the ceremony wherewith kings are inaugurated; so the prophet compares the prince of Tyre, to a ruling or principal cherub, one of the chief of the angelical order, who attend upon God in heaven, and are represented by the cherubims in the temple overshadowing the mercy-seat. To this sense St. Jerome translates it, The extended cherub that covereth: i. e. whose wings were stretched out to cover the mercy-seat: (see Exod. xxv. 20.) reading memushak instead of mimshak. The words allude to the high advancement of Satan in heaven before his fall, where he was placed in one of the highest orders of angels, such as were nearest in attending upon the Divine Majesty. So Isaiah's description of the fall of the king of Babylon does plainly allude to the downfal of Satan out of heaven. (Isa. xiv. 12, &c.)

Thou wast upon the holy mountain of God.] The temple is often styled God's holy mountain; (see xx. 43.) and the temple being the place of God's peculiar residence, is now and then put for heaven itself. (See Psal. xi. 4. xviii. 6. Jonah ii. 7.) So the phrase denotes, that this prince might be compared to the cherubims overshadowing the mercy-seat, or the angels who stood before the throne of God, typified by the cherubims in the temple: the expressions still alluding to the high station of Satan before his apostacy.

Thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire.] Thy dominion was in the upper region of the sky, where hailstones and lightning are formed; or, as Tertullian paraphrases the expression, (lib. ii. contr. Marcion. cap. 10.) "Inter gemmantes siderum radios demoratus:" Thou hadst thy abode among glittering stars; as the angels are sometimes called. (See Job xxxviii. 7. Isa. xiv. 13.) [The words may allude to the sparkling stones of Aaron's breast-plate: so they agree with what goes before, ver. 13, 14. See Dr. More's Synopsis Prophet, book ii. chap. 16.]

Ver. 15. Thou wast perfect in thy ways—till iniquity was found in thee.] An exact description of the angelical purity in which the devil was created, and in which he continued, till, being lifted up with pride, he fell from his first estate.

Ver. 16. By the multitude of thy merchandise, they have filled the midst of thee with violence, &c.] Thy skill in trading hath degenerated into violence, cheating, and extortion; for which I will degrade thee from the honour of being nearly related to me, as my minister, and the executor of my commands, by which thou didst resemble the dignity of the angelic order. (See ver. 14.)

Ver. 17. Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty.] Compare ver. 9. 13. xxxi. 10. So the devil was lifted up with pride upon the account of his perfections. (See 1 Tim. iii. 6.)

Thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness.] That height of glory and authority to which I had advanced thee has perverted thy judgment, and made thee abuse thy wisdom to craft and deceit. (See ver. 16.)

I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee.] I will make thee a spectacle to other princes, expose thee as a miserable object before their eyes, that thou mayest be an example to them to deter them from the like practices. (See xvi. 41. xxiii. 48. xxxi. 14.)

Ver. 18. Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, &c.] The word mikdash does sometimes signify a palace, in which sense it is probably taken Amos viii. 13. where our translation renders it the king's chapel. Thus Bishop Patrick understands it, Exod. xxv. 8. where the English reads, Let them make me a sanctuary, but it may probably mean a palace: for God commanded himself to be served and attended upon in the tabernacle, as a king is in his court. The cherubims were his throne, the ark his footstool, the altar his table, and therefore called by that name, xli. 22. Mal. i. 7. the priests his attendants, and the shew-bread and sacrifices his provisions. Thus the word may most probably be taken here to this sense: That since their palaces and stately buildings are filled with the iniquity and injustice which they have practised in their trade and commerce, therefore God will utterly destroy them by Nebuchadnezzar, who reduced the whole city to a heap of ashes and rubbish, which Alexander afterward made use of to make a bank or causey, by means of which he assaulted the new city of Tyre, and took it. (See Dr. Prideaux, par. i. p. 484.) If we follow the common translation, it imports a denunciation of God's judgments for filling their idolatrous temples with riches and presents gotten by injustice. So God often punishes the contempt of religion, in general, in those who are mistaken in their own way of worship.

Ver. 19. Thou shalt be a terror, &c.] See xxvi. 21.

Ver. 21. Set thy face against Zidon, &c.] Direct thy face and thy speech towards Zidon; (see vi. 2.) and foretell its destruction by the king of Babylon. (See xxxii. 30. Jer. xxv. 22. xlviii. 4.) Tyre and Zidon were neighbours, and partakers of the same fate both in prosperity and adversity. Zidon was afterward utterly destroyed by Ochus king of Persia.

Ver. 22. I will be glorified in the midst of thee, &c.] I will make my power and justice known by the judgments I will execute upon thee. In the same sense God saith, Exod. xiv. 17. I will get me honour upon Pharaoh; where the word in the original is the same.

And will be sanctified in her.] God is said to be sanctified in those, for whose preservation or destruction he exerts his power in a remarkable manner. (Compare ver. 25. and see xx. 41.)

Ver. 23. And I will send unto her pestilence and blood into her streets.] The pestilence, which often accompanies long sieges, shall destroy her inhabitants as well as the sword. (See v. 12. xxxviii. 22.)

Ver. 24. And there shall be no more a pricking brier unto the house of Israel, &c.] My people shall dwell in their land quietly and securely, when the rest of their ill neighbours are destroyed, who were a continual vexation to them, and as so many thorns in their sides. (Compare Numb. xxxiii. 55. Josh. xxiii. 13.) So a thorn in the flesh, 2 Cor. xii. 7. signifies a cruel enemy or persecutor, as appears by comparing that place with the context, ver. 9, 10. The following verse shews, that this promise chiefly relates to the general restoration of the Jews, when all the enemies of God's church and truth are vanquished and subdued, often denoted in the prophetical writings, by the names of Edom, Moab, and other neighbouring countries, who upon all occasions shewed their spite and ill will against the Jews. (See the note upon xxxviii. 17. and upon Isa. xi. 14. and compare Jer. xii. 14. with this place.)

Ver. 25. When I shall have gathered the house of Israel from among the people among whom they were scattered, &c.] This, if we follow the literal sense of the words, is a plain prophecy of the general restoration of the Jews, and their return into their own land, as will appear by comparing the words with the parallel texts in this prophet, viz. xi. 17. xx. 38. 41. xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24. xxxvii. 12. 14. 21. 25. xxxix. 27. and the rules laid down concerning the division of the land among the twelve tribes, (chap. xlvii. xlviii.) do very much favour this interpretation; (compare Isa. lxv. 9, 10. Jer. xxx. 18. xxxii. 41.) in which prediction most of the other prophets agree with him. (See the note on Isa. xi. 11.)

And shall be sanctified in them.] See ver. 22. and xxxvi. 23.

Ver. 26. And they shall dwell safely therein.] This denotes outward peace and freedom from the annoyance of enemies. (Compare xxxvi. 21. xxxviii. 11. Jer. xxiii. 6.)

And shall build houses, and plant vineyards.] Building and planting are commonly joined together. (Compare Isa. lxv. 21. Jer. xxxi. 4, 5. Amos ix. 14.)

When I shall have executed judgments upon all those that despised them.] See ver. 24. The prophets conclude their threatenings against infidels with gracious promises to God's people; implying, that he will not make an utter destruction of them as of other people, but reserve a remnant, to whom he may fulfil his promises made to their fathers. (Compare Jer. xlvi. 27, 28.)

CHAP. XXIX.

ARGUMENT.

In this and the three following chapters, is foretold the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, which came to pass in the thirty-sixth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, which was the twenty-seventh of Jehoiachin's captivity. (See ver. 17.) This was the same judgment upon Egypt, which was foretold by Jeremiah, xlvi. 13, &c.

Ver. 2. SET thy face [see vi. 2.] against Pharaoh king of Egypt.] Pharaoh being a common name to all the kings of Egypt, this prince was called Pharaoh-Hophra, by way of distinction, by Jeremiah, (xlvi. 30.) and Apries by Herodotus.

Ver. 3. The great dragon that lies in the midst of his rivers.] The word tannim signifies any great fish, such as a whale, as it is translated xxxii. 2. where it is applied to the same subject as here. (See the note on Isa. xxvii. 1.) Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, lib. v. cap. 16. 18. not improbably understands it here of a crocodile (see the following note), a fish in a manner peculiar to the river Nile, to which he likens the king of Egypt, because he valued himself so much upon his dominion over that river. The same learned author observes, that the word Pharaoh signifies a crocodile in the Arabic tongue. The kings of Egypt are elsewhere compared to whales, or some such great fishes, sporting themselves in the waters, and exercising a sort of dominion over the lesser fry. (See Psal. lxxiv. 13, 14. Isa. li. 9.)

Which hath said, My river is my own, and I have made it for myself.] The prophet having described this prince as bearing rule over the waters, in pursuance of the same metaphor, speaks of his kingdom as if it were a great river, and he priding himself in having established his government so firmly over it, that it was not in the power of God himself to dispossess him of it, as Herodotus tells us (lib. ii. cap. 169.) he profanely boasted, affecting to be a god, as the prince of Tyre did, (xxviii. 2.)

Ver. 4. But I will put hooks in thy claws.] In pursuance of the same metaphor, God tells him that he will put a stop to all his vain-glorious designs and boastings: having the same absolute power over him as a fisherman hath over a fish, when he has fastened his hook in his jaws. (Compare 2 Kings xix. 28.)

I will cause the fish of thy river to stick to thy scales, and I will bring thee out of the midst of thy rivers, &c.] Thou shalt send a great number of thy subjects upon an expedition into Lybia against the Cyrenians, where his army having ill success, the Egyptians, entertaining an opinion that the army was sent upon this expedition on purpose to be destroyed, thereupon mutinied against him, and set up Amasis to be their king.

I will bring thee out of the midst of thy rivers.] By this is metaphorically expressed his undertaking a foreign expedition: the expression alludes to the nature of a crocodile, who is not confined to the water, but useth to come upon the land, where he is frequently taken.

Ver. 5. And I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers.] Thy army shall be discomfited, and fall in the deserts of Lybia and Cyrene: Apries himself did not perish there; but the king and people being like the head and body, whatever calamity befals either part, is common to both. So the king of Assyria is said to be involved in that destruction which consumed his army, Isa. xxx. 33. Apries himself was afterward strangled in his palace at Sais, by Amasis, that overcame him.

They shall not be brought together, nor gathered.] Their bones or carcasses shall not be brought together in order for burial. (See Jer. viii. 2. xxv. 33.)

I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field, &c.] See xxxix. 17.

Ver. 6. Because they have been a staff of reed to the house of Israel.] The expression alludes to the canes or reeds that grow on the bank of the river Nile; on which if a man leaned, they brake, and the splinters ran into his hand. (Compare 2 Kings xviii. 21.) The prophets often upbraid the Jews with their vain confidence in Egypt, which would certainly disappoint them. (See Isa. xx. 5, 6. xxx. 3. 5, &c. xxxi. 3. Jer. ii. 36.)

Ver. 7. When they took hold of thee by thy hand, thou didst break and rend all their shoulder.] Or, their arm. The king, who was Zedekiah's confederate, came with a great army to raise the siege of Jerusalem; but durst not engage a battle with the Chaldeans, but in a little time retired again into his own country, treacherously leaving Zedekiah, whom they had engaged to rebel against Nebuchadnezzar; whereby they became the occasion of his own and his people's ruin. (See xvii. 15. Jer. xxxvii. 5. 7.)

And madest all their loins to be at a stand.] Or, to shake, as men do when they are tottering and ready to fall. The Hebrew verb hanamadhta signifies properly to stand, but it is probably here taken in the same sense with the verb hamanadhta: words of a near sound being often taken one for the other. (See the note on xxvii. 15.)

Ver. 8. Behold, I will bring a sword upon thee, and cut off man and beast from thee.] See xiv. 17. This is to be understood of Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Egypt, who, taking advantage of Amasis's revolt against Apries, overran that country, and made a prey of the whole kingdom. (See ver. 19, and xxxii. 13.)

Ver. 9. Because he hath said, The river is mine, &c.] Hophra himself shall be slain, and his country destroyed, for his impiety and insolence. (See ver. 3.)

Ver. 10. Behold, I am against thee and thy rivers.] Since thou hast opposed me I will set myself against thee, and bring down the strength and glory of thy kingdom, wherein thou magnifiest thyself so much. (See the note on ver. 3.)

From the tower of Syene unto the border of Ethiopia.] If we follow this translation, we must understand the word Cush, rendered here Ethiopia, of Arabia, as it is often taken: (see the note on Jer. xiii. 23.) for Syene was the border of Egypt towards Ethiopia: (see Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. v. cap. 9.) which lay westward of Egypt, as Arabia did eastward. But the words may be translated thus, From Migdol to Syene, even to the borders of Ethiopia. (Compare xxx. 5. 9.) Migdol was a town near the Red Sea, mentioned Exod. xiv. 2. Jer. xliv. 1. xlvi. 14. so it lay at the entrance of Egypt from Palestine; whereas Syene was at the other end of the country upon the borders of Ethiopia. The parallel text, xxx. 6. confirms this interpretation, where our translation reads, From the tower of Syene, they shall fall in it by the sword; but the sense would be much more perfect if we translate it, From Migdol to Syene, &c.

Ver. 11. No foot of man shall pass through it—neither shall it be inhabited forty years.] The intestine wars between Apries and Amasis, and the conquest of the whole country by Nebuchadnezzar, will make Egypt a desolation the greatest part of forty years, nor shall it recover its former settlement till those are ended. (See xxx. 10. xxxii. 13. compare xxxv. 7.)

Ver. 12. And I will make the land of Egypt desolate.] Many of the Jews which fled into Egypt upon the murder of Gedaliah, were involved in the common destruction of the country and its inhabitants. (See Jer. xliv. 27, 28.)

Among the countries which are desolate.] Egypt shall have its share of calamities with its neighbours, who shall be a prey to Nebuchadnezzar, according to the prophecies of Jeremiah, chap. xxv. xliv. xlvi. &c. and of Ezekiel, chap. xxv. &c.

I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations.] Some of them shall flee for refuge into foreign countries, and some shall be carried away captive by the Babylonians. (Compare Jer. xlvi. 19.) This captivity of the Egyptians, though not taken notice of by Herodotus, is mentioned by Berosus in one of the fragments of his history, quoted by Josephus, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11. and published with notes by Scaliger, at the end of his books de Emendatione Temporum, whose remark upon the place is very observable; viz. "The calamities that befel the Egyptians, are passed over by Herodotus, because the Egyptian priests would not inform him of any thing that tended to the disgrace of their nation."

Ver. 14. And I will cause them to return into the land of Pathros.] That part of Egypt which is called Thebais, as Bochart proves by several arguments. (See his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 27.)

And they shall be there a base kingdom.] i. e. A tributary kingdom. (See xvii. 14.)

Ver. 15. It shall be the basest of kingdoms, &c.] Notwithstanding Amasis's shaking off the Persian yoke, Egypt was not able to keep up its former grandeur, but was entirely conquered by Cambyses, Cyrus's son, who made it a province to the Persian empire; and upon its revolting from under that government, it was finally subdued by Ochus the Persian emperor, and has been governed by strangers ever since. "For on the failure of the Persian empire, it became subject to the Macedonians, after them to the Romans, after the Romans to the Saracens, then to the Mamelukes, and is now a province of the Turkish empire:" as Dr. Prideaux observes, in his Connex. of Script. Hist. par. i. p. 79.

Ver. 16. And it shall be no more the confidence of the house of Israel, which bringeth their iniquity to remembrance, &c.] At the same time that the Jews put confidence in Egypt, they distrusted the promises and assistance of God, and forsook him, to comply with the idolatries of their allies; thereby to recommend themselves to their protection. (See ver. 7. Isa. lvii. 8, 9. Jer. ii. 18. 36. Hos. xii. 1.)

Ver. 17. In the seven-and-twentieth year, in the first month.] The following prophecy is related here, not with respect to the order of time (for there is near seventeen years' distance between the date of the foregoing prophecy and this), but because both prophecies relate to the same subject, viz. the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, which fell out this year: the city Tyre having been taken by him the year before, after thirteen years' siege. Concerning which event, Dr. Prideaux hath observed, that the chronology of the Phœnician Annals (the extracts of which may be seen in Josephus, lib. i. contr. Appion.) exactly agrees with the time the prophet Ezekiel assigns for the taking of Tyre. (See his Connex. of Script. Hist. par. i. p. 92, 93.)

Ver. 18. Nebuchadnezzar caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus, &c.] The siege lasted thirteen years, as hath been already observed; till the heads of their soldiers became bald with continual wearing their helmets, and the skin was worn off their shoulders with carrying earth to raise mounts and fortifications against it. (See xxvi. 8.)

Yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyrus.] Before the town came to be closely besieged, the inhabitants had removed their effects into an island about half a mile distant from the shore, and there built another city, called New Tyre, which was afterward besieged and taken by Alexander the Great: (see the Argument to chap. xxvi.) so that there was nobody left there when Nebuchadnezzar's army took the city.

Ver. 19. He shall take her multitude, and take her spoil.] He and his army shall have the advantage of the captives and spoil of Egypt, which they shall utterly pillage and lay waste. (See ver. 10. 12. and xxx. 12.)

Ver. 20. Because they wrought for me, saith the Lord.] The destruction of cities and countries is a work of God's providence, for the effecting of which he makes use of kings and princes as his instruments. Upon this account he calls Nebuchadnezzar his servant, (Jer. xxv. 9.) because he wrought for him, as it is here expressed; i. e. executed his judgments upon Tyre, and the other cities and countries which God delivered into his hand.

Ver. 21. In that day.] This phrase frequently denotes in the prophets not the same time which was last mentioned, but an extraordinary season, remarkable for some signal events of Providence. (See the note on Isa. iv. 2.) In this sense it is to be understood here.

I will cause the horn of the house of Israel to bud forth.] The word horn signifies strength, from whence it comes to denote prosperity, or a flourishing condition: (see 1 Sam. ii. 1. Job xvi. 15.) from whence it is applied to express kingly power and majesty. (See Psal. lxxxix. 24. xcii. 10. cxxxii. 17.) So here it signifies, that after the destruction of God's and his church's enemies, denoted by Tyre, Egypt, and other oppressors of the Jews, (see the note on xxxviii. 17.) the kingdom and state of the Jews should again flourish under the Messias, as it is more clearly foretold, chap. xxxiv. xxxvii. (Compare likewise xxxiii. 25, 26.)

And I will give thee the opening of the mouth in the midst of them.] When thy prophecies are made good by the event, this shall add a new authority to what thou speakest. (See xxiv. 27.)

CHAP. XXX.

See the Argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 2. HOWL ye, Woe worth the day!] The prophet directs his speech to the Egyptians. (Compare Isa. xiii. 6.)

Ver. 3. The day is near, even the day of the Lord, &c.] The time of God's vengeance. (See vii. 7. 12.)

The cloudy day.] When the calamities that are coming upon Egypt shall make every thing look dark and dismal. (See ver. 18. xxxii. 7, 8. xxxiv. 12. Joel ii. 2. Amos v. 18.)

It shall be the time of the heathen.] Of the punishment of the Egyptians and their allies: (see ver. 4, 5. vii. 7. 12.) God's judgments upon particular places and nations, are an earnest of that general judgment, when he shall execute judgment upon all the ungodly. (See the note upon Isa. xiii. 10.)

Ver. 4. Great pain shall be in Ethiopia.] See ver. 5. 9.

And her foundations shall be broken down.] Her strong forts and citadels. (Compare Isa. xvi. 7. Jer. l. 15.)

Ver. 5. Ethiopia, and Lybia, and Lydia.] The names in the Hebrew are Cush, Phut, and Lud: who are mentioned together as the Egyptian allies, Jer. xlvi. 9. (See the note there, and compare Nahum iii. 9.) Cush probably signifies Ethiopia here, (see xxix. 10.) as being joined with Phut and Lud; which were people of Africa. Phut is rendered Lybia by our interpreters here, and in that place of Jeremy; but Phut and Lubim were a distinct people, as hath been observed upon xxvii. 10. Phut may denote some part of Africa near Egypt, and Lud probably signifies some part of the Abyssines' country.

And all the mingled people.] All their auxiliaries. (Compare Jer. l. 37.) If we distinguish these from the men of the league which follow, they may mean that mixture of Carians, Ionians, and other nations lying upon the Mediterranean Sea, which Apries got together to encounter Amasis, who, together with him, were destroyed. (See Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra; and the note on Jer. xxv. 20.)

And Chub.] The Cubii are mentioned in Ptolemy as a people of Mareotis, a province of Egypt.

The men of the land that is in league.] The LXX. translate it, The men of my league, or covenant; i. e. the Jews: many of whom flying into Egypt, were destroyed there with the Egyptians. (See the note on xxix. 12.)

Ver. 6. They also that uphold Egypt shall fall.] The governors of the several provinces, those who are called the stay of the tribes thereof, Isa. xix. 13. i. e. of the several nomi, or divisions of Egypt.

From the tower of Syene they shall fall in it.] The sense would be more complete, if the words were translated, From Migdol to Syene. (See the note on xxix. 12.)

Ver. 7. And they shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate, &c.] See xxix. 10.

Ver. 8. When I have set a fire in Egypt.] God's judgments are often compared to fire. (See xix. 14. xxii. 21. 31. Psal. lxxviii. 63. Jer. vii. 20. Amos i. 4, &c.)

And when all her helpers shall be destroyed.] All her allies and auxiliaries. (Compare xxxi. 7. xxxii. 21.)

Ver. 9. In that day shall messengers go from me in ships, to make the careless Ethiopians afraid.] The Ethiopians were the confederates of the Egyptians in former times, and sharers with them in their good or ill fortune. (See Isa. xviii. 1, 2. xx. 3, 4. and the notes upon those places.) The verse may be likewise thus rendered; In that day shall messengers go from me to the people in the wilderness, to make the careless Ethiopians afraid. The word tziim is translated the people in the wilderness, Isa. xxiii. 13. and that appellation is particularly given to the Ethiopians, Psal. lxxii. 9. lxxiv. 14. as the LXX. translate the word.

And great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt.] The Egyptians and Ethiopians being confederates, the ill news of the conquest of Egypt, shall sensibly affect them. (Compare xxiv. 16. xxxiii. 9, 10. xxvii. 35. Isa. xix. 17. xxiii. 5.)

Ver. 11. The terrible of the nations.] See xxviii. 7.

Ver. 12. And I will make the rivers dry.] I will destroy the strength of Egypt; the metaphor is taken from the decrease or failing of the Nile, upon whose overflowing all the plenty and prosperity of Egypt depended. (Compare xix. 3. Isa. xix. 5, 6.)

And sell the land into the hand of the wicked; and I will make the land waste by the hand of strangers.] See vii. 24. To sell, signifies here to deliver up, as men do goods that they sell. (Compare Deut. xxxii. 30. Judg. ii. 14. iv. 9.)

Ver. 13. I will also destroy the idols.] Idolatry being one of the principal sins for which God visits the infidel nations, he will take particular vengeance upon the idols, thereby shewing how much he is superior to them in power. (Compare Exod. xii. 12. Isa. xix. 1. Jer. xliii. 12. xlvi. 25.)

And I will cause their images to cease out of Noph.] Noph, or Memphis, was one of the principal cities of Egypt, a seat of their kings, where their sepulchres stood; one of which is still remaining: upon which account it is often mentioned in Scripture. (See Isa. xix. 3. Jer. ii. 16. xliv. 1. xlvi. 14.) In Hosea it is called Moph, xi. 6. which comes near in sound to Memphis. This place was famous for the worship of Apis and Osiris; whereupon the prophet, in a particular manner, denounces destruction to the idolatry of that place.

And there shall be no more a prince in the land of Egypt.] It shall no more have a natural prince of the Egyptian race to rule over it, as formerly, but shall be subject to foreigners. (See the note on xxix. 15.)

And I will put a fear in Egypt.] Will make them faint-hearted, and not able to defend themselves. (Compare Isa. xix. 16. Jer. xlvii. 5.)

Ver. 14. And I will make Pathros desolate.] See xxix. 14.

And I will set fire in Zoan.] Zoan, or Tanis, was one of the ancient cities in Egypt, (see Numb. xiii. 20.) and the metropolis of the kingdom in Moses's time. (See Psal. lxxviii. 12. 43.)

And I will execute judgment in No.] Called the multitude of No, or Hamon No, in the next verse; and probably the same with the city Thebes, famous for its hundred gates. (See the note on Jer. xlvi. 25.)

Ver. 15. And I will pour my fury upon sin, the strength of Egypt.] It is generally agreed, that Sin is the same with Pelusium, one of the seven mouths of the Nile, which was commonly called the key of Egypt, as Suidas observes; and therefore was strongly fortified, that no enemy might gain admittance.

And I will cut off the multitude of No.] Or Hamon No, as the original reads. The name is generally supposed to be derived from Hamon, who was the Egyptian Jupiter. Mizraim, the son of Ham, was the founder of Egypt, which is called the land of Ham, Psal. cvi. 22. And this Hamon was probably either Ham himself, or one of his posterity advanced to Divine honours. Plutarch informs us, in his book de Iside et Osiride, that Ammon, in the Egyptian language, is equivalent to Ζεὺς in Greek, (p. 354. edit. Francof.)

Ver. 16. And I will set fire in Egypt.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 17. The young men of Aven and of Phi-beseth shall fall by the sword.] Aven is the same with On, mentioned Gen. xli. 45. in aftertimes called Heliopolis, as our margin explains it here, because of a temple or image there dedicated to the sun. (Compare Isa. xix. 18. Jer. xliii. 13.) The word is so translated by the Seventy interpreters, both here and Gen. xli. 45. who were very well acquainted with Egypt, and the principal places of it. Phi-beseth was afterward, with very little variation, called Bubastum, and so translated here by the LXX.

Ver. 18. At Tehaphnehes the day shall be darkened.] Compare ver. 3. Tehaphnehes, elsewhere writ Tahapanes, is supposed to be the same place which was afterward called Daphnæ Pelusiacæ. (See the note on Jer. xliii. 7.)

When I shall break there the yokes of Egypt.] When I shall set those at liberty that are oppressed by the bondage of Egypt. (Compare xxxiv. 27.)

A cloud shall cover her.] See ver. 3.

Ver. 21. I have broken the arm of Pharaoh, &c.] I have broken his strength, so that he will never be able to recover his former power. (Compare Jer. xlviii. 25.) It is usual for the prophets to speak of a thing future, as if it were already accomplished. (See the note on Isa. xxi. 9.)

Ver. 22. And I will break his arms, the strong, and that which was broken.] The king of Babylon had before dispossessed the king of Egypt of all his new conquests, from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates: (2 Kings xxiv. 7.) so that this part of his strength was already taken away, and never to be recovered; and now God threatens to destroy the remainder of his power, the kingdom of Egypt itself.

And I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand.] He shall have no more strength to defend himself, than a man hath to use his sword when his arm is broken.

Ver. 23. And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, &c.] See xxix. 13.

Ver. 24. And I will strengthen the arm of the king of Babylon.] The same promise God afterward made to Cyrus, Isa. xlv. 1. (Compare Psal. xviii. 39.)

And he shall groan with the groans of a deadly wounded man.] His strength shall perfectly fail, as a man's who is dying of his wounds.

CHAP. XXXI.

ARGUMENT.

A continuation of the judgments denounced against Pharaoh and his kingdom; whose pride God humbles by putting him in mind of the dreadful fall of the king of Nineveh, much superior to him in power and greatness, whose ruin the prophet elegantly describes under the metaphor of a fair flourishing tree cut down and withered.

Ver. 2. WHOM art thou like unto in greatness?] Thou pridest thyself as if there never was any prince or king that could compare with thee.

Ver. 3. Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon, &c.] By the Assyrian, Archbishop Usher, ad A. M. 3378. and Dr. Prideaux, par. i. p. 47. do most probably understand that king of Assyria, whom some call Chyniladanus, others Saracus. It is of this king of Assyria, the words of the prophet Nahum are to be understood, iii. 18. In like manner Zephaniah joins the destruction of Assyria, and the desolation of Nineveh together, ii. 13. Nabupolassar, the king of Babylon, and Cyaxares, the king of Media, called by the names of Nebuchadonosor and Assuerus in Tobit, xiv. 15. joining their forces together against him, besieged Nineveh, took it, and after having slain the king, utterly destroyed that great and famous city; and put an end to that part of the Assyrian empire. Nabupolassar having before possessed himself of the other part, which was properly called the Babylonian empire. (See Dr. Prideaux, p. 45.) In this remarkable catastrophe, the prophecies of Jonah, Nahum, and Zephaniah, foretelling the destruction of Nineveh, were fulfilled.

The king of Nineveh is compared here to a fair and tall cedar, such as grow in Mount Lebanon. (See the like comparison, Isa. x. 34. xxxvii. 24. Zech. xi. 2.) The greatness of Nebuchadnezzar's power and kingdom, is set forth under the same resemblance, Dan. iv. 10, &c.

His top was among the thick boughs.] He overtopped all the other flourishing trees. (Compare xvii. 3. xix. 11.)

Ver. 4. The waters made him great, &c.] As trees flourish by a river side, (compare xvii. 5.) so the traffic of the several branches of the river Tigris, upon which Nineveh was situate, made that city and kingdom rich and populous, and she imparted her wealth and stores among the neighbouring provinces. (Compare Nahum ii. 6.)

Ver. 5. Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field.] He became greater than all the kings about him. (Compare Dan. iv. 11.)

Ver. 6. All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs, &c.] Several nations applied to him for protection, and thought themselves and all their concerns safe under his government. (Compare xvii. 23. Dan. iv. 12.)

Ver. 8. The cedars in the garden of God could not hide him.] He overtopped the goodly cedars, called in the Hebrew, the cedars of God: (Psal. lxxx. 10.) such fair ones as might be supposed to have grown in Paradise. (Compare xxviii. 13.)

Ver. 9. So that all the trees of Eden—envied him.] All the kings of the east envied him and his greatness; as the Chaldee paraphrast expresseth the sense.

Ver. 10. Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height,

Digitized by Microsoft®

&c.] Because thy pride hath still increased with thy prosperity. (Compare xxviii. 17.)

Ver. 11. I have therefore delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen.] Or, the mighty one of the nations, as the word gojim is rendered in the next verse. The word El, though commonly spoken of God, yet is sometimes applied to heroes; (see xxxii. 21.) sometimes to angels, as being mighty in strength, as Psal. lxxxix. 6. So God here saith, he delivered the Assyrians into the hand of Nabupolassar king of Babylon, who joining his forces with Cyaxares king of Media, his confederate, made themselves masters of Nineveh, and the king of Assyria, whose seat it was.

Ver. 12. And strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him, &c.] Compare xxviii. 7. xxx. 11. The armies of the kings of Babylon and Media shall utterly destroy him and his empire, and leave him without life or strength, like a tree that is cut down, dried up, and withered.

Upon the mountains and in all the valleys his branches are fallen, &c.] As the limbs of such a tree are broke by the fall, and those that rested under its shadow are frighted away, and have forsook the place: so the Assyrian army lies slain here and there: (compare xxxii. 5. xxxv. 8.) and those that lived under his protection and government withdrew their obedience from him. (Compare Dan. iv. 14.)

Ver. 13. Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, &c.] As the birds sit upon the boughs of a tree cut down, and the beasts browse upon its branches; so his dominions shall be a prey to the conquerors: or his armies that are slain, shall become meat to the birds and beasts. (Compare xxix. 5. Isa. xviii. 6.)

Ver. 14. To the end that none of the trees by the waters exalt themselves, &c.] Thy destruction shall be a warning to other kings and potentates, to deter them from priding themselves in the time of their prosperity. (See xxviii. 17.)

For they are all delivered unto death.] Whatever distinction there is between them and the inferior sort, death shall make them all equal; (see Psal. lxxxii. 7.) and particularly to Egypt, and those other countries against which God hath denounced his judgments, the same fate is allotted which this Assyrian monarch has already undergone. (See xxxii. 18, &c.)

Ver. 15. In the day when he went down to the grave.] This and the following verse are an elegant description of that consternation that seized the king of Assyria's allies at the suddenness of his downfal: the same metaphor being still pursued.

I caused a mourning: I covered the deep for him.] The sense might better be expressed thus: I covered the deep with mourning: for when two verbs are joined together in the Hebrew, one is usually taken in the sense of a noun, or an adverb. The deep that nursed up this fair tree, (ver. 4.) is described as mourning at its downfal.

I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed.] As if the streams had stopped their usual course, on purpose to lament his fate.

I caused Lebanon to mourn for him, &c.] The forest of Lebanon, and all the stately trees in it, sympathized with his misfortunes; i. e. all his confederates and allies.

Ver. 16. I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall.] See xxvi. 15.

When I cast him down to hell [or the grave] with them that descend into the pit.] See xxxii. 18. 21. Isa. xiv. 15.

All the trees of Eden, the choice of Lebanon, all that drink water, [see ver. 14.] shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth.] The deceased princes, confederates to the Assyrians, described here as so many stately trees and cedars, shall feel some mitigation of their calamities, when they see thee brought down as low as themselves. (Com- xxxii. 31. Isa. xiv. 8—10. a place exactly parallel to this.)

Ver. 17. They also went down to hell [or the grave] with him.] His allies underwent the same fate with himself, and were cut off in the common destruction. (See xxxii. 20, &c.)

Even they that were his arm, that dwelt under his shadow in the midst of the heathen.] Or, the nations; (see ver. 11.) his auxiliaries: (see xxx. 8. xxxii. 21.) who lived under his protection in several countries and provinces. (Compare Lam. iv. 20.)

Ver. 18. To whom art thou thus like in glory and greatness among the trees of Eden?] The prophet now applies himself to the king of Egypt; q. d. Wilt thou still boast thyself, as if no prince were thine equal? (see ver. 2.) yet thou shalt undergo the same fate with this fair flourishing cedar, the king of Assyria. (See ver. 14. and compare xxxii. 19.)

Thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised, &c.] See xxviii. 10. xxxii. 19, 20.

This is Pharaoh, and all his multitude, saith the Lord God.] The judgment that befel the king of Assyria here described, is an exact representation of the destruction that remains for Pharaoh and his people: the word is commonly denotes the same as to signify or represent, especially in prophecies, parables, and such-like figurative descriptions. (See xxxiv. 31. xxxvii. 11. Gen. xli. 26. Exod. xii. 11. Matt. xiii. 19. xxvi. 26.)

CHAP. XXXII.

ARGUMENT.

A continuation of the same subject, and a farther description of the lamentable destruction of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar: the prophet illustrating the dreadfulness of his fall by a poetical description of the infernal mansions appointed for tyrants and oppressors, where Pharaoh is to have a place allotted for him.

Ver. 2. TAKE up a lamentation for Pharaoh.] See the note on xxii. 2.

Thou art like a young lion of the nations.] Thou art like a beast of prey, devouring far and near. (See xix. 3. 6. xxxviii. 13.)

Thou art as a whale in the seas.] By the word tannim we may fitly understand a crocodile, as hath been observed upon xxix. 3. and the description that follows of this creature agrees very well to a crocodile, but cannot be applied to a whale.

And thou camest forth with thy rivers, and troubledst the waters with thy feet, &c.] Or, thou rushedst forth through thy streams, and troubledst, &c. i. e. thou wast the occasion of great commotions and disturbances to all thy neighbours. (Compare xxxiv. 18.)

Ver. 3. I will therefore spread my net over thee, &c.] I will bring thine enemies upon thee, who shall encompass thee, and master thee, as a wild beast or monstrous fish that is taken in a net. (See xii. 14.)

Ver. 4. Then I will leave thee upon the land, and cast thee forth upon the open field, &c.] Thine armies shall fall in the open field, and become a prey to wild beasts and ravenous birds. (Compare xxix. 5.)

Ver. 5. I will lay thy flesh upon the mountains, and fill the valleys with thy height.] The vast bulk of thine armies when they are slain, shall fill both mountains and valleys. (See xxxi. 12.)

Ver. 6. I will also water with thy blood the land wherein thou swimmest.] The land shall be soaked with thy blood wherein thou bearest rule, just as in the waters the great fish have an absolute power over the lesser fry.

Even to the mountains.] The mountains shall be wet with it, as well as the lower grounds, ver. 5. (Compare Isa. xxxiv. 3.)

Ver. 7, 8. I will cover the heavens, and make the stars thereof dark, &c.] These metaphors denote the downfal of states and governments; kings and rulers being figuratively expressed by the sun, moon, and stars. (Compare Isa. xiii. 10. xxxiv. 4. Joel ii. 31. Rev. vi. 12—14.) God's judgments upon particular countries being earnests of a general judgment, they are described in such terms as if the whole frame of nature were dissolved.

And set darkness upon thy land.] Every thing shall look dark and dismal. (See xxx. 3.)

Ver. 9. And I will vex the hearts of many people, when I shall bring thy destruction among the nations, &c.] When thy exiles shall be dispersed into foreign countries, (see xxix. 12.) and relate the miserable circumstances of thy destruction, it shall cause grief and consternation in all that hear it. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 10. Yea, I will make many people amazed at thee, &c.] See xxvi. 16. xxvii. 35. xxx. 9.

Ver. 12. The terrible of the nations.] See xxviii. 7.

Ver. 13. I will also destroy all the beasts thereof from beside the great waters.] Or, that they be no more beside the great waters, as Noldius translates the phrase, p. 635. The horses shall be consumed in the war, and the other cattle that used to feed in the meadows by the side of the Nile, (see Gen. xli. 2.) shall be destroyed or drove away as a prey. (See xxix. 8. 11.) [Neither shall the foot of man trouble them any more—then I will make their waters deep, &c.] Or, I will make their waters clear, for so the Hebrew word is taken xxxiv. 18. Following this translation, the words may be interpreted to this sense: There being an entire destruction both of man and beast in Egypt, (see xxix. 11.) and none passing through it, it shall be like the waters of a river which are never disturbed, but run pure and clear like oil.]

Ibid. and Ver. 14. Neither shall the foot of man trouble them any more, nor the hoofs of beasts, &c.] Here is a transition from a proper sense to a metaphorical one: the prophet in the second verse compared the disturbances the Egyptians gave their neighbours to troubling and fouling of waters; in allusion to which metaphor he saith here, that when Egypt is made desolate, and the number, both of men and beasts, diminished by their wars and confusions, then their neighbours will enjoy such quietness, as a river does that smoothly glides along, and never hath its streams fouled or disturbed.

Ver. 16. This is the lamentation wherewith they shall lament her.] This is the substance of a lamentation which may be properly used to bewail the calamities of Egypt. (See ver. 2.)

The daughters of the nations shall lament her.] i. e. The people of the neighbouring countries: so the daughters of Zion and of Babylon signify the inhabitants of those cities. The expression alludes to the mourning women, whose profession it was to lament at funerals. (See the note on Jer. ix. 17.)

Ver. 17. In the fifteenth day of the month.] Of the twelfth month. (See ver. 1.) The LXX. understand it of the first month, as that indefinite expression is probably understood, xxvi. 1.

Ver. 18. Wail for the multitude of Egypt.] See ver. 2. 16.

And cast them down, even her, and the daughters of the famous nations.] The prophets are said to do things, when they declare God's purpose of doing them; see xliii. 3. where Ezekiel saith, he was sent to destroy the city; i. e. to foretell its destruction. In the same sense we are to understand the expression here of casting down Egypt; i. e. foretelling its ruin, together with God's judgments upon other famous kingdoms in that part of the world, which are reckoned up in the following verses, and called here the daughters of the nations; concerning which expression see the note on ver. 16.

Unto the nether parts of the earth, with them that go down to the pit.] The expressions denote utter destruction, and are parallel to those elsewhere used of being brought down to hell, to the grave, or into silence. (Compare xxxi. 14. Isa. xiv. 15.)

Ver. 19. Whom dost thou pass in beauty? Go down, and be thou laid with the uncircumcised.] What reason hast thou now to prefer thyself before others? since thou shalt undergo the same fate with the worst of them? (See the note on xxviii. 10.)

Ver. 20. They are fallen in the midst of them that are slain by the sword.] They do not die the common death of all men, as Moses speaks, Numb. xvi. 29. but are cut off by an extraordinary judgment from the hand of God himself.

Draw her and all her multitudes.] Carry her and her people away to the grave, like so many carcasses which are buried without any solemnity. The words are spoken to the Babylonians, the executioners of God's judgments upon Egypt.

Ver. 21. The strong among the mighty shall speak to him out of the midst of hell with them that help him.] Here follows a poetical description of the infernal regions, where the ghosts of deceased tyrants, with their subjects, are represented as coming to meet the king of Egypt and his auxiliaries, (see xxx. 8.) upon their arrival to the same place. Hell signifies here the state of the dead. (Compare xxxi. 16, 17. Isa. xiv. 9, &c. and see the notes there.)

They are gone down, &c.] These warriors, famous in their time for their exploits, have undergone the same fate with other men of blood, and are gone down to the grave by violent deaths. (See ver. 19.)

Ver. 22. Ashur is there, and all her company.] The Assyrians, both king and people, whose destruction is represented in the foregoing chapter.

His graves are about him.] The Egyptians lie buried in the same place with them. The masculine and feminine genders are promiscuously used in the following verses. The masculine referring to the prince, whose subjects the deceased were; the feminine to the nation or country to which they belonged.

Ver. 23. Whose graves are set in the sides of the pit.] Compare xxvi. 20. Isa. xiv. 15.

And her company round about her grave.] Like lesser graves placed round the monument of a person of great quality: or the words may import that death has made them all equal. (Compare ver. 24, 25.)

All of them slain, &c.] See ver. 20.

Which caused terror in the land of the living.] Though they were a terror while they were alive to their neighbours. (See xxvi. 17.)

Ver. 24. There is Elam, and all her multitude.] Which was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar. (See Jer. xlix. 34. and the notes there.)

Yet have they borne their shame with them that go down into the pit.] They have been shamefully subdued, and lost their lives and glory together, as Ashur did before them. (Ver. 22.)

Ver. 25. They have set her a bed in the midst of the slain, &c.] Elam and her people have a place among the deceased princes and potentates. The word bed is used for the grave, Isa. lvii. 2. and may, perhaps, in both places, allude to the costly monuments or sepulchres which used to be erected for persons of great quality. Mittah, a word of the same sense, is used for a bier or coffin, 2 Sam. iii. 31.

Her graves are round about him.] About those of the king of Egypt, and his people.

Ver. 26. There is Meshech, and Tubal, and all her multitude.] Who are threatened by God with a terrible destruction. (See xxxviii. 2, &c.) But they seem to be mentioned here by way of prolepsis, or anticipation, as the critics call it; for the destruction threatened to Meshech and Tubal was not to come to pass till several ages after this prophecy against Egypt was fulfilled, as may be gathered from several expressions in that prophecy. It is usual in the prophets to speak of what is to come, as if it were already past, as hath been observed elsewhere. So the country of Goshen is called the land of Rameses, Gen. xlvii. 11. which yet had that name from the city Rameses, built in aftertimes by the Israelites. (See Exod. i. 11.) By the same figure Horeb is called the mountain of God, Exod. iii. 1. Concerning Meshech and Tubal, see the note on xxvii. 13.

Ver. 27. And they shall not lie with the mighty that are fallen of the uncircumcised.] They shall not lie among those heathen heroes who died a natural death, and are laid in their graves with pomp and magnificence. (Compare this verse with Isa. xiv. 18, 19.)

Which are gone down to hell, [or the grave; see ver. 21.] with their weapons of war, &c.] The prophet may possibly represent the future state of these tyrants and warriors, according to the popular notions received in the world, and describe their condition in the other life suitably to the character they bore in this. So Virgil describes his heroes in the Elysian fields, (Æneid. lib. vi.)

"Quæ gratia currûm—— Armorumque fuit vivis,—sequitur tellure repostos."

And they have laid their swords under their heads.] Who were carried to their graves in state, and had their achievements and other ensigns of honour affixed to their monuments for perpetuating their memory. It has been the custom of all ages to adorn the sepulchres of heroes with their swords and other trophies of war. (See 1 Mac. xiii. 19.) So Virgil describes Misenus's tomb, (Æn. vi.)

"Ingenti mole sepulchrum Imponit, suaque arma viro."

But their iniquity shall be upon their bones, &c.] Their death shall carry in it plain tokens of their sins, and of God's vengeance pursuing them for their cruelty.

Ver. 28. Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the uncircumcised, &c.] See ver. 19.

Ver. 29. There is Edom, her kings, and all her princes, &c.] Of whose destruction Ezekiel prophesied, xxv. 12.

Ver. 30. There be the princes of the north all of them, and the Zidonians.] By the princes of the north, may probably be understood the Tyrians and their allies, (see xxvi. 16.) joined here with the Zidonians their near neighbours, as they are put together in this prophecy, chap. xxviii. as sharers in the same destruction. Some by the princes of the north understand Meshech, Tubal, and other northern nations: see xxxviii. 6. 15. xxxix. 2. whose destruction is foretold in those chapters.

Ver. 31. Pharaoh shall see them, and shall be comforted over his multitude.] As it affords some relief to calamitous persons to see others in the same condition with themselves. (See xxxi. 16.)

Ver. 32. For I have caused my terror in the land of the living, &c.] As these kings and nations have been a terror to the world whilst they were in it, (ver. 24, &c.) so I will be now a terror to them: and especially to Pharaoh and his people, in making them a remarkable example of my vengeance.

CHAP. XXXIII.

ARGUMENT.

The duty of a prophet in warning a people of their sins, is exemplified by that of a watchman; then follows an earnest exhortation to repentance, upon assurance that God will accept it, being for the most part a repetition of what was said before in the eighteenth chapter. Upon the news being brought to the prophet that Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans, he foretells the utter destruction of Judea, to check the vain confidence of those who still tarried in it, and withal reproves the hypocrisy of those Jews who were of the captivity.

Ver. 2. WHEN I bring a sword upon a land.] Bring an enemy against a land with armed force. (See xiv. 17.)

If the people of the land take a man of their coasts.] Or, from among them, to which sense the word miktse is translated, Gen. xlvii. 2.

And set him for a watchman.] Such watchmen were placed upon the turrets of their city walls, to give notice of the enemy's approach. (See 2 Sam. xviii. 24, 25. 2 Kings ix. 17. Isa. xxi. 8.)

Ver. 3. If when he see the sword come upon the land.] When he spies the enemy marching against it. (See ver. 2.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 4. His blood shall be upon his own head.] His destruction is owing to himself. (See xviii. 13. Acts xviii. 6.)

Ver. 5. But he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul.] Shall save his life from the danger that threatens it. In like manner, he that takes warning by the prophet's admonition shall preserve himself from the judgments threatened against sinners. (See ver. 10.)

Ver. 6. He shall die in his iniquity, &c.] See iii. 18.

Ver. 7—9. I have set thee a watchman to the house of Israel, &c.] See iii. 17—19.

Ver. 10. If our transgressions be upon us, and we pine away in them, how shall we then live?] Thou hast threatened that we shall pine away in our sins, xxiv. 23. how then can the promises of life belong to us? The words of persons despairing of God's mercy, and from thence taking encouragement to go on in their sins. (See a like instance, Jer. ii. 25.)

Ver. 11. Why will ye die, O house of Israel?] See the note on xviii. 4.

Ver. 12, 13. The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him in the day of his transgression, &c.] See the note upon xviii. 26, 27.

Ver. 13. If he trust to his own righteousness.] If he rely upon the good works he hath done, and think the worth of them will overbalance the guilt of his evil deeds. This seems to be the sense of the latter Jews, who lay this down for a certain rule in their Mischna, that all Israel hath a share in the world to come. [The Mahometans maintain the same opinion. See Relandus, lib. i. de Relig. Mohammed. cap. 6.]

Ver. 15. If the wicked restore the pledge.] See xviii. 7.

Give again that he hath robbed.] It is a necessary condition of obtaining pardon, that men make restitution of what they have unjustly gotten from others. The law was express to this purpose, Lev. vi. 5. where the offender is required to add a fifth part to the principal, and give it to him to whom it appertaineth; to the same purpose is that received rule among the Christian casuists taken from St. Augustine, epist. 54. "Non dimittitur peccatum, nisi restituatur ablatum;" The sin is not forgiven, unless what is taken away be restored.

Walk in the statutes of life.] See the note on xx. 11.

Ver. 16. None of the sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him.] See the note on xviii. 22.

Ver. 21. In the twelfth year of our captivity, &c.] The news of the taking and burning of Jerusalem was brought to that part of the Babylonish dominions where the Jewish captives were, in something above a year and four months after this calamity happened. (See Jer. lii. 12.)

Ver. 22. Now the hand of the Lord was upon me in the evening.] I felt a sensible impulse of the prophetical spirit. (See i. 3.)

And had opened my mouth, until he came to me in the morning, &c.] God has given me commission to speak in his name unto the people, which I had not done before near the space of three years. (Compare xxiv. 1.) And the destruction of the city, which I had so often foretold, being now brought to pass, (which at that time you would not believe, see xi. 3. xii. 22.) gave an indisputable authority and credit to my words. (See the note on xxiv. 27.)

Ver. 24. They that inhabit those wastes of the land of Israel.] They that are left behind in the land that is now wasted with fire and sword. (See ver. 27. and xxxvi. 4.)

Abraham was one, and he inherited the land.] If Abraham, being but a single person, with his family, had the whole country of Judea given to him, (see Gen. xiii. 15.) there is much greater reason to conclude that God will preserve the possession of it to us, who are a numerous part of Abraham's posterity. These men spake after the vain manner of the Jews, who fondly presume that they have a right in all the promises made to Abraham. (See Matt. iii. 8. John viii. 33. Rom. ix. 7.) The title of one is elsewhere given to Abraham, as being singled out from the rest of his family to be the original or head of the Jewish nation. (See Isa. li. 2. Mal. ii. 15. Heb. xi. 12.)

Ver. 25. Ye eat with the blood.] Which was forbidden several times in the law, as being a rite the heathens used in the sacrifices they offered to idols (whose worship is reproved in the very next words), as Dr. Spencer proves at large, de Legib. Hebraic. lib. ii. cap. 11. who brings many arguments to shew that the Hebrew phrase nal hadam, should be translated near the blood; in allusion to the idolatrous rite of pouring the blood of the slain beast into a vessel or pit, and then eating part of the sacrifice just by it.

And lift up your eyes towards your idols.] See xviii. 6.

And shed blood.] See ix. 9. xxii. 6. 9.

Ver. 26. Ye stand upon your sword.] You make your strength the law of justice, according to the character given of ungodly men, Wisd. ii. 11. Dr. Spencer, in the forecited place, thinks that the expression alludes to a custom of the heathens, who put the blood of their sacrifices into a vessel or pit, in order to call up and consult evil spirits, and then stood with their swords drawn to keep the demons off from doing them any harm.

Ye defile every one his neighbour's wife.] See Wisd. ii. 6. xxii. 11.

Ver. 27. They that are in the wastes (see ver. 24.) shall fall by the sword, &c.] The three judgments here mentioned, together with famine, are often threatened as the last and finishing strokes of God's vengeance upon the Jewish nation. (See v. 12. 17. vi. 12. xiv. 21. Jer. xv. 3.)

And they that be in the forts, and in the caves, shall die of the pestilence.] Compare Judg. vi. 2. The caves here mentioned were a sort of strong holds formed by nature in the rocks, or cut out under the tops of mountains: they were so large, that men might secure themselves, their families, and their goods, in them. So David is said to abide in strong holds, and remain in a mountain in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxiii. 14. Such was the cave of Adullam, where David had his residence for some time, and was there resorted to by his relations, (1 Sam. xxii. 1.) and at another time by his principal officers, (2 Sam. xxiii. 15.) [Such a cave is mentioned by Dio, called Ceria, belonging to the Getæ, whither they fled, and carried their moveables, for fear of Crassus: lib. li. ad fin.]

Ver. 28. For I will lay the land most desolate.] See Jer. xliv. 2. 6. 22. and xxxvi. 34, 35. of this prophecy.

The pomp of her strength shall cease.] All that riches and magnificence wherein they pleased themselves, as that which gave them strength and reputation in the eyes of the world: (see vii. 24.) or the phrase may denote the beauty and glory of the temple, which they looked upon as their chiefest strength and protection. (See xxiv. 21.)

And the mountains of Israel shall be desolate.] See vi. 2.

Ver. 29. Then shall they know that I am the Lord, &c.] See vi. 7.

Ver. 30. The children of thy people (those of the captivity) are still talking against thee, &c.] Or rather, of thee, as the LXX. rightly render it; for with their mouth they shewed much love, as it follows in the next verse.

By the walls, and in the doors of their houses.] Both in their public places of concourse, and in their private meetings.

Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word that cometh forth from the Lord.] These were such as drew nigh to God with their mouths, but their hearts were far from him; as Isaiah describes their hypocrisy, xxix. 13.

Ver. 31. They come unto thee as the people cometh.] Or, as disciples flock to their teachers. So the Chaldee paraphrase explains it.

And they sit before thee as my people.] See the note on viii. 1.

For with their mouth they shew much love.] They make loves, or jests, as our margin reads out of the Hebrew; which some interpreters understand, as if they ridiculed the prophet's words, or turned them into burlesque; so the Vulgar Latin renders it, In canticum oris sui vertunt. But by comparing this with the following verse, where the same word nagabim is spoken of a song or musical tune, we may rather understand the phrase to this sense, That they were delighted with the prophet's harmonious voice, or taking eloquence, but would not make the proper use of what he said for the correcting their evil manners.

Ver. 32. And, lo, thou art to them as a very lovely song, &c.] They come to hear thee for their entertainment, not for their edification, as many go to hear famed and eloquent preachers. St. Augustine tells us, that he himself was such an auditor of St. Ambrose, before he was converted, (Confess. lib. v. cap. 13.) "Studiose audiebam disputantem in populo, non attentione qua debui, sed tanquam explorator facundiæ ejus, utrum conveniret famæ suæ.—Verbis ejus suspendebar intentus, rerum autem incuriosus et contemptor astabam." I heard him diligently when he discoursed in the congregation, but not with that application of mind which I ought to have done; but I came rather out of curiosity to know whether his eloquence was answerable to that opinion the world had of him. I was very attentive to his style, and charmed with the sweetness of his delivery, but had little value or concern for the subjects he treated of.

Ver. 33. And when this comes to pass, lo, it will come, &c.] Or rather, lo, it is come; for so the same phrase is translated, vi. 2. 6. 10. the verb being in the present tense. When you see my prophecies concerning the destruction of Jerusalem actually brought to pass, as it appears they are at this time, (see ver. 21.) then you will be convinced of the truth of my mission, and of your own inexcusable crime in despising my predictions. (See xxiv. 27.)

CHAP. XXXIV.

ARGUMENT.

God reproves the ill conduct of the governors of the Jewish nation, both civil and ecclesiastical; and promises a general restoration of his people, and their happy condition under the government of the Messias, their king.

Ver. 2. PROPHESY against the shepherds of Israel.] The word shepherd, in the prophetical writings, comprehends both civil and ecclesiastical governors: (see the notes upon Isa. lvi. 11. Jer. ii. 8. xxiii. 1.) princes being called shepherds of their people, as well as those who have the immediate care of their souls. (See Psal. lxxviii. 71, 72.) To the same sense Homer calls Agamemnon, ποιμένα λαῶν, the shepherd of the people. And as the threatenings here denounced, extend to all sorts of governors; so the several sins of the princes, priests, and prophets, are reproved, xxii. 25, &c. (Compare likewise xlv. 8, 9.)

Woe to the shepherds of Israel that feed themselves.] That regard their own profit and advantage, not the good of the people committed to their charge. Plato, in the first book of his Commonwealth, describing the office of a magistrate, saith, "He should look upon himself as sustaining the office of a shepherd, that makes it his chief business to take care of his flock; not as if he were going to a feast to fill himself and satiate his appetite, or to a market to make what gain he can to himself." Eusebius, in his twelfth book de Præparatione Evangelica, cap. 44. hath transcribed the whole passage as an exact parallel to this place of Ezekiel.

Ver. 3. Ye eat the fat.] Or, the milk, as the LXX. render it. The Hebrew words, halab, milk, and heleb, fat, differ only in their points; so that the ancient versions take them promiscuously one for the other. (See xxv. 4.)

Ye kill them that are fed.] Them that are fat ye design for the slaughter, wherewith to feed yourselves: (see Zech. x. 5.) i. e. they took away the lives of the wealthy and substantial, that they might enrich themselves with their estates. (See xxii. 25. 27.)

Ver. 4. The diseased have ye not strengthened, &c.] Ye have not applied proper remedies to the wants and necessities of the people committed to your charge. The magistrates have not took care to relieve the needy, and defend the oppressed. The priests and the prophets have not been diligent in giving the people proper instructions, in reducing those that are in error, or in comforting the disconsolate.

Neither have ye bound up that which was broken.] Ye have not given ease to the afflicted and miserable. A metaphor taken from surgeons binding up wounds. (Compare Isa. lxi. 1.)

Neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, &c.] Or, which was gone astray, as the word niddakuh is translated, Deut. xxii. 1. Ye have not sought by good instructions to reduce those that have been seduced into error; or to reclaim those that are ready to be lost and perish in their sins. (Compare Matt. ix. 36. xviii. 11.)

But with force and cruelty have ye ruled them.] You have tried to reduce them to their duty by the rough methods of cruelty and compulsion, not by the gentle way of reason and argument. In like manner the methods of instruction and good example are particularly recommended to the pastors of the Christian church, 1 Pet. v. 3. 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25.

Ver. 5. And they were scattered abroad because there is no shepherd, &c.] By reason of these neglects of the governors, the whole frame of the government is dissolved, and my people are scattered here and there: some are fled for refuge into foreign countries; (see Jer. xl. 11.) others are carried captives by their enemies, who, as so many beasts of prey, have spoiled and devoured them. (Compare Isa. lvi. 9. Jer. xii. 9.)

Ver. 6. My sheep wandered through all the mountains, &c.] As sheep, when there is nobody to look after them, wander from one mountain and hill to another; so my people have been forced to leave their habitations, and fly to any place where they might hope for protection. (Compare vii. 16. and see the note upon Jer. xiii. 16.)

And none did seek or search after them.] Their rulers took no care of my people while they had power and authority; and now I have displaced them for their misdemeanours, and there is nobody left whose office it is to take any farther care of my people. (See ver. 10.)

Ver. 10. I will require my flock at their hands, and cause them to cease from feeding the flock.] I will require a severe account of their kings and princes, their priests and prophets, of the damage my people have sustained through their ill management; and I will deprive them of that honour and pre-eminence which they have made such ill use of, as I have already displaced Zedekiah, and the princes, priests, and others, that were in authority under him.

Ver. 12. So will I seek out my sheep, and deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day.] I will bring them home from their several dispersions, whither they have been driven in the dark and dismal time of the destruction of their country, and their own captivity. (Compare xxx. 3.)

Ver. 13. And I will bring them out from the people, &c.] This prophecy may in some degree have been fulfilled in the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity: but seems still to look farther, even to the general restoration of the whole nation; which most of the prophets foretell shall come to pass in the latter days. (Compare xi. 17. xx. 41. xxviii. 25. xxxvi. 24. xxxvii. 21. xxxviii. 8. xxxix. 27.)

Ver. 14. Upon the high mountains of Israel.] See vi. 2.

There shall they lie in a good fold, &c.] The expressions denote plenty and security. (Compare Isa. lxv. 10. Jer. xxxiii. 12. Hos. ii. 18. Zeph. iii. 13.)

Ver. 16. I will seek that which was lost, &c.] The Messias, whom I will set over them, (see ver. 23.) shall faithfully discharge all the offices of a shepherd towards them, which their former pastors have neglected, ver. 4. (Compare Isa. xl. 11. lxi. 1. Matt. xv. 24. xviii. 11. John x. 11.)

But I will destroy the fat and the strong.] Those that oppress and domineer over the weak. (See ver. 20, 21. compare xxxix. 18. Amos iv. 1.)

I will feed them with judgment.] Or, with discretion; i. e. I will deal with each of them according to their deserts, and make a distinction between the fat and lean cattle. (See ver. 18. 20.)

Ver. 17. Between cattle and cattle, between the rams and the he-goats.] The Hebrew runs thus, Between the small cattle, and the cattle of rams, and he-goats; between the weak and the strong cattle, i. e. between the rich and the poor, as the Chaldee paraphrase explains the sense upon ver. 20.

Ver. 18. Seemeth it a small thing unto you, to have eaten up the good pasture, &c.] This reproof may fitly be applied to those great persons who take no care that the poor may enjoy the benefit of their superfluities; but rather let them be thrown away and perish, than they will be at the trouble of seeing them disposed of for the good of those that want.

Ver. 21. Because ye have thrust with side and shoulder, &c.] In pursuance of this comparison, the oppressors of the weak are commonly styled in Scripture by the names of oxen, bullocks, rams, and he-goats. (See Psal. xxii. 12. lxviii. 31. Dan. viii. 3. 5.)

Ver. 23. And I will set up one shepherd over them—even my servant David.] The Messias is often described under the character of a shepherd, both in the Old and New Testament. (See the note on ver. 16.) And the title may be applied to him with respect to his office of king, as well as that of priest and prophet. (See the note on ver. 2.) He is elsewhere styled by the name of David, as being the person in whom all the promises made to David were fulfilled. (See Isa. lv. 3, 4. Jer. xxx. 9. Hos. iii. 5.) [The expression may likewise allude to David's first employment, which was that of a shepherd.]

He shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd.] This prophecy was remarkably fulfilled when Christ, by the preaching of the gospel, gathered in one the children of God which were scattered abroad, (John xi. 52. Eph. i. 10.) among whom were many of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, (Matt. x. 6.) But it will receive a farther completion at the general conversion of the Jews, when the time will come that they shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, (Matt. xxiii. 37.) And this signal event will usher in or complete the fulness of the gentiles. (See Rom. xi. 12. 15. 25. 32.)

Ver. 24. And I the Lord will be their God.] I will renew my covenant with them, and receive them again into my protection. (See ver. 30. xxxvii. 27. Lev. xvi. 12. and the notes upon Jer. xxx. 22.)

And my servant David a prince among them.] See the note on xxxvii. 22.

Ver. 25. And I will make with them a covenant of peace.] As I will be at peace with them, so I will give them the blessing of outward peace, and will protect them from the annoyance of all their enemies, from persecution and outward violence. (See Jer. xxiii. 6.)

And will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land.] This may be meant of freedom from persecution by infidels and strangers. (Compare ver. 28.) Such a security is elsewhere expressed by making a covenant for them with the beasts of the field. (See Lev. xxvi. 6. Job v. 23. Isa. xxxv. 9. Hos. ii. 18.) The words are likewise capable of a literal interpretation, importing, that as God had threatened after the desolation of the land, wild beasts should overrun it, and devour the few inhabitants that were left; (see v. 17. xxxiii. 27.) so upon the repeopling of the country, those ravagers should forsake it.

Ver. 26. And I will make them, and the places round about my hill, a blessing.] I will there give remarkable instances of my favour, and the happiness which accompanies it. (See Gen. xii. 2. Isa. xix. 24. Zech. viii. 13.) God's hill is the same with his holy mountain, xx. 40.

And there shall be showers of blessing.] Such as shall produce all sorts of plenty. (Compare Mal. iii. 10.)

Ver. 27. And the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, &c.]

The spiritual blessings of the gospel are sometimes described under the emblems of fruitfulness and plenty. (See the notes on Isa. iv. 2. xxxv. 2. lxv. 10. Jer. xxxi. 12.)

When I have broken the bands of their yoke.] The same expression which is used concerning the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt. (Lev. xxvi. 13. Jer. ii. 20.) Their final restoration being represented as the greater deliverance of the two. (See Jer. xxiii. 7, 8.)

And delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them.] See Jer. xxv. 14.

Ver. 28. And they shall no more be a prey to the heathen, neither shall the beasts of the land devour them.] See ver. 25.

And they shall dwell safely, &c.] See the note on Jer. xxiii. 6.

Ver. 29. And I will raise them up a plant of renown.] The Messias is often described under the name of the branch; and the rod or shoot growing of the stem of Jesse. (See Isa. iv. 2. xi. liii. 2. Jer. xxiii. 5. Zech. iii. 8. vi. 12.)

And they shall be no more consumed with hunger in the land.] But shall be blessed with plenty of all things. (See ver. 26, 27. and xxxvi. 29.)

Neither bear the shame of the heathen any more.] By whom they were reproached, as if their God had cast them off. (See xxxvi. 3. 6. 15.)

Ver. 30. Then shall they know that I the Lord their God am with them, &c.] See ver. 24.

Ver. 31. And ye, my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men.] These words, at the conclusion of the chapter, explain the metaphor which runs through the whole: that what was said of a flock and its shepherds, is to be understood of men and their governors; and especially of God's people, whom he takes care of, as a shepherd does of his flock. (See xxxvi. 38. Psal. lxxxi. 2.)

CHAP. XXXV.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet renews his former denunciations of judgments upon the Edomites, (see xxv. 12.) as a just punishment for their insulting over the calamities of the Jews.

Ver. 2. SET thy face against Mount Seir.] See vi. 2. Mount Seir is the same with Idumea. (See Deut. ii. 5.)

Ver. 4. I will lay thy cities waste, &c.] See ver. 9.

Ver. 5. Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred, &c.] See the note on xxv. 12.

In the time that their iniquity had an end.] When their iniquity received its just doom. (See vii. 6. xxi. 25. 29.)

Ver. 6. Sith thou hast not hated blood, even blood shall pursue thee.] Since thou hast loved cruelty, and took delight in shedding blood, vengeance shall pursue thee, and thou shalt fall into the hands of those that will be as eager to shed thine. The phrase, Thou hast not hated blood, is spoken by the figure called litotes by the rhetoricians, when the words imply more than they express. (See the note on Jer. vii. 31.)

Ver. 7. And cut off from it him that passeth out, and him that returneth.] No travellers shall go forward or backward in it with safety. (See xxix. 11. compare Judg. v. 6. 2 Chron. xv. 5.)

Ver. 8. And I will fill his mountains with his slain men, &c.] Every part of the country shall be filled with the carcasses of those that are slain. (Compare xxxii. 4, 5.)

Ver. 9. And I will make thee perpetual desolations, &c.] See xxv. 13. Jer. xlix. 17, 18. Mal. i. 3. Dr. Prideaux, Script. Hist. par. ii. p. 299. informs us, that the Nabatheans having driven the Edomites out of their ancient habitations in the time of the Babylonish captivity, they settled themselves in the southern part of Judea, where they were afterward conquered by Hyrcanus, and obliged to embrace the Jewish religion, and so became at length incorporated with that nation. (See ibid. p. 307.)

Ver. 10. These two nations, and these two countries, shall be mine.] They settled themselves in part of the country, and hoped to have got possession of the whole in time. (See the note upon the foregoing verse.) The Ammonites had the same design, as appears from Jer. xlix. 1.

Whereas the Lord was there.] They did not believe that God had placed his name there, had chosen it for a place of his peculiar residence, and would never quite relinquish his property in it. (See xlviii. 35.)

Ver. 11. And I will make myself known among them, when I have judged thee.] I will make my people see that I have not quite cast them off, by my avenging their quarrel upon thee.

Ver. 12. And thou shalt know that I am the Lord.] See vi. 7.

They are laid desolate, &c.] See the note on ver. 10.

Ver. 13. Thus with your mouth ye have boasted against me.] As if I were not able to make good my promises towards the Jews, or to assert my right in Judea. (See ver. 10.)

Ver. 14. When the whole earth rejoiceth, I will make thee desolate.] When I shall restore other countries, conquered by the king of Babylon, to their former posterity, thou shalt still lie waste and desolate. The Edomites never recovered their country, after the Nabatheans had expelled them out of it. (See Dr. Prideaux, in the place abovecited.)

Ver. 15. Thou shalt be desolate—all Idumea.] The expression is like that of Isaiah, whole Palestina, Isa. xiv. 29. i. e. all the several tribes and divisions of it.

CHAP. XXXVI.

ARGUMENT.

This and the following chapter contain a prediction of the general restoration both of Israel and Judah, a subject often spoken of by this prophet: of which the return of the two tribes from Babylon may be thought an earnest.

Ver. 1. PROPHESY unto the mountains of Israel.] See the following verse.

Ver. 2. Because the enemy hath said against you, even the ancient high places are ours in possession.] The Idumeans have made their boasts (see ver. 5. xxxv. 10.) that they should become masters of the mountainous parts of Judea, where the ancient fortresses were placed which commanded all the rest of the country. To the same sense we are to understand the expression of treading upon the high places of the earth, Deut. xxxii. 13. i. e. taking possession of the fortresses or passes which command the rest of the country.

Ver. 3. And ye are taken up in the lips of talkers, and are the infamy of the heathen.] Your calamities have made you become a proverb, a by-word, and a reproach among the heathen round about you, according to the threatenings of the prophets denounced against you. (See Deut. xxviii. 37. 1 Kings ix. 7, 8. Psal. lxxix. 4. Jer. xviii. 16. Lam. ii. 15. Dan. ix. 16.)

Ver. 4. Which became a prey to the residue of the heathen that are round about you.] To these heathens that are left, after the general desolations threatened upon the neighbouring countries, Moab, Edom, Ammon, &c. (Compare ver. 36. Jer. xxv. 20. xlvii. 4.)

Ver. 5. Surely in the fire of my jealousy.] In that fervent zeal and concern that I have for my own honour, which is blasphemed among the heathen. (See xxxv. 12, 13. compare xxxviii. 19. xxxix. 25.)

Against the residue of the heathen—which have appointed my land into their possession.] See the note on xxxv. 12.

Ver. 6. Because ye have borne the shame of the heathen.] See xxxiv. 29. xxxv. 12, 13.

Ver. 7. I have lifted up my hand.] I have solemnly sworn. (See xx. 5, &c.)

Ver. 8. Yield your fruit to my people of Israel; for they are at hand to come.] This may have an immediate aspect upon the Jews' return from Babylon, when they were restored to the possession of their own country. If we suppose the words to relate to the general restoration of the nation, the longest distance of time that the things of this world can extend to, is but as a moment in respect of eternity. (Compare Heb. x. 37. Philip. iv. 5.)

Ver. 10. And the wastes shall be builded.] Compare ver. 33. This may likewise have been in some measure fulfilled at their return from Babylon. (Compare Isa. lviii. 12. lxi. 4.)

Ver. 11. And I will multiply upon you man and beast.] As God in his judgments threatens to cut off man and beast from a land; (see xiv. 17.) so here he promises to replenish it with both. (Compare Jer. xxxi. 27. xxxiii. 12.)

And will do better unto you than at your beginnings.] In bestowing upon you the blessings of the gospel; the promises of which were made first to the Jews and to their children, (Acts ii. 39.) The words may likewise imply, that God would give them a more lasting and secure possession of their land than ever they had before. (See the following verses.)

Ver. 12. Yea, I will cause men to walk upon you.] O mountains or land of Israel, (ver. 8.)

Ver. 13. Thou land devourest up men, and hast bereaved thy nations.] The neighbouring people raised this ill character upon the land of Judea, because of the severe judgments of the sword, famine, and pestilence, which had destroyed the greatest part of the inhabitants. The expression alludes to that evil report which the spies brought upon it, (Numb. xiii. 32.) that it was a land that did eat up its inhabitants; as if the air had been unwholesome, or the country always afflicted by some judgment from heaven.

Ver. 14. Therefore thou shalt devour men no more, &c.] Thou shalt be free from the strokes of heaven, and from the annoyance of enemies on earth.

Ver. 15. Neither will I cause men to hear in thee the shame of the heathen any more, &c.] See ver. 6. and xxxiv. 29.

Neither shalt thou cause thy nations to fall any more.] The Chaldee, and some other ancient versions, translate the words, Neither shalt thou bereave thy people [or nations] any more; as if the word, in the original, were shaccal, the same which is used in the sense of bereaving in the foregoing verses; whereas here the present copies read cashal, which signifies to fall. But it hath been before observed, that words in the Hebrew, which are near in sound, often have an affinity in their signification. (See the note on xxvii. 15.)

Ver. 17. Their way was before me, as the uncleanness of a removed woman.] As such a person was under a legal pollution, and forbidden to come within the courts of the temple, or attend upon God's worship there: so the defilements the Jews had contracted by their idolatries, and other heinous sins, rendered them unqualified to be my people, or to offer up any religious service to me.

Ver. 18. Wherefore, I poured my fury upon them for the blood they had shed upon the land, and for their idols, &c.] Murder and idolatry, two sins of the first magnitude, are often joined together in the catalogue of national sins recited in this prophecy; meaning particularly, the blood of their children, which they offered to their idols. (See xvi. 36. 38. xxiii. 37.)

Ver. 19. And I scattered them among the heathen, &c.] See v. 12.

Ver. 20. And when they entered unto the heathen—they profaned my holy name, when they said unto them, &c.] Or, When it was said unto them: verbs of the third person being often taken impersonally. By their evil practices they brought a scandal upon my name, and gave occasion to the heathen to say, See what profligate wretches these are who call themselves by the name of God's people, whom he hath justly expelled out of their country which he had given them. The Chaldee paraphrase understands the words to this sense: "If these are God's people, why does he suffer them to be turned out of the land which he made the place of his own especial residence? why does he not continue to protect them?" But the former sense agrees better with the scope of the text, and with St. Paul's application of it to the Jews of his own time, Rom. ii. 24. and with what follows, ver. 31.

Ver. 21. But I had pity for my holy name, &c.] I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted among the heathen, as the prophet speaks, xx. 9.

Ver. 22. I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel.] The promises I make in your favour in the following verses, are not owing to any desert of yours, but purely to vindicate my own honour. (See ver. 32. and compare Deut. ix. 5. Psal. cvi. 8.)

Ver. 23. And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, &c.] I will give illustrious proofs of my power and goodness, and vindicate my honour from the reproaches with which it has been blasphemed among the heathen, upon the occasion of your evil doings.

And the heathen shall know that I am the Lord.] The return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity was taken notice of by the heathens, as a signal instance of God's providence towards them; (see Psal. cxxvi. 2.) and their general conversion will be a much more remarkable proof of my fulfilling the promises made to their fathers; so that the heathens themselves will be forced to take notice of it. (See xxxvii. 28.) It will be an effectual argument to convince infidels that your nation, and the rest of the true Israelites, are the only church of God, and professors of his truth. (See Zech. viii. 23.)

When I shall be sanctified in you before your eyes.] When I shall sanctify my name, as it is expressed in the former part of the verse, and make my power and goodness known to the world. (See the notes on xx. 41. xxviii. 22.)

Ver. 24. And I will take you out from among the heathen, &c.] See xxxiv. 13. xxxvii. 21. xxxix. 25.

Ver. 25. And I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean.] The expression alludes to those legal purifications which were made by sprinkling water upon the unclean person; (see Numb. viii. 7. xix. 13.) and denotes the sacrament of baptism, by which true believers are cleansed from their former sins, and inwardly sanctified. (See Acts ii. 38. xxii. 16. Titus iii. 5. and compare Jer. xxxiii. 8.) St. Paul may probably allude to this text, when he exhorts the Hebrew converts to draw nigh to God, having their hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and their bodies washed with pure water, (Heb. x. 22.)

From all your filthiness, and from your idols will I cleanse you.] When the prophets foretell the general conversion of the Jews, they usually mention their detestation of their former idolatries, as a necessary preparation towards it. (See Isa. i. 29. xvii. 7, 8. Jer. iii. 22, 23, &c. Zech. xiii. 1, 2.) Some account of this circumstance of their conversion hath been given in the note upon Isa. lxv. 7. and upon the forementioned chapter of Jeremiah.

Ver. 26, 27. A new heart also will I give you, &c.] See xi. 19. This promise will be fulfilled, when the heart of this people shall turn to the Lord, and the veil shall be taken from it, as St. Paul informs us, 2 Cor. iii. 16. (Compare Jer. xxxi. 33, 34.)

Ver. 28. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers.] See xxviii. 25.

And ye shall be my people, &c.] See xi. 20.

Ver. 29. I will also save you from all your uncleannesses.] I will take away the guilt of them, and deliver you from the punishments due to them. (See Matt. i. 21.)

Ibid. and Ver. 30. And I will call for the corn, and will increase it, &c.] See the notes upon xxxiv. 27. 29.

Ver. 31. Then shall ye remember your own evil ways.] See the note upon xvi. 61.

And shall loathe yourselves in your own sight, &c.] See vi. 9.

Ver. 32. Not for your sakes do I this—be it known unto you, &c.] The prophet repeats what he said ver. 22. on purpose to check all vain presumption in the Jews, and confidence of their own intrinsic worth or merit: a fault they have been very prone to in all ages.

Ver. 33. I will cause you to dwell in the cities, and the wastes shall be builded.] See ver. 10.

Ver. 34. Whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by it.] As Moses had threatened, Deut. xxix. 23. 28.

Ver. 35. This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden.] See xxviii. 13. Isa. li. 3.

Ver. 36. The heathen that are left round about you, shall know that I the Lord build the ruined places, &c.] The heathen nations that are near you, (see ver. 4.) shall be convinced that the restoring the Jews to their former state must be the immediate hand of God, who will certainly, in due time, fulfil what is here foretold. (See xxxvii. 14.)

Ver. 37. I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them.] God, in his anger, tells the Jews, that he will not be inquired of by them, (xiv. 3. xx. 3. 31.) intimating, that during their continuance in idolatry and other wickedness, they ought not to address themselves to him, nor expect any favourable answer to their requests: but now, upon their repentance and reconciliation, he tells them, that he will be inquired of by them; i. e. he will dispose their hearts to apply themselves to him by prayer, and will answer the petitions they make to him for the fulfilling these his promises. (See Psal. x. 17. and compare Jer. xxix. 13.)

Ver. 38. As the holy flock; as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts.] The sheep and lambs, designed for the sacrifices which were offered at the three solemn feasts, were both very numerous, and likewise of the best in their kind. The epithet of holy, and most holy, is often applied to sacrifices in the Levitical law, as being wholly dedicated to God, and set apart for his worship. (See Lev. vi. 25. 29. Numb. xviii. 9.)

So shall the waste cities be filled with flocks of men.] See xxxiv. 31.

CHAP. XXXVII.

ARGUMENT.

Under the figure of a resurrection of dry bones, is foretold the general restoration of the Jews from their several dispersions; and by the joining of two sticks, is represented the uniting of Israel and Judah into one kingdom.

Ver. 1. THE hand of the Lord was upon me.] See the note upon i. 3.

And carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord.] Or, by the Spirit of the Lord. (Compare iii. 14. viii. 3. xi. 24.) This was performed either by a local translation of the prophet, or else by way of vision and lively representation. (See the note upon viii. 3.)

Ver. 3. O Lord God, thou knowest.] This is only an act of thy power and good pleasure. Raising the dead to life again is peculiarly ascribed to God, as being properly the work of Omnipotence, and a sort of new creation. (See Deut. xxxii. 39. 1 Sam. ii. 6. John v. 21. Rom. iv. 17. 2 Cor. i. 9.)

Ver. 4. O ye dry bones, hear ye the word of the Lord.] A prophetical and lively representation of that voice of the Son of God, which all that are in the graves shall hear at the last day, and shall come forth out of them, (John v. 28, 29.)

Ver. 5. Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you] The breath of life, as it is expressed, Gen. ii. 7. (Compare Psal. civ. 30.)

Ver. 7. And as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking.] Such a noise, or commotion, as we may suppose the bones of a human body would make upon their meeting together again, after having been severed one from another.

Ver. 9. Prophesy unto the wind.] Or rather, to the breath, meaning that vital principle which unites body and soul together, and is mentioned as distinct from the four winds in the following words.

Come from the four winds, O breath.] The words figuratively represent the restoration of the Jewish nation from the several countries whither they were dispersed over the world, expressed by their being scattered towards all winds, (v. 10. xii. 14. xvii. 21.)

Ver. 10. An exceeding great army.] To signify the great numbers they will amount to, when they return from their several dispersions, and unite into one body. They are elsewhere styled a remnant, but that is in comparison of the whole nation. (See the notes upon Isa. iv. 2. x. 22. xxvii. 12, 13.)

Ver. 11. These bones are the whole house of Israel.] They represent the forlorn and desperate condition to which the whole nation is reduced.

Ver. 12. I will open your graves, and cause you to come out of your graves.] I will reunite you into one body or nation, who now lie scattered and dispersed as the bones in a charnel-house. (Compare ver. 21.) In their state of dispersion and captivity they are called the dead Israelites, in Baruch, iii. 4. And their restoration is described as a resurrection by Isaiah, (xxvi. 19.) at which time their bones are said to flourish, or to be restored to their former strength and vigour, in the same prophet, lxvi. 14. In like manner St. Paul expresses their conversion, and the general restoration which shall accompany it, by life from the dead, Rom. xi. 15.

And bring you into the land of Israel.] See ver. 25. and the note upon xxviii. 25.

Ver. 14. And shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live.] That principle of life expressed by breath or spirit, ver. 9. not excluding that new spirit of grace, which God will at that time plentifully bestow upon them. (See xi. 19. xxxvi. 26, 27.) The principle of grace is often spoken of as a higher principle of life, and the earnest of our heavenly happiness. (See Rom. viii. 11. 1 Cor. vi. 17. xv. 45.)

Ver. 16. Take thee one stick, and write upon it, &c.] i. e. One rod; the expression alludes to Numb. xvii. 2. where Moses is commanded to take twelve rods, one for each tribe, and to write the name of the tribe upon the rod.

For Judah, and the children of Israel his companions.] Not only the tribe of Benjamin, but many of the other tribes joined themselves to the tribe of Judah, and kept close to the law of God, and the worship of his temple. (See 2 Chron. xi. 12. 16. xv. 9. xxx. 11. 18.)

For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions.] Upon Reuben's forfeiting his birthright, that privilege was conferred upon the sons of Joseph, of whom Ephraim had the precedence: (see Gen. xlviii. 20. 1 Chron v. 1.) which made him be reckoned the head of ten tribes; Samaria, the seat of that kingdom, being likewise situate in the tribe of Ephraim: upon these accounts the name of Ephraim signifies in the prophets the whole kingdom of Israel, as distinct from that of Judah; and particularly in the prophet Hosea, v. 3. 5, &c. (See likewise Jer. xxxi. 6. 18.)

Ver. 17. And join them one to another into one stick.] A rod or sceptre is an emblem of power; (see Psal. cx. 2.) so the joining these two rods or sticks together, denotes uniting the two kingdoms under one prince or governor. (See ver. 22.)

Ver. 18. Wilt thou not shew us what thou meanest by these?] Ezekiel foretold many things by signs, and the Jews were very inquisitive into the meaning of them; though sometimes their curiosity proceeded rather from a secret contempt of the prophet and his predictions, than a real desire of information. (See xii. 9. xvii. 12. xx. 49. xxiv. 19.)

Ver. 19. Which is in the hand of Ephraim.] Of which he is the head. (See ver. 16.)

They shall be one in my hand.] I will make them one nation, and appoint one king to rule over them, the Messias. (See ver. 22.)

Ver. 20. And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes.] Thou shalt place the sticks or rods thus joined together before their eyes, as a visible token or pledge of the truth of what I enjoin thee to speak to them in the following words.

Ver. 21. I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, &c.] See xx. 34. xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24. xxxix. 25.

Ver. 22. And I will make them one nation.] They shall not be divided any more into separate kingdoms; the consequence of which was their setting up separate ways of worship, and espousing separate interests. (Compare Isa. xi. 13.) It has been already observed, that the prophecies which foretell of the general restoration of the Jews, join Judah and Israel together, as equal sharers in that blessing.

And one King shall be king to them all.] The Messias, who is that one Shepherd and Prince that shall rule over them all, as one nation. (See xxxiv. 23, 24. compared with Luke i. 32, 33.) The Messias is described as king of the Jews in most of the prophecies of the Old Testament, beginning with that of Gen. xlix. 10. concerning Shiloh. From David's time he is commonly spoken of as the person in whom the promises relating to the perpetuity of David's kingdom were to be accomplished. This was a truth unanimously owned by the Jews; (see John i. 49.) to which our Saviour bore testimony before Pontius Pilate, when the question being put to him, Art thou a king? he made answer, Thou sayest [the truth], for I am a king: thus those words should be translated, for St. Paul alluding to them calls them a good confession, 1 Tim. vi. 13. The same truth Pontius Pilate himself asserted in that inscription which he providentially ordered to be written upon the cross: (see John xix. 19. 22.) so that the chief priests impiously renounced their own avowed principles, when they told Pilate, that they had no king but Cæsar. (Ibid. ver. 15.)

Ver. 23. Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols.] See the note upon xxxvi. 25.

Nor with their detestable things.] Or, abominations, as the word shikkuts is elsewhere translated, and commonly applied to idols. (See xx. 7. 2 Kings xxiii. 13. Dan. ix. 27.)

Nor with any of their transgressions.] This expression comprehends in it, their being touched with a hearty compunction for their great sin of rejecting and crucifying the Messias, their King and Saviour. (See Zech. xii. 10.)

And will save them out of all their dwelling-places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them.] See xxxvi. 20. 25. 28.

Ver. 24. And David my servant shall be king over them, &c.] See xxxiv. 23.

They shall also walk in my judgments, &c.] See xxxvi. 27.

Ver. 25. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given to Jacob my servant.] A promise often repeated in this prophecy. (See ver. 12. 21. and the note on xxviii. 25.)

Ver. 26. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them, &c.] See xxxiv. 25. The words may likewise be understood in a spiritual sense, that God will be reconciled to them through Christ, and admit them into that covenant of peace, of which he is the Mediator, and therefore is called our peace, Eph. ii. 14. And then the following words, It shall be an everlasting covenant with them, may fitly be explained of the gospel, being such a covenant as shall never be abolished, or give way to any new dispensation. (Compare Isa. lv. 3. Jer. xxxii. 40.)

Ibid. and Ver. 27. And will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them.] God's placing first his tabernacle, and then his temple among the Jews, was a pledge and token of his presence among them, and protection over them. (See Lev. xxvi. 11, 12. and the note upon xi. 16. of this prophecy.) And here he promises new and more valuable tokens of his presence among them, by the graces of his Holy Spirit, and the efficacy of his word and sacraments: (compare 2 Cor. vi. 16.) and perhaps will vouchsafe them some extraordinary appearance of the Divine Majesty. (See xliii. 4, 5. 7. Zech. ii. 5.)

Yea, I will be their God, &c.] See xi. 20.

Ver. 28. And the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel. The conversion of the Jewish nation, and their being restored to their former state of favour and acceptance with God, will be a work of providence taken notice of by the heathens themselves, who shall join themselves to the Jews, as the church of God and temple of truth. (See xxxvi. 23.)

CHAP. XXXVIII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophecy contained in this and the following chapter concerning Israel's victory over Gog and Magog, without question relates to the latter ages of the world, when the whole house of Israel shall return into their own land, (xxxix. 25, 26.) And the expressions we meet with in this chapter, (ver. 8. 16.) that this should come to pass in the latter days, and after many days, or a considerable number of years, and that God had of old prophesied concerning this transaction: these and other circumstances of this prophecy, are a proof that the event was to happen a great while after the several predictions of the prophets concerning it. So that this must be looked upon as one of those obscure prophecies of Scripture, the fulfilling whereof will best explain their meaning.

Ver. 2. SET thy face (see vi. 2.) against Gog, the land of Magog.] Or, of the land of Magog. Magog was the son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) from whence the Scythians are generally supposed to be derived. The Mogul Tartars, a people of the Scythian race, are still called so by the Arabian writers, as Dr. Hyde informs us, in his epistle, De Mensuris Synensibus. By Gog and Magog may most probably here be meant the Turks, who were originally natives of Tartary, called Turcheston by the eastern writers; and whose language is derived from that of the Tartars. The land of Canaan hath been, for several years, in the possession of the Turks: several texts in Ezekiel foretell the Jews' settlement in that country again; and some of the expressions in this and the following chapter intimate, that the people called here by the name of Gog, and their allies, will attempt to recover it again out of the hands of the Jews, its rightful owners: this may probably occasion the war and victory here spoken of. But this is what cannot be positively affirmed; only thus much one may venture to say, that since the whole strength of Europe was so unsuccessful in their attempts to recover that land out of the hands of the infidels in the holy war, it looks as if God had reserved that work to some farther time of his own appointment, when that country should be the scene of some extraordinary event of Providence. We may farther observe, that the second woe, mentioned Rev. ix. 12. xi. 14. is by many learned men understood of the Turkish empire; and in consequence of that interpretation, the putting an end to that tyranny, will be an introduction to some extraordinary changes in the Christian part of the world.

The chief prince of Meshech and Tubal.] The king or head of all those northern nations which lie upon the Euxine Sea. (See the notes upon xxvii. 13.) The Turk is called the king of the north in Daniel, xi. 40. as several commentators interpret that place. The LXX. interpreters take the word Rosh, commonly translated chief, for a proper name; so they render the sentence thus, The prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal. Rosh, taken as a proper name, signifies those inhabitants of Scythia, from whence the Russians derive their name and original.

Ver. 4. And I will turn thee back, and put hooks into thy jaws.] I will disappoint all thy designs, and turn thee about as easily as a fisherman masters a great fish, when he hath once fastened the hook into his jaws. (See xxix. 4.)

And I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, &c.] The sense would be plainer, if the words were thus translated, After I have brought thee forth, &c. In which sense the copulative vau is sometimes used. (See Noldius's Concordance, p. 291.)

Horses and horsemen.] See ver. 15.

Ver. 5. Persia, Ethiopia, and Lybia with them.] Their allies, Ethiopia and Lybia, are called Cush and Phut in the Hebrew, and are joined together as allies, xxx. 5. (See the note there.) Persians are joined in like manner with Africans, xxvii. 10.

All of them with shield and helmet.] So the Lybians, or people of Phut, are described, Jer. xlvi. 9. as handling the shield; i. e. being remarkable for their great and large shields, as Zenophon relates of them, (Cyropæd. lib. vi.)

Ver. 6. Gomer, and all his bands, the house of Togarmah of the north quarters.] Gomer is joined with Magog, Gen. x. 2. and probably signifies Galatia, Phrygia, and Bithynia, which, with Cappadocia, denoted by Togarmah, comprehends all the northern parts of Asia Minor, which border upon the Euxine Sea. (See the meaning of Togarmah explained in the note upon xxvii. 14.)

And many people with thee.] Those of Cilicia, Pamphilia, and other nations inhabiting Asia Minor.

Ver. 7. Be thou prepared—thou and all thy company that are assembled with thee.] The prophet ironically encourages Gog to make all warlike preparations, and muster all his forces together, that God may gain the greater honour by their signal defeat. (See ver. 16. and compare Jer. xlvi. 2, 3. 14. li. 12.)

And be thou a guard unto them.] Let them rely upon thy prowess and conduct as their leader.

Ver. 8. After many days thou shalt be visited, &c.] This judgment shall be inflicted by God upon thee, (compare Isa. xxix. 6.) after a succession of many generations: In the latter years, or days, as it follows here, and ver. 16. i. e. towards the end of the world; (compare Dan. viii. 26.) particularly the expression of latter days, or years, is used to denote the times of the general restoration of the Jewish nation. (See Deut. iv. 30. Jer. xxx. 24. Hos. iii. 5.)

Thou shalt come into the land that is brought back from the sword.] The land is put for the people of the land, who are said to be brought back from the sword, as they are elsewhere styled a remnant; i. e. those that should survive after the hardships they had suffered in their several dispersions, and the judgments that should fall upon the disobedient in their return home. (See the notes upon xx. 34. 38. and upon Isa. iv. 2.) And perhaps those words of Jeremiah, xxxi. 2. may be best explained to this sense, The people that were left of the sword found grace in the wilderness. The whole chapter relates to the general conversion and restoration of the Jews; and the prophet speaks in that verse of the favours God would shew to those that should escape the severe judgments that should destroy the disobedient in their passage home to their own country, called the desert, or wilderness, by Isaiah, xl. 3. and by Ezekiel, the wilderness of the people, or nations, xx. 35. (See the notes upon that place.)

And gathered out of many people.] See the note upon xxxiv. 13.

Against the mountains of Israel, [see xxxvi. 1. 4.] which have been always waste.] Or rather, altogether waste, as the LXX. rightly translate it.

But it is brought forth out of the nations, and they shall dwell safely all of them.] Or, And they have dwelt safely all of them; the future tense being often put for the preter-perfect. The sense is, that after the return of the people of Israel into their own country, and their having lived there for some time in peace and safety, this enemy will think to take advantage of their security, and fall upon them unexpectedly. (Compare ver. 11.)

Ver. 9. Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm.] A comparison elsewhere made use of to express the devastations which attend a destroying army. (See xiii. 11. Isa. xxviii. 2.)

Thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land.] Thou shalt overspread the land like a dark cloud, which makes every thing look melancholy and dismal. (See xxx. 3. Jer. iv. 13.)

Ver. 11. I will go to the land of unwalled villages, &c.] A description of a people, that live securely without any apprehension of danger. (Compare Jer. xlix. 31.)

To them that are at rest and dwell safely.] According to the promise often repeated in the prophet, that in those days Israel should dwell safely, and none should make them afraid. (See xxxiv. 28. Jer. xxiii. 6. and the note there.)

Ver. 12. To turn thine hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited.] Judea is described as a country that lay desolate before the Jews' return into it. (See xxxvi. 34, 35.) After it had been for some time reinhabited, Gog and his associates designed to fall upon it with all their forces; in that sense to turn the hand is taken, Isa. i. 25. (See the note there.)

That dwell in the midst of the land.] In the navel of the land, as the Hebrew reads, i. e. in Jerusalem, because that stood near the middle of the holy land, and likewise was situate upon a rising ground, which the Hebrew metaphorically expresses by the navel. (See Judg. ix. 37.)

Ver. 13. Sheba, and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish—shall say unto thee, Art thou come to take a spoil?] These were people that dealt much in trade: the two former dwelling in the east, the latter often sailing from the Spanish coasts into the eastern parts: they are mentioned xxvii. 12. 15. 20. 22. as having commerce with Tyre, which bordered upon Judea. Those merchants, as soon as they heard of this intended invasion, came into Gog's camp as to a market, to buy both persons and goods which should come into the conqueror's power. (See the note upon xxvi. 2.)

With all the young lions thereof.] The Targum understands it of their kings, i. e. their chief merchants, who are described as so many princes, Isa. xxiii. 8. and are called lions, because of the injustice and oppression they too commonly practised in their commerce. (See xxviii. 16.) But the LXX. translate the word kephirim, towns or villages; in which sense it is taken, Nehem. vi. 2. and in other places.

Ver. 14. In that day.] At that remarkable time, when God shall bring again the captivity of Israel and Judah, so often spoken of by the prophets. (See the note upon Isa. iv. 2.)

When my people of Israel dwelleth safely, shalt not thou know it? &c.] As soon as the news of their being settled in their own country comes to thy knowledge, thou wilt certainly make preparations to invade them.

Ver. 15. And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts.] See ver. 6.

Thou and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses, &c.] The character here given of this people, may properly be applied to the Turks, the chief strength of whose armies consists in their cavalry, and the great numbers of them which they bring into the field, as the writers of the Turkish history observe: compare Rev. ix. 16. which place several interpreters expound of the Turks. We may not improbably apply those words of the prophet Zechariah to the event here spoken of, xii. 4. "I will smite every horse with astonishment, and his rider with madness; and will open mine eyes upon the house of Judah."

Ver. 16. As a cloud to cover the land.] See ver. 9.

That the heathen may know me, &c.] This signal victory over Gog and his associates, shall be a means of bringing infidels to give glory unto me. (Compare xxxix. 21. and see the note upon xxxvi. 23.)

Ver. 17. Art thou he?] The words would be more significant if they were translated, Art thou not he? A sense which he the particle of interrogation often imports. (See the note upon xx. 4.)

Of whom I have spoken in old time by my servants the prophets, who have prophesied in those days many years.] Or, and years. The prophet is speaking here of some terrible enemy to God's people, who shall be subdued by the immediate hand of Heaven, which victory should make way for glorious times of peace and prosperity. This enemy is said to be foretold of old by the prophets; and is therefore probably described under the names of such nations as were the chief enemies to the Jews in the particular times of each prophet. Such we may suppose the Assyrian to be, spoken of by Isaiah, xiv. 24, 25. and by Micah, v. 5. The same enemy may probably be intended under the figure of Tyre; (see the note on xxviii. 24.) of Egypt; (see the note upon xxix. 21. and compare Isa. xi. 15. with Zech. x. 11.) of Moab; (see Isa. xxv. 10.) of Edom; (see Isa. xxxiv. 6. lxiii. 1. Joel iii. 20. Obad. ver. 18, 19.) and under the name of Leviathan, Isa. xxvii. 1. To these we may add those prophecies, which speak of some great and general destruction of God's enemies before the day of judgment, or consummation of all things. Such are Psal. cx. 5, 6. Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. xxxiv. 1, &c. lxvi. 16. Jer. xxx. 7. 10. Joel iii. 9. 14. Obad. ver. 15, &c. Zech. xii. 1. xiv. 1, &c. Zechariah lived, indeed, after Ezekiel's time, but a great while before the fulfilling of this prophecy. The expressions here used, of old time, and which prophesied in those days [and] years, plainly imply, that there was to be a succession of many ages between the publishing those prophecies and this event foretold by them; and therefore seem to look beyond the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, to which some expositors apply this place of Ezekiel. (See the note upon xxxix. 9.)

Ver. 18. My fury shall come up in my face.] An expression taken from human passions, which cause the blood to fly up into the face. So Isaiah describes Almighty God as burning with anger, his lips being full of indignation, and his tongue as a consuming fire, xxx. 27. (See the note upon that place.)

Ver. 19. For in the jealousy, and in the fire of my wrath, have I spoken.] See xxxvi. 5. xxxix. 25.

Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel.] Great changes and alterations in kingdoms and governments are expressed in Scripture by shaking of heaven and earth, the sea and the dry land, (see Hag. ii. 6, 7. 21, 22. Heb. xii. 26.) and by earthquakes, (Rev. vi. 12. xi. 13. xvi. 8.)

Ver. 20. So that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of heaven, &c.] Every part of the creation shall bear its share of this calamity, as if there were a convulsion of the whole frame of nature. (Compare Jer. iv. 24, &c. Hos. iv. 3.) The prophets often describe God's judgments upon particular countries or persons, as if it were a dissolution of the whole world, because his particular judgments are an earnest of the general judgment. (See his notes upon Isa. xiii. 10.)

And the mountains shall be thrown down, &c.] These expressions may probably be meant of walls, towers, and other fortifications, which are dismantled and demolished in the time of war. (Compare Jer. li. 25.)

Ver. 21. I will call for a sword against him.] I will appoint a sword to destroy him. (Compare xiv. 17.) God's decrees are expressed by his speaking the word, and giving out his command. So he is said to call for a dearth upon the land of Canaan, Psal. cv. 16.

Throughout all my mountains.] See ver. 8.

Every man's sword shall be against his brother.] God often destroys his enemies by intestine quarrels among themselves, and making them executioners of his judgments upon each other. (See 2 Chron. xx. 23. Judg. vii. 22. 1 Sam. xiv. 20.)

Ver. 22. I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood.] Or, I will plead with him, (See xx. 35.) God pleads with men by his judgments, which are a manifest token of the vengeance due to their sins. (See Isa. lxvi. 16. Jer. xxv. 31.) Pestilence is joined with blood here, as it is v. 17. xiv. 19. xxviii. 23.

And will rain upon him and his bands—an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone.] God shall as plainly shew himself in the destruction of these his enemies, as when he consumed Sodom and Gomorrah by fire and brimstone from heaven, (Gen. xix. 24.) and discomfited the armies of the Canaanites and Philistines by tempests of thunder and hail. (See Josh. x. 10. 1 Sam. vii. 10. compare Psal. xi. 6. Isa. xxix. 6. xxx. 30. and see xiii. 11. of this prophecy.)

Ver. 23. Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself, &c.] Compare ver. 16. and see the note upon xxxvi. 23.

CHAP. XXXIX.

See the Argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 1. O GOG, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal.] See xxxviii. 2.

Ver. 2. And I will turn thee back.] See ibid. ver. 4.

And leave but a sixth part of thee.] So the word shissha, or shissah, as it is read with a different termination, signifies, xlv. 13. Others render it, I will strike thee with six plagues, viz. those mentioned xxxviii. 22.

And I will cause thee to come up from the north parts, &c.] The words may be better translated, After I have caused thee to come up from the north parts, and have brought thee upon the mountains of Israel: see a like construction xxxviii. 4.

Ver. 3. And I will smite thy bow out of thy left hand, &c.] There shall be no might in thy hand, as Moses threatens the Israelites, Deut. xxviii. 32. Thou shalt not be able to use thy weapons to any purpose.

Ver. 4. I will give thee to the ravenous birds of every sort, &c.] See ver. 17. and xxxiii. 27.

Ver. 6. And I will send a fire on Magog.] I will consume him by fire and brimstone out of heaven. (See xxxviii. 22.) Fire doth likewise signify the fiercest of God's judgments. (See the note upon xxx. 8.)

And among them that dwell carelessly in the isles.] The inhabitants of the sea-coast which dwell securely, and think no harm can come upon them. The expression relates to the merchants of Tarshish, and others mentioned xxxviii. 13. All countries lying upon the sea-coast are called islands in the Hebrew language.

Ver. 7. So will I make my holy name known in the midst of my people Israel.] See ver. 21. and xxxviii. 16. 23.

And I will not let them pollute my holy name any more.] The words in the Hebrew run thus, I will not pollute my holy name any more; i. e. I will not suffer it to be polluted, as the verbs active often signify only permission. (See the note upon xiv. 9.) The sense is, I will not suffer my name to be dishonoured any more, nor let it be said among the heathen, that I was not able to rescue my people out of the hand of their enemies.

Ver. 8. Behold, it is come, and it is done, saith the Lord God.] The time appointed for this great destruction is come, and it is the last and finishing stroke of God's justice upon the enemies of his church and truth. (Compare Rev. xvi. 17. xxi. 6.)

This is the day whereof I have spoken.] By my servants the prophets, xxxviii. 17.

Ver. 9. And they that dwell in the cities of Israel shall go forth, and shall set on fire and burn the weapons, &c.] In token of an entire conquest, and that such a lasting peace should ensue that there should be no more need of warlike preparations. (Compare Psal. xlvi. 9.)

Seven years.] The burning the weapons of war must be the consequent of a complete victory: so that the seven years here mentioned cannot be meant, as some would understand them, of those terrible conflicts which the Jews had with Antiochus Epiphanes, from the 143d or 145th year of the æra Seleucidarum (according to the different computation of the beginning of that persecution; see 1 Macc. i. 20. 29.) to the 151st year of the same era, when Nicanor was slain. (1 Macc. vii. 1. 43.) Nor is that true which this opinion supposes, viz. that Nicanor's death put an end to the troubles of the Jews; for after that there was great affliction in Israel, the like whereof had not been since the time that a prophet had not been seen among them, as the same writer informs us, 1 Macc. ix. 27. So that this passage of Ezekiel's prophecy must necessarily be expounded of some other event.

Ver. 10. So that they shall take no wood out of the field, &c.] The quantity of these weapons will afford sufficient fuel for all that time.

They shall spoil those that spoiled them, and rob those that robbed them.] The same measure they dealt to others, shall be measured out to them again. (Compare Isa. xiv. 2. xxxiii. 1. Rev. xiii. 10. xviii. 6.)

Ver. 11. The valley of the passengers on the east side of the sea.] i. e. The sea of Gennezareth, as the Chaldee paraphrast explains it. In the Hebrew language all lakes are called by the name of seas. The same is called the eastern sea, (xlvii. 18.) to distinguish it from the Mediterranean, called the great sea westward, Josh. xxiii. 4. The valley near this sea or lake is called the valley of the passengers, because it was a great road by which the merchants and traders from Syria and other eastern countries went into Egypt.

And it shall stop the noses of the passengers.] Or, the passengers shall stop their noses, viz. to avoid the smell of so many carcasses: the transitive is often taken in a passive or impersonal sense, as hath been observed upon Isa. xliv. 18.

Ver. 13. Yea, all the people of the land shall bury them.] See the note on the following verse.

And it shall be to them a renown, the day that I shall be glorified.] Or, the day that I shall be glorified, shall be to them [a day] of renown; i. e. a remarkable day of joy and gladness. (See ver. 21, 22.)

Ver. 14. And they shall sever out men of continual employment, passing through the land, to bury with the passengers those that remain upon the face of the earth.] The latter part of the sentence may more clearly be translated thus, even buriers with the passengers, [to bury] those that remain, &c. For the passengers or searchers are distinguished from those whose office it is to bury the dead, in the following verse.

After the end of seven months shall they search.] All the people shall be employed seven months in burying the dead, (ver. 13.) and after they are ended, particular persons appointed for that purpose, shall make a clear riddance.

Ver. 15. Then shall he set up a sign by it.] A stone or some other mark of distinction, that men may avoid passing over them. (See the Excerpta out of Dr. Pocock's Miscellany Notes, in the Synopsis upon Luke xi. 44.) [And also the name of the city shall be Hamonah.] This is probably meant of a city that should be afterward built near this valley, and called Hamonah, signifying a multitude, to perpetuate the memory of such a transaction.

Ver. 17. Speak to every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field, &c.] It was the custom for persons that offered sacrifice to invite their friends to the feast that was made of the remainder. (See Gen. xxxiv. 54. 1 Sam. ix. 13.) So here the prophet, by God's command, invites the beasts and fowls to partake of the sacrifice of his enemies slain.

Gather yourselves to my sacrifice, that I do sacrifice for you.] The slaughter of God's enemies is called a sacrifice, because it is offered up as an atonement to the Divine justice. (Compare this verse with Isa. xxxiv. 6. Zeph. i. 7. Rev. xix. 17.)

Upon the mountains of Israel.] Where this great army was to be destroyed. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 18. Of rams, of lambs, of goats, of bullocks.] Of all ranks and kinds, who shall be brought like beasts to the slaughter. (Compare Psal. lxviii. 31. Isa. xxxiv. 6. Jer. l. 27. li. 40.)

All of them fatlings of Bashan.] See Deut. xxxii. 14.

Ver. 19. And drink blood till ye be drunken.] Or be filled, or satiated; for so the Hebrew ravah usually signifies: (see Cantic. v. 1. Jer. xxxi. 14. 25. Hag. i. 6.) and the Greek verb Μεθύω is taken in the same sense, John ii. 10. and so I conceive it should be understood, 1 Cor. xi. 21. where the apostle, reproving the abuse of their love-feasts, saith, One is hungry, and another drinks, or fills himself to the full.

Ver. 20. Thus shall ye be filled at my table.] The feast made upon the peace-offerings, or sacrifices of thanksgiving, is properly called the table of the Lord. (See Mal. i. 12.) From whence the expression is applied to the feast of the Lord's supper, 1 Cor. x. 21.

Ver. 21. And I will set my glory among the heathen, &c.] See xxxviii. 16. 23.

Ver. 22. So the house of Israel shall know that I am the Lord their God, &c.] Both by my acts of mercy in returning their captivity, (see ver. 28, 29.) and by my judgments executed upon their enemies.

Ver. 23, 24. And the heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity, &c.] They were not carried away by their enemies, because I wanted power to rescue them, but as a just punishment of their sins. (See xxxvi. 18—20.)

Ver. 25. Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob.] See xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24. xxxvii. 21.

And have mercy upon the whole house of Israel.] See xx. 40.

Ver. 29. Neither will I hide my face any more from them.] I will never withdraw my favour or protection from them. (See Isa. liv. 8.)

For I have poured out my Spirit upon the house of Israel.] There will be a new effusion of God's Spirit upon the Jews, in order to their conversion: see Isa. lix. 20, 21. a place applied by St. Paul to this very purpose, Rom. xi. 26, 27. (Compare likewise Zech. xii. 10. and xi. 19. xxxvi. 27. of this prophecy.)

CHAP. XL.

ARGUMENT.

The general Argument to the following chapter.

God having forsaken the city and temple of Jerusalem, and given them up to destruction, for the idolatries and other sins committed there: in this and the following chapters, he sheweth to the prophet, in vision, the model or plan of another temple, of the same dimensions with that built by Solomon; as Villalpandus, and other learned men, with great probability, suppose. David had the pattern of that temple, which Solomon was to build, revealed to him by God: (see 1 Chron. xxviii. 11. 19.) as Moses had the model of the tabernacle represented to him by a vision, while he was in the mount, (Exod. xxv. 40.) And here the plan of Solomon's temple is again discovered to Ezekiel, who, foretelling the destruction of this temple by the Chaldeans, shews how highly it was valued by the Jews, when he calls it, The excellency of their strength, and the desire of their eyes, (xxiv. 21.) They looked upon it as the honour, glory, and safeguard of their nation. This lying in ruins at the time of this vision, the Jews had need of being comforted, instructed, and humbled upon that occasion; they would not have cared for the thoughts of returning home, were there no promise made of restoring the temple, as well as their commonwealth; the temple being the pledge of God's presence among them. Moses's ritual law would soon have been adapted to the manners of the gentiles, where they lived, if the expectations of a new temple, to which most of its rites were fitted, had not restrained their propensity to idolatry; and they would have been dispirited beyond measure, as they were afterward, upon sight of their second temple, if the prophet had plainly foretold, that their new temple should fall short of the glory of the old one: they were therefore to be encouraged to the observation of their law, with the hopes of returning to rebuild their temple, which should be finished after the plan of that of Solomon.

We cannot suppose any exact model of Solomon's temple remaining, which might be transmitted to those that returned from the captivity; for it was above seventy years from the destruction of the first temple to the finishing of the second, in the sixth year of Darius, (Ezra vi. 15.) During which interval, the ancient priests must be all dead; and those that were younger could have but confused and very imperfect ideas of it. To direct them, therefore, in the dimensions, parts, order, and rules of their new temple, is one reason why Ezekiel is so particular in the description of the old. And, no doubt, but Zerubbabel's temple was accordingly conformable to that of Solomon, in figure, disposition of parts, and order of the whole fabric and service. If in state or magnificence there was some variety, that is to be imputed to the necessity of their circumstances, and doth not imply any essential alteration.

However, the building being found inferior to the model here prescribed, the first discovery of which was a sensible mortification to the ancient men that had seen the first temple, (Ezra iii. 12.) it was natural for the Jews of former ages, that studied the style of prophecy, to conclude, as many of the Jewish writers of later times have done, that Ezekiel's temple had a farther view, and the chief intent and design of it was that to be fulfilled under the Messias. Whatever was august and illustrious in the prophetic figures, and not literally fulfilled in or near their own times, those things were justly thought to belong to the days of the Messias; but as for minuter circumstances, there is no more necessity of giving them a place in the spiritual application of a prophecy, than in the explication of a parable. The temple, and the temple-worship, was a proper figure of Christ's church, and of the spiritual worship to be instituted by him: and the notions of the Jews were to be raised by degrees to a farther and higher meaning, hereafter to be completed, without destroying their obligations to the statutes and ordinances God enjoined for the present.

There was the more reason for Ezekiel's keeping to the figure of Solomon's temple, in speaking of the times of the Messias, because Solomon was a type of the Messias chiefly in this respect, that he was to build a house for the name and worship of God, according to Nathan's prophecy concerning him, (2 Sam. vii. 13, 14.) several parts of which prophecy are applied to Christ in the New Testament: (see Heb. i. 5. Luke i. 32.) this exposition of that place receives a farther confirmation from hence, that other prophets foretell the same thing concerning the Messias. Beside those passages in Ezekiel, which are under our present consideration, Zechary after him prophesied that the man whose name is the BRANCH shall build the temple of the Lord; and bear the glory, and sit and rule upon his throne, and shall be a priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both; i. e. between the kingdom and the priesthood; the same person shall be both king and priest, and his offices shall not interfere with, or obstruct each other. (Zech. vi. 12, 13.)

The New Testament copies the style of the old: St. Paul, in his Epistles, calls the Christian church by the name of the house or temple of God, (see 1 Cor. iii. 16. 2 Cor. vi. 16. Eph. ii. 20, &c. 1 Tim. iii. 15. Heb. iii. 6.) In pursuance of the same metaphor he tells us, that antichrist shall sit in the temple of God, meaning the Christian church, (2 Thess. ii. 4.) And St. John in the Revelation not only describes the heavenly sanctuary by representations taken from the Jewish temple, (Rev. xi. 19. xiv. 17. xv. 5. 8.) but likewise transcribes several of Ezekiel's expressions, (Rev. iv. 2, 3. 6. xi. 1, 2. xxi. 12, &c. xxii. 1, 2.) and borrows his allusions from the state of the temple, as it was built by Solomon, not as it stood in our Saviour's time; as if the former had a more immediate reference to the times of the gospel. Thus, Rev. iv. 1, &c. the throne of God is represented like that over the ark, where the Schechinah or Divine Glory sat, encompassed with four cherubims [see the note upon ver. 6. of the first chapter], and with the seats of four-and-twenty elders, alluding to the heads of so many priestly courses. All these ornaments were proper to the first temple, as it was finished by Solomon; whereas in the second temple there was no proper ark, no throne encompassed by cherubims, no visible glory; and but four of the four-and-twenty courses of the priests returned from Babylon. (See Ezra ii. 36. 39.)

Upon the whole we may conclude, that the general scope of Ezekiel's temple is, by giving a promise of restoring Solomon's, to preserve the Jews from defiling themselves with idolatry during their captivity; and when the time of that should be expired, to encourage them to go home, and rebuild their temple, and observe the laws and ordinances prescribed by Moses, for performing God's worship there, which yet was never to be equal to Solomon's in every respect, before the Messias should come, who should supply its deficiencies, and whose church should resemble Solomon's temple in symmetry and beauty, in firmness and duration, in a regular, orderly, and decent worship of the true God, and in the manifestation of the Divine presence, at first by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, and ever since by the inward assistances, comforts, and protection of the same Spirit.

The fortieth chapter contains a description of the two outward courts, with the chambers thereto belonging, together with the porch of the temple.

Ver. 1. IN the five-and-twentieth year of our captivity.] See the note upon i. 2.

In the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month.] i. e. The first month, called here the beginning of the year, which in the ecclesiastical computation was the month Nisan. The word month likewise taken indefinitely signifies the first month, xxvi. 1.

In the fourteenth year after that the city was smitten.] Zedekiah's reign commenced from Jehoiachin's captivity, in the eleventh year of whose reign the city was destroyed, (Jer. lii. 5, 6.) So the fourteenth year after the destruction of the city must be coincident with the twenty-fifth of Jehoiachin's captivity.

The hand of the Lord was upon me.] See i. 3.

Ver. 2. In the visions of God brought he me into the land of Israel.] See the note upon viii. 3.

And set me upon a very high mountain.] The expression points out Mount Moriah, whereon the temple was built, which is here called a very high mountain; because it represents the seat of the Christian church, foretold by the prophets that it should be established upon the top of the mountains. (See Isa. ii. 1. Micah iv. 1. compared with Rev. xxi. 10.)

By which was a frame of a city on the south.] Mount Moriah lay southward of the hill of Zion, or the city of David, though both of them lay northward in respect of the lower part of the city, which from the times of Solomon was most commonly called by the name of Jerusalem. (See Psal. xlviii. 2. Isa. xiv. 13. and Dr. Lightfoot's Geographical Description of Jerusalem, chap. 22.) So the words describe the situation of the temple on the south side of Mount Zion; which with all its courts, buildings, and walls encompassing the courts, and the whole area, or holy mountain, (see xlii. 20.) resembled a city for bigness. So Tacitus (lib. v. Hist.) describes the temple as built like a citadel for strength and largeness.

Or we may suppose that the prophet being brought by the Spirit from Chaldea into the land of Israel, which lay southward of Babylon, (see i. 4.) might see placed just before his eyes a representation of the city and temple, standing upon an eminence, both in respect of their natural situation, and that the prophet might take a better view of them: for it appears from xlviii. 15, &c. that he had a view of the holy city which was to be restored, as well as of the temple.

Ver. 3. Behold, there was a man, whose appearance was like the appearance of brass.] Or burnished or polished brass, as we read i. 7. Dan. x. 6. that is, of a bright or flaming colour. This seems to be an inferior angel, because he is distinguished from the Divine Glory, or the Logos appearing in the Schechinah, xliii. 6. (Compare ix. 3.)

With a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring-reed.] The use of the line was to measure the land of Israel, and of the reed, to take the dimensions of the buildings in and about the temple; as also to set out several portions of land belonging to the sanctuary and city, to the prince and people. (See xlv. 1, &c. xlvii. 3, &c.)

And he stood in the gate.] Probably the north gate, being the first entrance the prophet may be supposed to have arrived to, as he came from Chaldea, which lay northward of Judea. (See the note upon ver. 2.)

Ver. 4. Son of man.] See the note upon ii. 1.

Behold with thine eyes—declare all thou seest to the house of Israel.] Compare xliii. 10. xliv. 5. The temple now represented, was partly designed to assure the people that their temple should be restored, and to serve them partly as a model, by which they should rebuild it at their return from captivity. The Jewish writers do confirm this opinion, when they tell us, "That the children of the captivity, who returned from Babylon, followed the platform of that temple, which Ezekiel described, as far as their circumstances would allow." (See Dr. Lightfoot's Description of the Temple, chap. 10.)

Ver. 5. And behold a wall on the outside of the house round about.] A wall went round the whole compass or square of the holy mountain whereon the temple was situate, to separate the holy ground from that which was profane. (See xlii. 20.)

And in the man's hand a measuring-reed of six cubits long, by the cubit and a hand-breadth.] The prophet explains what sort of cubit he means in the following delineation of the temple; viz. such a one as consists of six hand-breadths, or one hand-breadth over the cubit used in Chaldee, where he now lived. (Compare xli. 8. xliii. 13.) This is the measure of a Scripture cubit, generally agreed to be equivalent to eighteen inches, or a foot and a half of our measure. (See Bishop Cumberland, of Scripture Weights and Measures, p. 36, &c.)

So he measured the breadth of the building, one reed; and the height, one reed.] The breadth or thickness of the wall was equal to the height of it.

Ver. 6. Then he came unto the gate which looketh towards the east.] The temple being placed towards the west part of the holy mountain, as the sanctuary was at the west end of the temple, (see the note upon viii. 16.) this was the first gate that led to it. This gate opened into the first court, or the court of the people; (see ver. 19.) and is called the king's gate, 1 Chron. ix. 18. as being built by king Solomon.

And went up the stairs thereof.] Which consisted of seven steps, as the Septuagint expressly mentioned. (Compare ver. 22. 26.)

And measured the [one] threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad, and the other threshold, &c.] He went up the stairs, that he might more easily measure the upper lintel, as well as the lower threshold. The word saph, translated threshold, signifies the lintel, or upper part of the door-case, as well as the threshold properly so called, or lower part of it. The plural sippim comprehends both; see xli. 16. Isa. vi. 4. and the Septuagint translate it there ὑπέρθυρον, the lintel. Some understand the word here of the two side-posts, in which sense it is used, Amos ix. 1.

Ver. 7. And every little chamber was one reed long, and one reed broad, &c.] Along the wall of the porch were chambers, three on each side, ver. 10. These the angel measured, and they were of equal dimensions, each one reed square, with a passage of five cubits' breadth between them.

And the threshold of the gate, by the porch of the gate within, was one reed.] The inward threshold at the farther end of the porch looking into the first court, was of the same size with the outward one, ver. 6. (Compare ver. 15.)

Ver. 8. He measured also the porch of the gate within, one reed.] Or, He even measured, &c. for the words seem to be a repetition of what was said in the latter part of the seventh verse; so the Vulgar Latin understood it, and therefore omits the whole verse: and the Septuagint in the Alexandrian copy, published by Dr. Grabe, join the two verses in sense together. (See the like repetitions, ver. 11, 12. 16. xli. 11.)

Ver. 9. Then measured he the porch of the gate, eight cubits, &c.] This was a portico beyond the little chambers, which looked inward, i. e. into the first court: it was eight cubits wide, and the two side-posts were two cubits thick, which made up the ten cubits mentioned ver. 11. The word ael, translated post, is the same in sense with mezuzah, (xlv. 19.) which properly signifies the side-post that supports the lintel. (See Exod. xii. 22.)

Ver. 10. And the little chambers of the gate eastward, &c.] Or, The little chambers of the eastern gate, which he has been hitherto describing; and the form of which is here repeated. These rooms were for the use of the porters that took care of the several gates that led to the temple. (See 1 Chron. ix. 18. 23, 24. xxvi. 12, 13. 18.)

And the posts had one measure on this side and on that side.] The side-posts, or fronts of the doors, belonging to each row of chambers, were of the same size.

Ver. 11. And he measured the breadth of the entry of the gate, ten cubits.] See ver. 9.

And the length of the gate, thirteen cubits.] By the length of the gate, Villalpandus understands the height, which he supposes to have been two reeds, or twelve cubits and a half high; for he reckons every reed to consist of six ordinary cubits, and a fourth part over, which, in the common computation of full numbers for fractions, may be called thirteen cubits. Bern. L'Amy, in his book De Tabernaculo Fœderis, explains the expression of the breadth of the walls on each side of the gate, which he supposes to be six cubits and a half: and so the LXX. interpreters may be thought to understand the words, who translate the Hebrew oreb by Εὖρος, breadth.

Ver. 12. The place also before the chambers was one cubit on this side, and—on that side.] There was a border, or a rail, which enclosed a cubit's space before each chamber.

And the little chambers were six cubits on this side, &c.] See ver. 7.

Ver. 13. He measured then the gate from the roof of one little chamber to the roof of another: the breadth was five and-twenty cubits.] Measuring the arch of the gate from north to south, it was in breadth five-and-twenty cubits; which L'Amy thus computes,—the breadth of the gate ten cubits, the breadth of both the side-walls thirteen cubits, and two cubits for the space or border on each of the side-chambers; ver. 12.

Door against door.] The door to each chamber exactly answered the door on the opposite side.

Ver. 14. He made also posts of threescore cubits.] The angel described or made a delineation of the height of the columns or pillars, which were to support the rooms or stories over the arch of the gate, and these were in height sixty cubits: the whole building being divided into three stories, like those described xliii. 6. The height of each story is thus computed by Villalpandus: (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 16.) That the pillars of the lower story were twenty cubits high; those of the second fifteen; and the uppermost twelve; the remainder being allowed for floors and the roof. The word posts in this verse signifies pillars. (Compare xlii. 6.)

Even unto the posts of the court round about the gate.] Villalpandus, and several interpreters, suppose there is an ellipsis in the words, which they thus supply: And there was one measure to the pillars of the court, and of the gate round about; which makes the sense run plain and easy: compare xli. 9. where there is the same ellipsis.

Ver. 15. And from the face of the gate of the entrance unto the face of the inner gate were fifty cubits.] The whole length of the porch, from the outward front (compare xli. 21. 25.) unto the inner side, which looks into the first court, (ver. 17.) was fifty cubits; which may be thus computed: twelve cubits for the thickness of the wall at each end, (ver. 6.) eighteen for the three chambers on each side, (ver. 7.) and ten cubits for the spaces between the chambers: allowing the same space between the chambers on each side, and the two walls, (ibid.) Villalpandus observes the just proportion between the breadth and length of the gate; the length being double to the breadth, (ver. 13.) The same he tells us was observed between the breadth of the cloisters of the outward court, which was fifty cubits; and the contents of the whole area, which was a hundred. (See the note on ver. 18.)

Ver. 16. And there were narrow windows to the little chambers, and to their posts within the gate round about.] Every one of these little chambers (ver. 7.) had a narrow window to it, towards the inside of the gate, where the passage was; and so there was over the side-posts or fronts, placed at the entrance of every chamber. By narrow or closed windows, some understand windows with lattice-work, to let in the light: but the phrase seems equivalent to that which is more fully expressed, 1 Kings vi. 4. by open and narrow windows; i. e. as the margin of our Bibles doth very well explain it, broad within [to disperse the light] and narrow without.

And likewise to the arches.] By windows to the arches, Villalpandus understands the stone itself wrought into figures of net-work, and made in the shape of a lattice. The word translated arches, doth likewise signify a porch, or entrance, and so the Vulgar Latin here translates it; and then the sense is, that there were windows over every door: compare ver. 31. 34. with ver. 37. where the same sense is expressed in the two former verses, by arches, aelamo in the Hebrew; and in the latter, by posts, or fronts, aelau.

And the windows were round about inward.] A repetition of what was said in the former part of the verse. (See ver. 10.)

And upon each post were palm-trees.] A palm-tree was carved upon the chapiter of each side-post, or front. (See ver. 26.)

Ver. 17. Then brought he me into the outward court.] There were two courts belonging to Solomon's temple; the outward for the people, the inward for the priests. It is probable, that Solomon built only the inner court; (see 1 Kings vi. 36. compared with viii. 64.) and that the outer court was built after his time, whereupon it is called the new court, 2 Chron. xx. 5. After which time, there is particular mention of the two courts of the house of the Lord, 2 Kings xxi. 5. A third court, called the court of the gentiles, was afterward added by Herod, when he rebuilt the temple.

The great court, mentioned 2 Chron. iv. 9. as distinct from the court of the priests, Dr. Lightfoot explains of the holy mountain, or area, where the temple stood, which Solomon enclosed with a wall, and separated it from common ground; so that text, 1 Kings vii. 12. The great court round about was with three rows of hewed stones, &c. is to be understood only of this enclosure, according to his opinion. (See his Description of the Temple, chap. 10. 18.)

And, lo, there were chambers, and a pavement made for the court round about.] These chambers were over the cloister, and supported by it. (See ver. 14. and xlii. 8.) They might be for the use of the priests; and likewise to be store-houses for tithes and offerings. (See 1 Chron. xxviii. 12.)

Thirty chambers were upon the pavement.] The number of them Villalpandus thus divides:—towards the east and west, seven on a side, answering one another; on the north and south sides, eight a-piece, abating one chamber, both on the east and west side, for the thickness of the walls or arches which supported those two gates, which he supposes to be higher than the north and south gates.

Ver. 18. And the pavement by the sides of the gates, over against [or equal to] the length of the gates, was the lower pavement.] The breadth of this pavement, that lay on the side of the gate, was equal to the length of the whole porch or gate, which was fifty cubits, ver. 15. This will plainly appear, if we consider, that the area of the outward court contained a hundred cubits, ver. 19. So the porticoes, or cloisters, cutting the area in right angles, by the gate placed in the middle of the court, the pavement belonging to each side of the gate, or cloister, must be just half that dimension, viz. fifty cubits. The word gates, in the plural number, seems to be used for the singular, as it implies the whole building, consisting of upper rooms, as well as the lower passage. (See the note upon ver. 14.) The word leummah, which our translation renders over against, often signifies equal, answerable, or the same proportion; (see Noldius, p. 525.) and so it is used i. 20. iii. 8. xlv. 7. xlviii. 13, &c. This was called the lower pavement, in respect of the several ascents which were still to go up, the nearer you came to the temple. (See Dr. Lightfoot's Description of the Temple, chap. 20.) Villalpandus explains the lower pavement by way of distinction to the upper rooms, or chambers, placed over them, for the use of the priests, or as store-rooms for the service of the temple.

Ver. 19. Then he measured the breadth, from the fore-front of the lower gate unto the fore-front of the inner gate without, a hundred cubits eastward.] That is, unto the hither side of the gate which faced the inner court. He measured the whole space of ground between the west front of the lower gate to the front of the upper gate, which leads into the eastern inner court, and found it a hundred cubits; the same was the space between the south front and north front: so the court was exactly square. (See ver. 23. 27. 47.) The expression is elliptical; as if he had said, there were a hundred cubits from west to east, and from north to south. There were two gates belonging to the porch, or passage, that led to the inner court; the first was eastward looking towards the outer court, which is here meant; the other looked westward into the inner court. The gate at the east end of the outer court is called the lower gate, for the same reason as the pavement is called the lower pavement, ver. 18. because there was still an ascent, as you went from one court to the other. The expression of the inner gate without, is explained in the note upon xlvi. 2.

Northward.] The Septuagint join this word to the following verse, and render the sentence thus; And he brought me to the north, and behold the gate looking to the north in the outer court.

Villalpandus explains the nineteenth verse to this sense; That the outward court consisted of seven squares, a hundred cubits each; the first placed directly before the court of the priests, and of the same dimensions with it; the others extended on the north and south sides of the outer court, and likewise commensurate with the sides both of the inner court and of the temple, each of which contained one hundred cubits. By which description it must contain a square of three hundred cubits on the east part, and two hundred cubits both on the north and south side. (Consult Villalpandus's Delineation of the Temple.)

Ver. 20, 21. And the gate of the outward court that looketh towards the north—and the little chambers thereof, &c.] The whole model was the same with that of the east gate. (See ver. 9, 10. 13. 15, 16.)

Ver. 22. And they went up into it by seven steps.] See ver. 6.

And the arches thereof were before them.] Or, at the entrance of them. The Septuagint render the word liphni, before them, as if it meant the same with el penemith, within, or inward, (xlii. 4.) This sense is followed by most expositors, to denote that the arches were within, or at the top of the stairs; but the phrase may probably mean the same with nal penehem, suitable to them; i. e. to those of the east gate. (See the following note.)

Ver. 23. And the gate of the inner court was over against the gate towards the north, and towards the east.] The words might be translated more plainly thus; And the gate of the inner court was proportionable, or answerable, to the gate that was towards the north and towards the east. The expression is elliptical, as that of ver. 19. and the full import of it is, that the north gate of the inner court did exactly answer this north gate of the outer court, described ver. 20. 22. And in like manner the east gate of the inner court answered the east gate of the outward court. The word neged, translated over against, signifies here suitable, or proportionable; in which sense it is used xli. 16. Gen. ii. 18. I will make him a help, kenegdho, suitable to him: so an equivalent expression, nal penehem, before them, is used in describing the house which Solomon built, 1 Kings vii. 6. where our margin expresses the sense very properly The porch was according to them; i. e. answerable to them, or of the same proportion with them. (See the note upon xli. 4.) So the Greek preposition κατέναντι may most properly be understood, Rom. iv. 17. Κατέναντι οὗ ἐπίστευσε Θεοῦ, not before, but like unto him whom he believed, even God; to this sense, That Abraham is a father of many nations, in like manner as the God in whom he believed, is the Father of gentiles as well as Jews; as it is said in the foregoing chapter, ver. 29.

Ver. 24—26. After that he brought me towards the south, &c.] The twenty-third verse is to be read in a parenthesis, where the prophet having shewed the exact correspondence between the gates of both courts, he proceeds in the three following verses to describe the south gate of the outer court, by the same dimensions he had before given of the east and north gate. He takes no notice of the western gate of the outer court, because it joined to the eastern gate of the inner court, which he describes ver. 32.

Ver. 27. And there was a gate in the inner court towards the south.] The south gate in the inner court was exactly parallel to the south gate in the outer. (See ver. 23.)

And he measured from gate to gate a hundred cubits.] See ver. 19. 23. 47.

Ver. 27, 28. And there was a gate in the inner court towards the south.—And he brought me to the inner court by the south gate.] Villalpandus, and those of his opinion, who maintain, that the outer court enclosed the inner on the east, north, and south sides, explain these words to this sense; That the prophet was conducted from the south gate of the outer court (ver. 24.) to the south gate of the inner court, which was over against it, and so into the inner court itself.

Ver. 28, 29. And he brought me to the inner court towards the south, &c.] After he had measured the inner court, he took the dimensions of the south gate itself, and the chambers thereto belonging, and found them of the same dimensions with the former.

Ver. 30. And the arches round about were five-and-twenty cubits long, and five cubits broad.] Length is here taken for height, as before, ver. 11. The words express the dimensions of those arches, which were between the several little chambers, between each of which there was the space of five cubits, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 31. And the arches thereof were towards the outer court.] Or, were like [those of] the outer court; for the preposition el is sometimes taken in this sense. (See Noldius, p. 63.) If we understand it according to the common interpretation, that the arches or fronts (see the note on ver. 16.) of the inner court looked towards the outer, it is a confirmation of Villalpandus's opinion, that the outer court surrounded the inner. (See the note upon ver. 19.)

And the going up to it had eight steps.] Whereas in the outer court the ascent had but seven. (Ver. 22. 26.) The fifteen Psalms, from the hundred and twentieth forward, called Songs of Degrees, or Ascents, are supposed to have been sung upon some of these steps, or ascents.

Ver. 32—37. And he brought me into the inner court towards the east, &c.—And he brought me to the north gate, &c.] The east and north gate had the same dimensions with the south gate, described ver. 28, 29. 31.

Ver. 34. And the arches thereof.] What is expressed here by arches, is signified by posts, or fronts, ver. 37. (See the notes upon ver. 10. 16.)

Ver. 38. And the chambers, and the entries thereof, were by the posts of the gate, where they washed the burnt-offering.] The chambers mentioned ver. 36. were near the entrance of the north gate, where they washed the legs and entrails of the burnt-offering, and marble tables were placed there for that purpose. See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, chap. 35. According to this exposition, the word gates stands for the singular number, as ver. 18. But that learned author observes in the same chapter, that they washed the sacrifices on the south side of the court of the priests, as well as on the north side, when the sacrifices were more numerous than the north side could well contain; so he understands the word gates as comprehending both north and south gate; and confirms this interpretation from the placing of the lavers, which were designed for that use, and were set five on the right side of the house, and five on the left, (1 Kings vii. 39.)

Ver. 39, 40. In the porch of the gate were two tables on this side, and two tables on that side, &c.] Those expositors, who by the word gates in the foregoing verse understand both the north and south gates, render the sense of these two verses perspicuously thus: In the porch of one gate (viz. that on the south) were two tables on this side, and two tables on that side, &c. And at the outer side of the step of the entry of the north gate were two tables: which interpretation agrees very well with what follows, ver. 41. Four tables were on this side, and four tables on that side. But they that understand these verses to be only a description of the north gate (on which side of the altar the sacrifices were commonly killed), suppose that two tables were on each side, as you came into the porch of that gate, and two on each side of the inner part of the gate that looked towards the altar.

Ver. 39. The sin-offering, and the trespass-offering.] It is no easy matter to ascertain the difference between a sin-offering and a trespass-offering. Dr. Outram (lib. i. cap. 13. de Sacrificiis) is of opinion, that a trespass-offering implied an injury done to another, as well as a breach of God's law. Dr. Lightfoot hath accurately related the sense of the Jewish writers upon this subject, in his Temple Service, chap. 8. sect. 2, 3.

Ver. 43. Within were hooks, a hand broad, fastened round about.] Within the gate or entrance on the north side of the inner court, were iron hooks, for the hanging up the beasts that were to be sacrificed, in order to the flaying off their skins. (See Dr. Lightfoot's Description of the Temple, chap. 35.)

And upon the tables was the flesh of the offering.] Or, they laid the flesh of the offering. Upon those marble tables the priests laid the flesh of the slain beasts, and there cut it in pieces, and fitted it for laying upon the altar. (See Lev. i. 6.)

Ver. 44. And without the inner gate were the chambers of the singers of the inner court.] On the farther side of the inner gate, as you come into the inner court, (compare ver. 40.) were the chambers of the singers, who constantly attended upon the service of the temple. (See 1 Chron. vi. 31, 32.)

Which was on the side of the north gate; and their prospect was towards the south.] These chambers were placed at the north-east corner of the inner court, and so had their prospect towards the south.

One at the side of the east gate, having the prospect towards the south.] They had likewise chambers on the south-east corner of that court, which had the prospect towards the north.

The copies which the Septuagint followed, read this verse to a clearer and better sense thus: And he brought me into the inner court, and, behold, there were two chambers; one on the side of the north gate, looking towards the south; and the other on the side of the south gate, looking towards the north.

Ver. 45. This chamber, whose prospect is towards the south, is for the priests, &c.] The word chamber may stand for chambers in the plural, (as side-chamber doth, xli. 5. 9.) and signify a row of buildings on the north side of the inner court, distinct from the chambers of the singers, (ver. 44.) and designed for the use of the priests, who were in constant attendance, according to their courses, upon the service of the temple. (See Numb. xviii. 5. 1 Chron. vi. 49. 2 Chron. xiii. 11.)

The keepers of the charge of the house.] They took care of the holy vessels, and kept constant watch and ward (as the word mishmereth properly signifies) about the temple. (See 1 Chron. ix. 23. Psal. cxxxiv. 1.) The word priests may include Levites under it, as Levites elsewhere comprehends priests. (See xliv. 10. xlviii. 11.)

Ver. 46. And the chamber whose prospect is towards the north is for the priests and keepers of the charge of the altar.] Another row of chambers on the south side of the inner court is for the descendants of the family of Aaron, whose office it is to attend upon the service of the altar, and keep the fire burning thereon perpetually, (Lev. vi. 12, 13.)

These are the sons of Zadok, among the sons of Levi.] To the eldest house of the sons of Aaron the high-priesthood belonged; so that office of right belonged to Zadok, though the family of Ithamar usurped it for some time, from Eli, who was high-priest in Samuel's time, to Abiathar, whom Solomon dispossessed, and restored the high-priesthood to the right line, by placing Zadok in his room, (1 Kings ii. 27. 35.) The family of Zadok is only taken notice of in this vision, it may be for this reason, because they kept close to the worship of God, when the priest of Ithamar's line forsook it, and fell into idolatry. (See xliv. 15.) And the eldest son of Zadok's family having an unquestionable title to the high-priesthood, (see Numb. xxv. 13.) upon that account was an eminent type of the Messias, the eternal High-priest. (See Numb. xxxv. 25. 28.)

Ver. 47. And he measured the court, a hundred cubits long, and a hundred cubits broad, four-square.] The inner court was of the same dimensions with the outer. (See ver. 19. 23. 27.)

And the altar that was before the house.] Or rather, and the altar was before the house; i. e. stood in the inner court just before the porch that opened into the temple. The altar was now measured; the measure of it being described afterward, xliii. 13, &c.

Ver. 48. And measured each post of the porch, five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side.] By the posts are meant the side-posts or columns on each side of the door of entrance. (See ver. 9.) These were measured to be five cubits thick, both on the north and south sides.

And the breadth of the gate was three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side.] By the breadth of the gate, Villalpandus understands the space of the wall on each side, from the entrance itself to the two corners: (compare xli. 3.) which, supposing with the text here to take up six cubits, and the entrance of the porch to be fourteen cubits, both those dimensions make up the length of the porch to be twenty cubits, from north to south, according to the measure set down in the following verse. This interpretation is countenanced by the Septuagint, who translate the latter part of the verse thus: And the breadth of the gate fourteen cubits; and the sides of the gate of the porch three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side.

Ver. 49. The length of the porch was twenty cubits.] The same length with the porch of Solomon's temple, 1 Kings vi. 3. which being there said to be of the same measure with the breadth of the house, must be understood of its dimensions from north to south.

And the breadth eleven cubits.] The porch in Solomon's temple was but ten cubits in breadth: (1 Kings vi. 3.) the length of such buildings being commonly double to the breadth. (See ver. 13. 15. 21. 25. 33. and 36. of this chapter, and xli. 2.) Some copies of the LXX. read ten cubits; and L'Amy conjectures that was the ancient reading in the Hebrew. St. Jerome, upon the place, suspects there might be a mistake in the Hebrew copy, though the emendation he offers doth not at all render the sense clearer.

Villalpandus supposes the breadth of the porch to be ten cubits and a half; (see the note on ver. 11.) which, putting an entire number in the room of a fraction, may be accounted eleven.

And he brought me by the steps whereby they went up to it.] The ascent was by eight steps, according to the Vulgar Latin; the same number which belonged to the several entrances into the inner court. (See ver. 31. 34. 37.) The copies of the LXX. read ten steps.

And there were pillars by the posts.] By the side-posts of the door, or entrance; (see ver. 48.) like those erected in Solomon's temple, called Jachin and Boaz, 1 Kings vii. 21. which were set up before the temple, as it is expressed 2 Chron. iii. 17.

CHAP. XLI.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter contains a description of the measures, parts, chambers, and ornaments, of the temple itself.

Ver. 1. AFTERWARD he brought me to the temple, and measured the posts, six cubits broad on one side, and six cubits broad on the other side, which was the breadth of the tabernacle.] By the posts are meant the piers or door-cases on each side of the entrance: (see xl. 9. 48.) these were six cubits thick on the north and south sides. Rochob, translated breadth, sometimes signifies thickness: (see ver. 9. 12. of this chapter, and xl. 5.) the same thickness had the upper lintel over the door; for so Villalpandus rightly explains the Hebrew word ohel, which we render tabernacle. That word sometimes signifies a covering, and so it is rendered by our translators, Exod. xxvi. 7. and is to be understood in the same sense, Exod. xxxvi. 14. where our English reads, For a tent over the tabernacle; but it should be translated, For a covering over the tabernacle; to which sense the LXX. translate it in both places. In this signification it may not be unfitly applied to the upper lintel, which is a kind of covering to the door; and thus it is generally understood by the rabbins upon this place.

Ver. 2. And the breadth of the door was ten cubits; and the sides of the door were five cubits on this side, and five cubits on the other side.] The entrance itself being ten cubits broad, and the wall on each side five cubits, makes the breadth of the house itself to be just twenty cubits, as it is expressed in the latter part of the verse, which was the same in Solomon's temple, 1 Kings vi. 2.

And he measured the length thereof, forty cubits.] The length of the first sanctuary, as distinct from the inward, or the holiest of all, which was twenty cubits in length, (ver. 4.) and made the whole structure sixty cubits long; wherein it agreed with Solomon's temple, 1 Kings vi. 2. 17.

Ver. 3. Then he went inward, and measured the posts of the door two cubits, &c.] From the outward sanctuary he went forward towards the holiest of all, and measured the thickness of the partition-wall, called the veil of the temple, Matt. xxvii. 51. to be two cubits, the entrance itself six cubits, and the breadth of the wall on each side of the door seven cubits: compare xl. 48. where the breadth of the gate is taken in the same sense: the breadth of the wall, thus computed, making up fourteen cubits, and being added to the breadth of the entrance itself, makes up twenty cubits; the breadth of the inner sanctuary, as it is set down in the following verse.—And measured the post of the door two cubits.] Maimonides, in Beth-Habbekirah, saith, That in the first temple there was a wall between the sanctuary and most holy place of the thickness of a cubit: but in the second temple, instead of a wall there were two veils made, one towards the most holy place, and the other towards the outward sanctuary, leaving a space between them of the thickness of a cubit, where the wall was supposed to stand in Solomon's temple.

Ver. 4. So he measured the length thereof twenty cubits, and the breadth twenty cubits.] It was an exact cube of the same dimensions in length, breadth, and height. (See 1 Kings vi. 20.)

Before the temple.] The words should rather be rendered, According to the [breadth of] the temple. The Hebrew word el-pené, before, is promiscuously used with nal-pené, which signifies of the same size, or proportion; (see the note on xl. 23.) and so it is used 2 Chron. iii. 8. where the text, speaking of this subject, runs thus in the Hebrew, He made the most holy house, the length thereof before the face of the breadth of the house; where our translation very properly expresses the same sense, According to the breadth of the house. In the same sense the phrase is used, I Kings vi. 3. So the sense here is, that the breadth of the inner sanctuary was equal to the breadth of the outer part of the temple, which is said to be twenty cubits, ver. 2.

Ver. 5. After he measured the wall of the house six cubits.] The thickness of the wall from the foundation, the first story of the side-chambers. (See ver. 8.)

And the breadth of every side-chamber four cubits.] The side-chambers upon the lowermost floor were five cubits in breadth, (1 Kings vi. 6.) Therefore Villalpandus understands these words of the thickness of the buttresses, which supported those side-chambers.

Ver. 6. And the side-chambers were three, one over another.] They were three stories high. (See 1 Kings vi. 6.)

And thirty in order.] As in Solomon's temple, according to Josephus's description of it, (Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 3. sect. 2.) and built round about the house on every side: as it is expressed in the foregoing verse; to which the text in the first book of Kings agrees, vi. 5. The Talmudists increase the number to eight-and-thirty, placing fifteen on the north side, fifteen on the south, and eight on the west side of the temple. (See Cod. Middoth. cap. 4.) The supernumerary chambers being probably added in latter times.

And they entered into the wall which was for the side-chambers round about.] At five cubits' height from the ground, the wall or the buttresses which supported these outward chambers (see ver. 5.) abated of their thickness one cubit, and there was a rest or ledge of one cubit's breadth, on which the ends of each story were fastened. (See 1 Kings vi. 6. 10.)

But they had not hold in the wall of the house.] They were not fastened into the main wall of the house, but rested on the outside of the wall, where it grew narrower; which is meant by migrenoth, the narrowest rests, or rebatements, which we read 1 Kings vi. 6.

Ver. 7. For there was an enlarging and a winding about still upward to the side-chambers, &c.] So much of breadth was added to the side-chambers, as was taken out of the thickness of the wall; so that the middle story was one cubit larger, and the uppermost story two cubits larger, than the lower rooms. And winding stairs, which enlarged as the rooms did, went up between each two chambers from the bottom to the top; and there were two doors at the top of each pair of stairs, one door opening into one room, the other into that over against it. (See 1 Kings vi. 8.) The Talmudists add, that these winding stairs were continued from one side of the temple to the other, beginning at the north-east side, and by these they went into the upper room which was over the sanctuary. (See Cod. Middoth. cap. 4. sect. 5.)

Ver. 8. I saw also the height of the house round about.] By the house is meant these chambers three stories high; in which sense the word beth, house, is used ver. 9.

The foundations of the side-chambers were a full reed of six great cubits.] By the foundations of the side-chambers, Villalpandus understands those rests or buttresses which supported them, which were at six cubits' distance from each other. Bernard L'Amy supposes this verse to contain a description of the second story of these side-chambers, which were six cubits broad, being one cubit wider than the lower rooms. (See the note on ver. 7.) Concerning the size of these cubits, see the note upon xl. 5. They are called great cubits, because they are larger than the cubit used in Chaldea, as was there observed.

Ver. 9. The thickness of the wall, that was for the side-chamber without, was five cubits.] This is to be understood, not of the veil of the temple, which was six cubits thick, (ver. 5.) but of the outward wall that enclosed these side-chambers. Side-chamber in the singular number is used for the plural, as in ver. 5. and xlii. 1. So door is used for doors, ver. 16. 20. post for posts, ver. 21. chamber xlii. 1. for chambers, ver. 4.

And that which was left [or the void space] was the place of the side-chambers that were within.] Or, that belonged to the house, or temple. This void space was of the same measure; viz. five cubits. (Compare ver. 11.) So the sense is supplied by Villalpandus and Noldius, n. 889. (Compare xl. 14.) The space of five cubits was allowed for the lower chambers, though the upper stories were wider by reason of the rebatement of the wall. (See ver. 7. and 1 Kings vi. 6.) Others understand this space of five cubits to be allowed for a walk before the chambers, or a passage from one chamber to another. (See ver. 11.)

Ver. 10. And between the chambers was the wideness of twenty cubits round about the house.] The chambers, called leshacoth in the Hebrew, are to be distinguished from the side-chambers mentioned in the foregoing verses; they mean, probably, the chambers of the inner court, described xl. 44, 45. Between these and the temple was left a space of twenty cubits. The temple stood in an area of a hundred cubits square, (ver. 14.) and was seventy cubits wide; (ver. 12.) to which adding the five cubits on either side, mentioned ver. 9. and the twenty cubits in this verse, makes up just a hundred cubits.

Ver. 11. And the doors of the side-chambers were towards the place that was left, &c.] Or, towards the void space: the doors of the lower rooms opened into this void space before the chambers, (ver. 9.) Or it may be understood of the two doors on the north and south sides, which opened on the top of the staircase into the upper rooms. (See ver. 7.)

And the breadth of the place that was left was five cubits round about.] See ver. 9.

Ver. 12. Now the building that was before the separate place, at the end towards the west, was seventy cubits broad.] Bernard L'Amy seems to give the clearest account of this difficult place, (lib. vi. cap. 11. n. 2.) He understands this word binian, translated building, of a wall or enclosure, as it is used, xl. 5. which ran along the outside of the priest's court, commensurate with the breadth of the western side of the temple, which was seventy cubits from north to south, and extended in length, from east to west, ninety cubits; ten cubits shorter than the whole area itself (see the following verse), and enclosing a void space of five cubits' breadth, which lay between the side-chambers and the enclosure; so he explains those words, The wall of the building was five cubits thick round about. (Compare xlii. 10.) Which void space he understands by the separate place, in this verse, and the place which was left, ver. 11.

Seventy cubits broad.] This was the breadth of the temple at the west end, and the buildings adjoining to it, which the abovementioned author thus computes: the breadth of the oracle twenty cubits; the thickness of the side-walls six cubits on each side; the side-chambers six cubits on each side; (see the note upon ver. 8.) thickness of the out-walls of those chambers five cubits on each side; a walk or gallery of five cubits before those chambers, (see the note on ver. 9.) and the utmost wall, enclosing the whole building, five cubits. Those that differ from him, as to some of those particulars, make up the sum of seventy cubits, by making an allowance for the stairs, and for conveyances to carry off the water.

Ver. 13. So he measured the house, a hundred cubits long; and the separate place, &c.] The whole temple, with the porch and walls, was in length a hundred cubits, from east to west, which may be thus computed: the thickness of the wall of the east porch five cubits; the passage through the porch eleven cubits; the wall between the porch and the temple six cubits; the outward sanctuary forty cubits; the partition-wall two cubits; the holiest of all twenty cubits; the thickness of the west wall six cubits; the side-chambers at the west end of the holy place five cubits; and outer wall of those chambers five cubits.

Ver. 14. Also the breadth of the face of the house, and of the separate place towards the east, a hundred cubits.] The whole front of the house eastward was a hundred cubits, which some expositors thus compute: the breadth of the temple twenty cubits; the thickness of the outward walls twelve cubits; the side-chambers eight cubits (of these dimensions they explain the latter part of the fifth verse of this chapter); the walls of those chambers five cubits on each side; the breadth of the void space five cubits on each side; and the twenty cubits round about the house, (ver. 10.) Others compute the sum a different way, by making different allowances for the outward buildings, and the several passages from one part of the temple to the other.

Ver. 15. And he measured the length of the building over against the separate place which was behind it.] Noldius translates this sentence more clearly thus: And he measured the length of the building which was before the separate place, [and] that which was behind it, or opposite to it; by which he understands the north and south porches; the east and west sides having been measured before, ver. 12. 14. (See his Concordance, p. 104.) The phrase el-pené, translated here over against, is rendered before in our English version, xliv. 4.

And the galleries thereof on one side, and on the other side, a hundred cubits, with [or and] the inner temple, and the porches thereof.] As the temple, and the area wherein it stood, made a square of a hundred cubits; so the courts and buildings thereto belonging were of the same dimensions. (See xl. 19. 47.)

By the galleries are meant the side-chambers, described ver. 6, 7. (Compare the following verse.)

With the inner temple.] Called the inner house, ver. 17.

and xlii. 15. to distinguish it from the courts and buildings which were about it.

Ver. 16. The door-posts, and the narrow windows, and the galleries round about in their three stories.] He measured likewise the thickness of the walls on each side of the porch, (see xl. 48.) and the thickness of the door-cases, at the entrance into the temple, (xli. 1.) as also the narrow windows belonging to the three stories of chambers, which were placed on the outside of the temple. (See ver. 6. and xl. 16.)

Over against the door, ceiled with wood round about.] Or, answerable to which was the door ceiled with wood. The doors of the little chambers exactly answered one another, as those belonging to the porch did, xl. 13. The word neged, over against, signifies likewise answerable, or proportionable. (See the note on xl. 23.)

Door signifies every door. (See the note upon ver. 9.)

And from the ground up to the windows.] He measured from the ground up to the windows of the temple, which were placed above the side-chambers.

And the windows were covered.] Either because the side-chambers jetting out beyond the main wall of the temple, hindered their being seen in the inner court; or else they were covered on the inside with curtains drawn before them.

Ver. 17. To that above the door, even to the inner house and without, &c.] This verse may best be explained by joining it to what went before to this sense: that the windows were made in exact proportion, both over the porch and through every part of the temple, and the buildings adjoining to it. The inner house may mean only the first or outward sanctuary in this verse, as it is distinguished from the porch and outer buildings, expressed by the word without: (compare ver. 15.) for it is generally supposed that there were no windows in the inner sanctuary. But Villalpandus explains the words even unto the inner house, in an exclusive sense, as if he had said, As far as the inner house; and by the walls round about, understands the north and south walls of the temple. (Par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 34.)

Ver. 18. And it was made with cherubims and with palm-trees, &c.] On the inside of the house the walls were adorned with carved work of cherubims and palm-trees, as Solomon's temple was, 1 Kings vi. 29. The cherubims and palm-trees were placed alternately; and, according to the different way of counting them, you might reckon a palm-tree placed between two cherubims, or a cherubim placed between two palm-trees.

Ibid. and Ver. 19. And every cherub had two faces; so that the face of a man was towards the palm-tree on the one side, and the face of a young lion towards the palm-tree on the other side.] The cherubims had four faces or appearances: (see i. 10.) but only two of these appeared in the carved work; the two other faces, viz. that of an ox and an eagle, being supposed to be hid in the plain or surface of the wall.

Ver. 20. From the ground up to above the door.] Up to the windows, as it is expressed ver. 16. up to the ceiling, as the Septuagint explain it.

Ver. 21. The posts of the temple were squared, and the face of the sanctuary.] i. e. The entrance into the inner sanctuary. (Compare xl. 15.) The lintels, or door-posts, both of the temple and inner sanctuary, were not arched, but square, with a flat beam or upper lintel laid upon the top of the side-posts; compare 1 Kings vi. 33. where the margin translates the word rebingim, four-square.

Ver. 22. The altar of wood was three cubits high, and the length thereof two cubits.] The Septuagint add by way of explication, And the breadth thereof two cubits; that it might be four-square, as Moses's altar of incense was, Exod. xxx. 2. The altar here described is a cubit higher, and double the breadth to that of Moses, which is supposed to be agreeable to the dimensions of the altar made by Solomon, who did not exactly observe the proportions prescribed to Moses, in making the cherubims and the other furniture of the temple: God having given a new model to David of all the parts and ornaments of the temple. (See 1 Chron. xxviii. 12. 19.) This altar was made of wood, but overlaid with gold, (Exod. xxx. 3.) and therefore is called the golden altar, 1 Kings vii. 48. Rev. viii. 3.

And the corners thereof, the length thereof, and the walls thereof, were of wood.] The corners are the same with the horns mentioned Exod. xxx. 2. being made out of the four posts which supported each corner of the altar. The surface or top of it is called the length, and the sides the walls.

This is the table that is before the Lord.] Compare xliv. 16. The words altar and table are used promiscuously, as hath been observed upon xxiii. 41. Incense was an emblem of the prayers of saints; (see Psal. cxii. 2. Rev. viii. 3, 4.) which are the spiritual sacrifices of those that worship God in spirit and in truth. (See Hos. xiv. 2.) This table or altar is said to be before the Lord, i. e. in the place of his peculiar presence. (Compare Exod. xxx. 8.) In the same sense the burnt-offering is said to be made at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord, i. e. in the place dedicated to his worship, Exod. xxix. 42. and the lamp is said to burn before the Lord, xxvii. 21. though the candlestick stood in the outward sanctuary.

Ver. 23. And the temple and the sanctuary had two doors.] Each of them had a double or a folding door. (See 1 Kings vi. 31. 34.)

Ver. 24. And the doors had two leaves a-piece.] The two doors being exceeding large, that of the outward sanctuary ten cubits broad, and that of the inner six, (see ver. 2, 3.) and of a height proportionable; each of them had two leaves, that they might be more easily opened, and each leaf had a wicket in it. (Compare 1 Kings vi. 34.)

Ver. 25. And there were made on them, on the doors of the temple, cherubims and palm-trees.] On the doors both of the outward and inward sanctuary. (Compare 1 Kings vi. 32. 34.)

And there were thick planks upon the face of the porch without.] There was a wainscot-work of boards fastened to the end of the great beams, which came out beyond the wall of the porch: these were laid so as to make a frieze-work over the entrance into the eastern porch.

Ver. 26. And there were narrow windows and palm-trees on the sides of the porch, and upon the side-chambers of the house.] Compare xl. 16.

And thick planks.] The sense would be plainer, if we translate it, And [upon] the thick planks; i. e. the figures of palm-trees were carved upon that wainscot, which was described in the foregoing verse.

CHAP. XLII.

ARGUMENT.

A description of the priests' chambers, and their use, and the dimensions of the holy mountain whereon the temple stood.

Ver. 1. THEN he brought me forth into the outer court, the way towards the north, &c.] The angel now brings the prophet out of the inner court by the north gate, into some chamber or building, which looked towards the south side of the temple, and faced the wall or enclosure that encompassed the north side of the inner court and temple, mentioned xli. 12. 15. Some suppose this to be a building distinct from all the parts of the temple hitherto described.

The words of the seventh and ninth verses imply, that it was a distinct building from the outer court.

Into the chamber that was over against the separate place, and before the building.] Or, Before the separate place, and before the building: for the preposition neged is used in both parts of the sentence. Chamber is put for chambers. (See ver. 4. and xli. 9.)

Ver. 2. Before the length of a hundred cubits was the north door, and the breadth was fifty cubits.] This north door faced one of the cloisters, whose length was a hundred cubits, and its breadth fifty; which was the proportion of all the cloisters. (See the note upon xl. 15.) Noldius translates the words to this sense, Unto the place whose length was a hundred cubits towards the north door. He supposes these buildings to be distinct from any hitherto described, and adds, that the Jews profess their ignorance how they were situate; because there was nothing in the second temple that answered to them. (See his Concordance, n. 390.)

Ver. 3. Over against the twenty cubits which were for [or, which belonged to] the inner court, and over against the pavement which was for [or, belonged to] the outer court.] One side of these buildings looked upon the void space about the temple, which contained twenty cubits, mentioned xli. 10. and the other side was towards the pavement belonging to the outer court, described xl. 17.

Was gallery against gallery in three stories.] Like those mentioned xli. 16.

Ver. 4. And before the chambers was a walk of ten cubits inward.] There was a walk or cloister of ten cubits' breadth, running along the inside of the wall, which divided the buildings into two rooms; one half of which looked into the outer court, the other into the inner. (See xlvi. 19.)

A way of one cubit.] This some understand of an entrance at each end of the cloister.

And their doors towards the north.] See ver. 1, 2.

Ver. 5. Now, the upper chambers were shorter: for the galleries were higher than these, than the lower, &c.] The marginal reading in the Hebrew is to be preferred, the sense of which is, For the galleries did abate of these, i. e. of the lower and middlemost parts of the building; the reason of which is assigned in the next verse.

Ver. 6. For they were in three stories, but had not pillars as the pillars of the courts, &c.] The two upper stories had balconies standing out of them, the breadth of which was taken out of the rooms themselves, and made them so much the narrower, because the weight of the balconies was not supported by pillars, as the rooms over the cloisters of the outward court were, but only by the wall. This is L'Amy's exposition of the words.

Ver. 7. And the wall that was without—towards the outer court on the forepart of the chambers, the length thereof was fifty cubits.] The wall that enclosed these buildings was commensurate with the breadth of one of the cloisters of the outer court, which was fifty cubits broad. (See ver. 2.)

Ver. 8. For the length of the chambers that were in the outer court was fifty cubits.] The chambers that were built over the cloisters were in length fifty cubits. What is called length here, is expressed by breadth, ver. 2. as that is opposed to the length of the outer court, which was a hundred cubits. (See the following words.)

And, lo, before the temple were a hundred cubits.] The words imply that the angel conducted the prophet from these north chambers to those on the south side: (see ver. 11. 13.) so that crossing over the space of ground that fronted the east side of the temple, they took notice of its dimensions, which they had before measured, and found to be a hundred cubits. (See xli. 14.) The LXX. with a small alteration of the Hebrew text, and reading, probably, hennah for hinneh, and häelle col for häecal, translate the sentence thus: The one side was opposite to, or answered the other, and in all were a hundred cubits; meaning that the chambers, on the north and south sides, contained each of them fifty cubits.

Ver. 9. And from under these chambers was the entry on the east side, &c.] The entry into these south chambers was by a pair of stairs at the east corner of the outer court. Compare this verse with chap. xlvi. 19. and with the description Dr. Lightfoot gives of the stairs that went up into the chamber about the temple, chap. 12. though his description belongs to the temple, as it was in our Saviour's time.

Ver. 10. The chambers were in the thickness of the wall of the court towards the east.] Or rather, in the breadth of the wall; i. e. in the breadth of ground which that wall enclosed: so those words, xli. 12. The wall of building was five cubits thick round about, are explained by some of a space of ground five cubits broad, enclosed by that wall. (See the note there.)

Over against the separate place, and over against the building.] Or, before the separate place, and before the building. (See ver. 1. 13.) The expressions denote, that these south chambers had the same situation, with respect to the temple, as the north chambers had, spoken of ver. 1.

Ver. 11. And the way before them was like the appearance of the chambers that were towards the north.] Such a way led to these chambers, as is described leading to the chambers on the north side, ver. 4.

As long as they, and as broad as they; and their goings out were both according to their fashions, &c.] The proportions of both were the same; and the windows, doors, and passages belonging to these, were exactly uniform with those on the north side.

Ver. 12. And according to the doors of the chambers that were towards the south.] The sense would be plainer, if the words were thus translated, And such were the doors of the chambers towards the south [as those towards the north]. In which sense the affix ke is used in the foregoing verse.

[There was] a door in the head of the way, &c.] Like that described ver. 9.

Ver. 13. The north and south chambers, &c.] Which were described in the foregoing part of the chapter. (See ver. 8. 10—12.)

They be holy chambers, where the priests that approach unto the Lord shall eat the most holy things.] The shew-bread, the remainder of the meat-offering, sin-offering, and trespass-offering, are expressly called the most holy things, Lev. vi. 14. 17. xxiv. 9. Numb. xviii. 9. and are distinguished from the holy things, such as are peace-offerings, first-fruits, and tithes, Lev. xxi. 22. These were to be eaten within the precincts of the temple, by the direction of the same laws.

There they shall lay up the most holy things.] These rooms were likewise set apart for laying up the remainder of the sacrifices, till they were eaten by the priests and their families. (See Lev. x. 13. xxii. 13.)

Concerning the difference between the sin-offering and the trespass-offering, see the note upon xl. 39.

Ver. 14. And when the priests enter therein.] Within the inner court, xliv. 17.

They shall not go out of the holy place into the outward court, but there they shall lay their garments wherein they minister.] They shall not go into the court of the people in their priestly vestments, but shall lay them up in some of these chambers: the priestly garments were only to be used in the time of their ministration, as appears from Exod. xxix. 43. and is farther confirmed from this verse, and xliv. 19. Josephus asserts the same, de Bello Jud. lib. vi. cap. 15.

The Christian church followed the practice of the Jewish, in this as well as in many other customs: the testimony of St. Jerome, in his Commentary upon xliv. 19. of this prophecy, plainly proves, that the clergy of that age wore a distinct habit from the laity, at the time of their performing the public offices of religion: "Religio Divina alterum habitum habet in ministerio, alterum in usu vitaque communi." And that this was the practice of the earlier ages of the church, may be probably concluded from the testimony of Polycrates, a writer of the next age to the apostles, who tells us, that St. John wore an ornament upon his head resembling the mitre, with a plate upon it, which was worn by the Jewish high-priest. (See Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. 24.) And in the next age, Pontius, the writer of St. Cyprian's life and martyrdom, acquaints us, that the bishop's seat in the church used to be covered with white; "Sedile erat fortuito linteo stratum, ut et sub ictu passionis episcopatus honore frueretur:" and it can hardly be imagined, there should be a peculiar dress for the bishop's seat, and none for the bishop himself.

And shall approach to those things that are for the people.] The words should rather be thus translated, And shall come into the court belonging to the people; the outer court, mentioned at the beginning of the verse.

Ver. 15. Now, when he had made an end of measuring the inner house.] The inner house denotes the temple, as it is distinguished from the courts about it. (Compare xli. 15.)

He brought me forth to the gate whose prospect is towards the east.] The gate that opened into the first court. (See xl. 6.)

Ver. 16. He measured the east side with the measuring-reed, five hundred reeds, &c.] This and the following verses contain the measures of the holy mountain, or area, upon which the temple stood, which is described to be an exact square, consisting of five hundred reeds in measure on each side of it. We may observe, that the heavenly Jerusalem, represented to St. John, Rev. xxi. 16. is likewise described as four-square, that figure being an emblem of solidity. And Ezekiel's vision as well as St. John's is designed, in its mystical sense, to represent the regularity and strength of Christ's church and kingdom. (Compare with this verse xl. 47. xli. 13, 14. xlv. 2. xlviii. 20.)

Capellus is of opinion, that instead of five hundred reeds, we ought to read five hundred cubits: he supposeth the word ammoth, cubits, wanting in the present reading of the text, to have been rejected as spurious by the correctors of the Hebrew copies, by reason of its affinity with meoth, a hundred; and the word kanim, reeds, substituted in its place. This emendation he justifies from the authority of the Septuagint, who read cubits both in the seventeenth and twentieth verses: which reading St. Jerome acknowledges to have been in the Greek copies in his time. He confirms it likewise from the parallel text, xlv. 2. which he thinks, according to the rules of grammar, should be expounded of cubits. And he farther argues, that the Jews themselves formerly understood this text of cubits; because they are generally of opinion, that the temple stood in an area or square, containing five hundred cubits on every side; (see Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, chap. 2.) whereas, according to the present reading, the whole compass of the area will amount to three miles and a half, according to the same author's computation; which is more than half the circuit of the whole city of Jerusalem in its most flourishing condition. (See the Excerpta out of Capellus's Triplex Delineatio Templi, in the first volume of the Polyglot Bible.)

Whereas the angel is said to measure the east side of this square round about; and so of the other three sides: we need not from hence conclude, that the whole compass of the ground was measured four times over; for the phrase round about often signifies, in this prophecy, only from side to side, or from one end to another. (See xl. 14. xli. 16.) The words therefore only import, that the angel continued measuring from one side to the other, till he had gone over the whole compass of the area.

Ver. 20. It had a wall round about, &c.] To defend it from being invaded or profaned. (Compare Rev. xxi. 17.) The wall was five hundred cubits every way; (see ver. 16.) as it composed the length and breadth of the temple, and its courts: see the same expression, xl. 47.

To make a separation between the sanctuary and the profane place.] By the sanctuary is here meant the whole compass of ground which was the precincts of the temple, elsewhere called the holy mountain. (See xliii. 12.) In comparison of which, Jerusalem itself, though upon several accounts styled the holy city, was esteemed but as profane ground. (See xlviii. 15.)

CHAP. XLIII.

ARGUMENT.

The glory of the Lord is represented as returning to the temple, where God promises to fix his residence, if the people repent, and forsake those sins which made him depart from them. Then the measures of the altar, and the ordinances relating to it, are set down.

Ver. 1. THEN he brought me to the gate, even the gate that looked towards the east.] The eastern gate of the priests' court, which was just before the temple. (Compare ver. 4. and xliv. 1. xlvi. 1.)

Ver. 2. And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east.] The word behold is an expression of joy and admiration: as if the prophet had said, Behold a wonderful and joyful sight! The glory of that God, who calls himself the God of Israel, as choosing to dwell among them, and to give evident tokens of his presence among them, and protection over them. This glory, which had departed from this place for so long a time, now returned to it, and fixed its residence there. The glory of the Lord, when it forsook the temple, is described as departing from the eastern gate of it, (x. 19.) Afterward it is represented as quite forsaking the city, and removing to a mountain on the east side of the city, (xi. 23.) and now it returns by the same way it departed.

And his voice was like the noise of many waters.] Great and terrible: (compare i. 24. Rev. i. 15.) either to signify the dreadfulness of God's judgments, or the efficacy of his commands, who calls things into being by speaking the word.

And the earth shined with his glory.] The rays of his glory, like the sun-beams, enlightened the earth. (Compare x. 4. Isa. vi. 3. Hab. iii. 4.)

Ver. 3. And it was according to the vision which I saw when I came to destroy the city.] See ix. 3. 5. The prophets are said to do those things which they foretell shall come to pass. (See the notes upon xiii. 19. xxiii. 54. Jer. i. 10.)

Ver. 4. And the glory of the Lord came into the house, by the way of the gate whose prospect is towards the east.] See ver. 1, 2. and xliv. 2.

Ver. 5. So the spirit took me up.] See iii. 12. 14. viii. 3. xxxvii. 1. xl. 2.

And he brought me into the inner court.] Carried me from the gate that enters into it, into the middle of it, just before the temple.

And, behold, the glory of the Lord filled the house.] That glory, or symbol of the Divine presence, which I saw coming from the east, (ver. 13.) entered into the temple, and settled there, as it did when it was finished by Solomon, (1 Kings viii. 10, 11.)

Ver. 6. And I heard him speaking to me out of the house.] With a great and mighty voice, (ver. 2.)

And the man stood by me.] See xl. 3.

Ver. 7. The place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet.] The sense would be plainer, if the beginning of the verse were thus rendered, This is the place of my throne, &c. The cherubims were God's throne, from whence he is said to dwell or sit between the cherubims, and the ark was his footstool. (See Psal. xcix. 1. 5.)

Where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever.] He means the promise formerly made with relation to the tabernacle and temple: (see Psal. lxviii. 16. cxxxii. 14.) which is to be understood as those were, under the condition of their obedience; (see ver. 9.) and to be eminently fulfilled in Christ, in whom all the promises of the Old Testament are to have their final accomplishment. Zechary prophesies of the Messias, (vi. 13.) that he should build the temple of the Lord, and bear the glory; i. e. as the spiritual sense of these prophecies is explained in the New Testament, He shall build the Christian church; in him shall all the fulness of the Godhead dwell bodily, and really, not in types and figures. (See Heb. iii. 3. Matt. xvi. 18. John i. 14. Coloss. ii. 9.) To the same sense we may explain the prophecy of Haggai, ii. 7. The glory of the latter house shall be greater than that of the former. There was no visible Schechinah, or glory, appeared in the second temple, till the Lord, whom they expected; came to his temple; (Mal. iii. 1.) i. e. till the Messias, who was the brightness of his Father's glory, appeared there, and made it an illustrious figure of that true church, or temple of believers, where he would continue his presence for ever. (See 2 Cor. vi. 16.)

And my holy name shall the house of Israel no more defile by their whoredom.] By idolatry, often described in Scripture, and particularly by this prophet, under the metaphor of fornication. (See chap. xvi. xxiii.) The captivity had that good effect upon the Jews, that they scarce ever afterward relapsed into idolatry. The entire destruction of idolatry is likewise often mentioned as a blessing reserved for the latter days, when the Jews shall be converted, and the fulness of the gentiles come into the church. (See the note upon Isa. i. 30.)

Nor by the carcasses of their kings, in their high places.] Idols are called carcasses, because they are without life and motion, and likewise upon the account of their being hateful and loathsome in the sight of God. (See Lev. xxvi. 30. Jer. xvi. 18.) They are called the carcasses of kings; because they were set up, and the worship of them encouraged, by the idolatrous kings of Judah, who erected high places for that purpose near Jerusalem, in the very sight and view of the temple. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 13.) By this means the temple itself was profaned by those that came directly from the worship of idols, to attend upon God's service in the temple. (See chap. xxiii. of this prophecy, 38, 39.)

Ver. 8. In their setting up their thresholds by my thresholds, &c.] Their kings still advanced to greater degrees of idolatry, in setting up altars and images for their idols in the temple itself, and the courts before it. (See v. 11. viii. 6. 15. 2 Kings xvi. 14. xxi. 4, 5. 7.)

And the wall between me and them.] The margin gives a plainer sense, For there was but a wall between me and them.

Ver. 9. Now let them put away their whoredom, &c.] See the note upon ver. 7.

Ver. 10, 11. Shew the house to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities, &c.] The words, if understood as spoken to the Jews of that age, imply, that the house here described, with the whole platform of it, and the ordinances relating to it, might be a model for them to imitate, as far as they were able, when they should return to their own country, and rebuild their temple. (See the general preface before chap. xl.) The same draught or description, when duly considered, would be a proper inducement to make them sensible of their former deviations from God's worship, and touched with deep remorse for those sins, which provoked him to deprive them of the honour of his residence among them, and the benefit of his ordinances. (See ver. 7, 8.) But we may probably suppose, that the words may have a farther view, and import, that the model of God's temple, here set forth, is but a pattern of heavenly things, as Moses's was, Exod. xxv. 40. and a type of that pure church built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner-stone; which we may hope God will, in due time, every where restore. And in the mean season, it is the duty of all good Christians, according to their abilities, to inform themselves and others, what is the pattern, form, and fashion, of this true church of God, in order to reform all those deviations which have been made from it.

And let them measure the pattern.] In order to build their new temple by it, when they shall return from captivity, as far as their abilities will reach. (See the general preface before the fortieth chapter.) For the same purpose the prophet is commanded to write it in their sight, in the following words.

Ver. 11. And if they be ashamed.] Or, And that they may be ashamed: so the particle im is often used. (See Noldius, p. 90.)

Ver. 12. Upon the top of the mountain.] Whereupon the temple stood. (See xl. 2.)

The whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy.] See xlii. 20.

Ver. 13. The cubit is a cubit and a hand-breadth.] See xl. 5.

The bottom shall be a cubit, and the breadth a cubit, and the borders thereof—shall be a span.] The bottom signifies the basis or foundation; (see ver. 14.) this shall be a cubit in height, and a cubit over in breadth; the parts above the lower settle being contracted, and growing narrower by the breadth of a cubit. (See the following verse.) This lower ledge or settle about the altar had a border of the height of a span, or half a cubit, (see ver. 17.) to keep the blood that was poured out at the foot of the altar from running upon the pavement; but it was conveyed away into two holes at the south-west corner of the altar, and so into a sink or common shore under ground.

And this shall be the higher place of the altar.] The Hebrew reads, The back of the altar; which imports, that this basis was the protuberance of the altar, or the widest part of it; the Hebrew word gab, signifying any part that sticks out, and is used for the eyebrows, the protuberance of a hill, or such-like eminence.

Ver. 14. And from the bottom upon the ground, even to the lower settle, shall be two cubits.] The altar was made narrower as it came nearer to the top; these narrowings or in-benchings are called here settles. The word is azarah in the Hebrew, which is elsewhere used for a court; because the priests trod upon these settles, as they and the people did in the courts before the temple. From the foundation to the lower of the two settles here mentioned, the text saith, was to be two cubits; which seems to contradict the words in the verse before, the bottom shall be a cubit. This difference in expression Dr. Lightfoot thus reconciles, in his Description of the Temple, chap. 34. that the foundation, as it lay flat upon the ground, was but a cubit high; but then there arose a slope of another cubit's height, which was thicker than the compass of the altar just above it; so that from the ground to the top of the rising was two cubits: and thus he reconciles the description here given with that of the Talmud, which reckons five cubits from the lower settle to the higher; whereas the prophet counts but four in the following words.

And the breadth one cubit.] The breadth of this lower settle, or border, was one cubit, which made that part of the altar which was above it narrower, by a cubit on every side of the square, than that part which was nearer the foundation.

And from the lesser settle even to the greater settle shall be four cubits, and the breadth one cubit.] Dr. Lightfoot, in the same place, assigns this reason, why the upper settle is here called the greater, because the upper settle, though it was less in compass (being narrower by two cubits on every side of the square), yet was larger in breadth; the lower settle rising with a leaning slope, as was observed before, which took up a considerable part of its breadth, and made the walk upon it not so large as that upon the upper.

Ver. 15. So the altar shall be four cubits.] i. e. From the upper settle, which makes the altar ten cubits high, the same height with that made by Solomon, 2 Chron. iv. 1. The fourteenth verse reckons six cubits to the upper settle, and here are four cubits added to the top of the altar. The dimensions of the altar are the same in the Talmud, as Dr. Lightfoot observes in the place abovecited; who farther remarks, out of the Jewish writers, that within two cubits of the top, or the place where the hearth was, there was another narrowing, or bench, of a cubit's breadth, where the priests stood to officiate.

The altar is twice mentioned in this verse under two different names; the first harel, that is, the mountain of God, being so called, as some rabbins think, in opposition to the idolatrous altar built upon high places; the second ariel, that is, the lion of God, having that name given to it, because it devoured and consumed the sacrifices offered upon it. (See Isa. xxix. 1.)

And from the altar and upward shall be four horns.] To be added at each corner, as was in Moses's altar, Exod. xxvii. 2. These were squares of a cubit on each side, and hollow in the middle; and into these cavities some of the blood of the sacrifices was put. (See ver. 20.) They arose from the uppermost bench, where the priest stood to officiate.

Ver. 16. And the altar shall be twelve cubits long, twelve broad, &c.] The upper part of it shall be an exact square, reckoning from the second settle, which is properly called the altar, and distinguished from the bottom or foundation. (See ver. 15.)

Ver. 17. And the settle shall be fourteen cubits long, and fourteen broad.] This is to be understood of the lower settle, which was two cubits wider than the upper part of the altar, as appears by the description already given.

And the border about it shall be half a cubit.] Or a span, as it is expressed, ver. 13.

And the bottom thereof shall be a cubit about.] A cubit wider than the lower settle. (See ver. 13.)

And his stairs shall look towards the east.] God forbade his priests to go up by steps to his altar, Exod. xx. 26. which is usually expounded, that he would not have his altar set upon a great ascent, in imitation of the heathen high places; yet Solomon's altar was ten cubits high; (2 Chron. iv. 1.) which necessarily required some ascent for the priests to go, that they might officiate on the top of it: and in this place there is express mention of stairs to go up to the altar here described, being of the same height with Solomon's. The Jews tell us, that since the law prohibited stairs or steps, the ascent to the altar was by a gentle rising, which they call kibbesh, of thirty-two cubits in length, and sixteen in breadth; the landing-place being upon the upper bench or walk, next the hearth or top; of which mention hath been already made in the notes upon ver. 16. See Dr. Lightfoot in the forecited place, and Dr. Prideaux's Connex. of Script. Hist. par. i. where there is a draught of the altar, and the ascent to it, which very much helps to explain the description here given of it.

This ascent is directed to be placed at the east side of the altar, that they, who went up, should look towards the west, and upon the temple, and should turn their backs to the rising sun, in opposition to the rites of those idolaters who worshipped the rising sun. (See the note upon viii. 16.)

Ver. 18. And to sprinkle blood thereon.] See Lev. i. 5. iii. 8.

Ver. 19. And thou shalt give to the priests, the Levites, that be of the seed of Zadok.] See the notes on xl. 45. xliv. 15.

A young bullock for a sin-offering, &c.] To consecrate the new altar therewith, and the persons who were to offer sacrifice upon it. (Compare xlv. 18, 19. Exod. xxix. 10. 12. and ver. 36.)

Ver. 20. And upon the four corners of the settle.] The word settle may signify both the settles, as the singular number elsewhere stands for the plural. (See the note upon xli. 9.)

Ver. 21. And he shall burn it.] Or rather, It shall be burnt, as the LXX. rightly express the sense; the verb transitive being often used for the impersonal. (See the note upon Isa. xliv. 18.)

In the appointed place of the house without the sanctuary.] In some place appointed for that purpose, within the precincts of the holy mountain. The temple itself is called the inner house, xli. 15. xlii. 15. to distinguish it from the outer courts and precincts thereof. The body of the bullock, whose blood was to sanctify the altar, was to be burnt without the camp, by the order of the law, Exod. xxix. 14.

This was the first day's sacrifice; the ceremony of consecration being to last seven days. (See ver. 26.)

Ver. 22. And on the second day thou shalt offer a kid of the goats without blemish for a sin-offering.] This is over and above the sacrifices of consecration, prescribed Exod. xxix. 1. Some other rites are prescribed in the following ordinances, that differ a little from those ordained by Moses. (See the note upon xlvi. 4.)

Ver. 23. Thou shalt offer a young bullock and a ram out of the flock.] Called the ram of consecration, Exod. xxix. 31. Lev. viii. 22. These sacrifices were to be repeated every one of the seven days of the consecration. (See ver. 25.)

Ver. 24. And the priest shall cast salt upon them.] Every sacrifice was to be salted with salt. (Lev. ii. 13.)

Ver. 26. Seven days shall they purge the altar, and purify it.] Seven days were appointed for the performing the ceremonies of purifying the altar, and consecrating the priests. (See Exod. xxix. 35. Lev. viii. 34.)

And they shall consecrate themselves.] The expression in the Hebrew is, They shall fill their hands; the phrase being taken from that ceremony used in consecrating a priest, of filling his hands with part of the sacrifice then offered. (See Exod. xxix. 24.)

Ver. 27. Upon the eighth day, and so forward.] See Lev. ix. 1.

Your peace-offerings.] The margin reads thank-offerings, because they were offerings of thanksgivings for mercies received.

CHAP. XLIV.

ARGUMENT.

The chapter begins with a description of the glory of God returned into the temple; then follows a reproof of the people for suffering idolatrous priests to profane the temple by ministering there; and ordinances are set down relating to the deportment of God's true priests, and the maintenance due to them.

Ver. 1. THEN he brought me back the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary.] From the altar to the gate belonging to the court of the priests that leadeth to the outward court of the temple. (Compare ver. 27. and xlvi. 1.) All the courts were reckoned holy ground, and called sometimes by the name of the temple. (See John viii. 20. Acts xxi. 28.)

And it was shut.] After that the glory of the Lord had entered that way; (xliii. 4.) to signify that the Divine presence would never forsake the temple any more.

Ver. 2. This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened.] It shall not stand open continually, as it formerly did, but only at certain seasons: (see ver. 3. and xlvi. 1.) and that out of respect to the Divine glory, which made its entrance into the temple that way, where it had now took up its fixed residence, (see xliii. 7.) not to depart any more by the east gate of the temple, as it formerly did. (See the note on xliii. 4.)

Because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it.] That is, the glory of the Lord, as it is expressed xliii. 2. 4. The glory of God is himself, and is often called by the name of the Lord, or the God of Israel. (See Exod. xxiv. 10. Isa. vi. 1. 5.)

Ver. 3. It is for the prince.] Solomon placed his seat at the entrance into the inner court before the altar of the Lord, (2 Chron. vi. 13.) and here the prince seems to have had his place in aftertimes, whenever he came to worship at the temple. (See 2 Chron. xxiii. 13. xxxiv. 31.) Not far from which place a seat was placed for the high-priest, as may be gathered from Eli's seat, mentioned 1 Sam. ii. 9. and from whence the high-priest pronounced the blessing after the service was ended. (See Ecclus. l. 20. and Lightfoot's Temple Service, chap. 36.) Some understand by the prince, the high-priest; which title does very properly belong to the Messias, who is both king and priest, and hath the style of Prince given him, xxxiv. 23. But in the parallel place to this, (xlvi. 2, 3. 8, 9.) the word prince is opposed to the people: and other ordinances are there laid down, which cannot be fitly applied to the Messias. For which reason, I conceive the word must be taken here in its usual sense, to denote the chief governors of the Jews, such as were Zerubbabel and Nehemiah after the captivity.

The prince shall sit in it to eat bread before the Lord.] To eat part of the peace-offerings, which are to be provided at his charge. (See xlvi. 2.) Bread stands for all sort of entertainments; (see Gen. xliii. 31.) and particularly for a religious feast made of the remainder of a sacrifice, (Gen. xxxi. 54.)

He shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, &c.] See xlvi. 8.

Ver. 4. Then brought he me the way of the north gate before the house.] The east gate being shut, ver. 1.

And, behold, the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord.] There was no door into the house on that side, but I could see the brightness of the Divine glory shining through the windows. (See xliii. 3. 5.)

And I fell upon my face.] See i. 28.

Ver. 5. Mark well, and behold with thine eyes, &c.] See xl. 4. xliii. 2.

Mark well the entering of the house with the going forth of the sanctuary.] The word laws is here to be repeated, to this sense, That the prophet should admonish the people of the laws relating to the admitting certain persons into the temple, or the courts of it, and suffer none that are unqualified to attend upon God's service there. (See the following verses.)

Ver. 6. And say to the rebellious [house], even to the house of Israel.] See ii. 5.

Let it suffice you of all your abominations.] Let the time past be sufficient for you to have provoked me with your abominations. (See xlv. 9. compare 1 Pet. iv. 3.) We find the same expression Numb. xvi. 3. where our translation reads, ye take too much upon you: but the phrase may more properly be translated, Let it suffice you [to have usurped an authority hitherto].

Ver. 7. In that you have brought into my sanctuary strangers, uncircumcised in heart, &c.] In setting up idols within the precincts of mine own house, and appointing idolatrous priests to officiate there. (See xliii. 8.)

When ye offer my bread, my fat, and my blood.] At the same time that ye offer my sacrifices upon the altar. Or the words may imply, that they suffered heathens to offer at God's altar, expressly against the law, Lev. xxii. 27.

By bread may be understood the meat-offerings made of flour, which accompanied the other sacrifices: although every thing offered upon the altar is properly called the bread of God. (See the note upon xxiii. 41.) The fat and blood of every sacrifice were peculiarly appropriated to God. (See Lev. iii. 16. xvii. 11.)

And they have broken my covenant.] Idolatry was a direct breach of that covenant God had entered into with the Jews, that he would be their God, and they his people, Lev. xxvii. 12. Upon which account it is so often represented under the metaphor of adultery and fornication: being a breach of that covenant which is usually described under the notion of a marriage-contract. (See the note upon xvi. 8.)

Ver. 8. And ye have not kept the charge of my holy things, &c.] You have not observed the laws I gave you, for taking care of the things relating to my house and worship; but have appointed such persons to officiate there, as best suited with your own inclinations. (See the note upon xl. 45.)

Ver. 9. No stranger shall enter into my sanctuary.] To offer any sacrifice or oblation there; (see ver. 7.) nor be suffered to go beyond the precincts appointed for proselytes.

Ver. 10. And the Levites that are gone far from me, &c.] The same who are called the priests, the Levites, ver. 15. i. e. the sons of Levi, who are priests. Many of these departed from attending upon God's service, and fell into idolatry; first, in the general apostacy of the ten tribes, afterward under Ahaz, and other wicked kings of Judah: (see 2 Kings xxiii. 9.) these shall bear the punishment due to their iniquity, and shall be degraded from attending upon the higher offices belonging to the priesthood, and thrust down to meaner services. (See ver. 13.) It is not likely that any of those priests who had been defiled with idolatry in former times, lived to see the restoration of God's worship in the temple after the captivity: so the punishment here allotted to them, either relates to their posterity; God having particularly threatened to punish the sin of idolatry to the third and fourth generation, Exod. xx. 5. or else the ordinances here prescribed are standing rules, that were to be perpetually observed, whensoever this case should happen.

The discipline of the Christian church was still more severe: for whoever of the clergy had committed idolatry in the times of persecution, was for ever deprived of his function; and even for lesser crimes they were degraded from a higher to a lower station; as the learned Mr. Bingham, in his Eccl. Antiq. book xvii. chap. 3. hath shewed in several instances.

Ver. 11. Having charge of the gates of the house.] Performing the office of porters, an inferior station belonging to the Levites. (See 1 Chron. xxvi. 1.)

They shall slay the burnt-offering.] Kill the beasts appointed for the daily burnt-offering and other sacrifices, and flay their skins, which was an office usually performed by the Levites. (See 2 Chron. xxxv. 11.)

And they shall stand before them.] They shall be servants to the people, in undergoing the most servile offices belonging to the temple; whereas it is the proper office of a priest to be God's immediate minister. (See Deut. x. 8. xvii. 12.)

Ver. 12. Because they ministered to them before their idols, and caused the house of Israel to fall into their iniquity.] They led the people into idolatry, by giving them an ill example.

Therefore have I lifted up my hand against them.] I have solemnly sworn that I will punish them for this their sin. (See the note on xx. 6.)

Ver. 13. And they shall not come near to me, to do the office of a priest unto me, &c.] They shall not offer sacrifice at my altar, or come into the temple, to perform any part of the priestly office there. So Josiah discharged the priests that had been guilty of idolatry, from attending upon the service of the altar, (2 Kings xxiii. 9.)

Ver. 14. But I will make them keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof, &c.] They shall perform the servile offices belonging to my temple and worship. (See 1 Chron. xxiii. 28. 32.)

Ver. 15. But the priests, the Levites.] The sons of Levi, who are priests. (Compare Deut. xvii. 9. xviii. 1. xxiv. 8.)

The sons of Zadok.] See xl. 46. xliii. 19.

To offer to me the fat and the blood.] See ver. 7.

Ver. 16. They shall enter into my sanctuary, and they shall come near to my table.] The foregoing verse expresses their ministering at the altar, and offering sacrifice there: this denotes attendance upon God's service within the temple: the principal part of which was burning incense there upon the altar placed in the temple for that purpose: which mystically implied the offering up the prayers of the people to God. This altar of incense is called here the table of the Lord, as it is xli. 22. (See the note there.)

Ver. 17. When they shall enter in at the gates of the inner court.] The court just before the temple, where the altar of burnt-offering stood, ver. 27. of this chapter.

They shall be clothed with linen garments.] The ephod, breeches, mitre, and girdle, which was the habit of the ordinary priests, were all of fine linen, contrived for glory and beauty: (Exod. xxix. 40.) fine linen being the habit of persons of the greatest quality. (See the note upon xxvii. 7.)

While they minister in the gates of the inner court, and within.] Or, in the house, or temple itself, as Noldius translates the word bayetha, n. 829.

Ver. 18. They shall not gird themselves with any thing that causeth sweat.] With a woollen girdle, which may make them sweat, during their laborious services about the altar, and make their garments smell offensively. But the Chaldee paraphrase renders it thus: They shall not be girt about their loins, but be girt upon (or about) their heart; i. e. they shall not wear girdles about their middle, or under their arm-pits, either of which may cause them to sweat, but shall wear them about their breasts. So St. John describes our Lord appearing in the habit of a high-priest, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle, Rev. i. 13.

Ver. 19. And when they go forth into the outer court, they shall put off their garments wherein they ministered.] See the note on xlii. 14.

And they shall not sanctify the people with their garments.] By the rules of the law, things immediately dedicated to God's service did convey some degree of holiness to common things that touched them: so the altar sanctified the gift that was laid upon it. (See Lev. vi. 27. Matt. xxiii. 13.) Thus some sort of holiness might be derived to the garments of the people by touching those of a priest: which God would have prevented, to keep up an exact difference between the holy and profane, (ver. 23.)

Ver. 20. Neither shall they shave their heads.] This prescription is implied in those words of the law, Lev. xxi. 5. especially according to the translation of the Septuagint, who render the sentence, Thou shalt not shave thyself with baldness [to make baldness] upon thy head for the dead. They, indeed, understand it as an expression of mourning for the dead, which agrees with the sense of the parallel texts, Lev. xix. 27, 28. Deut. xiv. 1. But the words in the original contain a general prohibition, and consequently include the times of mourning as well as other seasons. St. Jerome upon the place does with great probability suppose, that the Jewish priests were forbid to shave their heads, thereby to distinguish them from several of the heathen priests, particularly the Egyptian priests of Isis and Serapis, who had their heads shaved and uncovered; which were funeral rites, and therefore proper to be used in the worship of the heathen gods, who were no better than dead men. (See Baruch vi. 31.) Learned men have observed, that many other Jewish laws were made, in opposition to the funeral rites observed in the heathen worship.

Nor suffer their locks to grow long.] It is the opinion of Dr. Spencer (Leg. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 25.) and Schindler, that this law is likewise taken out of the same chapter of Leviticus, at the tenth verse; where our translation renders the original, He shall not uncover his head. But the Chaldee paraphrase translates the words, He shall not nourish the hair of his head; which sense several interpreters follow: letting the hair grow long and neglected, being a sign of mourning, as well as shaving it close to the head.

Ver. 21. Neither shall any priest drink wine, when they enter into the inner court.] During the time of their ministration. (See ver. 17.) This law is likewise taken from Lev. x. 9, 10. And the reason of the prohibition is there given, that they might put a difference between holy and unholy, between clean and unclean; i. e. that they might be able exactly to determine the cases relating to legal uncleanness: many of which had a great deal of niceness in them, by reason of the variety of circumstances. (Compare ver. 23. of this chapter.)

Ver. 22. Neither shall they take for their wives a widow, or her that is put away, &c.] This law we find in Lev. xxi. 13, 14. But it is there spoken of the high-priest only, here it is applied to all the priests in general.

Ver. 23. And in controversy they shall stand in judgment, &c.] The priests were to determine all controversies relating to the law, as well the judicial as the ceremonial part of it, which were brought before them; (see Deut. xvii. 8, 9.) and the people were to seek the law at their mouths, (Mal. ii. 7.) i. e. to inquire of them what was the purport and meaning of it, and to stand to their determination. And when the supreme judicial power was placed in the Sanhedrin, the majority of that court consisted chiefly of such as had the chief stations among the priests. (See Acts iv. 5, 6.)

And they shall keep my laws and my statutes in all mine assemblies, &c.] As well upon the solemn festivals, and the assemblies proper to them, (see Exod. xii. 16.) as on the ordinary sabbaths.

And they shall hallow my sabbaths.] Whereas the priests before the captivity profaned them, and neglected to perform the Divine worship prescribed upon them. (See xxii. 26.)

Ver. 25. They shall come at no dead person to defile themselves.] Whosoever touched a dead body became legally unclean, (Numb. xix. 11.) and thereby was unqualified to attend upon God's worship in the temple: (see Lev. xxii. 3.) upon which account the priests were forbidden to contract such a defilement, unless for their nearest relations, (Lev. xxi. 1—3.) which prohibition is here renewed.

Ver. 26. And after he is cleansed, they shall reckon unto him seven days.] His uncleanness continued for seven days by the forecited law, (Numb. xix. 11.) and the priests were to reckon to him seven days more, before he was to be admitted into the sanctuary.

Ver. 27. And in the day that he goeth into the sanctuary, unto the inner court.] See ver. 17.

He shall offer his sin-offering.] He shall offer a young bullock for a sin-offering. (See Lev. iv. 13.)

Ver. 28. And it shall be unto them for an inheritance, &c.] Their ministry in my sanctuary, mentioned in the foregoing verse, and the perquisites thereto belonging, shall be to them instead of lands and cities, of which they shall not have any share, as the other tribes; (see Deut. x. 9. Josh. xiii. 14.) excepting the portion allotted to them in the beginning of the following chapter.

Ver. 29. They shall eat the meat-offering, and the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering.] They shall have their share of it, after God's part hath been consumed upon the altar. (See Lev. vi. 18. 29. vii. 6.)

And every delicate thing shall be theirs.] Whatsoever men dedicate to God, the use of it shall accrue to the priests: if it be a living creature, it shall be killed, and the priest shall have the benefit of it: if it be a piece of land, it shall belong to the priests. (See Lev. xxvii. 27, 28. Numb. xviii. 14.)

Ver. 30. And the first of all first-fruits of all things, and every oblation of every sort of your oblations, shall be the priest's.] The words translated first-fruits and oblations, are in the Hebrew biccurim and trumah. The former imports the first ripe, or best of the fruits, while they were growing in the field; (compare Exod. xxiii. 19. with Numb. xviii. 12.) the latter denotes an oblation out of the product of the ground, after it was made fit for use: as out of the corn, after it was thrashed and laid in heaps in the floor or granary: and so of oil and wine, after they were pressed and fitted for spending. These oblations are by some authors, particularly by Mr. Selden in his treatise of Tithes, chap. 2. esteemed to amount to the sixtieth part of the whole produce. Schindler rates the biccurim at the lowest proportion to be the sixtieth part, and computes the trumah at the fiftieth. Dr. Comber supposes the biccurim to amount to a hundredth part, and the trumah at a medium to be the fiftieth. (See his treatise of Tithes, par. i. chap. 2. and the notes on xlv. 13.)

Ye shall also give unto the priest the first of your dough.] The first dough that you bake of the new corn every year shall belong to the priests, in the same proportion to be observed here, as in other first-fruits, viz. a sixtieth part. (See Numb. xv. 20.)

That he may cause a blessing to rest in thine house.] That the priest, whose office it is to bless the people in God's name, (see Numb. vi. 23. Deut. x. 8.) may procure a blessing upon thee from him, according to the promise he hath made of blessing those with an extraordinary degree of plenty, who conscientiously pay their tithes and offerings, as grateful acknowledgments to God, the giver of all good things. (See 2 Chron. xxxi. 10. Prov. iii. 9, 10. Mal. iii. 10. compare Deut. xxvi. 13—15.)

Ver. 31. The priest shall not eat of any thing that is dead of itself, or torn.] A command given to all the Jews, Exod. xxii. 31. and more particularly to the priests, Lev. xxii. 8.

CHAP. XLV.

ARGUMENT.

The several portions of land appointed for the sanctuary, the city, and the prince; together with ordinances concerning the provisions for the ordinary and extraordinary sacrifices.

Ver. 1. MOREOVER, when ye shall divide the land by lot for inheritance, ye shall offer an oblation to the Lord.] The land was divided by lot in the first division of it under Joshua, and is appointed to be divided so in the partition of it, as it here follows: (see xlvii. 14. 22.) a particular share of which was to be God's portion, as an acknowledgment of his sovereign dominion: (see Lev. xxv. 23.) it is therefore here called trumah, or oblation; which word properly signifies the offering made to God out of the first-fruits, and other increase of the ground; (see xliv. 30. Numb. xviii. 24, &c.) because this was a sort of first-fruits of the land, or soil itself, (xlviii. 14.)

The length shall be five-and-twenty thousand reeds, and the breadth shall be ten thousand.] The Hebrew doth not express either reeds or cubits: our translation supplies the word reeds, but many interpreters expound the place of cubits, which sense they think is plainly determined by ver. 3. where it is said, Of this measure (viz. the cubit measure mentioned ver. 2.) shalt thou measure the length of five-and-twenty thousand, &c. According to this measure, the portion here set apart will be almost seven miles square; whereas if we measure by reeds it will arise to six times as much, and can only be understood in a mystical sense.

Ver. 2. Of this there shall be for the sanctuary five hundred in length, with five hundred in breadth, square round about.] If we understand these dimensions of cubits, it exactly agrees with the opinion of the Jews, that the temple stood in an area of five hundred cubits square. (See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, chap. 2.) A square figure is the emblem of solidity. (See the note on xlii. 20.)

And fifty cubits round about for the suburbs thereof.] This likewise bears a suitable proportion to the content of a square of five hundred cubits.

Ver. 3. Of this measure shalt thou measure the length of five-and-twenty thousand.] See the note upon ver. 1.

And in it shall be the sanctuary and the most holy place.] Both the outward sanctuary and the inward oracle, or holiest of all, together with the courts adjoining, shall be placed in the centre or middle of it. (See xlviii. 10.)

Ver. 4. And it shall be a place for their houses.] The priests were divided into four-and-twenty courses, (1 Chron. xxiv.) who performed the public worship by turns; so the houses were for them to live in, who were not in their course of waiting.

And a holy place for the sanctuary.] See xlviii. 10.

Ver. 5. And the five-and-twenty thousand of length, and ten thousand of breadth, shall also the Levites have for themselves.] The French translation renders the sense plainer thus, There shall be other five-and-twenty thousand, &c. (See xlviii. 13.) This appears to be the true sense of the place, because else there will be wanting ten thousand in breadth to make an exact square of twenty-five thousand. (See the following verse.) The Levites, being very numerous, (they were reckoned thirty-eight thousand in David's time, 1 Chron. xxiii. 3.) had as large a piece of ground allotted to them as belonged to the temple, and the whole priestly order. The word other is, upon a like occasion, supplied by our interpreters, xlviii. 8.

For twenty chambers.] Most commentators understand this of several rows of chambers, or ranges of building. The LXX. read, Πόλεις κατοικεῖν, cities to inhabit: such cities as were allotted to them by Moses, Numb. xxxv. 2. The copies the Septuagint followed probably read, Narim Lashebeth, instead of the present reading, Nesharim Lesha- coth, כ and ב being easily put one for another. [These twenty chambers with apartments and storehouses, were for the use of the Levites. See 1 Chron. ix. 26. 33. 2 Chron. xxxi. 11, 12. Neh. x. 38, 39.]

Ver. 6. And ye shall appoint the possession of the city five thousand broad, and five-and-twenty thousand long, over against (or, by the side of; see xlviii. 15.) the oblation of the holy portion.] This must run parallel in length with the holy portion, though but half its breadth: by which means these three portions made an exact square, (see xlviii. 20.) as you may see in the following draught.

It shall be for the whole house of Israel.] The capital city, to which all the tribes shall resort upon the solemn festivals, and shall have twelve gates, according to the number of the tribes of Israel; (xlviii. 31.)

Ver. 7. And a portion shall be for the prince on the one side, and on the other side of the oblation of the holy portion, &c.] One half of the prince's portion was to lie on the west side of the three portions laid out for the priests and sanctuary, the Levites and the city; and the other half lay on the east of it, and it lay parallel to them in breadth, from north to south.

And the length shall be over against one of these portions from the west border to the east border.] I think the words may be translated more plainly thus: And the length shall be answerable to every one of these portions, both on the west border and the east; i. e. it shall run parallel with them, both on the east and west side. The word leummath, translated over against, signifies likewise parallel, or answerable, as it hath been observed upon xl. 18. The word echad, one, signifies each one, or every one, and is understood so in this text by Noldius, p. 785. and the phrase, from the west border to the east, is equivalent to that expression which often occurs in the sacred text, from small to great, which is very properly rendered, both small and great.

Ver. 8. In the land shall be his possession in Israel.] Or, this shall be his possession of land in Israel: for the particle la, in laaretz, is sometimes the note of the genitive case; particularly the eighteenth and nineteenth verses of this chapter. Or, As for land, this shall be his possession in Israel.

And my princes shall no more oppress my people.] As they formerly did: for which they are severely reproved. (See xix. 6, 7. xxi. 27. Jer. xxii. 17.)

Ver. 9. Let it suffice you, O ye princes of Israel, &c.] This is a reproof of the oppressions of the former kings, and their chief officers. (See the note upon xliv. 6.)

O ye princes of Israel.] This is to be understood of such princes as the Jews afterward had of the Asmonean race; for there were no more princes to reign of the tribe of Judah till Christ came. (See xxi. 27.)

Ver. 10. Ye shall have just balances, &c.] Ye shall take care that there be no deceit in private trade: ye shall provide just measures both for buying and selling, both dry things and liquid. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 11. The ephah and the bath shall be of one measure.] The ephah was the measure of dry things, as the bath was of liquid: the homer was about ten bushels, which amounts to about eighty gallons in liquid things.

The ephah the tenth part of a homer.] We must distinguish the word homer or chomer, writ with a cheth in the Hebrew, and omer, writ with an ain. The ephah is said here to be the tenth part of a homer, whereas the omer is but the tenth part of an ephah, Exod. xvi. 36.

Ver. 12. And the shekel shall be twenty gerahs.] This is made the standard of the shekel, (Exod. xxx. 13.) which confutes the common opinion, that the weights of the sanctuary were double to those of common use. Bishop Cumberland computes a gerah to be equivalent to an Attic obolus, consisting of almost eleven grains of silver. The shekel is usually valued at two shillings and sixpence of our money; but the same learned author supposes it to be in value but two shillings and fourpence farthing of our money, and a little over. (See his treatise of Scripture Weights and Measures, p. 104, &c.)

Twenty shekels, five-and-twenty shekels, and fifteen shekels, shall be your maneh.] Maneh is the same with the Greek μνᾶ and the Latin mina, being both derived from it. A maneh, or mina, consists of sixty shekels, i. e. thirty ounces of silver: (see ibid. p. 122.) which, reckoning every shekel at two shillings and sixpence value, amounts to seven pounds ten shillings. The dividing the maneh into twenty, twenty-five, and fifteen shekels, supposes there were coins of these several values, which, taken all together, are to be of the same weight with the mina.

Ver. 13. This is the oblation ye shall offer.] The Hebrew word, translated oblation, is trumah: which is always distinguished from the biccurim, or first-fruits, and signifies the portion belonging to the Levites out of the fruits of the earth when they were gathered in. (See xliv. 30.) For which reason, St. Jerome, upon the place, supposes the following words to express the proportion the people ought to pay the Levites out of the increase of their ground; which, by their rabbies, was determined to amount to at least a sixtieth part; in which determination they probably followed the rule laid down in this verse. (Compare ver. 11.) This sense is likewise favoured by the Chaldee paraphrase: after which separation, a tenth part was to be paid out of the remainder. The portions allotted to the priests and Levites were not intended only for their own maintenance, but likewise to make a constant provision for those sacrifices, both ordinary and extraordinary, which were appointed by the law. (See Mal. iii. 10.)

Ver. 14. Concerning the ordinance of oil, a bath of oil, &c.] Or, Concerning the ordinance of oil, even the bath of oil. The cor, and the homer, are mentioned as containing the same quantity; so a bath is the tenth part of a cor, as an ephah is the tenth part of a homer; and the tenth part of a bath of oil is the hundredth part of a cor, which amounts to about six pints of our measure, according to Bishop Cumberland, p. 137.

Ver. 15. And one lamb out of the flock out of two hundred.] This offering is enjoined, besides setting apart the first-born for the use of the priests and Levites, (Numb. xviii. 15.) for making provision for the daily burnt-offering, (Numb. xxxviii. 3.) and for burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, or sacrifices of thanksgiving, that were to be made upon proper occasions. (See xliii. 27.)

Out of the fat pastures of Israel.] This implies, that these lambs were to be of the best and fattest of their kind; (see Mal. i. 8. 14.) as all other tithes and things dedicated to God were to be. (See Numb. xviii. 12.)

For a meat-offering.] These words relate to the thirteenth and fourteenth verses. The meat-offering, which might be more properly translated the bread-offering, being made of fine flour mingled with oil. (Lev. ii. 5, 6.)

To make reconciliation for them.] This effect is ascribed to burnt-offerings, as well as to those which are properly sacrificed for sin. (See Lev. i. 4.)

Ver. 16. All the people of the land shall give this oblation for the prince.] The marginal reading is, with the prince, which makes the plainer sense; i. e. the prince shall join with the people in making these oblations; whereas those that follow, in the next verse, are to be at the sole charge of the prince.

Ver. 17. And it shall be the prince's part to give burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and drink-offerings, in the feasts, and in the new moons, &c.] Or, even in the new moons, as the particle vau often signifies. Meat-offerings and drink-offerings were always joined with burnt-offerings. (See Numb. xxviii. 5. 7.) The particular sacrifices which the prince was to provide upon the sabbaths, and other festivals, are specified, xlvi. 4. 11.

He shall prepare the sin-offering.] i. e. Provide it. Concerning the sin-offering, see xl. 39.

To make reconciliation for the house of Israel.] See ver. 15.

Ver. 18. In the first month, in the first day of the month, thou shalt take a young bullock and cleanse the sanctuary.] The words are directed to the prince, who is commanded, on the first day of the new year, (which, according to the ecclesiastical computation, began with the month Nisan, and answers to our tenth of March; see Exod. xii. 2.) to provide a bullock for a burnt-offering, to cleanse the temple from any defilement it may have contracted, by the people's offering their sacrifices, or coming into any of the courts belonging to it, while they were under any legal pollution. (See Lev. xvi. 19.)

A young bullock without blemish.] Whatever was offered to God was to be perfect, without blemish, and the very best in its kind. (See the note upon ver. 15. and Lev. xxii. 20.)

Ver. 19. And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin-offering.] Of the bullock which was offered for a sin-offering. (See xliii. 19.) The office of the priest is here distinguished from that of the prince: the prince was to provide the sacrifices, and the priest was to offer them.

And put it upon the posts of the house.] Upon the lintels, or the door-posts of the house. (See xli. 21.)

And upon the four corners of the settle of the altar.] See xliii. 14. 20.

And upon the posts of the gate of the inner court.] See xlvi. 1.

Ver. 20. So shall ye do the seventh day of the month, for every one that erreth.] There were particular sacrifices appointed for sins of ignorance, whether of private persons, or of the whole congregation. (See Lev. iv. 13. 27.)

So shall ye reconcile the house.] Cleanse it from any pollution it may have contracted through the ignorance of any of the common people. (See ver. 18.)

Ver. 22. And upon that day shall the prince prepare for himself, &c.] See ver. 17.

Ver. 23. And seven days of the feast he shall prepare a burnt-offering to the Lord.] Moses, in some places, speaks of the feast of unleavened bread, which lasted seven days, as distinct from the day wherein the passover was to be eaten; (see Lev. xxiii. 5, 6.) which is agreeable to the injunction of this and the foregoing verse; and the words may be easily reconciled with those texts, which include the whole solemnity within the compass of seven days, by supposing the passover to be eaten early in the evening, on the fourteenth day, between the two evenings, as the Hebrew text hath it, Exod. xii. 6. Immediately after which ceremony was over, they reckoned the fifteenth day to begin; for they reckoned their days from one evening to another. (See Lev. xxiii. 32.)

Seven bullocks, and seven rams.] Seven was a number often used in religious rites: most of the feasts, under the law, continued seven days; and this number of sacrifices seems to be derived from patriarchal institution, because such a custom prevailed where Moses's law was not known. (See Numb. xxiii. 1, 2. Job xlii. 8.)

And a kid of the goats daily for a sin-offering.] This was the sin-offering most commonly prescribed. (See Numb. xxviii. 15. 22. 30. xxix. 5. 11. 16. 19, &c.)

Ver. 24. And he shall prepare a meat-offering of an ephah, &c.] See ver. 11. 15.

And a hin of oil for an ephah.] For each ephah of fine flour. A hin was the sixth part of an ephah or bath; which contains one gallon and two pints, according to Bishop Cumberland, in the forecited place.

Ver. 25. In the seventh month, in the fifteenth day of the month.] When the feast of tabernacles was kept. (See Lev. xxiii. 34.)

CHAP. XLVI.

ARGUMENT.

A continuation of the ordinances relating to the worship of the prince and people: and concerning the gifts he shall bestow on his sons and servants. Then follows a description of the courts appointed for boiling and baking any part of the holy oblations.

Ver. 1. THE gate of the inner court that looketh towards the east shall be shut the six working days.] See the notes upon xliv. 1, 2.

But on the sabbath it shall be opened, and in the day of the new moon.] Under the sabbath and new moon, all the other feasts may probably be comprehended. (See xlv. 17.)

Ver. 2. And the prince shall enter in by the porch of that gate without.] He shall go through the outer gate of that court, and so pass to the inner gate, where he may see the whole service performed at the altar. Or, the porch of the gate without may signify the farthermost porch of the gate, with respect to those that are coming towards the temple, which is the same with the innermost, in respect of the temple itself. In this sense the word is taken xl. 44. The word michuts, or michutsah, signifies both the hither and the farther side, both being relative terms, and applicable to the same place, as persons are going out or coming into the temple. It signifies the hither side, xl. 19. and the farther side, ibid. ver. 44. and in this verse. So the word neber signifies both the farther and hither side of a river. (See Noldius, p. 660.)

Shall stand by the post of the gate.] i. e. By the entrance of the gate, where there was a seat prepared for him. (See the note upon xliv. 3.)

And the priest shall prepare his burnt-offering.] Or, offer his burnt-offering: for so the verb nasah often signifies, as facio does in Latin.

And he shall worship at the threshold of the gate.] By bowing his head, and bowing down his face to the earth, or falling down upon the ground, as the posture of Divine worship is elsewhere described. (See Gen. xxiv. 26. 52. Exod. xii. 27. 1 Chron. xxix. 20. 2 Chron. xxix. 29. Job i. 20.)

But the gate shall not be shut until the evening.] Because the people were to pay their solemn worship in the same place, as it is prescribed in the following verse.

Ver. 3. Likewise the people of the land shall worship at the door of this gate, &c.] During the continuance of the tabernacle, they that would offer any sacrifice were required to bring it to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and there lay their hands upon the head of it; (Lev. i. 3, 4.) and under the temple they came to the north or south gate of the inner court, according as the sacrifice was to be slain on the north or south side of the altar, and there presented their sacrifice. (See Dr. Lightfoot's Temple, chap. 34.) Here the inner porch of the east gate is assigned for their station, who came to present themselves before the Lord upon the solemn festivals, and they were to come no farther into the inner court.

Ver. 4. And the burnt-offering that the prince shall offer in the sabbath-day, &c.] It was the prince's part to provide sacrifices for the sabbaths and other festivals. (See xlv. 17.) This was a new ordinance, whereupon the number of the beasts that were to be offered, and the proportions of the meat and drink-offerings, are different here from those prescribed in the law: as will appear by comparing the fourth, sixth, seventh, and fourteenth verses of this chapter with Numb. xxviii. 9. 11, 12. 15.

Ver. 5. And the meat-offering shall be an ephah for a ram, and a hin of oil to an ephah.] See xlv. 24.

And the meat-offerings for the lambs, as he shall be able to give.] The margin reads from the Hebrew, according to the gift of his hand, i. e. as much as he shall think sufficient. (See the same expression, Deut. xvi. 17.)

Ver. 8. He shall go in by the way of the porch of that gate.] See ver. 2. To go in at the eastern gate was the privilege of the prince and the priests only: the people were to enter in by the north or south gates, as it is said in the following verse.

Ver. 9. He that entereth in by the north gate to worship, shall go out by the way of the south gate.] The words imply the reason why the people were not to come in at the east gate, because there being no passage or thoroughfare out of the temple westward; if they had entered in at the east gate, they must have returned back the same way they came in, which would have been turning their back upon God, and the place of his residence. (See the note upon viii. 16.) Dr. Spencer mentions this as a rule in the Talmud, that they who come within the holy mount, should enter in by the way of the right hand, and go out by the left; understanding the right hand of the northern part of the temple, and the left hand of the southern: so he is of opinion that God designed to take away that superstitious distinction between the several gates of the temple, by commanding that every one should go out the opposite way to that by which he came in, whether it were towards the north or south. (See lib. iv. de Leg. Hebr. cap. 8.)

Ver. 10. And the prince in the midst of them when they go in, shall go in.] He shall pay the same attendance upon God's worship with the people, since all men are equal in the sight of God.

Ver. 12. When the prince shall prepare a voluntary burnt-offering.] The foregoing verses gave orders about the sacrifices the prince was enjoined to offer upon solemn days: this gives directions concerning free-will-offerings. (Concerning which, see Lev. xxii. 18. 21.)

One shall then open him the gate, &c.] When the service is performed he shall go back the same way; (see ver. 8.) and the porter shall shut the gate after him, because it may not stand open upon ordinary days, (ver. 1.)

Ver. 13. Thou shalt daily prepare a burnt-offering unto the Lord.—Thou shalt prepare it every morning.] The daily evening sacrifice is generally supposed to be here implied, according to prescription of the law, Numb. xxviii. 3, 4. and both together called by the name of the daily sacrifice, Dan. viii. 11, 12. The daily oblation seems to have been provided at the joint charge of prince and people. (See xlv. 16, 17.)

Ver. 14. The sixth part of an ephah, and the third part of a hin of oil.] In Numb. xxviii. 5. the proportion required is the tenth part of an ephah, and the fourth part of a hin of oil.

By a perpetual ordinance unto the Lord.] So the law of the Passover is called a perpetual ordinance, Exod. xii. 17. and likewise ordinances about the first-fruits, Lev. xxiii. 14. The Hebrew word olam is used in each of these places: but that does not always denote perpetuity in a strict sense, but only a remarkable period or succession of time; accordingly the Jews themselves divide the duration of the world into three olams, or ages; that before the law, that under the law, and the times of the Messias.

Ver. 17. It shall be his to the year of liberty.] So the year of jubilee is called by the name of liberty, Lev. xxv. 10. because it freed both men's persons from the service of their masters, and their estates from any engagements, by which the right of them was transferred from their proper owners.

After, it shall return to the prince.] Or to his heirs, if he be dead.

But his inheritance shall be his sons for them.] Or, His inheritance shall belong to his sons, it shall be theirs; so as not to be alienated.

Ver. 18. Moreover the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance by oppression.] As Ahab did, 1 Kings xxi. 16. (Compare xlv. 8.)

That my people be not scattered every man from his possession.] Lest being turned out of their own, they be forced to wander up and down the country for a livelihood.

Ver. 19. Afterward he brought me through the entry, which was at the side of the gate, into the holy chambers of the priests, which looked towards the north.] This entry or private passage (see xlii. 9.) led to the priests' chambers, which were on the north side of the inner court, and are described xl. 44. 46.

Behold, there was a place on the two sides westward.] Or, on their sides westward: i. e. there was an enclosure on the west sides of these chambers: if we follow the sense of the English translation, we may suppose a walk or way between these western buildings, which divided them into two rows, or equal parts. (See chap. xlii. 4.)

Ver. 20. This is the place where the priests shall boil the trespass-offering and the sin-offering.] See xlii. 13. xliv. 29. The flesh of the sacrifices which were to be eaten was to be boiled, except the flesh of the passover. (See 2 Chron. xxxv. 13.) So it is taken notice of as a piece of daintiness, and an over nice palate in the sons of Eli, that they would not have the flesh which came to their share sodden, but roasted, (1 Sam. ii. 15.)

Where they shall bake the meat-offering.] According to the directions given Lev. ii. 4, 5. 7.

That they bear them not into the outer court, to sanctify the people.] The flesh of those sacrifices, and the remainder of the meat-offering, was accounted most holy; (see Lev. vi. 17. 29. vii. 6.) and consequently did convey some holiness to those that touched it. (See the note on xliv. 19.)

Ver. 21. Then he brought me forth to the outer court.] The court of the people, mentioned in the foregoing verse.

And, behold, in every corner of the court there was a court.] At every corner where the side walls met in right angles there was another little court.

Ver. 22. In the four corners of the court there were courts joined of forty cubits long and thirty broad.] These little courts were in the shape of an oblong square, joined with inner walls to the outside walls of the greater court. The Hebrew word keturoh, translated joined, is rendered in the margin, made with chimneys; which sense very well agrees with the description that follows of the uses for which these courts were designed.

Ver. 23. And there was a row of buildings round about in them.] On the inside of these courts.

Ver. 24. These are the places where the ministers of the house shall boil the sacrifice of the people.] As there was a place in the inner court for boiling the trespass and sin-offering, (ver. 19, 20.) so these boiling places might be appointed for boiling the peace-offerings, which were esteemed inferior in holiness to those abovementioned, (see the note upon xlii. 13.) and therefore, perhaps, were dressed by the Levites, or inferior ministers: whereas the former were boiled by the priests in the court properly belonging to them. Although it must be granted, the priests and Levites are often taken promiscuously in this prophecy. (See the note upon xl. 45.)

CHAP. XLVII.

ARGUMENT.

The vision of the holy waters issuing out of the temple, and the virtue of them: together with a description of the several bounds of the holy land, which is to be indifferently shared between the Israelites and the proselytes that sojourned among them.

Ver. 1. AFTERWARD he brought me again unto the door of the house.] The door of the temple, which is described xli. 2.

And, behold, the waters issued out from under the threshold eastward.] There was a great quantity of water necessary for the uses of the temple, for washing the bodies of those that officiated, as well as the sacrifices which they offered. This was conveyed in pipes under ground from the fountain Etam, as Dr. Lightfoot observes from the rabbins, and from Aristeas, an eye-witness. (See his Temple, chap. 23.) These waters gave occasion to the vision here related.

For the forefront of the house stood towards the east.] The inward sanctuary being placed towards the west. (See the note upon viii. 16.)

And the waters came down from under the right side of the house, at the south side of the altar.] This is spoke with respect to those that come out of the temple, and direct their faces eastward, for then the south side is on a man's right hand. These waters were conveyed, by the right side of the altar, into a room they called the well-room. (See Dr. Lightfoot, in the forecited place.)

Ver. 2. Then brought he me out of [or by] the way of the gate northward.] The east gate being shut. (See xlvi. 1.) The prophet in this vision is led to the north gate of the inner court.

And led me about the way without unto the utter gate.] He led me into the outward court, and so on till he came to the outmost north wall, that encompassed the whole mountain of the Lord's house. (See xlii. 20.)

By the way that looketh eastward.] When the prophet was come quite through all the courts, and is on the outside of the outermost, he is directed to come from the north gate towards the east gate.

And, behold, there ran waters out on the right side.] On the south side. (See ver. 1.) These were the spare waters not used in the service of the temple, which were conveyed away by the east part of the mountain, and by degrees increased its stream, till it became a river, and fell at last into the Dead Sea. (See ver. 8. 10. and compare Joel iii. 18.)

Ver. 3. And the man that had the line in his hand went forth eastward.] The angel described with a line in his hand, (xl. 3.) went on directly from the east gate before the holy mountain.

Ibid. and Ver. 4, 5. He measured a thousand cubits, and he brought me through the waters; and the waters were to the ancles, &c.] The gradual rise of the waters represented in this vision, denotes the large effusion of the Spirit, which which was very remarkable at the first publication of the gospel, and its wonderful increase from small beginnings; and will be so again, when God shall pour the spirit of grace upon the Jews, in order to their conversion. (Zech. xii. 10. see the note upon Isa. liv. 13.) The supplies of grace are often represented in the holy writers under the metaphor of a river, and streams watering the dry and thirsty earth, both cleansing and making fruitful the ground where they pass. The metaphor is probably taken from the river that watered Paradise. (See Rev. xxii. 1. and compare Isa. xliv. 3. Zech. xiii. 1. xiv. 8. and see the notes upon Isa. xxx. 25.)

Ver. 6. And he said unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen this?] Hast thou considered or taken notice of this vision now shewed unto thee? (Compare xl. 4.) To see, often signifies to take notice of what we see; on the contrary, they are said to have eyes, and see not, who do not observe what is placed before their eyes.

Then he caused me to return to the brink of the river.] He made me go along by the river side.

Ver. 7. Behold, on the bank of the river were very many trees on the one side and on the other.] The words allude to the trees planted in Paradise, and designed for man's food in the state of innocence, and especially to the tree of life which grew there. (See ver. 12. and compare Rev. xxii. 2.)

Ver. 8. These waters issue out towards the east country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea.] These waters are described as taking their course along the plain or champaigne country (for that is the sense of the word araba, here rendered desert) towards the lake where Sodom formerly stood, called the Dead Sea, and by Moses the Salt Sea. (Compare Deut. iii. 17. with this verse.)

Which being brought forth into the sea the waters shall be healed.] This is the observation of all writers, who describe this lake, that nothing can live in it: and the text here tells us, that these living streams shall, by mixing with these salt and brackish waters, make them wholesome and fit for use: mystically denoting the healing virtue of God's grace to cure the vices and corruptions of wicked men.

Ver. 9. And it shall come to pass, that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the rivers shall come, shall live, &c.] The metaphor is still continued, to this sense: That as the fish which move or swim (compare Gen. i. 20.) in waters cured or made wholesome, have life and nourishment from thence, whereas no fish can live in the Dead Sea: so the waters which flow from the wells of salvation, as the prophet Isaiah expresses it, (Isa. xii. 3.) shall make all those thrive and multiply who enjoy the benefit of them, though their condition before were never so desperate. The word rivers and river are promiscuously used in this verse, though some of the Jewish writers are of opinion, that these waters divide themselves, and some flow eastward, and others westward: which opinion they ground partly upon the plural number used in this verse, but chiefly upon the words of Zechariah, xiv. 8.

Ver. 10. And it shall come to pass, that the fishers shall stand upon it, from En-gedi to En-eglaim.] En-gedi was a town that lay on the south-west of the lake of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called Hazezon-tamar, Gen. xiv. 7. compared with 2 Chron. xx. 2. En-eglaim, or En-gallim, as St. Jerome reads the word, is another on the east side of the same lake, where Jordan falls into it; upon the confines of Moab, as may be conjectured from Isa. xv. 8. which is confirmed by the parallel text in Joel, iii. 18. where it is said, that a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim: which we know was in the country of Moab. (See Numb. xxv. 1.) So these two places denote the whole extent of that lake, which the prophet saith shall be full of fish, still prosecuting the allegory begun in the foregoing verses.

They shall be a place to spread forth their nets.] These two towns shall afford convenience for the fishers to hang out their nets a drying. (See xxvi. 5.)

Their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea.] This lake for plenty of fish may compare with the Mediterranean Sea, called the great sea here, and ver. 15. 19. xlviii. 28. and more distinctly described in Joshua by the great sea westward, Josh. xxiii. 4. Perhaps Christ may allude to this place, when he tells his disciples, he will make them fishers of men, Matt. iv. 19.

Ver. 11. But the miry places shall not be healed; they shall be given to salt.] By those unsound, rotten places, may be understood hypocrites; who shall receive no benefit by these healing waters, no more than some sort of marsh land can be made fruitful: but after all the care or culture that can be bestowed upon it, continues barren and unprofitable, which the Hebrew language expresseth by being given to salt: saltness is equivalent to barrenness in that language: (see Deut. xxix. 23. Psal. cvii. 34. Jer. xvii. 6.) so we read Judg. ix. 45. when Abimelech destroyed Shechem, he sowed the ground whereon it stood with salt, to denote that it should never be cultivated or inhabited again.

Ver. 12. And by the river, upon the bank thereof, shall grow all trees for meat.] See the note on ver. 7.

Whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed.] They shall be perpetually in a thriving condition, like the trees of Paradise, never barren or withering: a proper emblem of the flourishing state of the righteous still bringing forth fruit unto holiness, and whose end is everlasting life. (See Psal. i. 3. Jer. xvii. 8.)

It shall bring forth new fruit according to its months.] It shall be constantly fruitful, not only once a year, as fruit-trees commonly are. (Compare Rev. xxii. 2.)

The fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine.] As the waters issuing from the sanctuary have a healing virtue; (see ver. 8.) so the leaves of the trees shall have the same quality. The expression alludes to the opinion commonly received among naturalists and physicians, that the leaves of several trees are medicinal.

Ver. 13. This shall be the border, &c.] The borders described in the following part of this chapter shall be the limits or boundaries of your country. By the several captivities both of Israel and Judah, the several limits or borders belonging to the inheritance of each tribe were obliterated and forgotten: whereupon here is a new boundary and division made of the holy land, a full possession of which they might have expected to enjoy, if their sins had not prevented such a blessing. This may perhaps be the literal sense of the following part of the prophecy; though there is, without question, a mystical sense implied under this literal description. (See the note on xlviii. 7. 20.)

Joseph shall have two portions.] Upon Reuben's forfeiting his birthright, the double portion belonging to the first-born accrued to Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, according to Jacob's own appointment. (See Gen. xlviii. 5. 1 Chron. v. 1.)

Ver. 14. And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another.] The ten tribes which are scattered abroad, as well as Judah and Benjamin: (see xlviii. 1. 7. 23. 27.) who, together with some of the families of the tribe of Levi, made up the principal part of those who returned from the Babylonish captivity; from hence we may conclude that this prophecy relates to the general restoration of the Jews, an event often foretold in the prophecies of the Old Testament. (See the note upon xxviii. 25.)

Concerning the which I lifted up my hand to give it to your fathers.] See xx. 5, 6.

And this land shall fall unto you for inheritance.] The word fall is taken from the manner of their first acquiring the possession of the land, which was by lot, as it had formerly been, when they first took possession of it. (See ver. 22. and xlviii. 29.) By which means all controversies will be prevented, the lot referring all things to the Divine designation and appointment, (Prov. xvi. 33.)

Ver. 15. From the great sea, the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad.] The northern border of the land was to begin from the west point, on which side lay the Mediterranean Sea, (see ver. 10.) and go on northward towards Hethlon, a place near Damascus: (see xlviii. 1.) and so on forward to Zedad, mentioned Numb. xxxiv. 8.

Ver. 16. Hamath, Berothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath.] The places here mentioned were within this tract of ground. Hamath was the utmost point of the land northward, therefore called the entrance of Hamath, and described as the opposite point to the river of Egypt: (see 1 Kings viii. 65. Amos vi. 14.) the other two towns were situate between Hamath and Damascus.

Hazar-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran.] Or, as our margin reads, the middle villages between Hamath and Hauran, a place lying eastward from Hamath, from whence that country was called Auranitis.

Ver. 17. And the border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan, &c.] Or, Shall be to Hazar-enan, even the border of Damascus, and all the northern frontier, and the border of Hamath; i. e. that tract of land which is called the entrance of Hamath, as was observed before. Your north border shall be, as if a line were drawn from the Mediterranean Sea, along by Hamath, and so to Hazar-enan: (see Numb. xxxiv. 9.) keeping along by the frontier of that part of Syria, called Syria of Damascus: so as to distinguish the northern boundaries of Israel from the southern limits of Syria.

Ver. 18. And the east side ye shall measure from Hauran, and from Damascus, and from Gilead.] Damascus lay more northerly than Hauran, but the country called Auranitis might reach nearer it. Gilead was a long tract of ground that joined to Mount Libanus, and was extended to the land of Zihon, king of the Amorites, as St. Jerome tells us in his book de Locis Hebraicis: it is called the land of Gilead, and reached unto Dan, Deut. xxxiv. 1.

From the land of Israel by Jordan, from the border unto the east sea.] From the northern limits of the land of Israel, (ver. 17.) near Cæsarea or Dan, where the river Jordan takes its rise, unto the Dead Sea, or the lake of Sodom. (See ver. 8.)

Ver. 19. And the south side southward, from Tamar even to the waters of strife in Kadesh, [to] the river, to the great sea.] Compare xlviii. 28. The southern frontiers shall be from En-gedi, called Hazazon-tamar, 2 Chron. xx. 2. (see Dr. Lightfoot's Descript. of the Land of Israel, chap. 6.) to the waters of Meribah, or strife, in Kadesh, (Deut. xxii. 52.) and from thence to the river of Egypt. The river of Egypt riseth out of Mount Paran, taketh its course westward to Rhinocorura, and from thence falls into the Mediterranean, called the great sea, ver. 10. See Gen. xv. 18. Josh. xv. 47. 1 Kings viii. 65. Isa. xxvii. 12. where the LXX. translate it, Ἕως Ῥινοκορούρων, to Rhinocorura, near which it runs. This river seems to be the same with Sihor, mentioned Josh. xiii. 3. though that name be commonly understood to signify the Nile. (See the notes upon Jer. ii. 18.)

Ver. 20. The west side also shall be the great sea from the border.] i. e. From the south border, mentioned in the foregoing verse; so ver. 18. from the border, means the northern border, mentioned ver. 17.

Till a man come over against Hamath.] Or rather, Till a man come to Hamath; for so the particle nad-nocah signifies: (see Noldius, p. 657.) till you come to Hamath, the northern point towards the west frontier.

Ver. 22. Ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you.] See the note upon ver. 14.

And to the strangers that sojourn among you.] Foreigners never before had the privilege of purchasing or possessing any inheritance among the Jews; so this mystically denotes the incorporating the gentiles into the same church with the Jews: making them fellow-heirs, and of the same body with them, by the gospel, Ephes. iii. 6.

They shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel.] In whatsoever tribe they sojourn, as it is expressed in the next verse.

CHAP. XLVIII.

ARGUMENT.

This last chapter contains a description of the several portions of land belonging to each tribe: together with the portions allotted to the sanctuary, city, suburbs, and prince: as also the measure and gates of the new city.

Ver. 1. FROM the north end to the coast of the way of Hethlon.] As the description of the limits, or boundaries of the land, began on the north side, (xlvii. 15, &c.) so the portion of that tribe, to whom the most northern lot fell, is first named, which is Dan.

For these are his sides, east and west.] These are the boundaries belonging to that tribe, from the east point near Mount Libanus and Gilead, to the west point, which is bounded by the Mediterranean Sea. (See xlvii. 15, &c.)

Ver. 2. And by the border of Dan, from the east side to the west side, a portion for Asher.] All along from the south side of Dan, measuring from east to west, shall the share of Asher be.

Ver. 7. And by the border of Reuben—a portion for Judah.] From the first verse to the seventh, the situation of seven of the twelve tribes is described, which were placed on the north side of the holy portion, the length of Judea, from north to south, being divided into twelve equal parts; (see xlvii. 14.) beside the allotment for the holy portion, and for the prince; and the city and temple being placed where they stood formerly, there must be seven shares on the north side of that allotment, and but five on the south side; for Jerusalem did not stand in the middle of the holy land, but more towards the south, as may appear to any one that consults the map of Judea.

But for the fuller explaining this difficulty, we may reasonably conclude, that Judah's portion lay nearest to that which was allotted for the priests and sanctuary, to be a barrier and defence to them against the invasion of Gog and Magog, or any other enemies.

It is the opinion of some learned men, that so particular a description of the several portions allotted to each tribe relates to the Jews' settlement in their own country after their conversion; several passages in the prophets looking that way (see the thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh chapters of this prophecy): but without laying too great a stress upon this opinion, we may fairly suppose some mystical sense contained under this description. The twelve tribes denote the pure Christian church in the New Testament. (See Luke xxii. 30. Rev. vii. 4, &c.) Twelve is a hieroglyphical number in the same book, denoting the true church, built upon the doctrine of the twelve apostles. (See Rev. xii. 1. xxi. 14.) By the same analogy, the number of a hundred and forty and four thousand, Rev. vii. 4. xiv. 1. signifies the church of pure Christians, who continue steadfast in the apostolical doctrine, twelve being the square root, out of which that number ariseth: so this division of the land, among the twelve tribes, may imply, that all true Christians shall be equally sharers in the privileges of the gospel.

Ver. 8. And by the border of Judah, from the east side unto the west side, shall be the offering which ye shall offer of five-and-twenty thousand reeds in breadth.] Next to the border of Judah, which runs in length from east to west, shall be the offering ye shall set apart for the service of God, (xlv. 1.) The word reeds is not in the original, either here or in that text; and we may more probably understand the measure in both places of cubits. (See the note there.)

And in length as one of the other parts [are] from the east side to the west side.] Which was likewise five-and-twenty thousand, according to the dimensions of the holy portion set down, xlv. 1. 6. For the oblation was to be four-square, consisting of five-and-twenty thousand, multiplied by five-and-twenty thousand. (See ver. 20. of this chapter.)

Ver. 9. The oblation that ye shall offer unto the Lord shall be of five-and-twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth.] This shall be set apart for the sanctuary, and the most holy place, and the priests' houses. (See xlv. 3, 4.)

Ver. 10. Towards the north five-and-twenty thousand in length, and towards the west ten thousand in breadth, &c.] The dimensions from east to west are called by the name of breadth here, but of length ver. 8. And so they truly are, as may appear from the plan of the whole, described in the notes upon the forty-fifth chapter: but if we suppose that space of ground, which is expressed by the breadth in one place, to be called by the name of length in another, there will be no impropriety in the expression; because in an exact square, as the whole compass of ground is here supposed to be, all sides are equal.

Ver. 11. It shall be for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok.] See xliv. 10. 15.

As the Levites went astray.] Or, As the other Levites went astray: so the word other is supplied ver. 8. The Levites denote, in general, the sons of Levi, so as to comprehend the priests too. (See ver. 22.) Many of these had defiled themselves with idolatry; for which crime they were to be degraded from the honours and privileges due to those priests who had continued faithful in their office. (See the note upon xliv. 10, 11.)

Ver. 12. And this oblation—shall be unto them a thing most holy.] As all things dedicated to God were. (See Lev. xxvii. 28.)

By the border of the Levites.] It shall lie next to the portion of the Levites, which lay southward, between the priests' and the city's portion. (See the scheme placed at the forty-fifth chapter.)

Ver. 13. And over against the border of the priests, the Levites shall have five-and-twenty thousand in length, &c.] It might be better translated, just by the border of the priests, or beside the border of the priests, as the word leummath is translated in our English Bible, x. 19. xi. 22. The words import, that the border of the Levites ran parallel to that of the priests: and to the same sense the word should be translated in the fifteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-first verses of this chapter. (See the note upon xl. 18.)

Ver. 14. They shall not sell of it, neither exchange, nor alienate the first-fruits of the land, &c.] It being God's portion, they were not to sell nor part with it upon any pretence of advantage, or greater convenience. This portion of land is called the first-fruits, as it is styled an oblation, ver. 8. 12. to denote that the whole land was God's property. (See the note upon xlv. 1.)

Ver. 15. And the five thousand that are left in the breadth, over against [or beside, see ver. 13.] the five-and-twenty thousand.] Which was the portion assigned to the Levites, ver. 13. This five thousand, added to the five-and-twenty thousand in length, and two ten thousands in breadth, mentioned ver. 10. makes up a square of five-and-twenty thousand every way. (See ver. 20.)

Shall be for a profane place for the city, &c.] See xlv. 6. It is called a profane place comparatively, because it was not so holy as the temple and the sanctuary. (See the note upon xlii. 20.)

And the city shall be in the midst thereof.] A square piece of ground, of four thousand and five hundred cubits on every side, shall be taken out of the middle of the five-and-twenty thousand cubits in length, for the area of the city, (ver. 16.)

Ver. 16. And these shall be the measures thereof; the north side four thousand and five hundred, &c.] It shall be an equilateral square, every side being exactly of the same measure, consisting in all of eighteen thousand measures. (See ver. 35.)

Ver. 17. And the suburbs of the city shall be towards the north two hundred and fifty, and towards the south two hundred and fifty, &c.] These dimensions of the suburbs, added to those of the city, make the whole area an equilateral square, of five thousand cubits on every side; adding five hundred in breadth, and five hundred in length, to the four thousand five hundred cubits, which was the compass of the city.

Ver. 18. And the residue in length, over against [or beside, see ver. 13.] the oblation of the holy portion, shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward.] These two dimensions of ten thousand in length, both eastward and westward, remain on each side of the area, which is five thousand cubits square, and set apart for the site of the city.

It shall be over against [or beside] the oblation of the holy portion.] It shall join to the Levites' portion, both on the east and west side; and it shall lie parallel with the two portions belonging to the priests and Levites. (Consult the scheme placed above.)

And the increase thereof shall be for food to them that serve in the city.] That perform inferior offices in the city. The priests and Levites having a large portion already assigned for their sustenance.

Ver. 19. And they that serve the city shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel.] This service being a burden, it is fit that all the tribes should bear their part in it.

Ver. 20. All the oblation shall be five-and-twenty thousand by five-and-twenty thousand.] Five-and-twenty thousand in length multiplied by five-and-twenty thousand in breadth. (See ver. 10.)

Ye shall offer the oblation four-square.] So the heavenly Jerusalem is described as lying four-square, Rev. xxi. 16. a square figure being the emblem of perpetuity, strength, and solidity. (Compare xlii. 16. 20.)

A great part of the wisdom of the eastern nations was wrapped up in hieroglyphical emblems and numbers. The symbols of Pythagoras are a remarkable instance of this sort of ancient learning. This method God hath thought fit to make use of to discover some mysterious truths in his word: such as perhaps he thinks not convenient to be more clearly revealed till its proper time and season: intending by such obscure hints to encourage men's searching into the more abstruse parts of the Scriptures, and to shew that all human knowledge may be made subservient to Divine.

The text before us, compared with its parallel in the forty-second chapter of this prophecy and in the Revelation, plainly shews that a square is an emblematical figure. In like manner the number twelve is a sacred number, as I observed upon ver. 7. and the learned Mr. Potter, in his book of the Number 666, hath with great acuteness reconciled the twelve thousand furlongs, the measure of the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, with the measures of Ezekiel here, by interpreting them of solid measures, and extracting the root of each of them.

With the possession of the city.] Or, the land assigned for the site of the city: which was a square of five thousand cubits; and being added to the portion of the priests and Levites, made their twice ten thousand to be five-and-twenty thousand in breadth. (See ver. 10. 15.)

Ver. 21. And the residue shall be for the prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy oblation, and of the possession of the city.] The prince's part shall be extended both on the east and west side of the several allotments belonging to the priests, the Levites, and the city. The particular extent of the prince's portion is not here specified, but it is computed by some to contain above four times as much as those allotments. (See the note upon ver. 22.)

Over against the five-and-twenty thousand of the oblation towards the east border, and westward over against the five-and-twenty thousand towards the west border.] The particle el-pené, translated over against, is rendered before in the parallel text, xlv. 7. and thus interpreted makes the sense clearer; the words then importing, that the prince's portion ran along eastward and westward, like a frontier before the holy portions. (See the forementioned scheme.)

Over against the portions for the prince: and it shall be the holy oblation, &c.] Our translation hath rendered the latter part of this verse very imperfectly: which should be thus translated: Beside these [or joining to these] portions, (so leummath signifies, see ver. 13.) shall be that belonging to the prince: and this shall be the holy oblation, and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof. The last part of the sentence is only a recapitulation of what is said more at large, ver. 8.

Ver. 22. Moreover, from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city, being in the midst of that which is the prince's.] The words might be more plainly translated thus, Moreover beyond the possession of the Levites, and beyond the possession of the city—to this sense: that the possession belonging to the priests, and Levites, (see ver. 11.) and the city, were bounded on the east and west side with the prince's portion: so those lay in the middle, and this beyond them. The Hebrew particle min signifies beyond, in several places: examples of which may be seen in Noldius, p. 564.

Between the border of Judah, and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince.] The border of Judah was extended from east to west, next to the holy portion on the north side, (see ver. 1. 8.) The portion of Benjamin lay from east to west next the allotment set apart for the city, on the south side, (ver. 23. 28.) The several portions allotted for the priests, the Levites, and the city, extended only to the length of five-and-twenty thousand cubits from east to west: so that whatever ground ran in a parallel line eastward and westward beyond that boundary, even to the land's-end, belonged to the prince: and supposing the whole country to be sixty miles in breadth (as St. Jerome reckons it from Joppa to Jordan, Epist. ad Dardanum), and the holy portion about seven miles square, (see the note upon xlv. 1.) there will remain above six-and-twenty miles both on the east and west side for the prince's share. (See the scheme placed at the forty-fifth chapter.)

Ver. 23. As for the rest of the tribes, from east to west, Benjamin shall have a portion.] The portion assigned to Judah was situate next to the holy portion on the north side. (See ver. 1. 8.) The portion assigned to Benjamin lay next to the ground allotted for the city on the south side. (See ver. 28.) All these allotments run from east to west in length, and from north to south in breadth.

Ver. 24—27. And by the border of Benjamin, &c.] In these verses the four remaining tribes have their allotments assigned them, lying on the south side of the holy portion. These appointments are not laid out with any regard to the division of the land made in Joshua's time; for here a platform of a new church and state is set forth.

Ver. 28. And by the border of Gad, at the south side—the border shall be towards the great sea.] This is a description of the southermost borders of the land, extending by the south and west to the Mediterranean Sea. (See xlvii. 19.)

Ver. 29. This is the land which ye shall divide by lot, &c.] See xlvii. 14. 22.

Ver. 30. And these are the goings out of the city, on the north side, &c.] The same measures of the city are already set forth, (ver. 16.) beginning with those on the north side, as the general division of the land doth. (See ver. 1.)

Ver. 31. And the gates of the city shall be after the names of the tribes of Israel.] The same description is given of the gates of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 12, 13. to signify that all true Israelites have their share in this heavenly city, and a right to enter into it, (Rev. xxii. 14.)

Ver. 35. And it was round about eighteen thousand measures.] See ver. 16.

And the name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is there.] Jerusalem was formerly called the city of God, (Psal. lxxxvii. 3.) and the city of the great King, (Psal. xlviii. 2.) But in this New Jerusalem, God shall dwell in a more glorious manner, and make it the place of his perpetual residence. So that every part of that city shall be honoured with evident tokens of the Divine presence; and every member of it being dedicated to God's service, and becoming a habitation of God through his Spirit, shall have some degree of the holiness of the temple, where God had placed his name, (1 Kings viii. 29. compare with Rev. xxi. 22.) This is in a lower degree fulfilled in all good Christians, who are called the temples of the living God, 2 Cor. vi. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 5. and a habitation of God through the Spirit, Eph. ii. 22.

THE PROPHECY OF DANIEL,

AND

THE TWELVE MINOR PROPHETS.

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

WILLIAM,

LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY;

PRIMATE OF ALL ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN; AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY-COUNCIL.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,

HAVING had the honour to offer some former parts of my Commentary upon the Prophets to your Grace, I beg leave to lay this last and finishing part of my design at your Grace's feet, humbly entreating your favourable acceptance of my sincere endeavours to give what light I could to this important part of the Holy Writings.

The obscurity which is found in some passages of these prophecies, particularly in those of Daniel, hath exercised the thoughts of inquisitive men, in the foregoing ages of the church. But we, upon whom the ends of the world are come, seem to have an advantage above those that went before us: forasmuch as it may be reasonably supposed, that the nearer the events foretold are to their accomplishment, the greater light several providential occurrences may afford to the predictions themselves.

The prophecy of Daniel is an undeniable proof of an overruling Providence, that changes times and seasons, that removeth one government, and setteth up another. For what foresight was able so exactly to describe the orderly succession of the four great monarchies, but that of the Eternal Mind, whose wisdom reacheth from one end to another mightily, and sweetly orders all things? Who declares the end from the beginning, and from ancient times things which are not yet come to pass; saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.

That holy Prophet was adorned with such extraordinary endowments, as seldom are found in one person: being not only honoured with the gift of prophecy, but likewise advanced to bear rule over kingdoms, by reason of that excellent spirit which was found in him: this might afford me a proper occasion to draw a parallel between his and your Grace's accomplishments, which have qualified you to sustain the highest office in the church, and the greatest trusts in the state. But I shall forbear pursuing this subject, being well assured that your Grace takes greater satisfaction in performing worthy deeds, than hearing the report of them proclaimed by others: and shall conclude with my hearty prayers, that your Grace may also resemble the felicity of Daniel, in enjoying a long and prosperous life here, and may then be translated to an endless happiness hereafter.

I am, may it please your Grace,

Your Grace's most dutiful and obedient servant,

WILLIAM LOWTH.

CONCERNING THE AUTHOR AND THE SUBJECT

OF THE ENSUING

PROPHECY.

THE prophet Daniel was descended of the royal family of the kings of Judah; so that in the captivity of himself and his companions was fulfilled that prophecy of Isaiah, that the king's issue should be eunuchs, or officers, to the king of Babylon. (Isa. xxxix. 7.) The later Jews do not reckon Daniel among the prophets; but herein they contradict the sense of the more ancient ones, and particularly of Josephus, who calls him one of the greatest of the prophets, and saith, that he did not only foretell future things, which was common to him with other prophets, but also prefixed a time for their coming to pass. (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12.) Our Saviour's authority is decisive in this matter, who expressly calls Daniel a prophet, Matt. xxiv. 15. wherein he likewise spoke the sense of the Jews of that time. And if we consider the important subject of some of his prophecies, wherein he plainly points out the time of Christ's coming and sufferings, and the large extent of others of them, giving an account of the succession of four monarchies unto the end of the world, he may justly be reckoned among the first of that order. Daniel and St. John had both of them the honour of being persons greatly beloved by God and Christ: (compare Dan. x. 11. with John xiii. 23.) so the latter, in his Revelation, doth more distinctly unfold those events which the former foretells in general terms, as Mr. Mede has observed. (See his Works, p. 787.)

This prophecy is writ partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee: for which this reason may be assigned; that those parts of it in which the Babylonian empire was concerned were writ in their language, viz. from ii. 4. to the end of the seventh chapter; a great part of which was probably entered into their public registers. (See a like instance, Esth. ii. 23.)

St. Jerome tells us in the preface to his Commentary upon Daniel, that Porphyry had the boldness to affirm, that the prophecies of Daniel relating to the kings of Syria and Egypt, (chap. xi.) were written after the times of Antiochus Epiphanes: this was plainly granting the truth of the matters of fact therein contained, as St. Jerome observes; and the falsity of his assertion clearly appears from hence, that this prophecy was translated into Greek a hundred years before Antiochus's time, and that translation was in the hands of the Egyptians, who had no kindness either for the Jews or their religion. Nay, farther, the prophecies of Daniel foretelling the great successes of Alexander, (viii. 5. xi. 3.) were shewed to Alexander himself by the Jews, who thereupon obtained several privileges from him, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8.

Daniel lived in great favour under Nebuchadnezzar and his successors in the Babylonian monarchy; his extraordinary merits continued him in the same degree of favour under Darius and Cyrus, the two first Persian monarchs: and, as Josephus observes (ubi supra), "he was the only prophet that enjoyed a great share of worldly prosperity." He must needs have lived to a great age, it being near seventy years from the date of his first prophecy (ii. 1.) to that of his last, (x. 1.) Our learned chronologer, Bishop Lloyd, supposes him to have been carried into captivity, when he was about twenty years old: about ten years after we find him famed for his piety and wisdom, as appears from Ezek. xiv. 14. xxviii. 3. His last vision was in the third year of Cyrus, (Dan. x. 1.) at which time he was about ninety-four years of age, and it is not likely he lived much longer.

There need not any thing be said concerning the three additions to Daniel, viz. The Song of the three Children, the History of Susannah, and of Bel and the Dragon: since they manifestly appear to have been the productions of Hellenists of later times, and accordingly are rejected as apocryphal, by St. Jerome, in the prefaces to his translation, and to his Commentary on Daniel, and by other ancient writers.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

The first chapter gives an account of the captivity of Daniel, and his companions, together with the manner of their education under the king of Babylon.

Ver. 1. IN the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon to Jerusalem.] The prophet Jeremiah makes the first year of Nebuchadnezzar coincident with the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and from thence begins the date of the seventy years' captivity: (see Jer. i. 11. xxv. 1.) but here Daniel speaks of Nebuchadnezzar as king of Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim. To this objection Dr. Prideaux gives an easy answer: (Script. Connex. par. i. p. 60. edit. 8vo.) That Daniel begins his computation from the time that Nebuchadnezzar was sent by his father on the expedition against Pharaoh-Nechoh, king of Egypt, which was towards the latter end of the third year of Jehoiakim. In the beginning of the following year he conquered the Egyptians, which was the fourth year of Jehoiakim; (see Jer. xlvi. 2.) and in the latter end of the same year he came and besieged Jerusalem in the ninth month, according to the Jews' account, who to this day keep a fast, on the eighteenth day of that month, in memory of this taking of Jerusalem. At which time Jehoiakim became tributary to the king of Babylon, and consequently the seventy years of captivity and vassalage to Babylon began.

It has been observed in the notes upon Jer. xxv. 1. that the Scripture account of the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's reign anticipates the computation of Ptolemy's Canon two years, which two years Nebuchadnezzar reigned with his father, as Josephus informs us from Berosus, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11.

Ver. 2. And the Lord gave Jehoiakim into his hand.] He took Jehoiakim prisoner, and put him in chains, with a design to carry him to Babylon: but he having humbled himself, and submitted to become his tributary, he was restored to his kingdom. (Comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 1. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.)

And part of the vessels of the house of God.] See 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7. compared with Dan. v. 2, 3. Some of the vessels were still left, which Nebuchadnezzar seized when he carried Jeconiah captive. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 13. Jer. xxvii. 19, 20.)

Into the land of Shinar.] This was the original name of the country about Babylon, (Gen. xi. 2.) and it was still called by this name in some places of the prophets. (See Isa. xi. 11. Zech. v. 11.)

And he brought the vessels into the treasure-house of his god.] Of the idol Bel: (see Jer. l. 2.) from whence they were taken by Cyrus, and delivered to Zerubbabel, (Ezra i. 7, 8.) To this agrees the testimony of Berosus apud Josephum, (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11.) who tells us, "That Nebuchadnezzar adorned the temple of Bel with the spoils of war which he had taken in that expedition."

Ver. 3. And the king spake unto Ashpenaz, master of the eunuchs.] One of the chief officers of his palace; the officers that attended about the persons of the eastern kings being commonly eunuchs: a custom still practised in the Ottoman court.

That he should bring certain of the children of Israel, and of the king's seed, &c.] The words may be better translated, even of the king's seed; the conjunction copulative being often used by way of explication. (See Noldius's Concordance, p. 276. and the note upon Isa. li. 19.) And thus Isaiah's prophecy was punctually fulfilled, xxxix. 7. as hath been observed in the Preface.

Ver. 4. Children in whom was no blemish, &c.] He was directed to make choice of such as had the best accomplishments both of body and mind, and were fit to give attendance in a king's court. The word yeladim, children, is used in Scripture of such as are past the years of childhood, as we now distinguish the parts of man's life. It is applied to Rehoboam's counsellors, 1 Kings xii. 8. who cannot be thought mere children, since Rehoboam himself was of an advanced age. Nor can we suppose Daniel and his companions less than twenty years of age at this time, as may be concluded from their being put into considerable posts in the government in a short time after, (ii. 48, 49.)

Whom they might teach the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans.] Besides the study of politics and the art of war, the learning chiefly valued among them was astrology, or the knowledge of the heavenly motions, the interpretation of dreams, and architecture. (See the notes upon ver. 17. 20.)

The tongue of the Chaldeans.] The same was likewise called the Syrian language. (See ii. 4.)

Ver. 5. And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, &c.] In like manner it was a custom of the Persian kings to feed their domestics with the remainder of their own tables. (See Athenæus, lib. iv. cap. 10.)

Ver. 7. He gave unto Daniel the name of Belteshazzar, &c.] According to the name of his god, as Nebuchadnezzar himself derives the word, iv. 8. So the name was derived from Bel, the chief idol of Babylon, as Nebuchadnezzar had his own name from Nebo, another of their idols, mentioned Isa. xlvi. 1. and Evil-Merodach, his successor, was named from their idol Merodach, Jer. l. 2. It is probable that the other names imposed upon Daniel's companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, were derived from some of their idols. Misael, a word derived from El, the name of the true God, may probably have been changed into Meshach, because Sac was an idol worshipped by the Chaldeans. (See the note upon Jer. xxv. 26.)

Ver. 8. But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, &c.] It was the custom of most nations, before their meals, to make an oblation of some part of what they ate and drank to their gods, as a thankful acknowledgment, that every thing they enjoyed was their gift. These oblations were called prosiciæ and libamina among the Romans; so that every entertainment had something in it of the nature of a sacrifice. This practice generally prevailing, made Daniel and his friends look upon the provisions coming from the king's table as no better than meats offered to idols, and, by being so offered, to be accounted unclean and polluted. (See Ezek. iv. 13. Hos. ix. 3. compare with Acts xv. 20.) [The portion of the king's meat.] The word in the Hebrew is path-bag: from whence Scaliger derives the word ποτίβασις, mentioned in Athenæus as a dish served up to the table of the Persian kings, being a mixture of corn and wine together. See his notes upon Eusebius, p. 112.]

Ver. 9. Now God had brought Daniel into favour with the prince of the eunuchs.] See a like instance of God's care over Joseph, when he was a poor captive and prisoner, and destitute of all friends to support or comfort him: Gen. xxxix. 11. and compare Psal. cvi. 46.

Ver. 10. Than the children of your sort.] Or, Of your age; for so the word gile signifies in the Arabic, and to this sense the Greek translation understands it.

Ver. 12. Let them give us pulse to eat.] The Hebrew word zeronim signifies all sorts of garden roots or herbs. (See Isa. lxi. 11.)

Ver. 17. God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom.] In all sorts of learning and knowledge: so that it became a proverb, Thou art wiser than Daniel, Ezek. xxviii. 3. They were particularly skilful in those parts of the Chaldean learning which were really useful, and might recommend them to the favour of the kings both of Babylon and Persia, and qualify them for places of trust under them. So Moses's education in the Egyptian learning, (Acts vii. 22.) fitted him to be a ruler of God's people.

And Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams.] It was an opinion generally received in the early ages of the world, that dreams, when they were attended with unusual circumstances, did portend or signify some future event. This subject Tully handles at large in his first book de Divinatione, and alleges some very remarkable instances of that kind. Homer speaks the general sense of his own age, when he saith, καὶ γὰρ τ' ὄναρ ἐκ Διός ἐστιν: even a dream comes from God. The authority of Joseph is still more ancient, who saith, Do not interpretations [of dreams] come from God? (Gen. xli. 8.) The next evidence, in point of antiquity, is the book of Job, where Eliphaz relates a night-vision he himself had, which instructed him in a truth of great importance, (Job iv. 12, &c. xxxiii. 14, 15.) Elihu affirms, that God speaks once, yea, twice to men—in a dream, in a vision of the night: which, indeed, was the common way by which God revealed his will to the patriarchs of old, and afterward to the prophets. (See Gen. xxviii. 12, &c. xxxi. 11. Numb. xii. 6.) To descend to later times, the son of Sirach, when he discourses of the vanity of dreams, yet makes this exception, Unless they be sent from the Most High, (Ecclus. xxxiv. 1. 6.)

Ver. 18. At the end of the days that the king had said he should bring them in.] At the end of three years. (See ver. 5.)

Ver. 19. Therefore they stood before the king.] They were in continual attendance in the king's court. So Joseph stood before Pharaoh, Gen. xli. 46. The same expression is used of Elijah and Jeremiah, as God's servants and messengers, 1 Kings xvii. 1. Jer. xv. 19. and the Levites are said to stand before the congregation, to minister to them, Numb. xvi. 9.

Ver. 20. He found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm.] The words may be understood of those that employed themselves in the lawful search of natural causes and effects, and of the regular motions of the heavenly bodies. For when Daniel made intercession to the captain of the guard, that the wise men of Babylon might not be slain, (ii. 24.) we cannot suppose all of them were such as studied unlawful arts and sciences, since he himself was afterward made master or head over them: (ii. 48.) and if no part of the Chaldean learning might lawfully be studied, they that would not defile themselves with the king's meat, would have refused to be instructed in that way of education which he had appointed, as St. Jerome observes upon ver. 8. In like manner, the wise men mentioned Matt. ii. 1. called Μαγοὶ in the original, may be supposed such as employed themselves in observing the motions of the heavenly bodies, and might reasonably suppose that the new star they had seen, in that region of the heavens which the astrologers appropriated to Judea, did portend the birth of that Prince whom the Jews expected should be born about this time, and had spread such an expectation over a great part of the world: as a learned prelate hath lately shewed, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, chap. 1.

[Astrologers.] The word in the Hebrew is Assaphim, which coming near in sound to the Greek Σοφοὶ, hath made some conjecture that it was derived from thence. But the true derivation of it is either from the verb tsapha, or sapha, signifying to view carefully, from whence comes the word tsophim, watchmen, a name given to the prophets: or else from tsaphah, to hide, from whence the author of Ecclesiasticus derives the Greek sophia; wisdom, saith he, is according to her name, and she is not manifest unto many: (vi. 22.) See the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Vindication, book i. chap. 1. sect. 2.]

Ver. 21. And Daniel continued even to the first year of king Cyrus.] He lived to see the overthrow of the Babylonish monarchy by Cyrus: which made way for the fulfilling of Jeremiah's prophecy concerning the seventy weeks, in the return of the Jews from their captivity; which was accomplished in the first year of king Cyrus: (Ezra i. 1.) for the accomplishment of which prophecy we find Daniel very solicitous, ix. 1, 2. This being so remarkable a year, the text takes notice that Daniel lived so long: not but that he lived longer, at least till the third year of Cyrus, as appears from x. 1. The word unto, or until, does not always exclude the time following the period mentioned. (See Psal. cx. 1. cxii. 8.)

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

An account of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, the substance of which he had forgot, and the wise men of Chaldea could not relate to him: who are thereupon threatened with death: Daniel rescues them from that imminent danger, relates the dream to the king, and interprets it of the four great monarchies; and how, in the latter times of the fourth, God would set up the kingdom of the Messiah. Upon this the king advances him and his friends to considerable posts of honour.

Ver. 1. AND in the second year of the reign of king Nebuchadnezzar.] This was the fourth year of his reign, according to the Scripture computation: (see the note upon i. 1.) for above three years must have been expired since the time of Daniel's captivity. (See i. 5. 8.) But Daniel, writing the following history in Chaldee for the use of the Chaldeans, follows that computation of time which was in use among them.

Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams.] Though it was but one continued dream, it contained divers scenes of affairs; being a description of the succession of the four monarchies, which were to continue, under different forms, unto the end of the world.

And his sleep brake from him.] Or, Went from him, as a like phrase is rendered, vi. 18. The preposition al, sometimes signifies from, as Noldius shews in several instances, Concordance, p. 689.

Ver. 2. Then the king commanded to call the magicians and the astrologers.] See the note upon i. 20. Daniel and his companions did not appear among them: perhaps because the Chaldeans despised them as youths and strangers, and would not have them thought equal in knowledge with themselves.

And the sorcerers.] This word is always taken in an ill sense by the holy writers, for those that consult with evil spirits.

And the Chaldeans.] The Chaldeans were so much addicted to the study of the heavenly motions, and to make prognostications from thence, that the word Chaldean is used both in Greek and Latin writers for an astrologer.

Ver. 4. Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriac.] The ancient Chaldee and the Syrian language were the same. (See Gen. xxxi. 47. 2 Kings xviii. 26. Ezra iv. 7.) This language is found in its greatest purity in the books of Daniel and Ezra. The Jews, in the time of their captivity, mixed several Hebrew words with the Chaldean language, and this is the Chaldee in which the Targums upon the law and the prophets are writ, and is called the Hebrew tongue in the New Testament. The language spoken in Antioch, and other parts of Syria, differs as a dialect from the two former, and, being written in a different character, is what we now call Syriac. (See Bishop Walton, Prolegom. xiii. ad Bibl. Polyglot. and Dr. Prideaux's Connex. par. ii. p. 539. edit. 8vo.)

The following part of the chapter from this verse is writ in Chaldee, and so on to the end of the seventh chapter: the reasons of which see in the Preface.

Ver. 5. Ye shall be cut in pieces.] A punishment, of which other places of Scripture make mention. (See 1 Sam. xv. 33. 1 Chron. xx. 3.) Our Saviour alludes to it, Matt. xxiv. 51.

And your house shall be made a dunghill.] That there might be no remains left of their memory. (See Ezra vi. 11.)

Ver. 6. But if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, ye shall receive gifts and rewards.] Such as the king actually bestowed upon Daniel, after he had interpreted the dream, ver. 48. (Compare v. 16.)

Ver. 8. I know of a certainty that you would gain the time.] By importunately renewing your request that I would recollect my dream, you only protract the time, and delay the execution of the sentence pronounced against you, ver. 5. Buying or redeeming the time is a proverbial expression, denoting men's using their utmost endeavours to free themselves out of some imminent danger or difficulty: gaining time, being a considerable advantage to that purpose. (See the following verse.) In this sense St. Paul uses the phrase, Ephes. v. 16. Colos. iv. 5.

Ver. 9. There is but one decree for you.] The sentence of death already pronounced shall certainly be put in execution.

For you have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me, till the time be changed.] Ye have only contrived feigned excuses to protract the time, in hopes that circumstances might possibly alter, and so you might escape punishment.

Ver. 11. And there is none other that can shew it before the king, except that God, whose dwelling is not with flesh.] These Chaldeans undertook to foretell future events by their skill in the motions of the stars: and to explain dreams by some natural observations, such as are still to be seen in Artemidorus's Oneirocritics. Or if they pretended to have correspondence with spirits, they were the demons of a lower rank, who could not impart to them things so much above the compass of ordinary knowledge. (Compare ver. 28. and v. 11.)

Ver. 12. For this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon.] He might in his rage and fury not think of sending for Daniel; which made Daniel try to get admission to the king, (ver. 14, &c.) to prevent his own destruction, as well as that of the other wise men.

Ver. 13. And they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain.] Though they had not been summoned with the wise men of Chaldea. (See ver. 2.)

Ver. 14. Then Daniel answered with counsel and wisdom to Arioch the captain of the king's guard.] With whom he was in favour. (See i. 9.) The Vulgar Latin translates the former part of the sentence thus; "Tunc Daniel requisivit de lege et sententia," Daniel inquired concerning the law and decree, which the king had made for destroying the wise men. The word tenem, translated here wisdom, usually signifies an edict, or public decree, set forth by authority.

Ver. 16. Then Daniel went in, and desired of the king that he would give him time, &c.] The king's anger was now abated, and withal the providence of God was visible, in inclining the king's heart to allow Daniel that favour which he had before denied to the magicians, (ver. 8.)

Ver. 18. That they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret.] The danger equally threatened Daniel and his friends, therefore it was fit they should join in prayer for the averting of it.

Ver. 19. Then was the secret revealed to Daniel in a night vision.] The same with a dream. (See Job iv. 13. xxxiii. 15.)

Ver. 20. For wisdom and might are his.] His wisdom appears in ordering the great affairs of the world, and his might or power in bringing them to pass. To the same purpose Jeremy styles him, great in counsel, and mighty in work, Jer. xxxii. 19.

Ver. 21. And he changeth the times and the seasons, he removeth kings, and setteth up kings.] The great changes of the world are brought to pass by removing kings, and translating their dominions to others: by raising some empires, and pulling down others. Of this, Nebuchadnezzar's dream that was then revealed to Daniel was a signal instance: which contained the succession of the four great monarchies of the world. The prophet speaks of the disposal of governments as one of God's prerogatives, and the means whereby he brings to pass the most considerable changes which are wrought in the world. The Psalmist speaks to the same purpose, Psal. lxxv. 6, 7. This is a very good reason to persuade men to submit to such changes and revolutions being brought to pass by Providence for great and wise reasons. (See iv. 17. Jer. xxvii. 5, 6.)

Ver. 22. He knoweth what is in darkness, and the light dwelleth with him.] He knoweth the most secret things, while they yet lie hid in their causes, and can discover and bring them to light. (Compare v. 11. 14.)

For thou hast made known unto us the king's matter.] See the note upon ver. 36.

Ver. 24. Destroy not the wise men of Babylon.] Some of them might probably employ themselves in laudable studies, and searches after knowledge. (See the note upon i. 20.) However, here was no just cause given for putting them to death.

Ver. 25. I have found a man of the captives of Judah, that will make known to the king the interpretation.] Daniel undertook to do it of his own accord, (ver. 24.) but this officer, according to the manner of courtiers, takes this opportunity of ingratiating himself to the king, as if the discovery of Daniel's abilities in this kind was owing purely to his diligence.

Ver. 27. The soothsayers.] This word is not met with before among the several sorts of pretenders to wisdom among the Chaldeans, mentioned ver. 2. The Chaldee word is gazerin, which some think answers the Latin aruspices: who pretended to foretell events by tokens found in the entrails of the living creatures which they sacrificed.

The Greek translation which St. Jerome tells us was Theodotion's, retains the Chaldee word, and reads γαζαρηνῶν, which shews he did not understand the true import of that original.

Ver. 28. But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets.] Daniel assumes nothing to himself, but gives the glory to God alone, whose knowledge, as he tells the king, infinitely exceeds that of all the wise men of Chaldea, and of the gods or demons which they consulted or worshipped.

And maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days.] God only can certainly foreknow such future events as depend upon contingent causes, and the determination of man's free-will. (See Isa. xli. 22, 23.) The latter days very often signify the times of the Messias, called the last times, or age of the world; (see the note upon Isa. ii. 2.) and so the expression may be understood here; for the prophecy contained in this vision reaches to the times when the kingdom of the Messias shall be set up. (See ver. 44. and compare x. 14.)

Ver. 30. As for me, this secret is not revealed to me for any wisdom that I have more than any living.] See ver. 28. 36.

But for their sakes who shall make known the interpretation to the king.] That this may be a means for myself and my three friends to gain an interest in your majesty, the better to promote the glory of God, and to do kindnesses to our brethren of the captivity. This is the sense of the words if we follow the common translation: but I take the marginal reading to be the better interpretation, But for the intent that the interpretation may be made known to the king. The verb transitive is often used for the impersonal.

(See the note upon Isa. xliv. 18.) Several instances of this kind are to be found in the book of Daniel: as iii. 4. iv. 16. 31. v. 20. xi. 21.

Ver. 31. Thou, O king, sawest, and behold a great image. This image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee.] Grotius acutely observes, that this image appeared with a glorious lustre in the imagination of Nebuchadnezzar, whose mind was wholly taken up with admiration of worldly pomp and splendour: whereas the same monarchies were represented to Daniel under the shape of fierce and wild beasts, chap. vii. as being the great supporters of idolatry and tyranny in the world.

And the form thereof was terrible.] The success which accompanied their arms made them feared and dreaded by all the world.

Ver. 32. This image's head was of fine gold.] The Babylonian monarchy was arrived to the height of glory under Nebuchadnezzar: (see ver. 37, 38.) who likewise improved and adorned the city of Babylon to such a degree, as to make it one of the wonders of the world: as Dr. Prideaux shews at large, Connex. par. i. p. 94, &c. So this empire might justly be compared to a golden head.

His breasts and his arms of silver.] The second monarchy of the Medes and Persians will be inferior to the first; (see ver. 39.) probably in respect of its continuance: the Babylonian monarchy, if we date its beginning from Ninus, having lasted above seven hundred years.

Ibid. and Ver. 33. And his thighs of brass, his legs of iron.] These emblems denote the strength of the third and fourth monarchies, and the irresistible force with which they subdued their adversaries. Iron and brass are the emblems of strength in the prophetical writings. (See ver. 39, 40. iv. 15. vii. 19. Isa. xlv. 2. xlviii. 4.)

Ver. 33. His feet part of iron, and part of clay.] See ver. 41, 42.

Ver. 34. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet—and brake them to pieces.] A very proper representation how the whole image was destroyed: viz. by a great stone's falling upon the feet of the image, and breaking them to pieces, whereby the whole image was overturned, and broken to pieces. In like manner the kingdom of Christ, a kingdom of God's own erecting, (see ver. 45.) shall break to pieces the fourth and last monarchy, in which the remainders of the other three were comprehended: and shall at length put an end to all earthly rule, authority, and power, 1 Cor. xv. 24.

The Jews unanimously agree, that by the stone is here meant the Messiah. (See the authorities collected in the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's learned Defence of Christianity, p. 122.)

Ver. 35. And became as the chaff of the summer threshing-floors—that no place was found for them.] There was no sign or remainder left of their former greatness. (Compare Psal. i. 4. xxxvii. 10. Hos. xiii. 4.) The same expression is used by Isaiah, xli. 15. where speaking of the victory God will give to his church over its enemies, he saith, Thou shalt thrash the mountains, and make the hills as chaff: thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall drive them away. The expressions in both places allude to the thrashing-floors in the eastern countries, which were usually placed on the tops of hills. (See 2 Chron. iii. 1.)

And the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth.] This denotes the advancement and increase of Christ's kingdom, that it should from small beginnings proceed to fill the whole earth: as if a stone by degrees should grow to a mountain. Thus Christ is described as going forth conquering, and to conquer, Rev. vi. 2. Mr. Mede hath very judiciously observed, (see his Works, p. 743.) that this kingdom is described here under two states or forms; the one may be called by way of distinction the kingdom of the stone, the other the kingdom of the mountain. The first commenced upon the erection of the fourth kingdom, while the statue continued on its feet; the other was to be manifest under its last and weakest state. Christ, the foundation of the church, is often described as a stone, (see Isa. xxviii. 16. Zech. iii. 9.) and the church in its flourishing estate is represented as a mountain. (Isa. ii. 2. Ezek. xx. 40. Rev. xxi. 10.)

Ver. 36. We will tell the interpretation to the king.] An expression becoming the modesty of so good a man as Daniel: who allows his friends a share in the honour of interpreting the dream, because the interpretation was obtained by their joint prayers to God. (See ver. 18. 23.)

Ver. 37. Thou, O king, art a king of kings.] So Nebuchadnezzar is styled, Ezek. xxvi. 7. because he had kings for his vassals and tributaries: such were Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, the former kings of Judah, (2 Kings xxiv. 1. 17.) The same title was afterward given to Artaxerxes king of Persia, Ezra vii. 12.

Ver. 38. And wheresoever the children of men dwell—hath he made thee ruler over them all.] The great monarchs assumed to themselves the title of being lords of the world: (see vi. 25. viii. 5.) so the word Οἰκουμένη, the world, commonly signifies the Roman empire in the New Testament. (See Luke ii. 1. Acts xi. 29.)

The beasts of the field and the fowls of heaven hath he given into thine hand.] The Greek adds, And the fish of the sea: whatever right thy subjects can claim, either in their possessions, or in any perquisites thereto belonging, is all held of thee, as the supreme lord. (Compare Jer. xxvii. 6.)

Ver. 39. And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee.] See ver. 32.

And another third kingdom of brass, (see ver. 32.) which shall reign over all the earth.] The Grecian monarchy shall extend its conquests beyond the bounds of the preceding empires, even to those parts of the east, which none of the Persian monarchs had ever attempted to subdue.

Ver. 40. And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron.] So it is represented as having great iron teeth, vii. 7. 19. This fourth kingdom can be no other than the Roman empire. Some commentators, indeed, have reckoned the empire continued in Alexander's successors, as a distinct kingdom from that which was set up by himself. But no writer of the history of those times speaks of it as such: and this notion plainly contradicts the description which Daniel gives of that kingdom, chap. viii. There the prophet represents the third kingdom as it were set up by Alexander, and continued under his successors, under the figure of a goat having one great horn, and afterward, four others which stood up in its stead, (ver. 8.) and afterward expressly calls Alexander the first king, (ver. 21.) and farther tells us, (xi. 4.) that his kingdom shall be broken and divided towards the four winds of heaven. They that want farther satisfaction, may see more proofs of this point in

Mr. Mede's dissertation upon this subject, p. 712. of his Works.

The reason why the Spirit of God takes notice of these monarchies rather than any others, is, because God's people were subjects to these monarchies as they succeeded one another: and in their succession, a line of time is carried on to the coming of Christ, who was to appear in the times of the fourth monarchy, and the countries belonging to it were to be the chief seat of Christ's kingdom: as Mr. Mede observes in the same dissertation.

And as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise.] Or, Even as iron that breaketh (all things), shall it break in pieces and bruise all these.

Ver. 41. And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potter's clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided.] The ten toes of the image signify the ten kings, who were in aftertimes to divide this kingdom among themselves: denoted by the ten horns of this fourth beast, mentioned vii. 7. compared with Rev. xvii. 12. This partition of the Roman empire will divide its strength, and by consequence be a diminution of its power.

Ver. 42. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken.] Or, brittle. The sense of the words is more fully explained in the following verse. Some interpreters explain them thus: That the chief power in these ten kingdoms shall be partly secular, and partly ecclesiastical: and the encroaching of the ecclesiastical power upon the secular, shall be the occasion of frequent clashings between them, to the weakening of both parties, and endangering their breaking to pieces.

Ver. 43. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another.] These ten kingdoms shall be a medley of people of different nations, laws, and customs: and although the kings of the several nations shall try to strengthen themselves by marriage-alliances into one another's families, yet the different interests which they pursue will make them often engage in wars with each other, and thereby weaken the common strength.

Ver. 44. And in the days of these kings.] During the succession of these four monarchies, and in the times of the last of them. Compare ver. 34. where the stone cut out without hands, is said to smite the image upon its feet, which part of the image denotes the fourth monarchy.

The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed.] The kingdom of Christ is described in Scripture as an everlasting kingdom: not like the kingdoms of this world, subject to change and dissolution, but like the Author of it, eternal and unchangeable. (See vii. 14. 27.)

But it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms.] See ver. 34.

Ver. 45. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, &c.] There should not have been a full stop placed at the end of the last verse, as our translation is commonly pointed: the particle forasmuch shewing, that the sense of this verse depends upon the foregoing words, as in ver. 40, 41. The words shew the correspondence between the several parts of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and the event thereby signified: that as the stone cut out without hands overturned the image, and broke it to pieces; so a kingdom of God's own erecting should put an end to all these earthly kingdoms.

The stone was cut out of the [or a] mountain without hands.] The phrase without hands denotes it to be an act of God's own immediate power, and brought to pass without the interposition of second causes. (Compare viii. 25.) So the heavenly body we are to receive at the resurrection, is called a building not made with hands, 2 Cor. v. 1. The same expression is used concerning the heavenly tabernacle, Heb. ix. 11. 24. in opposition to buildings of human structure. In like manner, Christ at his coming into the world had a body prepared for him by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost.

The great God hath made known to the king, &c.] See ver. 28.

Ver. 46. Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell on his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odours unto him.] Doing reverence by prostration is not only an act of worship paid to God, but often given to kings and great men in the Old Testament, according to the custom of the eastern countries. (See 2 Sam. ix. 6. xiv. 33.) It was likewise an expression of reverence paid to prophets, on the account of the sanctity of their office, and not refused by them. (See 1 Kings xviii. 7.) Of this kind was probably the worship paid by the leper to Christ, (Matt. viii. 2.) whom he took for a prophet. But when other circumstances were added to it, which made it look like Divine worship, then it was refused to be accepted, as in the case of St. Peter, Acts x. 25. and of the angel, Rev. xix. 10. The adoration here described, seems to have been of the latter kind, being joined with offering incense, an act of worship peculiar to God alone. (See Ezra vi. 10.) For this reason it is highly probable that Daniel refused the honours offered to him, and put the king in mind that he should give God the glory, as we find he does in the following verse. Nebuchadnezzar seems in a sudden transport to have looked upon Daniel as having something more than human in him; (see iv. 8.) just as the barbarians thought of St. Paul, Acts xxviii. 6.

Ver. 47. Of a truth it is that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings.] Superior to all the gods or demons who are worshipped by men; the supreme Governor of the world, and Ruler of the kings and kingdoms in it. (See ver. 21.)

Ver. 48. Then the king made Daniel—ruler over the whole province of Babylon.] When the empire came under the government of the Medes and Persians, every province had a prince or ruler appointed over it, (vi. 1.) This might probably have been practised before, only afterward improved by the addition of three presidents over the rest. (Ibid. ver. 2. and v. 7.)

And chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon.] See the note upon i. 20. and compare iv. 9. v. 11.

Ver. 49. Then Daniel requested of the king, and he set Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon.] That they might be assisting to him, and partners in honour with him, by whose joint intercession this secret was revealed, (ver. 18.)

But Daniel sat in the gate of the king.] He was a constant attendant at the king's court. (See Esth. ii. 19. 21. iii. 2.)

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

The history of the miraculous deliverance of Daniel's three friends out of the fiery furnace, into which they were cast, because they refused to worship the golden image which king Nebuchadnezzar had set up.

Ver. 1. NEBUCHADNEZZAR made an image of gold, the height whereof was threescore cubits, and the breadth six cubits.] This image was set up probably in honour of Bel, whom Nebuchadnezzar worshipped as his tutelar deity; and called Daniel after his name. (See i. 2. iv. 8.)

The proportion of this image shews it to have been a very irregular figure, no man's height being above six times his thickness. This makes interpreters generally understand these sixty cubits of the height of the image and pedestal taken both together: and suppose the image to have been thirty-six cubits, and the pedestal twenty-four. Diodorus Siculus, giving an account of the plunder Xerxes had taken out of the temple of Belus, mentions a statue of massy gold which was forty feet high, which Dr. Prideaux conjectures to have been this statue: and then the body of the image would hardly have been twenty-seven cubits high. (See his Script, Connex. par. i. p. 100, 101.)

The Greek interpreter supposes this remarkable story to have happened in the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign.

Ver. 2. Then Nebuchadnezzar sent to gather the princes, the governors, and the captains, &c.] It seems a needless task to undertake an exact description of these several officers and commanders, who cannot be distinguished with any certainty. From the first word ahashdarpanaia, princes, the word satrapas is derived, which is commonly taken for a word of Persian original, but was probably first used among the Assyrians or Babylonians, and from thence derived into the Persian language.

The treasurers.] In the Chaldee, ghedabraia, the same word with ghizbar, translated treasurer, Ezra i. 8. Z being often changed into D, in the Chaldee.

Ver. 3. And they came and stood before the image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up.] They made their personal appearance, and shewed themselves ready to perform the worship required of them.

Ver. 4. O people, nations, and languages.] Whatsoever parts of the empire ye come from, and whatever language you speak. (See ver. 29. and iv. 1.) This form of speech was designed to set forth the largeness and extent of the Babylonish empire, which had subjects of so many different languages. The same phrase was afterward used under the Medes and Persians. (See vi. 25. Esth. i. 22. iii. 12. viii. 9.)

Ver. 5. That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, harp, &c.] Some of the names of these musical instruments have a great affinity with the Greek words of the same signification: as the word karna, the cornet, with κέρας; kithros, the harp, with κίθαρα; pesanterin, the psaltery, with ψαλτήριον; and symphonia, translated dulcimer, with συμφωνία. This some account for, by supposing that the traffic managed by the Phœnicians with Greece, (see Ezek. xxvii. 13.) and the transplanting of the Eolian and Ionian colonies into Asia, which happened about an age after the destruction of Troy, brought these and other Greek words into the eastern parts of the world.

But it is more probable that these names should be transferred from the eastern languages into Greece. This is taken for granted in the word sambuca, derived into Greek from the Chaldee sabca, mentioned in the text. In like manner kithros, from whence cithara is derived, is probably taken from citrus, i. e. the citron-wood, of which the instrument is made, the best of which kind grew in Media. This opinion is confirmed by the testimony of Strabo, (lib. x. p. 471.) who saith, "That the names of musical instruments, such as nablia, sambuca, and barbitos, were derived from barbarous languages:" by which the Greeks denote the eastern tongues. The words of Athenæus are to the same purpose, lib. iv. cap. 23. and lib. xiv. cap. 5. where he saith, "That the Phrygian and Lydian harmony came from the barbarians, i. e. the eastern nations, to the Greeks."

There is but one objection against this opinion, which is, that the word symphonia, here mentioned, is a Greek compound. But Isidore, in his Origines, describes that instrument to be hollow, something like our drum, and covered with leather, which they played upon with a stick or a quill: from whence we may conclude, that the affinity between this and the Greek word of the same sound is purely accidental.

Ver. 6. Shall the same hour.] This is the first place in the Old Testament where we meet with the division of time into hours. The Greeks ascribe the invention of hours to Anaximander or Anaximenes; who probably learned it from the Chaldeans. (See Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 109.)

Be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace.] Burning offenders alive was a punishment used among the Babylonians, (see Jer. xxix. 22.) and it may be in other eastern countries. (See Psal. xxi. 9.)

Ver. 7. All the people—fell down and worshipped the golden image, &c.] Paying Divine honours to the images of deified men was a piece of worship generally practised among the Chaldeans, as well as other heathens. (See Isa. xlvi. 1. Jer. x. 2. 11. l. 2.)

Ver. 12. They serve not thy gods.] Or rather, Thy god: for the image represented but one single object of worship: so the word is rendered i. 2. and so it should be translated Exod. xxxii. 4. This is thy God, O Israel; as the same words are rendered Nehem. ix. 18. For Aaron certainly designed to worship the true God by the emblem of the golden calf, and accordingly proclaimed a feast to the Lord, Exod. xxxii. 5.

Ver. 14. Is it true, O Shadrach? &c.] Or, Is it on purpose? so the word is used, Exod. xxi. 13.

Ver. 15. Now if ye be ready, &c.] The sentence is imperfect in the original, and is rightly supplied by our translators with the word well; see a like instance, Luke xiii. 9.

And who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hand?] Thus Nebuchadnezzar exalted himself above God Almighty, as Sennacherib had done before him, (2 Kings xviii. 36.) notwithstanding that he had before made an ample confession of the true God, (ii. 47.)

Ver. 16. We are not careful to answer thee in this matter.] In so plain a case there is no room for deliberation: we have an answer ready at hand, that we ought to obey God rather than man.

Ver. 17. Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us—and he will deliver us out of thine hand.] As we are firmly persuaded of his power to deliver us, so we trust in his mercy and goodness that he will deliver us out of this imminent danger. This they speak out of a well-grounded hope, not from a certain foresight of being delivered; for such an assurance would have defeated the worth of their courage and constancy in despising the danger which threatened them.

Ver. 19. Then was Nebuchadnezzar full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against Shadrach, &c.] He discovered in his looks the signs of his fierce anger against these three persons, whom he was incensed against, not only as guilty of disobedience, but likewise of the highest ingratitude towards him, who had preferred them to places of trust and honour.

Ver. 25. And the form of the fourth is like the Son of God.] Like that of an angel. (See ver. 28.) Angels are called the sons of God, Job i. 6. xxxviii. 7.

Ver. 26. Ye servants of the most high God.] This miracle calls to the king's mind that confession he had formerly made of the true God, (ii. 47.)

Ver. 28. Blessed be the God of Shadrach, &c.] So Darius offers up his acknowledgments to the God of Daniel, (vi. 26.) looking upon him as superior to other gods, but not as the only true God.

Who hath sent his angel.] So Daniel ascribes his deliverance from the lions to an angel, vi. 22. (Compare Acts xii. 11.)

And have changed the king's word.] Have rendered his command of none effect, God himself having suspended the execution of it.

Ver. 29. Shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill.] See ii. 5.

Ver. 30. Then the king promoted Shadrach, &c.] Or restored them to their former places and dignities: so Lud. de Dieu explains the Chaldee verb hatselach. The Greek interpreter adds, at the end of the verse, And he advanced them to be governors over all the Jews who were in his kingdom.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

A recital of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which foretold the loss of his kingly power, and his being driven from human society, as it was explained by Daniel, and fulfilled in the event.

Ver. 1. NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king, unto all people, nations, and languages, &c.] This chapter contains a recital of the very words of that edict or proclamation which Nebuchadnezzar published after his restoration, for the greater confirmation of the truth of the event here related.

Ver. 3. His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom.] He exercises an uncontrollable dominion over all the world, and even over the greatest princes. (See ver. 17. 34, 35.)

Ver. 4. I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in my house, and flourishing in my palace.] I thought myself secure in my enjoyments, and at full ease and prosperity in my palace at Babylon, which was built with that state and magnificence, as to be reckoned one of the wonders of the world, (ver. 30.) God's particular judgment often resembles the general one, in their coming suddenly and unexpectedly, when men indulge themselves in their carnal security. (See Psal. xxx. 6, 7. Matt. xxiv. 43, 44. 1 Thess. v. 2, 3.)

Ver. 6. Therefore I made a decree to bring in all the wise men of Babylon before me.] As he did before upon a like occasion: (ii. 2.)

Ver. 8. Whose name was Belteshazzar, &c.] See the note upon i. 7.

And in whom is the spirit of the holy gods.] Who is enlightened by the gods, or heavenly powers, with a supernatural degree of knowledge, such as none of the wise men of Babylon can attain to. (See ii. 11. v. 11. 14.)

Ver. 9. O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians.] See ii. 48. and the note upon i. 20.

Tell me the vision of my dream that I have seen, and the interpretation thereof.] Nebuchadnezzar tells the dream himself in the following words: so the meaning of this sentence must be, Tell me the dream, that is, the interpretation thereof; in which sense the copulative particle is often used. (See the note on i. 3.) The Greek translate it thus, Hear the visions of my dream, and tell me the interpretation thereof.

Ver. 10. I saw, and behold a tree in the midst of the earth.] Princes and great men are often represented by fair and flourishing trees. So the king of Assyria is described, Ezek. xxxi. 3. 18. (Compare Isa. x. 34. Zech. xi. 2.)

Ver. 12. The beasts of the field had shadow under it.] All the subjects of that large empire thought themselves safe under his protection. (Compare Ezek. xvii. 23. xxxi. 6. Lam. iv. 20.)

Ver. 13. Behold, a watcher and [or even] a holy one came from heaven.] The conjunctive copulative is used here by way of explication. (See ver. 9.) The word watcher is understood of some principal angel: the angelical orders being described as always attending upon God's throne, to receive and execute his commands. (See Psal. ciii. 20. Matt. xviii. 10. and the notes upon Ezek. i. 11. 24.) For the same reason they are called the eyes of the Lord, Zech. iv. 10.) In the fragments of that ancient book, called The Prophecy of Enoch, quoted in the Epistle of St. Jude, the angels are called Ἐγρήγοροι, the Greek word which answers to Eir in the text; and some critics derive the Iris of the poets, whom they describe as the messenger of the gods, from the word Eir: though others take the word Eir to differ only in the Chaldee dialect from the Hebrew Tseir, a messenger. The word holy one denotes such of the angels who kept their station, and were not seduced from their obedience, when the evil angels fell. (See viii. 13.) In the same sense the word is taken, Jude ver. 14. The Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints, or holy ones. (Compare Deut. xxxiii. 2. Zech. xiv. 5. 1 Thess. iii. 13.)

Ver. 14. Let the beasts get away from under it, &c.] Let his subjects not rely upon his protection. (Compare Ezek. xxxi. 12.)

Ver. 15. Nevertheless leave the stump of his roots in the earth.] As when the root of a tree is still alive, there is a possibility of its flourishing again: so there should still be hopes that the king may recover his former state and dignity. (See ver. 26.)

With a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field.] To denote that while the king was deprived of his reason, and lived among the beasts of the field, he was bound with fetters and chains, as madmen usually are. (See Mark v. 4.)

Ver. 16. Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him.] Let him lose the use of his reason. (See ver. 34. 36.) Scaliger thinks this madness of Nebuchadnezzar is obscurely hinted in a fragment of Abydeneus, produced by Eusebius, Præp. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 41. where having represented the king from the Chaldean writers to have fallen into an ecstacy, and to have foretold the destruction of that empire by the Medes and Persians; the author adds, that immediately after uttering this prophecy he disappeared, which Scaliger expounds of his being driven from his kingly state and the society of men. (See Scaliger's notes upon the Ancient Fragments, in the appendix to his work de Emendatione Temporum.)

And let seven times pass over him.] That is, seven years: so the expression is taken xi. 13. where the Hebrew reads, The king of the north shall come at the end of times, that is, years. So the time, times, and a half, mentioned vii. 25. xii. 7. signify three years and a half; and are accordingly explained by forty-two months, Rev. xi. 2. and by one thousand and sixty days, Rev. xii. 7. both which reckonings of time are equivalent to three years and a half.

Ver. 17. This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones.] It is called the decree of the Most High, ver. 24. So the expression of the text is an allusion to the proceedings of earthly princes, who publish their decrees with the advice of their chief ministers. Thus God is described as summoning all the host of angels, and taking resolutions according to their advice, 1 Kings xxii. 19. and Christ is represented as attended with angels and saints as his assessors at the day of judgment. (See vii. 22. of this prophecy, 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3. 1 Tim. v. 21. Rev. xx. 4.) The words are capable of another sense; viz. that this sentence was pronounced at the request of those angels whom God had appointed to preside over the affairs of the Babylonish empire. (See the note upon x. 13.) Watchers and holy ones are here spoken of in the plural number, whereas the words are in the singular, ver. 13. which difference may thus be accounted for; that the sentence was pronounced at the joint request of many, but was to be put in execution by one single angel.

To the intent that the living may know the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, &c.] See ii. 21.

And setteth up over it the basest of men.] This regards Nebuchadnezzar, either with respect to his present condition, whose pride and cruelty rendered him as despicable in the sight of God, as his high estate made him appear honourable in the eyes of men; and therefore was justly doomed to so low a degree of abasement: or else it may be understood of his wonderful advancement and restoration, after he had been degraded from his dignity, and sent to herd with the beasts of the field. God thereby asserting that prerogative of his, of bringing low and lifting up; and of raising the beggar from the dunghill, to set him among princes. (1 Sam. ii. 8, 9. Psal. cxiii. 7, 8.)

Ver. 18. For the spirit of the holy Gods is in thee.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 19. Then Daniel was astonished for one hour, &c.] Both at the surprising circumstances of the judgment denounced against the king; and likewise out of a tender regard and respect for his person, who had bestowed so many favours upon him.

The dream be to them that hate thee, &c.] The words are spoken by the figure called euphemismus, when we would avert an ill omen from ourselves or friends, by wishing it may light upon our enemies. See a like instance, 1 Sam. xxv. 22. So and more also do God unto the enemies of David. At the same time, Daniel expresses his dutiful concern for the safety of the king's person and government. Jeremy had before advised the Jewish captives at Babylon to wish and pray for the prosperity of the government under which they lived, Jer. xxix. 7.

Ver. 22. It is thou, O king—for thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven.] See ii. 38.

Ver. 25. They shall drive thee from men, &c.] See ver. 16.

Ver. 26. After that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule.] Heaven is put for God, as Matt. xxi. 25. Luke xv. 18. 21.

Ver. 27. Break off thy sins by righteousness, &c.] Become a new man. The Greek translates it, Redeem thy iniquities by alms-deeds: making this sentence equivalent in sense to the following words: and it is true that righteousness is often taken for mercy. (See Psal. xxxi. 2. cxii. 9.) Nor does this sense of the words favour the doctrine of merit, any more than those words of Solomon, Prov. xvi. 6. By mercy and truth iniquity is purged, or expiated: as the Hebrew verb caphar properly signifies. To the same sense St. Peter saith, Charity shall cover a multitude of sins, 1 Pet. iv. 8. viz. as it is a testimony of unfeigned repentance or conversion. Thus Salvian, descanting upon this text, and speaking of works of charity, as proper evidences of true repentance, saith of the sinner, "Offerat cum compunctione, cum lacrymis: aliter quippe oblata non prosunt; quia non pretio, sed affectu placent." We ought to make such oblations with all the signs of true contrition, or else they will not be accepted; because it is not the value of the things themselves, but the disposition of the giver, which renders them acceptable. (Salvian. ad Eccles. Cathol. lib. i.)

It may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity.] God sometimes defers his judgments upon men's shewing signs of repentance. (See 1 Kings xxi. 29.)

Ver. 30. Is not this great Babylon, which I have built, &c.] Though Babylon was one of the oldest cities in the world, yet Nebuchadnezzar had very much improved, and made it one of the wonders of the world, upon account of the largeness and height of its new walls, the temple of Belus, his own palace, and the hanging gardens belonging to it; the banks of the river, and the canals made for the draining of it: all which were the works of this king, and an exact description of them may be seen in Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. par. i. p. 94, &c.

The words of Nebuchadnezzar here recited savour of great pride and arrogance, and are therefore justly punished by that judgment pronounced upon him in the following verses. (Compare v. 20.)

Ver. 31. While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, &c.] So Herod was struck immediately, because he gave not God the glory, (Acts xii. 23.)

Ver. 34. At the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up

mine eyes to heaven, and my understanding returned unto me, &c.] At the end of seven years (see ver. 16.) I recovered the use of my reason, (ver. 36.) and became sensible of my dependance upon God, and lifted up mine eyes to heaven in a devout acknowledgment of his sovereign majesty, whose dominion alone is unchangeable, and endures for ever.

Ver. 35. And all the inhabitants of the world are reputed as nothing, &c.] The greatest monarchs, as well as persons of an inferior rank, are as nothing in his sight: and he disposes all things in heaven and earth by an irresistible power and authority. (Compare Isa. xl. 15. 17. xlv. 9.)

Ver. 36. And, for the glory of my kingdom, mine honour and brightness returned to me.] Or, The glory of my kingdom, (for the particle in the word likar is used for the nominative case, see Noldius, p. 463.) mine honour, and countenance, or comeliness, returned to me. The word ziv is translated countenance, v. 6. vii. 28. I recovered my former looks, was possessed of the same outward glory and majesty, and was honoured with the same attendance and retinue as I was before.

Ver. 37. All whose works are truth, and his ways judgment.] Who governs the world with equity and justice. (Compare Rev. xv. 3. xvi. 7.)

And those who walk in pride he is able to abase.] Of which Nebuchadnezzar himself was a remarkable instance, ver. 30, 31. and v. 20.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.

A judgment is denounced against Belshazzar, for his sacrilege, by a hand-writing upon the wall, which Daniel reads: importing the downfall of the Babylonish monarchy, and translating the empire to the Medes and Persians: which sentence is fulfilled the same night.

Ver. 1. BELSHAZZAR the king.] This was the last king of the Babylonish race, and therefore must be the same who is called Nabonnedus by Berosus, and Naboandelus by Josephus, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11. (See this clearly proved by Dr. Prideaux, Script. Connex. par. i. p. 114.)

Made a feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine before the thousand.] The king made a great feast to the principal officers and great men of his court, and was himself present at it. This feast was made at a time of public rejoicing, being an annual festival, when the whole night was spent in revelling: which season Cyrus took the advantage of to make himself master of the city, as Herodotus, lib. i. and Xenophon, lib. vii. relate, and was foretold by Jeremy, li. 39. 57.

Ver. 2. Belshazzar commanded to bring the gold and silver vessels which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple which was in Jerusalem.] These vessels were carried by Nebuchadnezzar into the temple of his own god, (i. 2.) and set apart, as it seems, for religious uses. So this farther profanation of them was contrary to the rules of their own religion, and may be supposed to have been done out of a drunken frolic by Belshazzar.

Without question the vessels and other furniture with which Solomon adorned the temple were extraordinarily magnificent: since Nebuchadnezzar thought them worth carrying to Babylon, to furnish the temple he had built there for his god Belus, a structure that might be esteemed one of the wonders of the world. (See Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra, p. 98.) Some of these vessels were afterward carried in triumph to Rome by Titus, after he had conquered Jerusalem, as Josephus, an eye-witness, asserts: (Bell. Jud. lib. vii. p. 1306. edit. Oxon.) afterward, when Gisericus sacked Rome, he carried these away with the rest of his booty; but when Justinian conquered Africa, he recovered them again, and sent them for a present to the church of Jerusalem. (See Evagrius, lib. iv. cap. 17.)

Which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken.] Nebuchadnezzar was in truth his grandfather; for he was the son of Evil-Merodach by Nitocris his queen: so he was grandson to Nebuchadnezzar: and thus the prophecy of Jeremy was fulfilled, that all nations should serve Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and his son's son, Jer. xxvii. 7. It is usual in Scripture to call the grandfather by the name of father. (See 2 Sam. ix. 7. 2 Kings viii. 26. compared with ver. 18.; 2 Chron. xv. 16. compared with xi. 20.; Zech. i. 1. with Ezra vi. 14.)

Ver. 4. They drank wine, and praised the gods of gold and of silver, &c.] They sang praises to their false gods, who were fitly represented by senseless images; and this they did by way of triumph over the God of Israel, the vessels of whose temple they brought forth as so many trophies of their victory. (See ver. 23.)

Ver. 5. In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand.] Next to murder, no sin is so remarkably punished in this world as that of sacrilege, as appears by innumerable instances taken out of the histories of all ages, of heathens and infidels, as well as Jews and Christians. For to profess a religion to be true, and yet to offer violence to the places and utensils dedicated to the service of that religion, is downright impiety, and argues a contempt of all religion. Remarkable examples of this kind in the heathen story are, the miserable end of the Phoceans, who robbed the temple of Delphos, and were the occasion of that war, which was called from thence the holy war; an account of which may be seen in Petavius, Rationar. Temporum, par. i. p. 113.; the destruction of the Gauls in their attempt upon the same temple; and of Crassus, who plundered the temple of Jerusalem, and that of the Syrian goddess: these two last stories are very particularly related by Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. p. 26. 202.

Grotius's note upon this place is worth observing: "The heathens thought it a great impiety to convert sacred things to common uses; but now-a-days neither princes nor people think there is any harm in it: and can we expect that God should not visit for these things?"

And wrote over against the candlestick.] The feast was continued till late in the night, according to custom. (See the note upon ver. 1.)

Ver. 6. Then the king's countenance was changed—so that the joints of his loins were loosed, &c.] He discovered the disorder of his mind, by the shaking and trembling which seized his whole body. (Compare Psal. lxix. 23.)

Ver. 7. The king cried aloud.] Discovering thereby great fear and impatience.

To bring in the astrologers, &c.] See the note upon i. 20. ii. 2. iv. 6.

Digitized by Microsoft®

And shall be the third ruler in the kingdom.] One of the three principal rulers. (See vi. 2.)

Ver. 8. Then came in all the king's wise men, but they could not read the writing.] It was probably writ in the old Hebrew letters, now called the Samaritan character, which the Chaldeans were ignorant of.

Ver. 10. Now the queen, by reason of the words of the king and his lords, came into the banquet-house.] The king's wives and concubines sat with him at the feast, ver. 2. So the person here mentioned must be the queen-mother Nitocris; a lady famous for her wisdom, who had the chief management of the public affairs, and so is called the queen, by way of eminence. (See Dr. Prideaux, par. i. p. 122.)

Ver. 11. There is a man in thy kingdom in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods.] See the note upon iv. 8.

And in the days of thy father.] i. e. Thy grandfather Nebuchadnezzar. (See ver. 2.)

Ver. 13. Art thou that Daniel? &c.] Though his grandfather had advanced Daniel to considerable places of honour, (ver. 11.) yet Belshazzar knew nothing of him; which argues him to have been a weak and vicious prince, according to the character historians give of him, and that he left the care of the public affairs to his mother, minding nothing but his pleasures.

Ver. 17. Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy reward to another.] The prophet was not willing to receive any reward for interpreting a writing, which was to receive its accomplishment in the destruction of the king and the government.

Ver. 19. And, for the majesty that he gave him, all people, nations, and languages, trembled and feared before him.] See ii. 37, 38.

Ver. 20. But when his heart was lifted up, &c.] See iv. 30.

And they took his glory from him.] Or, His glory was taken from him: the verb transitive being often used for the impersonal. (See the note upon ii. 30.)

Ver. 23. But hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven, &c.] See the note upon ver. 4.

And the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified.] Thou hast not given due honour to that supreme Being, who hath an absolute disposal, not only of thy affairs, (compare Jer. x. 23.) but even of thy life itself.

Ver. 26. MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it.] The determinate number of years which God hath appointed for the continuance of thy reign and the Babylonish monarchy is finished. So God is said to number the months of man's life, and to appoint him bounds which he cannot pass, Job xiv. 5. The word Mene is doubled in the foregoing verse, to shew that the thing is certain, and established by God, as Joseph tells Pharaoh in a like case, Gen. xli. 32.

Ver. 27. TEKEL; thou art weighed in the balances, and found wanting.] Wicked men are often compared to silver adulterated, and alloyed with baser metals, which makes it too light when weighed in the balances. (See Jer. vi. 30. Ezek. xxii. 18.) Such was Belshazzar when weighed in the scales of Divine justice. (Compare Job xxxi. 6. Psal. xlii. 10.) The same comparison is used by Homer, when Hector's fatal day approaches, Iliad. xxii. and by Virgil at the death of Turnus, Æneid. xii.

Ver. 28. PERES; thy kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians.] The verb Paras, from whence Peres is derived, as an appellative, signifies to divide, or break: it is likewise the proper name of the Persians, who were to be sharers in the division of the Babylonish empire. Upharsin, in the twenty-fifth verse, is a particle of the verb Paras; it literally signifies, And they divide it.

Ver. 29. Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, &c.] The king thought himself bound in honour to perform the promise he had made, ver. 16. which yet it is likely could not take effect at that unseasonable time of night: so the words might better be thus translated; Then commanded Belshazzar, that they should clothe Daniel with scarlet—and should make a proclamation concerning him, &c. The particle vau is often put for the conjunction that: (see Noldius, p. 312.) so it is used in the second verse of this chapter.

Ver. 30. In that night was Belshazzar king of the Chaldeans slain.] He and all his nobles were slain together in the midst of their feasting and revelling, as Herodotus (lib. i.) and Xenophon inform us: the latter relates the story thus: (Cyropæd. lib. vii.) "That two deserters, Gadata and Gobryas, having assisted some of the Persian army to kill the guards, and seize upon the palace, they entered into the room where the king was, whom they found standing up in a posture of defence; but they soon dispatched him, and those that were with him." Thus the prophecy of Jeremy was accomplished, that Babylon should be taken at the time of a public feast, while her princes and great men, her captains, her rulers, and mighty men, should be drunken, and should sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awaken: (li. 39. 57.)

Ver. 31. And Darius the Median took the kingdom.] This Darius is said to be of the seed of the Medes: (ix. 1.) and is supposed by the most judicious chronologers to be the same with Cyaxares, the son of Astyages: him Cyrus made king of the Chaldeans, as being his uncle by the mother's side, and his partner in carrying on the war against the Babylonians, and left him the palace of the king of Babylon, to live there whenever he pleased, as Xenophon relates, Cyropæd. lib. viii. Darius succeeding in the empire, being Cyrus's gift, Ptolemy's Canon supposes Cyrus to be the immediate successor of Nabonnedus, or Belshazzar, and allots nine years to his reign: whereas Xenophon reckons two of these years to Darius, and seven to Cyrus: ubi supra. The Chaldee phrase rendered here, took the kingdom, is translated possessed the kingdom, vii. 18. and means the same with succeeding in the kingdom.

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.

Daniel being preferred by Darius above all the governors and princes of the provinces, they maliciously contrive an accusation against him; upon which he is cast into the lions' den, and from thence miraculously delivered.

Ver. 1. IT pleased Darius to set over the kingdom a hundred and twenty princes.] According to the number of the provinces which were subject to the Medo-Persian empire. These were afterward enlarged to a hundred and twenty-seven by the victories of Cambyses and Darius Hystaspes. (See Esth. i. 1.)

Ver. 2. And over these three presidents, of whom Daniel was first.] He had been appointed one of the principal officers of state by Belshazzar, v. 29. Darius came not to Babylon, but tarried at Ecbatane in Media, whither he sent for Daniel, that he might be always near him: see Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12. (al. 11.) where it is likely he received this new advancement. Josephus informs us, in the same place, that Daniel built an admirable structure at Ecbatane, probably by Darius's direction, which was afterward made the burial-place of the kings of Media and Persia, the care of which place was always committed to a Jewish priest.

Ver. 3. Because that an excellent spirit was in him.] Compare v. 11, 12. He had great experience in the public affairs, it being now sixty-five years ago since he was first advanced by Nebuchadnezzar, (ii. 48.)

Ver. 8. According to the law of the Medes and Persians, that altereth not.] After it is once enacted by the king, with the consent of his counsellors. So Diodorus Siculus tells us (lib. iv.) of Darius, the last king of Persia, that he would have pardoned Charidemus after he was condemned to death, but could not reverse the law that had passed against him. We may observe the difference of style between this text and that of Esth. i. 19. Here the words are, the law of the Medes and Persians, out of regard to the king, who was a Mede: there it is styled the law of the Persians and Medes, the king being a Persian at that time.

Ver. 10. The windows being open in his chamber.] In his upper chamber, as the Greek reads that text. It seems to have been customary among the devout persons of the Jewish nation, to set apart some upper room for their oratories, as places freest from noise and disturbance. So we read Tobit iii. 17. that Sarah came down from her upper chamber, when she had been at her devotions: and the apostles assembled together in an upper room, Acts i. 13. (See Bishop Pearson on that text, in his first Lecture upon the Acts.)

Towards Jerusalem.] According to that petition in Solomon's consecration-prayer, (1 Kings viii. 48.) That if they were led away captive, and should pray to God towards the city which he had chosen, and the house which Solomon had built, then hear thou their prayer, &c. (Compare Psal. v. 7. Jonah ii. 4.)

Three times a day.] Some learned writers tell us, out of Maimonides, that upon solemn days, such as were the third and fifth days of the week, the evening sacrifice was killed at half an hour after twelve; so the hour of prayer, which on other days was the ninth hour, or three in the afternoon, was then about noon; and the third hour of prayer must then be towards bed-time. (See Thorndike of Religious Assemblies, chap. 8. and Dr. Prideaux's Dissert. upon the Synagogue Service, par. i. book vi. of his Script. Connex.)

Ver. 13. That Daniel, who is of the children of the captivity of Judah.] Compare v. 13. This is added to aggravate his fault, that one who is a foreigner, and brought hither a captive, should offer a public affront to the laws of the king, whose favour and protection he enjoys.

Ver. 14. Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself.] Having too late discovered that the princes, in procuring him to sign this decree, had no other aim but to take advantage of it to the prejudice of Daniel.

Ver. 16. Thy God, whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee.] The words express the king's hopes and good wishes, but no certain persuasion. (See ver. 20.)

Ver. 20. O Daniel, servant of the living God.] God sometimes makes the mouths of infidels instrumental in setting forth his praises. (See ii. 47. iii. 28.)

Ver. 22. My God hath sent his angel.] See iii. 28.

And also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt.] Though I disobeyed thy decree, it was not done out of contumacy or stubbornness, but purely to preserve a good conscience, which is the only true principle of loyalty and obedience. (See Rom. xiii. 5.)

Ver. 24. Them, their children, and their wives.] According to the cruel laws and customs which prevailed in some countries, of involving whole families in the punishment due to particular persons: in opposition to which, that equitable law was ordained by Moses, that the fathers should not be put to death for the children, nor the children for the fathers, Deut. xxiv. 16.

And the lions had the mastery of them, &c.] To shew that their sparing Daniel was miraculous.

Ver. 25. Then Darius wrote to all people—that dwell on all the earth.] See the note upon ii. 38.

Ver. 26, 27. I make a decree, that—men fear and tremble before the God of Daniel, &c.] He makes the same acknowledgment of the true God as Nebuchadnezzar had done before him. (See iii. 29. iv. 3. 34.)

Ver. 28. In the reign of Cyrus the Persian.] Who upon Darius's death took possession of the whole monarchy of the Medes and Persians, called from him the Persian monarchy. (See Ezra i. 2.)

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.

Daniel's vision concerning the four beasts, which an angel interprets of the four great monarchies, that were to continue successively unto the end of the world.

Ver. 1. IN the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon, Daniel had a dream.] The prophet having related some remarkable passages concerning himself and his brethren in captivity, and given proofs of his skill in interpreting other men's dreams, proceeds to give an account of his own visions: and thereupon goes back to the first year of Belshazzar's reign, which was seventeen years before the history contained in the last chapter.

Ver. 2. Behold, the four great winds of heaven strove upon the great sea.] Denoting those commotions of the world, and that troublesome state of affairs, out of which empires and kingdoms commonly take their rise.

Ver. 3. And four great beasts came up from the sea.] They took their rise from wars and commotions, which end in setting up the conqueror to be a great monarch over those whom he hath subdued. (Compare Rev. xiii. 1.) The reason why these monarchies are represented by fierce and savage beasts, had been observed in the note upon ii. 31.

Ver. 4. The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings.] Warriors, especially conquerors, are compared to lions for their strength and cruelty, and to eagles for their swiftness. (See Deut. xxviii. 49. 2 Sam. i. 23. Jer. iv. 7. xlviii. 40. Habak. i. 8.)

I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth.] Or rather, Wherewith it was lifted up from the earth; as the margin reads, the conjunction copulative sometimes supplying the place of a relative. (See Noldius, p. 296.) There was a stop put to the progress of its victories, by the frequent irruptions of the armies led by Cyrus and Darius, or Cyaxares, against the Babylonians, for twenty years together, before the final overthrow of that empire. See Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. from the first year of Neriglissar's reign, and so onwards.

And made stand upon the feet as a man, &c.] It became more tame and tractable.

Ver. 5. And behold another beast, a second, like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side.] This beast denotes the Persian empire, and its first beginning to advance itself and arrive at dominion. The margin reads, And it raised up one dominion; i. e. it made up one empire out of the joint powers of Media and Persia.

And it had three ribs in the mouth of it.] The learned Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, in the Vindication of his Defence of Christianity, vol. i. chap. 2. sect. 3. explains these three ribs to be Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt. It is certain that Lydia was conquered by Cyrus, from the famous story of Crœsus, the king thereof, whom he condemned to the fire: and as Egypt had been conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, (see Ezek. xxix. 19.) so it still continued tributary to Cyrus under the government of Amasis. (See the additional notes upon Ezek. xxix. 13. and Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. vii. viii.)

And they said thus unto her, Arise, and devour much flesh.] Their success made them still more greedy of dominion.

Ver. 6. After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard, which had on the back of it four wings like a fowl: the beast had also four heads.] This third beast denotes the Grecian empire, begun by Alexander, and continued in his four successors. (See viii. 8. 22.) The four wings signify the swiftness of its progress and victories. (See ver. 5. of that chapter.) A leopard is a creature of extraordinary swiftness, and jumps upon its prey, as naturalists observe.

And dominion was given to it.] By the swiftness of Alexander's progress, and the victories he obtained by small forces, it appeared that Providence gave him the empire of the world.

Ver. 7. Behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly.] And for that reason compared to iron, ii. 40. This must mean the Roman empire, as hath been fully proved in the note upon that place.

It subdued and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it.] It subdued all the nations who had been subjects of the former empires. The latter part of the sentence alludes to the fury of the wild beasts, who stamp upon that part of their prey which they cannot devour. (Compare viii. 7. 10.) So those conquests which the Romans could not make use of themselves, they gave for a prey and a spoil to their allies.

And it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns.] In this it was different from all the beasts or empires before it; that its dominion was to be divided into ten kingdoms or principalities, signified here by ten horns, and by the ten toes of the image, ii. 41. (See ver. 23, 24. of this chapter, and the notes there.)

Ver. 8. There came up among them another little horn, before whom were three of the first horns plucked up, &c.] See ver. 24, 25.

In this horn were eyes like the eyes of man.] Denoting great cunning and foresight.

A mouth speaking great things.] See the note upon ver. 25.

Ver. 9. I beheld till the thrones were cast down.] Or rather, pitched down, or placed. So the Greek interpreter understands it, and the verb in the text is used in the same sense in the Chaldee paraphrase upon Jer. i. 15. where our translation reads, They shall set every one his throne. The following words, And the Ancient of days did sit, justify this translation.

The thrones here mentioned import, first of all, the thrones of God and Christ; (see ver. 13, 14.) and then those of the saints, who shall be assessors with God and Christ at the day of judgment. (See ver. 22. and Rev. xx. 4.)

The fourth monarchy being to continue till the consummation of all things, the general judgment is described in this and the following verses, wherein sentence was to pass upon this fourth beast, and an end put to its dominion.

And the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was as white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool.] The eternal Judge of the world, (see Rev. xvi. 5.) he that was from the beginning, (1 John ii. 14.) who is elsewhere described covering himself with light as with a garment, (Psal. civ. 2.) and as a clear and unspotted brightness, (1 John i. 5.)

In this Divine representation there is mention made of the hair of the head, as there is in that vouchsafed to Moses and the elders of Israel of the feet, Exod. xxiv. 10. yet we are not to suppose that in either place any determinate shape or figure like that of a man was represented. (See Deut. iv. 15.) The expressions only import that both the upper and the lower part of this Divine Schechinah was of an amazing inexpressible brightness.

His throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as a burning fire.] God is described as coming to judgment in flames of fire, whereby the world and the wicked that are therein shall be destroyed. (See Psal. l. 3. 1 Cor. iii. 15. 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. 2 Pet. iii. 7. 10.) His throne is here described in the nature of a triumphal chariot, supported by angels, as so many fiery wheels. (See Psal. lxviii. 17. civ. 3, 4. Ezek. i. 13—15.)

Ver. 10. A fiery stream issued and came forth before him.] Lightnings and streams of fire were his harbingers, to give notice of his speedy approach. (Compare Psal. l. 3. xcvii. 3.)

Thousand thousands minister to him, &c.] His retinue was an innumerable company of angels. (See Deut. xxxiii. 2. Psal. lxviii. 17. Heb. xii. 22. Rev. v. 11.)

The judgment was set.] The court, God as the supreme judge, and the saints as his assessors, made their public appearance. (See ver. 9.) The expression alludes to the seats in the Jewish consistories, where the abbith din, or president of the court, had his assistants sitting with him; or, as some think, to the ancient custom among the Jews for the princes, or heads of the tribes, to sit with the king in the courts of justice.

And the books were opened.] The books both of God's laws and men's actions. The phrase is an allusion to the rolls and records belonging to courts of judicature. (Compare Deut. xxxii. 24. Psal. lvi. 8. Isa. lxv. 6. Mal. iii. 16.)

Ver. 11. Because of the great words which the horn did speak.] See ver. 25.

I beheld, even till the beast was slain.] The prophet here relates what was the final destruction of this fourth and last beast, and of that little horn belonging to it, and coming up after the rest of the horns, (ver. 24.)

And his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame.] See Rev. xviii. 8. xix. 20.

Ver. 12. As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time.] As to the three first monarchies, though the succeeding monarchy took away the dominion of that which went before, yet it was not done all at once, but by degrees: and the nations where those monarchies were seated, still had a being, though they changed their masters. Whereas the destruction of the last monarchy implied the putting an end to that empire, and to all other earthly governments: the kingdom of Christ being then immediately to take place. (See ver. 13, 14. and ii. 34.)

Ver. 13. Behold, one like the Son of man came in the clouds of heaven.] One in the shape and likeness of a man; but clothed with such ensigns of majesty, as shewed him to be an extraordinary person: (see the note upon Ezek. ii. 1. compare Rev. i. 13. xiv. 14.) indeed, no less than the Messias, as the description of him that follows doth declare. The two foregoing verses having explained why the fourth beast was destroyed, this part of the vision declares by whom it was done, represents Christ in his judicial capacity, and describes him by that title he often gives himself, the Son of man, in allusion to this place: particularly he alludes to this text, Matt. xxvi. 64. where he speaks of his coming in the clouds of heaven, by which expression he acknowledged himself to be the Messias here described; and gave a direct answer to the question there proposed to him, Art thou the Christ the Son of the Blessed? (Compare Mark xiv. 61, 62. Rev. i. 7.) Whereupon they condemned him as guilty of blasphemy. A learned prelate, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 131. observes, that Anani, the clouds, was a known name of the Messias among the Jewish writers, which shews that they understood this text as spoken of him.

And came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him.] To signify that Christ received his kingdom from his Father. (See Matt. xi. 27. xxviii. 18. John iii. 35. 1 Cor. xv. 27. Eph. i. 21. Philip. ii. 9, 10. Rev. v. 7. compare Jer. xxx. 21.)

Ver. 14. And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him.] Upon the destruction of antichrist, the little horn of the fourth beast, the stone which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his first vision, was to become a great mountain; (ii. 35.) and then all the ancient prophecies are to be accomplished, which speak of the uninterrupted glory and universality of Christ's kingdom: (see Psal. ii. 7, 8. viii. 6. cx. 1. Isa. ii. 2—4.) and the universality of Christ's dominion will be illustriously displayed at the day of judgment, when all the world shall be summoned to appear before him. (See Rom. xiv. 10—12.)

His dominion is an everlasting dominion, &c.] See ver. 27.

Ver. 15. I Daniel was grieved in my spirit.] The terrible appearance of this vision made an extraordinary impression upon my spirits. (See ver. 28. viii. 27. x. 8.)

In the midst of my body.] The original reads, In the midst of my sheath: a metaphor used by several heathen writers, who call the body the sheath of the soul. (See Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. vii. chap. 52. and Seneca, epist. 92.)

Ver. 16. I came near to one of them that stood by.] To one of the angels, who always attended upon the throne of God and Christ: (ver. 9, 10.) several angels are represented as attending upon Daniel's visions. (See viii. 13. 16. x. 5, 6. 16. xii. 5, 6.)

Ver. 17. These great beasts, which are four, are four kings.] Four kingdoms, or monarchies: so the word king is used for kingdom, Isa. xxiii. 15. (See the note there.)

Which shall arise out of the earth.] Shall be of the earth, earthy, and have nothing of a heavenly spirit in them: whereas the kingdom of Christ is a heavenly kingdom, which the saints shall possess, as it follows.

Ver. 18. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, &c.] Those earthly kingdoms being taken away, or destroyed, as the Greek adds by way of explication, the succeeding kingdom shall be that of Christ and his saints. (See ver. 22.) Instead of the Most High, the margin reads high ones, from the Chaldee: sometimes the one true God is spoken of in the plural number, by way of eminence: see Josh. xxiv. 19. Eccles. v. 8. where it is in the Hebrew—He is holy Gods.

Ver. 20. Whose look was more stout than his fellows.] Or, His appearance was more excellent than his fellows. Though he was little at first, yet he afterward claimed a superiority above the other horns or principalities.

Ver. 21. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints.] So antichrist is described as making war with the saints, and overcoming them for a time. (See Rev. xi. 7. 9. xiii. 7. xvii. 14.)

Ver. 22. Until the Ancient of days came.] Came to judgment, ver. 9.

And judgment was given to the saints of the Most High.] They were to sit in judgment with God and Christ. (See the note upon ver. 9.)

And the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom.] The saints are described as reigning with Christ in his kingdom: 2 Tim. ii. 11. Rev. ii. 26, 27. iii. 21. xx. 4.

Ver. 23. And the fourth beast—shall be diverse from all kingdoms.] As being managed under different forms of government: having the form of a commonwealth at the beginning of its greatness, and afterward governed by kings and emperors; and in process of time being divided into ten kingdoms or principalities; and all of them under the direction of one spiritual head. (See Rev. xvii. 13. and compare ver. 7. of this chapter.)

Ver. 24. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise.] A horn is an emblem of strength, so it comes to signify power and authority: (see Deut. xxxiii. 17. Psal. lxxxix. 17.) and from thence it is applied to denote sovereignty or dominion. (See viii. 21, 22. Rev. xvii. 12.) These ten horns or kingdoms arose out of the dissolution of the Roman empire, which came to pass about the year of Christ 476. And it was divided into the following principalities or kingdoms, according to Mr. Mede: (see his Works, p. 661.) 1. Britons. 2. Saxons. 3. Franks.

Digitized by Microsoft®

4. Burgundians. 5. Wisigoths. 6. Suevians and Alans. 7. Vandals. 8. Almons. 9. Ostrogoths; succeeded by the Longobards, first in Pannonia, and then in Italy. 10. Greeks.

The late learned Bishop Lloyd hath given the following list of the ten kingdoms which arose out of the dissolution of the Roman empire, and the time of their rise.

1. Hunns, erected their kingdom in that part of Pannonia and Dacia, which from them was called Hungary, about A. D. 356.

2. Ostrogoths settled themselves in the countries that reach from Rhetia to Mæsia, even to Thrace, about 377. and afterward came into Italy under Alaricus in 410.

3. Wisigoths settled in the south parts of France, and in Catalonia, about 378.

4. Franks seized upon part of Germany and Gaul, 410.

5. Vandals settled in Spain, afterward set up their kingdom in Africa, 407.

Their king Gensericus sacked Rome, 455.

6. Suevians and Alans seized the western parts of Spain, 407. and invaded Italy, 457.

7. Burgundians came out of Germany into that part of Gaul, called from them Burgundy, 407.

8. Herules, Rugians, and Thoringians, settled in Italy, under Doacer, about 476.

9. Saxons made themselves masters of Great Britain about the same time, 476.

10. Longobards, called likewise Gopidæ, settled in Germany about Magdeburg, 383, and afterward succeeded the Heruli and Thuringi in Hungary, about the year 826.

And another shall arise after them.] The papacy took its rise from the same cause, but did not arrive at direct supremacy till the year 606, when pope Boniface usurped the title of Universal Bishop. Mr. Mede translates the words, Another shall arise behind them: i. e. in an unperceived manner, so as the other kings were not aware of his growing greatness till he overtopped them.

And he shall be diverse from the rest.] His authority will be ecclesiastical, yet so as to lay claim to temporal power too, and to assert a right of disposing of secular affairs.

And he shall subdue three kings.] Or, kingdoms, see ver. 17. Mr. Mede (p. 778, 779.) explains these three kingdoms to be, 1. The exarchate of Ravenna, which Charles the Great recovered from the Lombards, and gave to the pope. 2. The kingdoms of the Greeks in Italy, of which the emperor Leo Isaurus was deprived by the popes Gregory the Second and Third: and, 3. The kingdom of the Franks, or German emperors: from whom the popes wrested the election and investiture of themselves and other bishops, and by degrees took from them all the jurisdiction they had in Italy: which was the occasion of grievous wars for several ages, between the popes and the emperor Henry IV. and his successors. See a brief account of those encroachments of the popes, and the disturbances which followed upon them, in Bishop Stillingfleet's Disc. of the Idolatry of the Church of Rome, &c. chap. 5.

Ver. 25. And he shall speak great words against the Most High.] See ver. 8. 20. xi. 36. St. John plainly alludes to this text, Rev. xiii. 5, 6. where the beast is said to open his mouth in blasphemy against God: this he did by advancing his own authority above that of God's, and in derogation to his laws: (compare 2 Thess. ii. 4.) as also by setting up the worship of images, and other idolatrous practices, which the prophet Isaiah calls reproaching and blaspheming God, Isa. lxv. 7.

And shall wear out the saints of the Most High.] By raising wars and persecutions against them. (See ver. 21. Rev. xvii. 6. xviii. 24.)

And shall think to change times and laws.] To alter governments and their constitutions. (Compare ii. 21. 1 Chron. xxix. 30.) This the papacy hath done by claiming a power to depose kings, and set up others in their stead: and not only to abrogate human laws, but likewise to dispense with Divine ones.

And they were given into his hand (or power, see Rev. xiii. 7.) until a time and times and the dividing of time.] Or half a time, as the Hebrew expresseth it, xii. 7. from whence the expressions are taken by St. John, Rev. xii. 14. i. e. for three years and a half of prophetical time. (See the note upon iv. 16.) The same space of time is expressed in other places of the Revelation by two-and-forty months, and by twelve hundred and threescore days, xi. 2, 3.

These times of antichrist some learned men think to be typically represented in the persecution which Antiochus Epiphanes raised against the Jewish church, and his interdict of the public worship in the temple, which Josephus reckons to have lasted three years and a half; (Bell. Jud. lib. i. cap. 1. n. 3.) although, computing from the time that the idol altar was set up, that desolation continued but three years precisely: as appears from 1 Macc. i. 54. compared with iv. 52. (See Archbishop Usher's Annals, par. ii. p. 23. and Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. par. ii. ad A. C. 165. 168.)

Ver. 26. But the judgment shall sit, (see ver. 22.) and shall take away his dominion.] This being the last of the four earthly kingdoms or monarchies, when that is destroyed, there will be an end of the present state of things, when all human rule, authority, and power, shall cease, (1 Cor. xv. 24.) and the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ, Rev. xi. 15.

Ver. 27. And the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, &c.] This denotes the reign of Christ on earth, where the saints are described as reigning with him. (See ver. 18. 22. compared with Rev. v. 10. xx. 4.)

Ver. 28. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me.] The extraordinary circumstances of the vision made a great impression upon my mind, (see ver. 15.) and it was matter of great trouble to me to foresee the profanation of God's laws and worship, and the persecutions and calamities which should come upon his church and people.

And my countenance changed in me.] The impressions this vision made upon me, weakened my spirits, and altered my complexion, as if I had a fit of sickness. (See viii. 18. 27.)

But I kept the matter in my heart.] I frequently meditated upon it: (compare Luke ii. 19.) and by that means was enabled to give an exact account of the vision and its interpretation in writing, for the use and benefit of after-ages. (See ver. 1.)

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.

This vision, as it is interpreted by the angel, foretells the succession of the Persian and Grecian monarchies, and how, during the latter, Antiochus Epiphanes should grievously persecute the Jews, profane the temple, and take away the daily sacrifice there offered: wherein he should be a type or figure of those horrible desolations which antichrist should make in the church of God.

Ver. 1. IN the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar.] The foregoing prophecy was writ in Chaldee, being a farther explication of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, interpreted chap. ii. This vision that follows is writ in Hebrew, because that part of it which relates to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes did chiefly concern the Jews.

A vision appeared to me, Daniel, after that which appeared to me at the first.] Or, In the beginning of Belshazzar's reign: (vii. 1.) or the sentence may be translated, After that which appeared to me before: as the word batechillah signifies, ix. 21.

Ver. 2. I saw in a vision.] When I was awake, and had the use of my bodily senses. (See ver. 3. compare x. 4, 5.)

I was at Shushan in the palace, (or, the palace, compare Esth. i. 1.) which is in the province of Elam.] The province of Elam, or Persia, properly so called, was taken from Astyages king of Media by Nebuchadnezzar, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah against Elam, xlix. 34. So it was subject to the king of Babylon when Daniel saw this vision; though afterward the viceroy of that country revolted to Cyrus, and joined with him in taking Babylon: as hath been observed in the note upon that place. Daniel's residing in the palace of Shushan, shews that he still continued in those posts of honour to which Nebuchadnezzar had advanced him. (See ver. 27. of this chapter.)

And I was by the river Ulai.] This river divides Susiana from the province of Elam, properly so called: (see Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 27.) though Elam is often taken in a larger sense, so as to comprehend Susiana under it. It was usual for the prophets to see visions by river-sides: of which Daniel gives us another instance, x. 4. and Ezekiel saw his first vision by the river Chebar; (Ezek. i. 3.) such places being proper for retirement and contemplation.

Ver. 3. Behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns: and the horns were high.] Horns are an emblem of power and dominion. (See vii. 24.) So this ram with two horns denotes the kingdoms of Media and Persia united into one government. The Hebrew reads, one ram: but the adjective one means no more than an article prefixed to a noun substantive: and so it is used x. 5. 1 Sam. i. 1. The ram was the royal ensign of the Persians, as Amm. Marcellinus observes, (lib. xix.) and rams' heads with horns, the one higher, and the other lower, are still to be seen among the remains of the ruins of Persepolis, as Sir John Chardin takes notice in his Travels.

But one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last.] To denote that the Persian kingdom, though it was of a later date, should overtop that of the Medes, and make a greater figure in the world, as it did from the times of Cyrus. (See the note upon Jer. li. 11.)

Ver. 4. I saw the ram pushing westward.] Persia lay eastward of Babylon: so all the conquests of Cyrus over Syria and the adjacent countries enlarged his dominions westward. But we may probably include under this head Cyrus's conquests in the lesser Asia, particularly over Crœsus, whereby he carried on his victories as far as the Ægean Sea. And his successors were for some time masters of a great part of Greece, called the west in the following verse.

And northward.] In the conquests over the Iberians, Albanians, those of Colchos and Armenia, and the adjacent countries.

And southward.] This chiefly relates to Cambyses's conquests over Egypt and Ethiopia, together with those of Darius Hystaspes over India, whence Ahasuerus, king of Persia, is said to have reigned from India to Ethiopia, Esth. i. 1.

But he did according to his will.] Nobody being able to oppose him. (See v. 19. xi. 3. 15.)

Ver. 5. And as I was considering, behold, a he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth.] A he-goat was anciently the emblem of princes or great commanders: see Prov. xxx. 31. Isa. xiv. 9. Zech. x. 3. where the word translated chief ones, signifies in the Hebrew great goats.

The goat is described here as coming from the west, that is, from Greece, on the face of the whole earth; i. e. carrying all before him as he went: denoting thereby the uninterrupted success of Alexander the Great. A goat was the emblem, or arms, of Macedon, as we now-a-days express it, ever since their king Caranus. (See Justin's Hist. lib. viii.)

And touched not the ground.] Hereby is signified the swiftness of his conquests: for which he is here described as having four wings of a fowl, vii. 6. having in eight years' time conquered all the countries that lay between the Ægean Sea and the river Hypanis in India. (See Dr. Prideaux, par. i. p. 503.)

And the goat had a notable horn between his eyes.] See ver. 21.

Ver. 7. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns.] He made a quick and furious onset upon the Medo-Persian empire, and utterly broke it in two engagements, the first at Issus, the second at Arbela.

He cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him.] See vii. 7. This prophecy of Alexander's success, Jaddus the high-priest shewed to him when he came to Jerusalem, and thereby encouraged him to go on in his expedition. (See Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8.)

Ver. 8. Therefore the he-goat waxed very great: and, when he was strong, the great horn was broken.] Alexander died in the height of his triumphs and prosperity. (See ver. 21, 22.)

And for it came up four notable ones, towards the four winds of heaven.] This the angel explains by four kingdoms standing up instead of it, ver. 22. (See likewise xi. 4.) Dr. Prideaux (ubi supra, p. 557.) shews, that this prophecy had its exact completion upon the partition of the Grecian empire after the battle of Ipsus, where Antigonus was killed. There were, indeed, partitions of it into provinces under the brother and son of Alexander; but this was a partition of it into kingdoms, among so many kings or independent governors, represented here by horns, and by heads, vii. 6. And these four kings were, 1. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, Lybia, Palestine, Arabia, and Cœlo-Syria, which may be called the southern part of the empire. 2. Cassander of Macedonia and Greece, which was the western part of it. 3. Lysimachus of Thrace and Asia, which was the northern part: and, 4. Seleucus of Syria and the eastern countries.

From the description here given of the empire of Alexander and his four successors, it is plain that the prophet represents it as one and the same empire: and as the third in order of four great monarchies. For it is represented under the emblem of one and the same he-goat, having first one notable horn in its forehead, which is expressly called the first king, ver. 21. and afterward four growing up in the room of it. This is a confirmation of what is observed before upon ii. 40. that the fourth kingdom must be the Roman empire.

Ver. 9. And out of one of them came forth a little horn.] From one of these four successors of Alexander came forth Antiochus, afterward called Epiphanes, or Illustrious, by his flatterers, but was, indeed, a vile person, to whom the honour of the kingdom did not belong, as the angel gives his character, xi. 21. Demetrius, his elder brother's son, being the rightful heir.

This little horn belonging to the third head, or monarchy, must not be confounded with the little horn belonging to the fourth, mentioned vii. 8. 20. although this here spoken of may be allowed to be a type or figure of the latter.

Which waxed exceeding great towards the south.] He took advantage of the youth of Ptolemy Philometor, (see 1 Macc. i. 16. 19.) and made himself master of Egypt, called the south in several places of the twelfth chapter of this prophecy.

And towards the east.] Towards Armenia and Persia. (See the note on xi. 44.)

And towards the pleasant land.] Judea is so called by the holy writers, as being made choice of by God to place his people there, and to make it the seat of his peculiar residence. (See Psal. xlviii. 2. Ezek. xx. 6. and compare xi. 16. 41. 45.) It is often described as a land flowing with milk and honey. The cruelties which Antiochus Epiphanes exercised in Judea, are the subject of the following verses. (Compare xi. 31, &c.)

Ver. 10. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven,] As the faithful are heirs of the kingdom of heaven, so the names and titles of the heavenly church are sometimes given to that on earth. The Christian church is called the Jerusalem which is above, Gal. iv. 26. and the governors of it are styled angels, Rev. i. 20. In like manner the host of heaven means here the Jewish church, and particularly the priests and Levites, who are called the host of heaven, a title proper to angels, from their continual attendance on God's service in the temple, in imitation of the angelical office. The word tsaba, host, is applied to the attendance in the sanctuary: Exod. xxxviii. 8. Numb. iv. 23.

And it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground.] Persons of principal dignity in the church are called stars, Rev. i. 20. so here the words import, either that Antiochus should put an end to the priests' ministration in the service of God, by taking away the daily sacrifice, (ver. 12.) or else that he seduce some of them by threats and flatteries to turn apostates. (See xi. 32. and compare Rev. xi. 1.)

And stamped upon them.] Utterly subdued or destroyed them. (See vii. 7.)

Ver. 11. Yea, he magnified himself even to [or against] the prince of the host.] This some understand of the high-priest Onias, (compare xi. 22.) whom Antiochus deprived of his office, and put in his room Jason, an ungodly wretch, who set up heathen rites in the place of God's worship: (2 Macc. iv. 13. 17.) but it may more probably be understood of God himself, the Lord whom the Jews served, (compare ver. 25.) or else of Christ the High-priest over the house of God, whose sanctuary the temple is called in the following words.

And by him the daily sacrifice was taken away.] The sacrifice which was offered in the name of the whole nation every morning and evening. (See Numb. xxviii. 3.) This was taken away by Antiochus, and both altar and temple profaned. (See 1 Macc. i. 44. 64.)

And the place of his sanctuary was cast down.] Or, cast out, as profane. (Compare Rev. xi. 2.) It was deprived of the honour and privileges belonging to a holy place, as if the enclosures had been thrown down, which separated it from common ground.

Ver. 12. And a host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, &c.] Antiochus prospered so far in his attempts against the Jews and their religion, that he built a citadel in the city of David, and placed a garrison of soldiers there, to disturb those that should come to worship God at the temple. (See 1 Macc. i. 33. 36.) This God permitted as a just punishment for the sins of his people; and particularly of those who professed a willingness to forsake the worship of God, and to join with the heathens in their idolatry. (See 1 Macc. i. 11, &c. 2 Macc. iv. 13. 17.) Some translate the words, And a set time was appointed against the daily sacrifice: for the word tsaba, host, signifies likewise a set time. (See x. 1.)

And it cast down the truth to the ground, and it practised and prospered.] He prospered so far in his attempts against the truth, as to suppress it for a time, and hinder the open profession of it. (See ver. 24. and xi. 28. 32.)

Ver. 13. Then I heard one saint speaking.] The word saint is equivalent to angel. (See iv. 13.) What this saint or angel said is not expressed: no more than the words spoken by that illustrious person who appeared to Daniel x. 5. are recorded.

And another saint said to that certain saint which spake.] Several angels are introduced in Daniel's visions: see ver. 15, 16. x. 6. 10. 16. xii. 5, 6. and so in Zecharias, i. 13, 14. iii. 2. 4. The word rendered here certain saint, is translated in the margin, the numberer of secrets, or the wonderful numberer: and must mean a person of extraordinary rank, as being able to unfold those secrets which were hid from other angels: and is therefore justly supposed to mean the Son of God, called the wonderful Counsellor, Isa. ix. 6. as being acquainted with all God's purposes and designs. (Compare John i. 18.) The participle medabber, speaking, used here twice with relation to this person, may denote him to be the Logos, or Word of God.

How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice? &c.] The words may be rendered more agreeably to the Hebrew thus; For how long a time shall the vision last, the daily sacrifice be taken away, and the transgression of desolation continue? The transgression of desolation, or making desolate, is the same with the abomination that maketh desolate, xi. 31. and applying the expression to the persecution raised by Antiochus, denotes the idol which he caused to be set upon God's altar, and there to be worshipped. (See 1 Macc. i. 54. compared with ver. 59.)

Ver. 14. And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.] This computation of time, in its obvious sense, contains something more than six years and four months, reckoning three hundred and sixty days to a year: and, if we explain it with relation to the persecution set on foot by Antiochus, we must date it, not from the height of that persecution, when the daily sacrifice was actually taken away, for that continued but just three years; (compare 1 Macc. i. 54. with iv. 52.) but we must date the rise of it from those transgressions which occasioned the desolation: (see 1 Macc. i. 11, &c.) and so we may reasonably suppose the two thousand three hundred days to commence some time before Antiochus's first invasion of Judea, and his pillaging the sanctuary, mentioned 1 Macc. i. 20—22. which invasion was above two years before the entire abolishing of God's worship in the temple, as appears from the twenty-ninth verse of the same chapter.

But since it is generally agreed, that the persecution of Antiochus was a type, or an imperfect representation, of a greater desolation which antichrist should make in the church of God: (compare ver. 13. here with xii. 11.) it is the opinion of some learned men, that these two thousand three hundred days are a line of time that is to be extended to the end of the times of antichrist: taking each day for a year, according to the genius of the prophetical writings: (see Numb. xiv. 34. Ezek. iv. 6.) according to which sense the three years and a half, mentioned vii. 25. and the seventy weeks in the ninth chapter, are explained by most interpreters. According to this opinion these two thousand and three hundred days will be commensurate to the one thousand two hundred and ninety, or one thousand three hundred and thirty-five prophetical days, or years, mentioned xii. 11, 12. and then the sanctuary will be thoroughly cleansed, and God's indignation will come perfectly to an end, as it is expressed ver. 19.

The phrase here translated two thousand three hundred days, is in the original two thousand three hundred mornings [and] evenings: which is the Hebrew way of expressing a natural day. (See Gen. i. 5.) According to this way of speaking, Christ is said to be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, Matt. xii. 40. i. e. part of three natural days. And perhaps the phrase may be here used, in allusion to the daily sacrifice, which was to be offered every morning and evening: the taking away of which is here foretold.

Ver. 15. When I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning.] Compare xii. 8.

Ver. 16. I heard a man's voice—which called and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision.] The person who utters this voice seems to be the same who is called the wonderful numberer, ver. 13. because he speaks as one that had authority over the angel Gabriel.

Ver. 17. When he came I was afraid, and fell upon my face.] Being struck with fear and astonishment. (Compare x. 7, 8. Ezek. i. 28. Rev. i. 17.)

But he said unto me, Understand, O son of man.] This is a title given to none of the prophets but Ezekiel and Daniel, who had more frequent converse with angels than any of the rest: and is given to the prophet here, either to put him in mind that he was but flesh and blood, that he might not be exalted for having these heavenly visions imparted to him; or else it may be interpreted for a mark or title of honour, as implying something more than an ordinary man, even such a one that was highly favoured and beloved of God. (See ix. 23. x. 11. and the note upon Ezek. ii. 1.)

For at the time of the end shall be the vision.] Or, To the time of the end; i. e. there is a precise time determined for the accomplishment of the vision, when it shall certainly be fulfilled. (See ver. 19. and compare ix. 27. xi. 35, 36. Habak. ii. 3.)

Ver. 18. Now while he was speaking to me, I was in a deep sleep on my face towards the ground.] As one that faints away, and falls into a swoon through fear and astonishment. (See ver. 27. x. 7—10. 16.)

But he touched me, and set me upright.] See x. 10. Ezek. ii. 2.

Ver. 19. I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation.] Or, To the last end of the indignation: I will explain to thee the whole series of God's judgments upon his people to the end and conclusion of them. (See xii. 8.)

For at the time appointed the end shall be.] God will not continue his anger for ever, but there is a fixed period appointed for it. (See ver. 17.)

Ver. 20—22.] See the notes upon ver. 3. 5. 8.

Ver. 22. Four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power.] Four kingdoms shall be set up by Alexander's generals, who shall be of the same nation with him, although not of his posterity: nor shall they have that power or extent of dominion which he possessed. (See xi. 4.)

Ver. 23. And in the latter end of their kingdom.] Greece was the chief province of this empire, from whence it had its original and its name: the bringing this country into subjection to the Roman power was a manifest indication of the declension of the third monarchy, and the advancement of the fourth: this was remarkably brought to pass when Æmilius the Roman consul vanquished Perseus king of Macedon, and thereby brought all Greece under the power of the Romans: and this happened much about the time when Antiochus set up the abomination of desolation in the temple of Jerusalem. (See Mr. Mede's Works, p. 654. and Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra, ad A. C. 168.)

When the transgressions are come to the full.] When many of the Jews shall be disposed to cast off the true religion, and embrace the gentile idolatries. (See 1 Macc. i. 11. 15. 43. ii. 15. 18.) God spares sinners for a time to give them space for repentance, till their iniquities come to their full height, and are ripe for judgment. (See Gen. xv. 16. Matt. xxiii. 32. 1 Thess. ii. 16.)

A king of a fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up.] One of a fierce and untractable temper, without pity or compassion; (compare Deut. xxviii. 50.) one practised in craft and policy: (see ver. 25.) especially in the arts of inveigling men, and seducing them from their religion. This character may be justly applied to Antiochus Epiphanes: though in other respects he behaved himself so unaccountably, that he might more fitly be called Epimanes the Madman, than Epiphanes the Illustrious, as Polybius observes. (See the Fragments of his twenty-sixth book; and Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. book iii. at the beginning.) This makes some interpreters think that the character here given to Antiochus, more properly belongs to antichrist, whose type he was: an observation that may be applied to some other expressions in the following verses.

Ver. 24. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power.] He shall subdue Judea, Egypt, and several other countries. (See ver. 9. xi. 41—43.) It is added here, that he shall not effect this by his own power: which they that apply to Antiochus understand either, first, of the assistance which Eumenes king of Pergamus, and his brother Attalus, gave him in keeping the kingly power he had usurped: (see xi. 21, 22.) or, secondly, we may understand the words of the wickedness of Jason and Menelaus, the high-priests, who joined with an irreligious party among the Jews, and forwarded Antiochus's designs to establish gentilism among them: (1 Macc. i. 11, &c. 2 Macc. iv. 7, &c.) or, thirdly, the place may be understood of God's prospering his attempts, as a punishment for the transgressions of his people, (ver. 23.) But the expression may be more fitly applied to antichrist, of whom Antiochus was the type, who grew great, and carried on his designs, not so much by his own strength, as by the power of the ten kings, who afforded him their arms and assistance. (See Rev. xvii. 13. 17.)

And shall prosper, and practise.] See ver. 12.

And shall destroy the mighty and the holy people.] That people, who, being set apart for God's service, (see ix. 16.) were under his peculiar protection, by virtue whereof they were formerly victorious over all their enemies. Antiochus, in his first invasion of Judea, slew and led captive eighty thousand Jews, (2 Macc. v. 14.) and two years afterward sent Apollonius with an army of two-and-twenty thousand men, to destroy those that assembled in the synagogue on the sabbath. (See 1 Macc. i. 29, 30. 2 Macc. v. 24.)

Ver. 25. And through his policy also shall he cause craft to prevail in his hands.] He first of all obtained the kingdom by flatteries: (xi. 21.) then after he had made leagues and covenants, he wrought deceitfully, and under pretence of peace and friendship, he invaded and spoiled both Egypt and Judea: (xi. 24. 27. 1 Macc. i. 30, &c. 2 Macc. v. 25.) The same thing is foretold in the following words, By peace he shall destroy many.

And he shall magnify himself in his heart.] See ver. 11. xi. 36. 2 Macc. ix. 4. 7, 8. 11.

He shall also stand up against the Prince of princes.] He shall exalt himself against the true God, the Lord of heaven and earth, (compare ver. 11. xi. 36.) abolishing his worship, and setting up idolatry in its stead. (See 1 Macc. i. 21. 24. 44. 54.)

But he shall be broken without hand.] By an immediate judgment of God. (Compare Job xxxiv. 20. and see the note upon ii. 45.) God struck him with a noisome disease, attended with horrible torments both of body and mind. See 1 Macc. vi. 8. 13. 2 Macc. ix. from the fifth verse to the end. The history those two writers give of his death agrees in many particulars with Polybius's account of it, p. 1453. of Gronovius's edition.

Ver. 26. And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true.] The vision of the two thousand three hundred evenings and mornings, mentioned ver. 14. is certain. (See x. 1.)

Wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days.] The same thing is expressed by shutting up the words, and sealing the book, xii. 4. The expression in both places denotes the concealing the sense of it from common understandings; or deferring the accomplishment of the events therein foretold. So we find shutting and opening, sealing and unfolding, are opposed in the prophetical language, and import the same as concealing and revealing; delaying the accomplishment of a prophecy, and bringing it into effect. (See Isa. xxix. 11. Rev. v. 1. 5. xxii. 10.) The words instruct us that prophecies are never fully understood till they are accomplished; and the nearer the time approaches of their accomplishment, the more light shall diligent searchers have for the explaining them. (See xii. 4.)

For yet the vision is for many days.] See x. 1. 14.

Ver. 27. And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days.] See the note on ver. 18.

Afterward I rose up, and did the king's business.] See the note upon ver. 2.

And I was astonished at the vision.] The calamities which it foreshewed should come upon God's people, filled me with melancholy and desponding thoughts. (See vii. 28.)

But none understood it.] Daniel himself had but an imperfect apprehension of it, just as when men view things at a distance, though the angel did impart to him the general meaning of it, (ver. 16. 17.) and afterward he had a more particular revelation of several things relating to it. (See the note upon x. 1.) But still it remained unintelligible to common capacities. (See the foregoing verse.)

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.

Daniel having thoroughly considered the prophecies of Jeremy relating to the seventy years' captivity, and being satisfied that that term of years was near expiring, humbles himself in prayer for the sins of his people, and earnestly begs of God the restoration of Jerusalem. In answer to his prayers, the angel Gabriel informs him, that the city should be rebuilt, and peopled as in former times, and should so continue for seventy weeks of years, i. e. for four hundred and ninety years; and then should be utterly destroyed for putting the Messias to death.

Ver. 1. IN the first year of Darius, the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes.] See v. 31. This is the same person who is called Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, by the heathen historians, with whom Josephus agrees. His father Astyages had the name of Ahasuerus among the Jews, as appears by a passage in Tobit, xiv. 15. where the taking of Nineveh is ascribed to Nebuchadonosor and Assuerus, who were the same with Nabupolassar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, and Astyages: Nebuchadnezzar being a name common to all the Babylonian kings, as Pharaoh was to the kings of Egypt. (See Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. ad A. C. 612.)

We need not wonder to find the same persons called by such different names, especially in different countries: the Scripture affords several instances of this kind: so Daniel was called Belteshazzar by Nebuchadnezzar, who changed the names of his three companions, i. 7. Zerubbabel was called Shezbazzar, Ezra i. 8. Esther, Hadassah, Esth. ii. 7.

I Daniel understood by books.] The several prophecies of Jeremiah are called so many books. (See Jer. xxv. 13. xxix. 1.) We may observe from hence, that the prophets studied the writings of those prophets who were before them, for the more perfect understanding of the times when their prophecies were to be fulfilled. The same they did by several of their own prophecies. (See 1 Pet. i. 11, 12.)

That he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem.] See Jer. xxv. 11, 12. xxix. 10. The seventy years mentioned both here and in Jeremy, are to be dated from the end of the third, or beginning of the fourth, year of Jehoiakim: (compare Jer. xxv. 1. with Dan. i. 1.) from which time to the first year of Cyrus, according to the Scripture account, are just seventy years. These desolations began from the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when the city was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, (see i. 1.) at which time the king of Judah became tributary to the king of Babylon: and they were from time to time increasing, till the eleventh year of Zedekiah, when they were fully accomplished in the burning of the city and temple; after which time it continued desolate till the end of the captivity, (2 Chron. xxxvi. 21.)

Ver. 3. And I set my face unto the Lord God.] I directed my face towards the place where the temple stood. (See vi. 10.)

To seek [him] by prayer and supplications.] The promises of God are generally conditional, and the promise of restoring the Jews' captivity after seventy years, had this condition particularly expressed in it, that they should call upon him, and pray unto him, and then he would hearken unto them, Jer. xxix. 12.

With fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes.] The soul and body are so nearly related, that the humiliation of both is necessary to make our repentance complete. (See James iv. 9, 10.)

Ver. 4. And I prayed unto the Lord my God, and made my confession.] Both acknowledging his justice and holiness, and my own and my people's iniquity. The better men are, the greater is the sense of their guilt, and the deeper is their humiliation. (See Job xlii. 6. 1 Tim. i. 15.)

Keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, &c.] The prophet does not insist upon any right the people had in those gracious promises made to their fathers, because the condition of their obedience, whenever it was not expressly mentioned, yet was tacitly implied. (Compare Nehem. i. 5.)

Ver. 5. We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, &c.] Daniel uses the same confession that is prescribed in Solomon's consecration prayer to be used by the Jews in the land of their captivity: with a promise subjoined of a favourable answer, that God would make to their supplications, presented to him upon that occasion. (See 1 Kings viii. 48—50. and compare Nehem. i. 7. Psal. cvi. 6.)

Ver. 7. And to all Israel that are near, and that are far off.] Some of the Jews were carried captive, or went voluntary exiles, upon foreseeing the calamities which were coming upon their country, into the neighbouring countries of Edom, Moab, and Ammon: (see the note upon Jer. xii. 14.) as others went down into Egypt. (See Jer. xliii. xliv.) Those were not removed to such a distance from their own country, as those that were carried to Babylon.

Ver. 10. To walk in his laws which he set before us by his servants the prophets.] By Moses, and the succession of the prophets that followed him: who reinforced the law of Moses, and gave the people new instructions from God upon emergent occasions.

Ver. 11. And the oath that is written in the law of Moses.] Those solemn denunciations of God's judgments declared against impenitent sinners, Lev. xxvi. Deut. xxviii. xxix. 20. The Hebrew word Shebunah, is taken here for an imprecation, as it is used, Numb. v. 21. the forms of swearing or adjuration, implying an imprecation upon those that forswear themselves. For which reason the Hebrew alah signifies both swearing and cursing. (See the note upon Jer. xxiii. 10.)

Ver. 12. And against our judges that judged us.] Judges here signify any princes or rulers. (Compare Job xii. 17. Psal. ii. 10. cxlviii. 12. Prov. viii. 16.)

For under the whole heaven hath not been done, as hath been done unto Jerusalem.] See Lam. i. 12. ii. 13. Ezek. v. 9.

Ver. 13. As it is written in the law of Moses, all this is come upon us.] A devout acknowledgment of God's justice and providence, in making his judgments exactly fulfil the threatenings denounced many ages before by Moses. (See Lev. xxvi. 14, &c. Deut. xxviii. 15, &c.)

Ver. 14. Therefore hath the Lord watched upon the evil.] The same expression is used by the prophet Jeremy in his threatenings against the Jews, xxxi. 28. xliv. 27.

Ver. 15. And now, O Lord our God, who hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt, &c.] A form of supplication used in several places of Scripture, whereby devout persons entreat God to continue his favours, by recounting his former mercies towards them. (See Exod. xxxii. 11. 13. Nehem. ix. 10. Jer. xxxii. 20.) This the Latin tongue expresses by the word obsecratio: of which kind is that form of supplication used in our Litany, By the mystery of thy holy incarnation, &c. which some men's ignorance or prejudice hath misinterpreted, as if it were a sort of conjuration.

We have sinned, we have done wickedly.] The entire sense is, Although we have sinned, and are unworthy of the continuance of thy mercies, yet deal with us according to all thy righteousness, as it follows.

Ver. 16. O Lord, according to all thy righteousness, I beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away from the city Jerusalem.] The word righteousness is in many places of Scripture equivalent to mercy. (See 1 Sam. xii. 7. Psal. xxxi. 1. cxliii. 1. Micah vi. 5. and Dr. Hammond upon Matt. i. 19.)

Thy holy mountain.] The temple. (See ver. 20. and the note upon Isa. ii. 2.)

Ver. 17. Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary which is desolate, for the Lord's sake.] For the sake of the Messias, known by the title of the Lord among the Jews: (see Psal. cx. 1.) and called Messiah the Prince, ver. 25. of this chapter. All God's promises are fulfilled in and for the sake of Christ, (2 Cor. i. 20.) To this sense some interpret Psal. lxxx. 14. 16. Behold, and visit this vine; and the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted, even for the sake of the Son, whom thou madest strong for thyself: expressed afterward by the Son of man, ver. 18.

Ver. 19. Defer not for thy own sake, O my God, &c.] The seventy years of our captivity are near being expired: (see ver. 2.) therefore I beseech thee not to defer the accomplishment of the promise thou hast made to restore us to our own country, and the free exercise of our religion. So remarkable a turn of providence will very much redound to the honour of thy name. (See Psal. lxxix. 9, 10. cii. 15, 16.)

Ver. 21. The man Gabriel.] The angel Gabriel appearing under the shape of a man. (Compare x. 16.)

Whom I had seen at the beginning.] Or before. (See viii. 16.) The word batechillah signifies before, viii. 1.

Being caused to fly swiftly.] The angels are commonly described as having wings, with respect to their appearance in a bodily shape, to signify their readiness to execute the Divine commands. (See Isa. vi. 2. Ezek. i. 11.)

Touched me [see viii. 18. x. 10.] about the time of the evening oblation.] There were three hours of prayer: (see vi. 10.) but the two most solemn seasons of it were at the time of the morning and evening oblation, that solemn service which was offered daily in the temple in the name of the whole nation. (See viii. 11.) This service was performed at the third and ninth hours of the day, answering to our nine of the clock in the morning and three in the afternoon. Devout persons that could not attend the temple service, set apart those hours for their private devotions: and we find Elijah made that solemn prayer and sacrifice recorded 1 Kings xviii. 36. at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice. But upon their solemn days of fasting and humiliation, they continued their devotions from the time of the morning sacrifice till that of the evening was finished. Such was this of Daniel, and that of Cornelius, mentioned Acts x. 30. This custom was continued among the primitive Christians, who did not conclude their prayers or fasts on their stationary days till three in the afternoon. (See Mr. Bingham, Eccles. Antiq. book xxi. chap. 3.)

Ver. 23. At the beginning of the supplication the commandment came forth.] God's command to me to instruct thee farther in what should hereafter befal the city and temple of Jerusalem, in whose behalf thou didst pour forth thy supplications. Here was a remarkable completion of that promise, Isa. lxv. 24. While they are yet speaking I will hear.

For thou art greatly beloved.] Learned men have observed a near affinity between the prophecy of Daniel and the Revelation of St. John; and we may take notice, that much the same title is given to them both. Daniel is styled a man greatly beloved, here and x. 11. 19. and the character given to St. John is, that of the disciple whom Jesus loved, John xxi. 20. 24.

Therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision.] Apply thy mind carefully to what is said, for this prophecy contains in it truths of the greatest importance. Our Saviour plainly refers to these words, which are repeated ver. 25. when, explaining the latter part of this prophecy of the final destruction of Jerusalem, he adds, Let him that readeth understand, Matt. xxiv. 15.

Ver. 24. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city.] To recite all the different methods chronologers have taken of computing these seventy weeks, would be too large a work for a commentary. I shall only take notice of three opinions, which seem most agreeable to the text. The first is, that of Petavius Rationar. Tem. par. ii. p. 154. and Archbishop Usher, Annal. V. T. ad An. P. J. 4260. These two learned authors date the beginning of this prophecy from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, when he gave his commission to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem; (Nehem. ii. 1.) from which time they reckon half of the week here specified, (ver. 27.) to be completed at the death of Christ. But then these authors suppose Artaxerxes to have begun his reign nine years sooner than the historians commonly date it. The second opinion is that of Dr. Prideaux, Connex. of Script. par. i. ad an. A. C. 458. who fixes the date of this prophecy to the seventh year of Artaxerxes, when he gave a commission to Ezra, to settle the state of the Jews at Jerusalem, to which sense he understands the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem: from which time he computes four hundred and ninety years to the death of Christ.

The third opinion is that of the late right reverend and learned Bishop Lloyd, which may be seen in the Chronological Tables, published by his direction, Numb. 3, 4. He supposes the years here specified to consist of three hundred and sixty days: such years he affirms the Scripture always makes use of in the computation of time: as appears in the history of Noah's flood, Gen. vii. 11. compared with ver. 24. and viii. 4. and from Rev. xii. 6. compared with ver. 14. and xiii. 5. where twelve hundred and sixty days are reckoned equivalent to three years and a half, and to forty and two months. The same computation of years was generally made use of in ancient times by all nations, particularly by the Chaldeans, where Daniel now lived. The reasons of this opinion are at large set forth by Mr. Marshal, in his treatise upon the Seventy Weeks, par. ii. chap. 4. The bishop, proceeding upon this hypothesis, computes the date of this prophecy from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, and reckons sixty-nine weeks of years, or four hundred and eighty-three years, from thence to the year before Christ's death. But then the last or single week that remains to make up the number of seventy he separates from the rest, and begins it from the year of Christ 63. in the latter half of which the sacrifice and oblation were to cease, and the city and sanctuary to be destroyed by the Romans: all which was fulfilled in the seventieth year after Christ.

The difference of these three opinions as to the main point, the completion of this prophecy, is not very great; for, as the learned Bishop Chandler hath judiciously observed, (Answer to Grounds and Reasons, p. 139.) "The commencement of the weeks must be either from the seventh of Artaxerxes, which falls upon the four hundred and fifty-seventh year before Anno Domini, or from the twentieth of Artaxerxes. Add to four hundred and fifty-seven years before Christ, twenty-six years after Christ (which is the number that four hundred and eighty-three years, or sixty-nine weeks, exceeds four hundred and fifty-seven years), and you are brought to the beginning of John the Baptist's preaching up the advent of the Messias: add seven years, or one week, to the former, and you come to the thirty-third year of Anno Domini, which was the year of Jesus Christ's death. Or else compute four hundred and ninety years, the whole seventy weeks, from the seventh of Artaxerxes; by subtracting four hundred and fifty-seven years (the space of time between that year and the beginning of Anno Domini) from four hundred and ninety, and there remains thirty-three, the year of our Lord's death. Let the twentieth of Artaxerxes be the date of the seventy weeks, which is the four hundred and forty-fifth year before A. D. and reckon sixty-nine weeks of Chaldean years; seventy Chaldee years being equal to sixty-nine Julian; and so four hundred and seventy-eight Julian years making four hundred and eighty-three Chaldee years, and the end in the thirty-third year after Christ, or the Passover following. Any of these reckonings (adds this learned author) are sufficient for our purpose. It is rather to be wondered, how, at this distance of time, learned men have been able to come to any exactness in these matters."

Seventy weeks are determined.] By seventy weeks are to be understood seventy weeks of years, or seventy times seven years; i. e. four hundred and ninety years: each day being accounted for a year, according to the prophetical way of reckoning. (See Numb. xiv. 34. Ezek. iv. 6.) Daniel distinguisheth between these weeks and the weeks after the common reckoning, by calling the latter weeks of days, x. 2. according to the sense of the Hebrew, expressed in the margin. And Isaiah distinguisheth a natural year from a prophetical one, by calling it the year of a hireling, Isa. xvi. 14. xxi. 16.

The Jews numbered their time by sevens of years: every seventh year was a year of release, and after seven times seven years, i. e. forty-nine years, came the year of jubilee. So the computation of time here made use of alludes to Lev. xxv. 8. Thou shalt number seven sabbaths [or rather weeks] of years, seven times seven years; the Hebrew word sabbath signifying the number seven, as it is rendered Ἑβδομὰς by the LXX. in the latter part of the verse: and so the Greek word Σάββατον is used in Luke xviii. 12. xxiv. 1. Daniel, by examining the prophecy of Jeremiah, had discovered how the seventy years of the captivity were near expiring: and here the angel discovers to him another line of time, importing, that after the restoration of Jerusalem it should continue for a period of time, consisting of seventy times seven years, which being expired, it should be finally destroyed. Seventy weeks contain ten jubilees, and ten being the number of perfection, these seventy weeks denote the bringing in the most complete jubilee, or remission, as the LXX. render that word: when all former trespasses should be cancelled, and men should be restored to that heavenly inheritance they had forfeited, by the death of the Messias.

Upon thy people, and thy holy city.] Daniel in his prayer to God speaking of the Jews and Jerusalem, had used these expressions, Thy people, and thy holy city, ver. 18, 19. as if their title to God's favour were indefeasible. To correct this mistake, the angel, directing his discourse to Daniel, returns him his own expressions, as if the people and the city were rather his than God's. In the same phrase God speaks to Moses, after the sin of the Israelites in making the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 7. At the twenty-sixth verse of this prophecy, the angel tells Daniel how they ceased to be God's people.

To finish the transgression, and to make an end of sin, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness.] This the Messiah did by making an atonement for sin, and absolving men from the guilt of it: by giving men the best rules and assistances for the promoting true and inward righteousness; called here everlasting righteousness, in opposition to the righteousness of the law, a great part of which consisted in external ordinances, imposed on them for a season till the time of reformation, Heb. ix. 10. where the English text reads, to make an end of sin; the margin translates it, to seal up sin, following a various reading in the Hebrew: but the sense comes all to one, for the verb which signifies to seal up, denotes likewise the accomplishing of any thing, and is applied to sin, or the punishment of it, Lam. iv. 22. (See likewise the following note.)

To seal up the vision and prophecy.] To fulfil the prophecies of foregoing ages concerning the Messias, and to confirm them, by making the event to answer the prediction, as the setting of a seal confirms the authenticalness of any writing. Thus the rabbins upon the text interpret the words, All the prophecies (say they) shall be fulfilled at the coming of the Messias. Bishop Lloyd explains the sentence of the finishing and completing the prophetical writings of the Old Testament, which he supposes to have been done forty-nine years after the commencement of this prophecy. (See the note upon the following verse.)

And to anoint the most Holy.] The word anoint plainly alludes to the name of Messiah, expressed in the following verse, which signifies in Hebrew, the Anointed, and is translated Christ in Greek. (See John i. 41.) To anoint is the same here as to consecrate the Messiah to be a priest, prophet, and king, all which offices were conveyed by the ceremony of anointing. The Messiah is styled here the most Holy, upon the account of his unspotted original, as well as his unblamable life. (See Luke i. 35. Acts iii. 14. Heb. vii. 26. Rev. iii. 7.) The words may be literally translated, To anoint the holy of holies: an expression which usually signifies the inner sanctuary, called the holiest of all, Heb. ix. 3. and it is very properly applied to the Messias, who was greater than the temple, Matt. xii. 6. because in him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, Coloss. ii. 9. whereupon he calls his body the temple, John ii. 21.

Ver. 25. Know therefore and understand.] See ver. 23.

From the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem.] Or, To build again Jerusalem, as the margin reads, and so the verb shub is translated in the latter part of the verse, and see xi. 10. Daniel had besought God to behold their desolations, and the ruins of the city which is called by his name, ver. 18. In answer to this his supplication, the angel acquaints him that the city, both the streets and the wall thereof, should be rebuilt. These expressions do very much confirm their interpretation, who date this prophecy from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, when he gave a commission to Nehemiah to rebuild the city and its walls; (Nehem. ii. 1.) whereas Dr. Prideaux, who dates this prophecy from the seventh year of Artaxerxes, is forced to understand these expressions in a metaphorical sense, for restoring and establishing the church and state of the Jews. Now it is a received rule, that a literal sense is always to be preferred, if it be consistent with the main scope of the text.

Unto Messiah the Prince.] Anointing being the ancient ceremony of investing persons in the highest offices and dignities, the name of Messias, or Anointed, was in an eminent manner appropriated to him that was sanctified, or set apart, and sent into the world under the highest character of being the Redeemer of it. By that name he was commonly known unto the Jews, John i. 41. iv. 25. and that title was chiefly given to him from the authority of this prophecy. He is called here the Prince, or Ruler, a title often given to David; (see 1 Sam. ix. 16. 2 Sam. v. 2. vii. 8.) and applied to the Messiah himself, spoken of under the name of David, Isa. lv. 4. The author of the first book of Chronicles probably alludes to this place of Daniel, v. 2. Judah prevailed over his brethren, and of him was the chief Ruler (the nagid here in the text) to come: as the words may best be translated. The Messiah was commonly known under the title of King of Israel, or King of the Jews. (See Matt. ii. 2. Luke xxiii. 2, 3. John i. 49. xix. 19.)

Shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks.] A colon should be placed at the end of this sentence, which is wrong placed in the middle of it in our English Bibles. Seven weeks and threescore and two weeks put together, make sixty-nine weeks of years, or four hundred and eighty-three years. As the cutting off the Messiah is appropriated to the period of threescore and two weeks in the following verse, so the seven weeks, or forty-nine years, here mentioned, must in all probability be assigned to the building of the street and the wall, whether we understand it literally, or metaphorically with Dr. Prideaux, for the restoring and settling the Jewish church and state. (See Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra, and ad an. A. C. 409.)

Bishop Lloyd, who reckons the date of this prophecy from the twentieth of Artaxerxes, concludes the seven weeks, or forty-nine years, in the eighth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, at which time he supposes Malachi to have writ his prophecy, and thereby finished the Old Testament Canon, or sealed up the vision and prophecy, after whom the Jews were to look for no other prophet till John Baptist. (See Mal. iv. 4, 5. compared with Matt. xi. 13, 14.)

The street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times.] When the Jews were sorely assaulted by their adversaries, who did all they could to hinder them from rebuilding the city, and fortifying it with a new wall. (See Nehem. iv. 7, &c. vi. 15.) These words, taken in their obvious sense, plainly fix the date of this prophecy to the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, who then gave Nehemiah a commission to repair the city, and raise up the walls and ramparts of it. (See Nehem. chap. ii.—iv. compared with Ecclus. xlix. 13.) Before which time the Jews, that returned from captivity, lived in the cities where their inheritance lay. (See Ezra ii. 70. Nehem. vii. 4.) "The word haruts, translated wall, properly signifies the circuit bounding out the limits of the city, whereon the wall was built, and anciently used to be marked out with a plough making a furrow round about," as Mr. Mede observes; (Works, p. 700.) and by rechob, the street, or broad place, he understands the area, or plat of ground whereon the city was to be built: or else we may suppose the singular put for the plural, an enallage very common in Scripture.

Ver. 26. And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off.] Or, After those threescore and two weeks—for the he prefixed to the word shebuuim, is emphatical, as the grammarians express it. The common interpretation of the word is, that in the seventieth or last week the Messiah should be put to death. The Hebrew verb here translated cut off, is by the Jewish rabbins interpreted of a death inflicted by the sentence of a judge, which sense they confirm by the use of it in a parallel place, Lev. xvii. 14. to which we may add 1 Sam. xxviii. 9. Our Saviour plainly refers to this text, among others, Luke xxiv. 26. 46.

Bishop Lloyd, who makes a break between the sixty-nine weeks and the seventieth, supposes the sixty-nine to expire in May, A. D. 32. which was the year before our Saviour's passion. In correspondence with this prophecy, our Lord could not survive a whole year after the sixty-nine weeks were expired: nor did he: but since he was to be CUT OFF at the Passover, himself being the true paschal Lamb, he died in the following year in the month Nisan, answering to our April, the very same day and hour that the paschal lamb was wont to be killed. (See the Chronological Tables abovementioned.)

But not for himself.] The just suffering for the unjust, 1 Pet. iii. 18. The Vulgar Latin renders the words to this sense, And the people that deny him shall be no longer his. The Hebrew phrase is used in the same sense, xi. 17. Job xxxix. 16. To confirm this interpretation, we are to suppose the word people, which follows, to be understood here, and may with Bishop Lloyd translate this and the following sentence thus: And the people that deny him shall be no longer his, but the Prince's (i. e. the Messiah's, ver. 25.) future people shall destroy, &c. And then the Jews will properly be called Lo-ammi, not my people, Hos. i. 9.

But the people of the prince that shall come.] The Romans, under the conduct of Vespasian and his son Titus, who were the generals in that war, and both of them dignified with the title of Prince or Cæsar. Bishop Lloyd corrects the common translation thus, The Prince's (i. e. the Messiah's) future people: the Hebrew word haba, as the Greek ἐρχόμενος, which answers it, often signifying the future, or that which is to come. (See Isa. xxvii. 6. xliv. 7. Mark x. 30. Rev. i. 4.) This people that learned prelate understands to be the Romans and their empire, which was the seat of the Christian church. So when our Saviour tells us, that before the end of the Jewish nation come, the gospel shall be preached in all the world, Matt. xxiv. 14. and St. Paul speaks to the same purpose, Rom. x. 16. Coloss. i. 6. 23. we are there to understand the world of the extent of the Roman empire. And our Lord, speaking of the final destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans, expresseth it by sending forth his armies to destroy those murderers, and burn up their city: (Matt. xxii. 7.) which exactly agrees with the words here following.

Shall destroy the city and the sanctuary.] After that the Romans had burnt both city and sanctuary, they so entirely destroyed them, that it could scarce be perceived the place had ever been inhabited, as Josephus relates (de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 1. edit. Hudson): and the Jews relate that a plough was drawn over the ground where they both stood: (see Dr. Lightfoot upon Matt. xxiv. 2.) which were evident accomplishments of our Saviour's prediction, that one stone should not stand upon another, with respect either to the city, (Luke xix. 44.) or to the sanctuary, (Matt. xxiii. 38. xxiv. 2.)

And the end thereof shall be with a flood.] The desolations made by an army are often compared to the inundations of a flood, whose violence nothing is able to withstand. (Compare xi. 10. Isa. viii. 7, 8.)

And unto the end of the war desolations are determined.] Or, decreed. That war shall make an utter destruction both of the city and the nation.

Ver. 27. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week.] The former part of the verse may be literally translated thus: One week shall confirm the covenant with many, and the midst of (or the half part of) the week shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease. Most interpreters suppose the seventy weeks to be completed at the death of Christ, or at least one half of the seventieth and last of them: accordingly they understand the confirming the covenant of the new covenant, and the terms of salvation therein proposed, first by John Baptist, as the forerunner of Christ, and then by Christ himself. (Compare Isa. xlii. 6. lv. 3. Jer. xxxi. 31. Ezek. xvi. 60—62.) They that confine the promulgation of the new covenant to the first half of the seventieth week, understand it of Christ's preaching for three years and a half, and then suffering in the midst of that week.

They that understand the confirming the covenant to be of the same extent with the seventieth week, suppose John Baptist's preaching to have taken up three years and a half, before Christ entered on his prophetical office, and translate the following words, In the half part of the week. (See the next note but one.)

With many.] The same expression is elsewhere used of the universal redemption, or general promulgation of pardon, by the gospel-covenant. (See Isa. liii. 11. Matt. xx. 28. Rom. v. 15. 19. Heb. ix. 28.)

And in the midst of the week.] Our translation of the words follows their opinion who place the death of Christ in the middle of the last week: (see Archbishop Usher's Annals, par. ii. p. 569.) whereas they that suppose the whole seventy weeks completed at our Saviour's passion, translate the sentence thus, In the half part of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease; understanding it of the latter half. (See Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra.) The Hebrew word chatsi, signifies properly the half part, and is commonly translated by Ἥμισυ in the Septuagint. [In this sense it is to be understood by our translation, xii. 7. of this prophecy.]

He shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease.] Christ, by his one oblation of himself once offered, shall put an end to all the sacrifices and oblations made in the Jewish temple. (Compare Heb. x. 5, &c.) Thus the words are expounded by those that suppose the seventy weeks to have been finished at our Saviour's death. To confirm this exposition, we may observe, that the putting an end to the temple service by violence, such as was threatened under Antiochus Epiphanes, is expressed in a different manner; viz. by taking away the daily sacrifice, viii. 11, 12. xi. 31.

Others understand these words of the final destruction of the Jewish temple and worship by the Romans; and it may be observed, that the word mincha, oblation, is sometimes used for the daily sacrifice. (See 1 Kings xviii. 29. 36.) Bishop Lloyd explains the words to this sense: he separates this single, or odd week (so he translates shabua echad, one week), from the other sixty-nine; and makes it commence in the sixty-third year after Christ, and to end in the final destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem, which came to pass A. C. 70. It must be granted, that this interpretation agrees better with the letter of the text than the former: and the abomination of desolation immediately following it, they may both be reasonably thought the express characters of one and the same week, viz. the seventieth, determined upon Daniel's people and city.

The same learned prelate understands the words, He shall confirm the covenant with many—of the prince's future people, mentioned in the foregoing verse, viz. the Romans: who, by their general Corbulo, made a peace with the Parthians, Medes, and Armenians, that they might be better at leisure to make an entire conquest of Judea: of which Tacitus speaking, saith, There never was so firm a peace as now, (Annal. lib. xv.)

There is one difficulty which attends this explication; viz. that instead of setting forth one continued line of time, from the going forth of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem, to the conclusion of the events here foretold, it makes a considerable break, or interval of time, between the fulfilling one part of the prophecy and the other. Whereas the other interpretations suppose the destruction of the city and temple to run beyond the computation of the seventy weeks, and to be immediately subjoined to the death of Christ, as we see they are, ver. 26. to shew what shall be the catastrophe, or final punishment, which shall attend so great a wickedness.

And for the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate.] Mr. Mede translates the words thus, And being a desolator, he shall command over a wing of abominations. (Works, p. 407.) Bishop Lloyd, with some little variation, renders them, And upon the battlements shall be the idols of the desolator. They both understand by the phrase the Roman army, which is the interpretation Christ himself gives of it. (Luke xxi. 20. compared with Matt. xxiv. 15.) The word kenaph, translated in the English overspreading, properly signifies a wing, and may either signify an army, as it is used, Isa. viii. 8. or else stand for the battlements of the temple, as the Greek Πτερύγιον, which answers to it, plainly does Matt. iv. 5. Here the Romans, after they had set the temple on fire, placed the idolatrous ensigns of their army over against the eastern gate of the temple, and offered sacrifice to them, as Josephus expressly tells us, (Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 6. edit. Hudson.) The word shikutsim, abominations, is commonly used for idols: (see 1 Kings xi. 5. 7. 2 Kings xxiii. 13.) and the abomination of desolation set upon the altar by Antiochus, (1 Macc. i. 54.) is explained by the idol-altar, ibid. ver. 59. So the abominations here spoken of do very properly signify the ensigns, or standards, of the Roman legions; each standard having stamped upon it the image of the tutelar god of that legion, to whom they offered sacrifice. Tacitus calls the eagle, and the other ensigns, "Propria legionum numina," the deities which were peculiar to their legions. (Annal. lib. ii.) Tertullian's words are to the same purpose: "Religio tota castrensis signa veneratur, signa jurat, et Diis omnibus præponit:" All the religion of the army consists in paying Divine worship to their standards, in swearing by them, and preferring them before all other deities. (Apol. cap. 16.)

Even until the consummation.] Till God's indignation be accomplished, as the same sense is expressed, xi. 36.

And that determined [or which is decreed] shall be poured upon the desolate.] Compare ver. 11. of this chapter. Mr. Mede translates it, shall continue upon the desolate, p. 709. The words briefly declare those terrible calamities which made an entire destruction of that city and people, and were executed upon them in the most dreadful manner that any nation ever suffered, and with the most evident tokens of a Divine vengeance upon them, according to the relation of their own historian Josephus, who was an eye-witness of these desolations. And ever since their posterity have been dispersed all the world over, living only upon sufferance in their several dispersions, and very often exposed to grievous oppressions and persecutions, enough to have extinguished their race, unless they had been preserved by Providence, on purpose to verify the truth of those prophecies which foretold these calamities: and particularly those words of Christ, which have a plain aspect upon the text before us, (Luke xxi. 22—24.) These be the days of vengeance: that all things that are written may be fulfilled—for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people: and they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and be led away captive unto all nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the gentiles, until the times of the gentiles be fulfilled: i. e. till the times of the fourth monarchy, spoken of chap. ii. vii. are expired. (See the note upon xii. 7.)

Bishop Lloyd renders the last word shomem, desolate, in an active sense, the desolator, or him that makes desolate: in which sense the word is plainly taken, viii. 13. xii. 11. The sense he gives of the sentence is much the same with the former: viz. that the Divine vengeance shall continue upon the Jews, till it be returned upon the author of their desolations, which he interprets of the Roman government, as it was exercised under the seventh head. (See Rev. xvii. 11.)

Having given a particular account of the most probable expositions of this famous prophecy, I need not take any notice of Sir John Marsham's explication of it in his Chronicus Canon, p. 568. since a learned writer, Mr. Marshal, in his treatise upon the Seventy Weeks, lately published, hath shewed it to be inconsistent with itself, as well as with the undoubted monuments both of sacred and profane history. The late author of Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, hath thought fit to mention Sir J. M.'s hypothesis with approbation: but it is to be presumed that this writer took it upon trust, without ever examining it, and was glad to find an opinion prejudicial to Christianity countenanced by so great a name.

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.

The three following chapters contain the last vision of Daniel's prophecy, wherein the several successions, both of the Persian and Grecian monarchies, are represented, together with the wars that should be raised between the kings of Syria and Egypt under the latter monarchy, as far as the times of Antiochus Epiphanes: who being the type and forerunner of antichrist, (as hath been observed upon chap. viii.) the latter part of the vision from xi. 36. seems chiefly to relate to the persecutions of the church in the times of antichrist, till its being finally cleansed from all those profanations, as the temple of Jerusalem was purified from the pollutions of Antiochus: after which will follow that kingdom of the saints mentioned vii. 18. 27. of this prophecy.

Ver. 1. IN the third year of Cyrus king of Persia.] Daniel must now have been above ninety years of age; he could not be less than twenty when he was carried captive (see the Preface to this Commentary), and that was seventy-three years before the date of this vision: which was the last Daniel saw, and it is not likely he himself survived it long.

Whose name was Belteshazzar.] See i. 7.

And the thing was true.] Or certain. (See ver. 21. xi. 2. and compare viii. 26. Rev. xix. 9.)

But the time appointed was long.] See ver. 14. and the note upon xii. 4.

And he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision.] He had a clear view of the succession of the Persian and Grecian monarchies, and of the series of the kings of Syria and Egypt under the latter of them: although the remaining parts of the vision were obscure, especially with respect to their final event. (See xii. 8.)

Ver. 2. In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks.] The reason of Daniel's fasting and mourning seems to be, because the adversaries of the Jews began to obstruct the building of the temple. (See Ezra iv. 4, 5.) This made Daniel deprecate God's judgments in so solemn a manner.

Three full weeks.] The Hebrew reads, Three weeks of days. So we read of a month of days, Gen. xxix. 14. Numb. xi. 20. where the English reads, a whole month. But the phrase may be used here to distinguish them from the weeks of years prophesied of in the ninth chapter.

Ver. 3. I ate no pleasant bread, &c.] This is expressed by chastening himself, ver. 11. and by afflicting the soul with fasting, Lev. xvi. 29. xxiii. 27. Isa. lviii. 3.

Neither did I anoint myself at all.] As the Persians used to do constantly. (See Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. xiii. cap. 1.)

Ver. 4. In the four-and-twentieth day of the first month.] According to the Jewish computation, which was the month Nisan, beginning about our 10th of March. The commentators observe from hence, that Daniel's fast fell upon the time of the paschal solemnity; and therefore the Jews did not think themselves obliged to keep their solemn festivals any where but in their own country, and at the place appointed by God for that purpose.

I was by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel.] The same with Tigris. (See Gen. ii. 14.) This was near Shushan, where Daniel probably resided. (See the note upon viii. 2.)

Ver. 5. I lifted up mine eyes.] Being by the river-side in a deep contemplation, I looked up and saw a person appear before me, placed in the air above the waters, or hovering over them. (See xii. 6. and compare Rev. x. 2. 5.)

Behold a certain man clothed in linen, whose loins were girt about with fine gold of Uphaz.] He appeared in the habit of a high-priest. (See Exod. xxviii. 4. 39. xxix. 5.) The description St. John gives of Christ as high-priest of the church, Rev. i. 15. seems to be taken from this place of Daniel, which proves that the person here described can be no other than the Son of God: which may be farther confirmed by comparing the person described here, and xii. 5, 6. with Rev. x. 2. 5, 6. who is there represented as setting his right foot upon the sea, and his left upon the land, as sovereign Lord of both elements. (Compare Matt. xxviii. 19.)

Concerning the fine gold of Uphaz, see the note upon Jer. x. 9.

Ver. 6. His body was like the beryl.] Of an azure, or sky-colour, mixed with a bright green. (See Ezek. i. 16.)

His arms and his feet were in colour like to polished brass.]

Of a bright flaming colour. (See Psal. civ. 4. Ezek. i. 7. Rev. i. 15. x. 1.)

And the voice of his words, as the voice of a multitude.] Great and powerful. (Compare Ezek. i. 24. Rev. i. 15. x. 3.)

Ver. 7. The men that were with me saw not the vision, but a great quaking fell upon them, &c.] They were seized with such terror and astonishment, that they made what haste they could to get out of the reach of such an amazing sight. (Compare Acts ix. 7.)

Ver. 8. There remained no strength in me.] I fell into a swoon or fainting fit. (See ver. 9.)

My comeliness was turned in me into corruption.] Or, my vigour, as the margin reads to a better sense. So the word is used Prov. v. 9. where our translation renders it, thine honour, but it should be translated thy strength, or vigour, as appears by comparing that verse with the parallel text, Prov. xxxi. 3.

Ver. 9. When I heard the voice of his words, then was I in a deep sleep on my face.] The very sound of his words put me into a fainting fit. (See viii. 18.)

Ver. 10. And, behold, a hand touched me, &c.] This seems to be a distinct appearance from that described ver. 5. not so terrible, but nearer approaching to a human form: (see ver. 16.) and may probably be supposed to be the angel Gabriel, who had been sent to Daniel upon the like occasions. (See viii. 17, 18. ix. 21.) The Logos, or Son of God, in the representations made of him in the Old Testament, usually appears with a retinue of angels attending him. (See Gen. xviii. 2.) And in this prophecy (viii. 13, &c.) we have a vision of several angels attending upon one principal one. (Compare xii. 5.) The same retinue of angels may be observed in Zechary's visions, i. 8—10. 12, 13. ii. 3, 4. 8. iii. 2. 4. 7. The angel who now appeared to Daniel, putting forth his hand, raised him from the ground, and restored him to his former strength in some degree. (See viii. 18. ix. 21. Jer. i. 9. Ezek. ii. 2. Rev. i. 17.)

Ver. 11. O Daniel, a man greatly beloved.] See ix. 23.

Understand the words that I speak unto thee—for unto thee am I now sent.] Though this angel was inferior to that eminent person described ver. 5. yet he being the angel that informs Daniel of all those matters contained in the following chapter, and the beginning of the twelfth, (the man clothed in linen, speaking nothing but what is related xii. 7.) he may properly take the whole business of the vision upon himself, as he does here and in the following verse.

And I am come for thy words.] To give an answer to thy requests, by the direction of that Divine person, (ver. 5.) upon whom I attend. (Compare viii. 15—17. ix. 22.)

Ver. 12. From the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand, and to chasten thyself before thy God, thy words were heard, &c.] As God graciously answered those prayers thou madest in thy former humiliation occasioned by thy searching out the time allotted for the captivity of thy people: (see ix. 2. 22, 23.) so now God is pleased, in answer to thy repeated humiliation and solicitous concern for thy people, to send me to inform thee what shall be their state and condition in after times.

Ver. 13. But the princes of the kingdom of Persia withstood me.] The princes of the kingdom of Persia and Grecia, mentioned here and ver. 20. are generally supposed to be the guardian or tutelar angels of those several countries. That there were such tutelar angels, not only over private persons, (see Acts xii. 15.) but likewise over provinces and kingdoms, was an opinion generally received. The four spirits mentioned Zech. vi. 5. seem to be the guardian angels of the four great empires. Every heathen nation thought their country under the peculiar protection of some tutelar deity: and they looked upon the God of the Jews to be no other than that Deity who presided over that nation. (See 1 Sam. iv. 8. 1 Kings xx. 23. 28. 2 Kings xviii. 33—35. Isa. x. 10, 11.) This notion was very much countenanced by a passage in Deuteronomy, xxxii. 8. where the Septuagint translate the text thus: When the Most High divided the nations their inheritance —he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the angels of God, for the Lord's portion is his people. As if the sense were, That the government of other nations was committed to so many tutelar angels, whereas Israel was under the immediate care and government of God himself. The opinion I have been hitherto explaining supposes the presiding angels here mentioned to have been good angels: from whence it follows, that the occasion of their contention was because neither party was as yet acquainted with the Divine will, to which they were already to submit. (See this point largely treated of by Petavius, Dogm. Theolog. tom. iii. lib. ii. de Angelis, cap. 8.)

But others suppose those princes or angels who opposed Michael and Gabriel to be evil spirits, such as are described by St. Paul under the names of the rulers of the darkness of this world, having their residence in the lower regions of the air, (Ephes. ii. 2. vi. 12.) These evil spirits are sometimes represented as part of the heavenly host, both in respect to their original station, and because these are the instruments of Providence, and have a command over the inferior world, as far as God thinks fit to permit. (See 1 Kings xxii. 19, &c. Job i. 6. 12, &c.) They are likewise represented as accusers of good men before God, and as aggravating their faults, in order to have them delivered over to them, as the executioners of God's judgments. (See Job i. 11. ii. 5. Zech. iii. 1. Rev. xii. 10.) If we follow this opinion, the contest here will be of the same nature with that of the angel and Satan, Zech. iii. 1. and with the dispute that Michael the archangel had with the devil about the body of Moses, mentioned in St. Jude's Epistle, ver. 9.

The prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one-and-twenty days.] The Persians, upon the solicitation of the Jews' enemies, had put a stop to the building of the temple, all the time of Daniel's humiliation. (See the note upon ver. 2.) And the tutelar genius of that empire still insisted that they might be kept under those hardships, while the angel Gabriel was doing them all the good offices he could. In like manner, Satan is represented as eagerly opposing the rebuilding the temple, and the restoration of the Jewish nation, Zech. iii. 1, 2.

But, lo! Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me.] Michael is styled an archangel by St. Jude, ver. 9. and a great prince that stands up for the children of thy people, xii. 1. of this prophecy. Christ himself, as he is often represented under the character of an angel, so he is described under the name of Michael, Rev. xii. 7. But in this and the parallel texts of Daniel, the name rather denotes some principal angel, whom the Jews looked upon as the guardian angel of their nation. (See ver. 21. and xii. 1.)

And remained there with the kings of Persia.] I still continued to oppose any motions the tutelar genii of Persia might make in prejudice of the Jews. The word king is equivalent in Hebrew to prince or governor. (See vii. 17. Jer. xxv. 20, &c. 1 Kings xxii. 47.)

Ver. 14. Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befal thy people in the latter days: for yet the vision is for many days.] Daniel was solicitous about the present state of his people. (See ver. 2.) The vision informs him, first, that the empire shall be translated from the Persians to the Greeks, (xi. 3.) and then what should be the condition of the Jews under Alexander's successors, the kings of Syria and Egypt; one of which, viz. Antiochus Epiphanes, should be a figure of antichrist, who should disturb the state of the Christian church in the latter times of the world. (See ver. 1. and compare xii. 4. 8.)

Ver. 15. I set my face towards the ground, and I became dumb.] I was perfectly astonished, and deprived of all sense. (See ver. 16, 17. and compare viii. 18.)

Ver. 16. Then one like the similitude of the sons of men touched my lips.] One that appeared in a human form, the same angel that touched me with his hand before, (see ver. 10.) restored my speech to me, which my fright and concern had quite deprived me of.

Then I opened my mouth, and said unto him that stood before me.] Compare viii. 15. This angel stood upon the earth near Daniel, not above the waters of the river, as the person did whose appearance was so glorious: ver. 5.

O my lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, &c.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 17. How can the servant of this my lord, talk with this my lord.] How can thy servant, a poor mortal man, maintain a discourse with a person of your rank and dignity? (See Noldius, p. 353.) The words may be translated thus, How can the servant of this my lord, talk with that my lord? i. e. with the other person that first appeared to me with so majestic a presence; at whose sight I was perfectly confounded: (ver. 5. 9.) the pronoun zeh, when it is doubled, often signifies two distinct persons or things. (See Exod. xiv. 20. Eccles. vi. 3. vii. 14. 18. Isa. vi. 3.)

Ver. 19. O man greatly beloved, fear not; peace be unto thee.] Thou needest not be under such terrible apprehensions, as if this vision did portend thee some mischief; (see Judg. vi. 22. xiii. 22.) for it is a peculiar token of God's favour to thee. (See ver. 11.)

Ver. 20. Knowest thou wherefore I am come to thee?] viz. To make thee understand what shall befal thy people in the latter days: (ver. 14.)

Now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia.] Or, I shall again fight, or contend, with the prince of Persia: in which sense the verb shub, return, is often used. (See ix. 25.)

And when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come.] When I am gone forth from the Divine presence, the tutelar angel of the Grecian empire will appear in the court of heaven, and offer his reasons for translating the empire from the Persians to the Greeks, that the Jews may enjoy the benefits of their dominion: as a government that will be more favourable to them than the Persian emperors were. Alexander and some of his successors bestowed many favours upon the Jews, as may be seen in Josephus's Antiq. lib. xi. cap. ult. lib. xii. cap. 2, 3.

Ver. 21. But I will shew thee that which is noted in the Scripture of truth.] Or, In the writing of truth: i. e. what is certain and irrevocable. God's decrees are spoken of as if they were committed to writing, and registered in a book. (See Deut. xxxii. 34. Psal. lvi. 8. Isa. lxv. 6. Mal. iii. 16.)

And there is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince.] None of the guardian or tutelary angels, who have the care and presidency of other nations committed to them, join with me in defending the cause of the Jewish nation, but Michael your prince and protector. (See xii. 1.) St. Jerome, in his commentary upon the thirteenth verse, supposes the prince of Persia to oppose the Jews upon account of their sins, which reason may be applied to other guardian angels or ministering spirits.

CHAP. XI.

See the Argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 1. ALSO I, in the first year of Darius the Mede, even I, stood to confirm and strengthen him.] This verse should have been joined to the last chapter: the angel adds, that as he now joins with Michael in defending the cause of the Jewish nation; so, at the time of the overthrow of the Babylonish empire, he assisted Michael in advancing Darius to the succession, which was the occasion of restoring the Jewish captivity. The word him may relate either to Michael or Darius, and the sense, taking it either way, is much the same.

Ver. 2. And now I will shew thee the truth.] What is contained in the Scripture, or writing, of truth, x. 21. Or, I will shew thee the succession of the Persian and Grecian empire in plain and naked truth, not in symbolical or figurative representations, as it was shewed before, chap. viii.

There shall stand up yet three kings in Persia.] After Cyrus shall succeed Cambyses, Smerdis, and Darius Hystaspes. So Ezra mentions two kings, whom he calls Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes (names which were common to most of the Persian kings in the Jewish history), who reigned between Cyrus and Darius Hystaspes, (Ezra iv. 6, 7.)

And the fourth shall be far richer than they all, &c.] This plainly means Xerxes, who brought together an army of above four millions, according to Herodotus's account: of eight millions, as others say, to overrun the whole country of Greece. These wars, carried on by Xerxes's successors, ended at last in the conquest of the Persian monarchy by Alexander the Great. Upon this account the angel passes over the rest of the Persian kings; and proceeds immediately to relate the successes of Alexander: it being the chief design of the former part of this vision to foretell the translation of the empire from the Persians to the Greeks. (See x. 20.) St. Jerome rightly observes upon the fifth verse of this chapter, "That it was not the design of the Scripture to give us an historical narrative of the actions of heathen princes any farther than the affairs of the Jewish nation were concerned in them." In like manner, at the thirty-sixth verse, the angel breaks off the succession of the Syrian kings after Antiochus, to describe antichrist, of whom the former was the type and forerunner. [So viii. 9. the prophet passes over all the successors of Alexander to Antiochus Epiphanes, whose reign had a particular influence upon the Jewish affairs.]

Ver. 3. And a mighty king shall stand up, and do according to his will.] Compare ver. 16. This denotes Alexander the Great, whose success was so uninterrupted, that no body was able to put a stop to the progress of his victories. (See viii. 5.)

Ver. 4. And when he shall stand up.] When he shall be in the height of his prosperity.

His kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven.] See the notes upon viii. 8.

And not to his posterity.] Alexander had a brother, Aridæus, and two sons, Alexander and Hercules: these were all cut off in a few years after his death, to make way for his generals, who divided his empire among themselves.

Nor according to his dominion which he ruled.] They did not immediately take upon them the title of kings: (see Dr. Prideaux, ad an. A. C. 301.) and his dominion being divided, lost much of that strength and power which the empire had when it was united in the person of Alexander. (See viii. 22.)

For his kingdom shall be plucked up, for others beside those.] Alexander's four great successors were Ptolemy, Cassander, Lysimachus, and Seleucus: (see the note upon viii. 8.) but others beside them came in for a share of his dominions, such as Eumenes, Philotas, and others. The word translated plucked up, is the same as rooted up, or destroyed, and is opposed to planting, or making to thrive; Jer. i. 10. xxiv. 6. xxxi. 28. or the phrase may allude to the feathers of a bird being plucked and scattered abroad. (Compare vii. 4.)

Ver. 5. And the king of the south shall be strong.] By the king of the south, in this and the following verses, is meant the king of Egypt: and by the king of the north, the king of Syria. These two kings came at length to have the principal share of Alexander's dominions, and make the greatest figure among his successors. But the reason why they are only mentioned here, is, because they only were concerned in the affairs of the Jews: Judea bordering upon each of their dominions, and sometimes belonging to one, and sometimes to the other, of those princes. The king of the south mentioned in this verse, denotes Ptolemy the First, the son of Lagus, called, by way of distinction, Ptolemy Soter. The texth saith of him, that he should be strong: for he had all Egypt and the adjacent parts of Lybia under his dominion, besides Palestine, Cœlo-Syria, and most of the maritime provinces of the lesser Asia.

And one of his princes, and [or even] he shall be strong above him, and have dominion.] Another of the successors of Alexander, who took upon them the style of kings, or princes. (See the note on ver. 4.) This was Seleucus Nicator, the first king of the north, or of Syria: who, by the conquest of Lysimachus king of Thrace, and Demetrius king of Macedon, obtained the name of Nicator, i. e. conqueror.

His dominion shall be a great dominion.] He had under his dominion all the countries of the east, from Mount Taurus to the River Indus: and from thence westward to the Ægean Sea: whereupon Appianus the historian reckons him the most potent of all Alexander's successors.

Ver. 6. And in the end of years, they shall join themselves together.] In process of time the successors of these two kings, viz. Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of the former Ptolemy, and Antiochus Theus, the grandson of Seleucus Nicator, shall enter into a league or confederacy with each other.

For the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement.] This league shall be concluded by the marriage of Berenice, daughter to Ptolemy Philadelphus, with Antiochus Theus king of Syria, although he had another wife Laodice, and two children by her, Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus.

But she shall not retain the power of the arm.] She shall not be able to keep her power or interest with Antiochus: for as soon as her father Ptolemy was dead, Antiochus divorced her, and recalled his former wife Laodice and her children.

Neither shall he stand, nor his arm.] Nor shall Antiochus himself long survive, for Laodice, being jealous of his fickle temper, procured him to be poisoned, and concealed his death till her son Seleucus had secured the succession.

But she shall be given up, and they that brought her.] Berenice, after she had shut herself up in the asylum, or place of sanctuary, at Daphne, was betrayed into her enemies' hands, and basely murdered with all those that attended her out of Egypt.

And he that begat her.] If we follow this translation, see the explication of it in the next note: but the marginal reading gives the better sense, He whom she brought forth; her son who was slain with her: the Hebrew, yoled, is in the form of the participle active; but the same form is sometimes used in a passive sense: of which we may produce an instance from ix. 27. of this prophecy, where the word shomem is rendered, in a passive sense, desolate, by most interpreters.

And he that strengthened her in these times.] Her father, who should have supported her with his interest under these difficulties, but died himself a little before.

All these particulars, and what are mentioned in the following notes, are fully related in the historical accounts of those times, as may be seen by those who will consult the authors referred to by St. Jerome, in his commentaries upon Daniel, and Dr. Prideaux, in the second part of his Script. Connexion.

Ver. 7. But out of a branch of her root shall stand up one in his estate, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north.] One of the same stock or original with Berenice; viz. her brother, Ptolemy Euergetes, shall succeed his father in the government of Egypt, and shall revenge his sister's quarrel, by invading the frontiers or territories (see ver. 10.) of Seleucus, and prevail against him.

Ver. 8. And he shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, &c.] St. Jerome tells us out of writers extant in his time, that Ptolemy made himself master of all Syria and Cilicia, and passing the Euphrates, conquered as far as Babylon: and carried back into Egypt vast plunder from all the conquered provinces, together with two thousand five hundred Egyptian idols, which Cambyses upon his conquering Egypt had carried into Persia. This action of his so highly obliged the Egyptians, that they gave him the title of Euergetes, or, the Benefactor.

And he shall continue more years than the king of the north.] Ptolemy outlived Seleucus the space of four years.

Ver. 9. So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom, &c.] Ptolemy shall return home without molestation, and quietly enjoy what he had gotten by his victories.

Ver. 10. But his sons shall be stirred up, and assemble a multitude of great forces.] The sons of Seleucus, Seleucus Ceraunus, and Antiochus, called afterward the Great, shall assemble a mighty army, in order to recover all that their father had lost.

And one shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass over.] Antiochus shall certainly overrun Judea and Cœlo-Syria, with other provinces belonging to the king of Egypt; taking the advantage of Ptolemy Euergetes's death, and the succession of his son Ptolemy Philopator, a weak and profligate prince; under whose reign he attempted the recovery of Syria. We may observe the text here speaks only of a single person, viz. Antiochus, for his brother Seleucus died in the beginning of this enterprise, having scarce reigned three years. The devastations of an army are fitly compared to inundations. (See ver. 22. 40. and ix. 26.)

Then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress.] Or, He shall again be stirred up, &c. (See the note upon ix. 25.) At the spring of the next year he shall take the field again, and encamp at Raphia, a frontier town upon the borders of Egypt. (See the history of this engagement in Polybius, lib. v. p. 573. edit. 8vo.)

Ver. 11. And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north.] Ptolemy Philopator, the young king of Egypt, being enraged at the attempts of Antiochus, shall come with a great army to encounter him.

And he shall set forth a great multitude.] If we understand the words of Ptolemy's army, that consisted of seventy thousand foot, five thousand horse, and seventy-three elephants; Antiochus's was little inferior to his, for he had sixty-two thousand foot, six thousand horse, and sixty-two elephants.

But the multitude shall be delivered into his hand.] The army of Antiochus was discomfited by Ptolemy, ten thousand being slain, and four thousand taken prisoners. The author of the third book of Maccabees ascribes this victory to the passionate importunity of Arsinoë, Ptolemy's sister, who ran about the army with her hair about her shoulders, and by promises and entreaties engaged the soldiers to fight with more than ordinary resolution.

Ver. 12. His heart shall be lifted up.] So far as to offer to force his passage into the holiest part of the Jewish temple, when he came to Jerusalem to offer sacrifices there, after his victory: the story is related at large in the forementioned third book of the Maccabees, chap. i.

And he shall cast down many ten thousands: but he shall not be strengthened by it.] Or, Though he shall cast down— he shall not be strengthened by it. He shall content himself with recovering the provinces of Cœlo-Syria and Palestine, and make no farther advantages of his victory; being willing to agree to a peace, that he might securely follow his pleasures. (See Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. ad. ann. A. C. 217.)

Ver. 13. For the king of the north shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come (after certain years) with a great army, &c.] Fourteen years after the ending of the former war, upon the death of Philopator, and the succeeding of his infant son Ptolemy Epiphanes, Antiochus the king of the north shall return into Cœlo-Syria and Palestine, for the recovery of those provinces, and shall bring with him a greater army than he had in the former war, the same which he brought out of the east, at his late return from thence.

After certain years.] The Hebrew reads, At the end of times, even years: which expression confirms the interpretation given before of the word times in this prophecy. (See the note upon iv. 16.)

And with much riches.] With abundant supply of all necessary provisions for an army: and especially with beasts of burden for removing their baggage: for that is the proper sense of the word recush.

Ver. 14. And in those times many shall stand up against the king of the south.] Antiochus, king of Syria, and Philip, king of Macedon, entered into a league, to divide the dominions of Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, being then an infant of six years of age. Agathoclea his father's concubine, and her brother Agathocles, who managed every thing under Ptolemy Philopator, were framing projects to keep the regency in their own hands during the minority of this prince. And Scopas, one of his generals, some time afterward formed a design of usurping the sovereignty over Egypt.

Also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision; but they shall fall.] The apostates from the Jewish law shall exalt themselves under the favour of the king of Egypt and his ministers, to accomplish what is said in the writings of the prophets concerning the persecutions that should befal God's people, and the punishments that should at length overtake those that forsake the truth. These apostates accordingly did fall, and were cut off by Antiochus; for in the ninth year of Epiphanes's reign, Antiochus made himself master of Jerusalem, and cut off or drove from thence all those Jews that were of Ptolemy's party, and bestowed particular favours upon those that persevered in the observance of the law. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. chap. 3. gives us a copy of Antiochus's decree in favour of their temple, and the service therein performed, and to secure it from being profaned.

Ver. 15. So the king of the north shall come, and take the most fenced cities.] Antiochus having vanquished the king of Egypt's army under Scopas at Paneas, near the fountain-head of the river Jordan, he besieged and took first Zidon and Gaza, then all the other cities of that district, viz. Abila, Samaria, and Gadara: and afterward became master of the whole country. The word sollelah, translated a mount, does likewise signify battering engines for throwing stones, and such-like offensive artillery. (See 2 Kings xix. 32. Jer. xxxii. 24. xxxiii. 4.)

And the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people.] Neither the king of Egypt's best generals, such as Scopas and others that came to relieve him, nor his choicest troops, shall prevail or be able to withstand Antiochus.

Ver. 16. But he that cometh against him shall do according to his own will, &c.] Nobody being able to oppose him in Cœlo-Syria or Palestine. (Compare viii. 4. 7. and ver. 36. of this chapter.)

And he shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed.] He shall make himself master of Judea, (see the note upon viii. 9.) which shall be consumed by the foraging and plundering of his soldiers; Jerusalem itself receiving great damages during the siege of the garrison which Scopas left there: as appears by Antiochus's decree for repairing the ruins of the city, in Josephus, ubi supra. In the contests between the kings of Syria and Egypt, Judea lying in the middle between them, whoever were conquerors, that country was sure to suffer: Josephus compares its condition to that of a ship in a storm, which is beaten by the waves on both sides. (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3. init.) The Greek interpreter renders the former part of the sentence, And he shall stand in the land of Sabi: which Dr. More in his notes upon the place, supposes to be a name of the God of Israel: and I have offered some arguments to support that conjecture, in the notes upon Jer. iii. 19.

Ver. 17. He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom.] Antiochus will likewise design to invade Egypt with all his forces, and make an entire conquest of it.

And upright ones with him.] Or rather, And he shall make agreements with him: yesharim here probably signifying the same as mesharim does ver. 6. i. e. he shall make proposals of concluding a marriage between his own daughter Cleopatra and king Ptolemy, to be consummated when they come of age: which offer made by Eucles of Rhodes was accepted, and a contract fully agreed between them.

Thus shall he do.] Or, He shall succeed, as the word is taken, ver. 28. 32. He shall succeed in this his proposal.

Giving him the daughter of women, corrupting her.] In making this proposal of marriage, his intent was that she should betray her husband to him, and by that means become master of Egypt. She is called the daughter of women, κατ' ἐξοχήν, by way of excellence, either upon the account of her quality, or else because of her great beauty.

But she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him.] When she was married to Ptolemy, she forsook the interest of her father, and embraced that of her husband: and we find her joining with him in an embassy to the Romans, to congratulate the victory they had obtained over her own father, as Dr. Prideaux observes out of Livy, lib. xxxvii. (See Script. Connex. par. ii. ad ann. C. 187.)

Ver. 18. After this he shall turn his face unto the isles, and shall take many.] Antiochus shall set out a great fleet for reducing the lesser Asia, which sailing along the coasts of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria, took a great many of the maritime cities of those provinces, and the islands adjoining. All countries lying upon the sea-coasts are called islands, in the Hebrew dialect, as hath been observed in the notes upon Isa. xi. 11.

But a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease: without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him.] Or, But a prince shall cause to cease his [i. e. Antiochus's] reproach against him: moreover, he shall cause his reproach to return upon him. (Compare Hos. xii. 14.) The particle bilti, translated without, signifies likewise moreover. (See Noldius, p. 202.) Lucius Scipio, the Roman consul, made the reproach which Antiochus had offered to the Romans by that invasion, to return upon his own head, by overthrowing him in battle at Mount Sipylus, and forcing him to quit all the conquests he had made in the lesser Asia. From this great victory, whereby Asia was delivered out of the hands of Antiochus, this Scipio had the surname of Asiaticus: this action is at large related by Livy, in the thirty-seventh book of his history.

Ver. 19. Then he shall turn his face towards the fort of his own land: but he shall stumble, and fall.] After this great defeat, Antiochus returned back to Antioch, the chief seat and fortress of his kingdom. From whence going into the eastern provinces, to raise the money he was by agreement to pay to the Romans, and attempting to rob the temple at Elymais, for that purpose, he was slain there, and never returned again into Syria.

And not be found.] An expression, denoting utter destruction. (See Job xx. 8. Psal. xxxvii. 36. Ezek. xxvi. 21.)

Ver. 20. Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom.] Seleucus Philopator, the son of Antiochus, shall succeed in the kingdom of Syria. (Compare ver. 7.) His father by the treaty of peace was obliged to pay a thousand talents for twelve years together to the Romans: and it was the main business of his son's reign to raise this money upon his subjects. His necessities put him upon offering to seize the treasures which were laid up in the temple at Jerusalem; for which attempt his treasurer Heliodorus was miraculously punished, as the story is told at large, 2 Macc. iii. 4, &c.

But within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle.] Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. Script. Connex. at the end of the second book, translates this sentence, Within few years he shall be destroyed: the word yamim, days, often signifying years: which sense suits better with the event here foretold. For Seleucus reigned but eleven years, which may properly be called a few, in comparison of the thirty-seven years of his father's reign: and he came to his end neither by war abroad, nor by a sedition at home, but was poisoned by Heliodorus his treasurer, who designed to usurp the kingdom to himself, as Appian relates it.

Ver. 21. And in his estate [or place] shall stand up a vile person.] This is a description of Antiochus Epiphanes, the great persecutor of the Jewish nation and religion. He is called here a vile person, not for any want of wit or parts, but for the extravagance of his life and actions, which made many doubt whether he had more of the fool or the madman in him: so, instead of Epiphanes, the Illustrious, they called him Epimanes, the Madman. (See the Fragments of the twenty-sixth book of Polybius, p. 1492. of the Leyden edition.)

To whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries.] The right of succession did belong to Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopator, and nephew to Antiochus: but he being sent a hostage to Rome by his father, Antiochus took advantage of his absence, and by courting Eumenes king of Pergamus, and Attalus his brother, with flattering speeches and great promises of friendship and assistance against the Romans, prevailed with them to stand by him against the usurper Heliodorus, and so came peaceably into the possession of the kingdom.

Ver. 22. And with the arms of a flood shall they be overflown from before him, and shall be broken.] Compare ver.

10. Antiochus, by the assistance of Enmenes and Attalus, shall vanquish all the forces that opposed his pretensions, both those raised by the usurper Heliodorus, and those which Cleopatra, mother to Ptolemy Philometor, had got together to assist her son's right, as being nephew to the deceased king Seleucus.

Yea, also the prince of the covenant.] Onias the high-priest, as several interpret it, whom they suppose to be meant by the prince of the host, viii. 11. where the prophet speaks of the persecution of the Jews, of which the same Antiochus was the author. This Onias was deposed and banished by him, and afterward murdered by one of his lieutenants, (2 Macc. iv. 10. 34.) But the following verse inclines me to think, that Ptolemy Philometor is meant here, for he it is with whom the league there mentioned is made; and he was the principal person that opposed Antiochus chiefly in his pretension to Cœlo-Syria and Palestine: in whose name a war was carried on against Antiochus, the success of which is foretold in the following verses.

Ver. 23. And after the league made with him he shall work deceitfully, &c.] This league was made between Ptolemy Philometor and Antiochus, in the lifetime of Cleopatra his sister, and mother of Ptolemy. But when the king of Egypt's ministers demanded the restitution of Cœlo-Syria and Palestine, as belonging to the king of Egypt, by virtue of the marriage-articles between Ptolemy Epiphanes and Cleopatra, Antiochus, without any regard to the league he had made with Philometor his nephew, marched his army towards the frontiers of Egypt, and having obtained a victory over the Egyptian army in a battle fought between Mount Casius and Pelusium, he the next year made himself master of the greatest part of Egypt, Philometor himself falling into his hands: whom he pretended to take care of as his nephew, and to manage his affairs as his tutor and guardian. But this belongs to his second expedition, mentioned ver. 25.

And shall become strong with a small people.] His forces then were but small, as St. Jerome observes out of Sutorius, an historian extant in his time: at least in comparison of those he brought with him in his second expedition. (See the note upon ver. 25.)

Ver. 24. He shall enter peaceably into the fattest places of the province; and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he shall scatter among them the prey, and spoil, and riches.] By his clemency towards the Egyptians, and civil treatment of Philometor, he shall succeed in his attempts upon Egypt, beyond all his predecessors, the former kings of Syria: viz. Antiochus Theus, Seleucus Callinicus, and Antiochus, surnamed the Great, whose actions are specified in the foregoing part of the chapter: all these had a design of getting Egypt into their hands, but none of them ever succeeded so far in the attempts upon it as Epiphanes: who miserably plundered the whole country, and divided the riches of it among his followers. (See 1 Macc. i. 19. St. Jerome in his notes upon the place, and Athenæus, Deipnosophist. lib. v. and x.) Epiphanes was in himself of a profuse and prodigal temper, as the author of the first book of Maccabees, iii. 30. and several other historians agree in giving his character, from whence he gained the name of Munificent and Liberal, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 11.

And he shall forecast his devices against the strong holds.] He shall not only seize upon the richest parts of Egypt, but shall likewise make himself master of the chief places of strength in that country, keeping Pelusium in his hands, which was the key of Egypt, and laying siege unto Alexandria.

Even for a time.] See ver. 27.

Ver. 25. And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army, &c.] The preparations here described belong to Antiochus's second expedition into Egypt, as the author of the second book of Maccabees rightly calls it, v. 1. when he invaded that country with great forces both by sea and land, as that expedition is described, 1 Macc. i. 17, 18. where the historian adds, that Ptolemy fled from him, and many of his army were wounded to death: thus they got the strong cities in the land of Egypt, and he took the spoils thereof. After which victory Ptolemy Philometor surrendered himself into Antiochus's hands, as was observed before: whereupon the Alexandrians set up his brother upon the throne, whom they surnamed Euergetes.

Ibid. and Ver. 26. But he shall not stand: for they shall forecast devices against him. Yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him.] The ill success of Philometor's expedition was chiefly owing to the maleadministration of Lenæus, Eulæus, and other ministers and officers employed under him, and to the treachery of Ptolemy Macron, who forsook Philometor's interest, and went over to Antiochus.

And his army shall overflow.] The arms of Antiochus shall overrun the whole kingdom of Egypt, like a sudden inundation. (See ver. 10. 22.)

Ver. 27. And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper.] These two kings shall meet at Memphis, and frequently eat at the same table as friends; Antiochus pretending to take care of the interests of his nephew Philometor, especially after the Alexandrians had proclaimed his brother Euergetes king: and Philometor seemingly confiding in his uncle's protection. But herein they both designed to impose upon each other; Antiochus's design being to seize the kingdom of Egypt to himself, and Philometor's to disappoint those designs of his, by coming to an agreement with Euergetes and the Alexandrians. So this pretended friendship broke out into open war, wherein Antiochus subdued all the country as far as Memphis, and marched to Alexandria to besiege that city.

For yet the end shall be at the time appointed.] These wars and calamities are not yet come to an end, but shall be determined at the time of God's appointment. (See ver. 29. 35, 36. viii. 19.)

Ver. 28. Then shall he return into his land with great riches.] Having taken the spoils of Egypt, 1 Macc. i. 19. (See the note upon ver. 24.) This return of Antiochus into his own dominions, is the same which is again mentioned at the end of the verse: so the sense might be more clearly expressed thus: Then shall he return into his land with great riches, having had his heart stirred up against the holy covenant, and having finished his designs, he shall even return into his own land.

And his heart shall be against the holy covenant.] While Antiochus was in Egypt, a false report was spread over Judea that he was dead, whereupon Jason with his party made himself master of Jerusalem, in order to regain the office of high-priest, from which he had been turned out by the fraud of his brother Menelaus. Upon this, Antiochus, supposing the whole nation had revolted from him, marched with all haste out of Egypt into Judea to quell this rebellion: and taking Jerusalem by force of arms, he slew forty thousand of the inhabitants in three days' time, profaned the temple, and took away all its ornaments and treasures. (See 1 Macc. i. 20. 28. 2 Macc. iv. 23, 24. v. 11. 20.)

And he shall do exploits, and return into his own land.] Or, Having finished his designs, he shall return, &c. (See the last note but one, and compare ver. 30. 32. viii. 12.) After having satisfied his revenge upon the Jews, he shall return to Antioch, the chief seat of his empire, with the spoils of the temple at Jerusalem (besides those of Egypt), amounting to eighteen hundred talents, (2 Macc. v. 21.)

Ver. 29. At the time appointed he shall return, and come towards the south: but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter.] Antiochus shall make a third expedition into Egypt, in order to reduce Alexandria: but this attempt shall not be attended with the same success as the two former, for the reason mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 30. For ships of Chittim shall come against him, therefore he shall be grieved, and return.] The ambassadors Popilius Lænas and his companions, coming in ships from the coasts of Macedonia and Greece, shall come to him, bringing peremptory demands from the Romans, that he should desist from making war against Egypt, otherwise they would denounce war against him. This message will make him, to his great grief, return out of Egypt, and quit his designs upon that country. The isles of Chittim, Jer. ii. 10. Ezek. xxvii. 6. signify the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea, so as to comprehend both Italy and Greece.

And have indignation against the holy covenant.] Being enraged at this disappointment, he shall vent his fury and indignation against the Jewish church and nation; and send Apollonius with an army of seventy-two thousand men to lay Jerusalem waste, and cause the temple-worship to cease there: this happened two years after the first taking of Jerusalem by Antiochus. (Compare 1 Macc. i. 29. 40. with 2 Macc. v. 24—26.)

So shall he do, [or, he shall prosper in his undertakings: see ver. 28.] and shall return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant.] At his return from Egypt, he shall practise with the deserters of the Jewish religion, such as Menelaus and the like apostates, and make use of them as instruments in making converts to heathenism. (See 1 Macc. i. 43. 52. 2 Macc. v. 15.)

Ver. 31. And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall profane the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice.] His arms shall so prevail, as to make an entire conquest over the Jews, to profane the temple, and cause the service daily performed there to cease. (Compare viii. 11. 1 Macc. i. 39, &c. 2 Macc. v. 2. 5.) The temple is called the sanctuary of strength, because it was a token of the Divine protection, being the place of God's especial residence. (See Psal. lxxxviii. 61. xcvi. 6. Ezek. xxiv. 21. 25.)

And they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate.] Idols are commonly called abominations in Scripture, as hath been observed upon ix. 27. In agreement with that usage of the word, the abomination of desolation must signify the idol which was placed upon the altar of burnt-offerings. (See 1 Macc. i. 54. 59.) As the temple itself was dedicated by the heathen to Jupiter Olympius, 2 Macc. vi. 2. so the idol was probably the image of Jupiter. This idol is said to make desolate, because it banished the true worship of God and his worshippers from the place. (See 1 Macc. iv. 38.)

Ver. 32. And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall be corrupt by flatteries.] Such as Jason and Menelaus, who had bought the high-priesthood of him, and became his instruments in spoiling and profaning the temple, (see 2 Macc. iv. 13, 14. v. 15.) and such other apostates whom the king by fair words and promises brought over to comply with his designs. (See 1 Macc. i. 52. 2 Macc. vi. 21.)

But the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits.] Or, shall prosper. (See ver. 28. 30.) They that have a sense of their duty shall courageously resist these attempts, and behave themselves valiantly. (See 1 Macc. i. 62. ii. 41—43. iii. 43, &c. 2 Macc. v. 27.)

Ver. 33. They that understand among the people shall instruct many.] They that know their duty, and are zealous in doing it, will arm others against the temptations whereby the wicked would persuade them to forsake the true religion. Such were Mattathias and his family, 1 Macc. ii. 1, &c. Eleazar, 2 Macc. vi. 18, 19. and the mother and her seven children, 2 Macc. vii.

Yet they shall fall by the sword.] It was death for any person to observe the law, and disobey the king's command: and accordingly many suffered for their constancy in adhering to their religion. (See 1 Macc. i. 50. 63. 2 Macc. vi. 9—11. 19. 30. vii. 1, &c.)

And by flame.] This was remarkably verified in the torments inflicted upon the seven brethren recorded 2 Macc. vii. 3. 5. Burning alive was a punishment usual in those countries. (See iii. 6.)

By captivity and by spoil.] By banishment and loss of goods.

Many days.] For three years and a half, as the time is computed by Josephus, reckoning from the first beginning of the persecution till the sanctuary was cleansed. (See the note upon vii. 25.) The persecution may be enlarged to a longer time, if we date it from the beginning of this apostacy. (See the note upon viii. 14.)

Ver. 34. Now, when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help.] That of Judas Maccabeus and his followers. (See 1 Macc. iii. 10, &c. iv. 14. 2 Macc. viii. 1.)

But many shall cleave to them with flatteries.] Not sincerely: such were Joseph and Azarias, who engaged in the common cause out of ambition, and a desire of fame: (1 Macc. v. 56. 62.) such were they who after their death were found with idols consecrated under their clothes, 2 Macc. xii. 40. Such was Rhodocus, who disclosed their secrets to the enemy, ibid. xiii. 21.

Ver. 35. And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge them, and to make them white.] Some of the principal men for piety and knowledge shall fall under this persecution, (see ver. 33.) for the trial of their faith and patience, and to purge them from lesser corruptions, which are the usual effects of prosperity. (Compare 1 Pet.

i. 7.) The persecutions which shall befal the church under antichrist, are designed for the same purpose, as appears by comparing xii. 10. with the words here: Antiochus's persecution being a type and figure of that under antichrist. (See the note upon viii. 14. 23, 24. and the thirty-first verse here, with xii. 11.)

Even to the time of the end: for it is yet for a time appointed.] Till the time appointed by God for an end of those calamities shall come. (Compare ver. 27. viii. 19.) Mr. Mede refers the latter part of the sentence to the following verse, and so connects the following prophecy with what went before, to this sense: "This persecution shall last to the time of the end: for as yet for a time appointed a king shall do according to his will." (See his Works, p. 903.) [To the same sense the Vulgar Latin translates it, Quia adhuc aliud tempus erit.]

Ver. 36. And the king shall do according to his will.] Antiochus was a type and forerunner of antichrist, as hath been observed: so the angel makes a sudden transition from the type to the antitype, or the description of antichrist himself: the words in the four following verses being not at all applicable to Antiochus. And several passages in the twelfth chapter shew that some parts of this prophecy belong to the latter times, or ages, of the world. (See Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. book iii. towards the end.) We may observe such a sudden transition in our Saviour's discourse, Matt. xxiv. from a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, to a description of the general judgment.

The [or, a] king shall do according to his will; [see ver. 16.] and he shall exalt himself and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods.] Compare vii. 25. viii. 11. 25. St. Paul describes antichrist almost in the same words, 2 Thess. ii. 4. Who exalteth himself above all that is called God. (Compare Rev. xiii. 5, 6.)

And shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished, &c.] He shall succeed in his attempts of aggrandizing himself, and asserting his own supremacy, till the time of God's indignation be accomplished; (compare ver. 27. 35.) i. e. for a time, times, and a half, as it is expressed, vii. 25. xii. 7.

Ver. 37. Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers.] Antichrist is described as the seventh head of the Roman empire, Rev. xvii. 11. and as the sixth head revived, Rev. xiii. 3. 14. But before he arrived at his dominion, the worship of the heathen gods, which had prevailed under the sixth head, was destroyed by the Christian emperors.

Nor the desire of women.] Mr. Mede hath observed in his Works, p. 668. that the expression properly signifies a desire of wives, i. e. of a married state, which should be discountenanced by the king here described. In like manner, forbidding to marry is a character of some antichristian teachers, 1 Tim. iv. 3. The word desire signifies that affection which married persons have for each other. (See Gen. iii. 16. Cant. vii. 10. Ezek. xxiv. 16.)

Nor regard any god: for he shall magnify himself above all.] He will dispense with the laws of God, and make religion subservient to his own greatness and interest.

Ver. 38. But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces.] I prefer Mr. Mede's translation of this and the following verse, as giving a clearer sense and more agreeable to the original: this verse he thus interprets: But (or for) together with God in his seat shall he honour Mauzzims. This last word, both the Greek, the Vulgar Latin, and several other translations, retain without interpreting it. The word imports protection, or a protector, the abstract being often used for the concrete, (see Psal. xxvii. 1. xxviii. 8. xxxi. 3. 5.) and is often rendered ὑπερασπιστὴς, by the LXX. The same learned person supposes the word here to denote saints and angels, in whom the votaries of the church of Rome place a great trust and confidence, and fly to their protection in their distress, and assign to some of them the patronage of whole countries, as is more fully expressed in the following verse. To these, saith this interpretation of the text, shall the king here described give honour and worship in the places dedicated to the service of that God whom his fathers knew not, as it follows.

And a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, &c.] Mr. Mede translates the sentence thus: Even together with the god whom his fathers knew not (see ver. 37.) shall he honour [them] with gold and silver; &c. i. e. with the most costly ornaments.

And pleasant things.] The Hebrew word hamudoth, is used by the prophet Isaiah, (xliv. 9.) to signify the costly ornaments wherewith the heathens decked their images.

Grotius and some others explain this verse of Antiochus's setting up the statue of Jupiter Olympius within the precincts of the temple, (1 Macc. i. 54. 2 Macc. vi. 1.) But I do not apprehend how he can be called a god whom Antiochus's father knew not, since he was worshipped under the name of Baal by the Phœnicians many ages before.

Ver. 39. Thus shall he do in the most strong holds with a strange god.] According to Mr. Mede, the words should be thus translated: And he shall make the strong holds [or fortresses] of the Mauzzims jointly with [or to] the strange [or foreign] god: i. e. He shall consecrate his temples and religious places jointly to the honour of God and of his saints. Temples may fitly be called strong holds, or places of defence, as being, in the opinion of those that pay their devotions there, the earnests of that protection which they expect in answer to their prayers. So the Jewish temple is called the sanctuary of strength, ver. 31. of this chapter, the word Mauz being used in both places. (Compare Psal. xxvii. 5.)

A strange god in the Old Testament, usually signifies a false god: but the phrase being here used in opposition to the gods who were worshipped by the gentile ancestors of the Romans, it may properly denote the true God, whom the Athenians called by the name of a strange God, Acts xvii. 23. For the entire inscription of that altar St. Paul takes notice of there, is supposed to be, To the unknown and strange God: whom St. Paul tells them, they ignorantly worshipped, as not knowing him to be the one supreme God.

And he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain.] Or, Distribute the earth for a reward: i. e. he shall assign whole provinces and kingdoms to the protection of several saints and angels, to whom they may have recourse as their patrons: and shall give them suitable titles and honour, as a reward of their care and protection.

Ver. 40. And at the time of the end.] At God's appointed time; (see ver. 35.) or, in the latter days. (See xii. 8.)

Shall the king of the south push at him: and the king of the north shall come against him.] They that understand this and the following verses of Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolemy Philometor, suppose that the angel recapitulates what he said before at large, from ver. 23. It is certain these and the following words cannot be explained of any farther wars between the kings of Egypt and Syria: for Antiochus never made any farther attempt upon Egypt, after that peremptory demand of the Roman ambassador, requiring him to desist from that enterprise, mentioned ver. 30. Whereupon venting all his indignation against the Jews upon that disappointment, he afterward took a journey into Persia, where he died. (1 Macc. vi. 1. 6. 2 Macc. ix. 1. 28.)

These difficulties attending the common interpretation, Mr. Mede, p. 674. and 816. by the king of the south understands the Saracens, and by the king of the north the Turks, who should both at different times afflict the western parts of the world, where he supposes the seat of antichrist to be: the former being denoted by the locusts, Rev. ix 3. and the latter by the Euphratean horsemen described in the same chapter, ver. 15, &c. as two woes or plagues sent to chastise the corrupt part of Christendom, ver. 12. The Saracen is called the king of the south, because that people were inhabitants of Arabia Felix, which lay southward of Palestine, whereas the Turks were originally Tartars or Scythians.

Shall come against him as a whirlwind.] Compare Isa. xxi. 1. Zech. ix. 14.

With chariots and horsemen.] This answers the description given of them in the forementioned place, Rev. ix. 16. And the army of Gog and Magog, which may probably mean the Turks, is described as consisting principally of horsemen, Ezek. xxxviii. 4. 15. the strength of the Turkish armies consists chiefly in the number of their cavalry: which makes them carry a horse-tail before their chief officers, as an ensign of honour.

And shall overflow and pass over.] See ver. 10. 22.

Ver. 41. He shall also enter into the glorious land.] The land of Judea. (See ver. 16. and viii. 9.) If we understand this of Antiochus Epiphanes, his invasion of Judea hath been described at large, ver. 31, &c. If we expound it of the Turk, with Mr. Mede, he hath had possession of the Holy Land for several ages.

But these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon.] Grotius expounds the words to this sense; That Antiochus did not make war upon these people, because they readily complied with his commands, and joined with him against the Jews: for which cause Judas Maccabeus made war upon them, 1 Macc. v. 3, 4. Mr. Mede understands the words of Arabia Petræa, whose inhabitants were never subdued by the Turks.

Ver. 42, 43. And the land of Egypt shall not escape. But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt.] If we understand this of Antiochus, the notes upon ver. 24. shew how it has been completed. Mr. Mede expounds the words of the final conquest of Egypt by the Turks, A. C. 1517. after it had held out against them for a great while under the Mamalukes.

Ver. 43. And the Lybians and Ethiopians shall be at his steps.] Shall readily obey him, and follow his commands. (Compare Exod. xi. 8. Judg. iv. 10. 1 Kings xx. 10.) Cushim is here rightly translated Ethiopians, being joined with Lybians or Africans, as they are in some other places. (See 2 Chron. xii. 3. xvi. 8. and the note upon Jer. xiii. 23.) St. Jerome observes upon the place, that it is not recorded of Antiochus Epiphanes, that he ever marched so far as into these countries, or had any footing there. So Mr. Mede more probably expounds the place of the Turks, who have extended their dominions into these parts of the world.

Ver. 44. But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him.] This Dr. Prideaux explains of Antiochus thus: That in the east, i. e. in Persia, his taxes were not duly paid, which engaged him to take a journey into Persia, to gather up the arrears due to him there: and in the north Artaxias, king of Armenia, had revolted from him. They that understand the words of later times, suppose them not yet fulfilled, and so not capable of a certain interpretation.

Ver. 45. And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain.] If we apply the words to Antiochus, the sense will be, that he shall place the ensigns of his sovereignty as a conqueror at Jerusalem: (compare ver. 41. and Psal. xlviii. 2.) which city was placed upon a mountainous situation, between the Mediterranean Sea and the Sea of Sodom, near the middle of Judea, which had those two seas for its boundaries. (See Joel ii. 20. Zech. xiv. 8.) To plant the tabernacle of his palace or pavilion at Jerusalem, is an expression denoting an entire conquest, and is applied to Nebuchadnezzar in that sense, Jer. xliii. 10. where the Hebrew word shaphrir, translated pavilion, is expounded in the Chaldee paraphrase by apadan, the word used in the text here. The holy mountain oftentimes denotes the Christian church in the prophetical writings: (see the note upon Isa. ii. 2.) and if we apply this text to antichrist, we may compare it with the boasts of that proud prince, who is supposed to be the figure of antichrist, Isa. xiv. 13. where he saith, I will sit in the midst of the congregation, in the sides of the north: and we may explain both these texts by those words of St. Paul, who describes antichrist as sitting in the temple of God, 2 Thess. ii. 4. meaning the Christian church, as that phrase commonly signifies in St. Paul's writings. (See 1 Cor. iii. 16. 2 Cor. vi. 16. Eph. ii. 20. 1 Tim. iii. 15.)

Yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.] He shall be broken without hand: i. e. by a judgment immediately inflicted by God, as is said of Antiochus, viii. 25. The like judgment is denounced against antichrist, 2 Thess. ii. 8.

ployed in gathering together God's elect, Matt. xxiv. 31. so we may collect from this place of Daniel, that it will be his province to assemble those of the Jewish nation.

And there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation.] The Scriptures speak of the extraordinary appearances of God's kingdom, as ushered in by great tribulations: (see Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. Jer. xxx. 7. Matt. xxiv. 21.) so the saints are said to have come out of great tribulation, Rev. vi. 14. This some learned men suppose to relate to the times of the last vial, Rev. xvi. 18. when there was a great earthquake, saith the text, such as was not since men were upon the earth.

And at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book.] That is, in the book of life. (Compare Exod. xxxii. 32. Psal. lxix. 28. Ezek. xiii. 9. Philip. iv. 3. Rev. iii. 5. xiii. 5. xx. 12.) The phrase alludes to the registers that used to be kept of the members of any city or corporation: the privileges of which society none can lay a claim to but those whose names are found in such registers.

Ver. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust shall awake, &c.] A plain description of the general resurrection both of the just and unjust: the belief of which St. Paul speaks of, as grounded upon the writings of the law and the prophets, Acts xxiv. 15, 16. xxvi. 6—8. and there is no text so full to that purpose as this before us. The word many is sometimes equivalent to all, as hath been observed in the notes upon ix. 27.

And some to shame and everlasting contempt.] In this life men may so far harden themselves in sin as to be past shame: but this shame shall be doubled upon them in the world to come, when they shall be convicted of their sins in such a manner, as neither to be able to deny or excuse them; and shall thereupon become objects of scorn and contempt to God and all his saints. And as a thief is ashamed when he is found, or taken in the very fact, so shall the wicked be ashamed and confounded at that time, as the prophet Jeremiah makes the comparison, Jer. ii. 26.

Ver. 3. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, &c.] The words allude to xi. 33. 35. and import, that they who have been the great lights of the world, who have instructed others by their doctrine, and confirmed them in the truth by their sufferings and example, shall have an eminently glorious reward at the day of judgment. So the martyrs are described as having a share in the first resurrection, Rev. xx. 4. Our Saviour's words plainly allude to this text, Matt. xiii. 43.

Ver. 4. But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end.] To shut up a book, and to seal it, is the same with concealing the sense of it, and hiding its meaning from common understandings, as hath been observed upon viii. 26. And the same reason is assigned in both places for this command, viz. because there would be a long interval of time between the date of the prophecy and the final accomplishment of it. (Compare x. 1. with both these texts.) But the nearer that time approached, the more light should men have for understanding the prophecy itself, as is implied in the following words.

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.] Many shall be inquisitive after truth, and keep correspondence with others for their better information: and the gradual completion of this and other prophecies, shall direct observing readers to form a judgment concerning those particulars which are yet to be fulfilled.

From hence we may learn the reason of the obscurity of several prophecies in Scripture: and it may be observed, that generally those prophecies are most obscure, the time of whose completion is farthest off. For the same reason, in interpreting the prophecies relating to the latter times of the world, the judgment of the latter writers is to be preferred before that of the ancients; because the moderns living nearer the times when the events were to be fulfilled, had surer marks to guide them in their expositions. Bishop Andrews hath a remarkable passage to this purpose, in his Tortura Torti, p. 186. in the following words: "Neque vero mirum, si ista quæ dixi [de Roma sede antichristi], tam vel claram, vel certam interpretationem in scriptis patrum non habeant. Signatus adhuc erat liber prophetiæ: verissimum autem verbum est, ænigma esse prophetiam omnem, cum nondum completa est: ut quamvis prisci illi omni genere charismatum, vitæ vero sanctimonia longo nos intervallo superarint, mirari tamen non debeat quis, si non illis tum adeo explicita omnia fuerint, quam nobis per Dei gratiam jam sunt, qui consummatam jam prophetiam illam quotidie oculis usurpamus." It is no wonder that what I have said concerning Rome's being the seat of antichrist, described by St. John, is not clearly asserted in the commentaries of the ancient fathers upon the Revelation; that book of prophecy was then sealed: and it is a certain rule, that every prophecy is a riddle before its completion: so that though we grant those ancient worthies to have far exceeded us, both in gifts and in holiness, yet it is not to be wondered if they had not such clear apprehensions concerning this matter, as we of later times have, by the grace of God, attained, who see this prophecy every day fulfilled in our sight.

Ver. 5. Then I Daniel looked, and, behold, there stood other two, &c.] I saw two other angels on the bank side of the river Hiddekel, attending upon that supreme angel, or the Son of God, who appeared in that glorious form described x. 4, 5. (See the note upon x. 10.)

Ver. 6. And one [of them] said to the man clothed with linen, which was upon the waters of the river.] Or rather, Above the waters of the river. (See the note upon x. 5.)

How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?] So the inferior angel inquires of the superior concerning the accomplishment of the events foretold, viii. 13.

Ver. 7. And I heard the man clothed in linen—when he held up his right hand and left hand unto the heaven, and sware by him that liveth for ever.] Holding up the hand was a ceremony anciently used in taking an oath. (See Gen. xiv. 22. Deut. xxxii. 40.) St. John plainly alludes to this place, Rev. x. 5, 6. and by the description he gives of the angel, that he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left upon the earth, ver. 2. he can be no other than Christ, who had all power given to him in heaven and in earth.

That it shall be for a time, times, and a half.] Or, The dividing of time, as it is expressed in the Chaldee, (vii. 25.) which contains, in the literal sense, three years and a half: during which time the public sacrifices and worship were discontinued during the persecution of Antiochus, the figure of antichrist. (See the note there.) But this line of time is expressly applied to the antichristian persecution, Rev. xii. 14. and is farther explained in that chapter, ver. 6. by twelve hundred and sixty days: which is three years and a half, reckoning three hundred and sixty days to a year. (See the note upon ix. 24.) And if we suppose each day to signify a year, which is the prophetical sense of the word day, this period of time denotes twelve hundred and sixty years. (See the note upon viii. 14. ix. 24.)

And when he shall have accomplished to disperse the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished.] When the Jews' dispersions shall be ended, then the most remarkable events contained in this prophecy shall be fulfilled. The restoration of the Jewish nation is foretold by the prophets as one of those signal events to be brought to pass in the latter days, or times, of the world. (See Isa. xi. 11. xxvii. 12, 13. lxvi. 10, &c. Jer. iii. 18. xxiii. 5. 8. xxx. 3, &c. xxxi. 1. l. 4. Ezek. xx. 38. 41. xxviii. 25. xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24, &c. xxxvii. 12, &c. Hos. i. 11. iii. 5. Joel iii. 1. Amos ix. 14, 15. Obad. ver. 17, &c. Micah vii. 14, 15. Zeph. iii. 14. Zech. viii. 7. 13. x. 6. xii. 10. xiv. 8, &c.) Mr. Mede makes the text before us parallel with those words of Christ, Luke xxi. 24. Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the gentiles, until the times of the gentiles be fulfilled: i. e. till the times of the fourth monarchy be expired. (See his Works, p. 709. 744. 753.)

Of the holy people.] See viii. 24.

Ver. 8. And I heard, but I understood not.] I did not understand what time was allotted for bringing to pass this event, viz. the restoration of the Jewish nation.

Then said I, O my lord, what shall be the end of these things?] See ver. 6. Or, as Mr. Mede translates the words, What are these latter times thou speakest of? (Compare x. 14.)

Ver. 9. And he said, Go thy way, Daniel: for thy words are closed up, and sealed till the time of the end.] Be content with what has been made known to thee: (see ver. 13.) for the fuller explication of this prophecy is deferred till the time of its accomplishment draws near. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 10. Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried.] The persecutions of the faithful are designed for the trial of their faith, and purifying their lives. (See xi. 35.)

But the wicked shall do wickedly.] And for those that are obstinately bent upon following the corrupt practices to which they have been accustomed, neither the exhortations nor threatenings of God's word, nor the judgments they see overtake others, will prevail with them to forsake their evil practices. (See Rev. ix. 20. xxii. 10.)

And none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand.] The holy writers often repeat this maxim: That an honest and good heart is a necessary qualification for the receiving and understanding Divine truths. (See Isa. vi. 9, &c. Hos. xiv. 9. John viii. 47. x. 27. xviii. 37.)

Ver. 11. And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate shall be set up.] The same expressions made use of to describe Antiochus's persecution, xi. 31. are here applied to the desolations made by antichrist, of which the former was a figure. (See the note upon viii. 14. 23, 24. xi. 26.)

Ibid. and Ver. 12. There shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five-and-thirty days.] Here the time allotted for the persecutions of antichrist, till the church be entirely cleansed and purified, is enlarged from one thousand two hundred and sixty days, denoted by time, times, and a half, ver. 7. to one thousand two hundred and ninety days; and then to one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days. Mr. Mede wisely forbears giving an interpretation of these particulars, telling us that time would make them manifest. (See his Works, p. 674.) However, we may venture to say, in general, that there may be a considerable space of time between the fall of antichrist, and the last judgments which shall be inflicted upon him. Some learned men, who have compared the prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation together, suppose the interval of time between the one thousand two hundred and sixty days, and the one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days, to be included within the times of the seventh trumpet, during which the seven last plagues will be fulfilled. (See Rev. xi. 15. 18. and xv. 1. 7, 8.)

Ver. 12. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh, &c.] Some expositors suppose St. John to allude to these words, Rev. xx. 4. where he saith, Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: in like manner the prophet here pronounceth those blessed, who, after a patient expectation of the fulfilling of God's promises, come to have a share in the enjoyment of them. (Compare ver. 1—3. of this chapter.)

Ver. 13. But go thou thy way, Daniel, till the end be.] Be content with that state and condition which God shall appoint thee, till the finishing of all these wonderful events, (ver. 4. 6. 8.)

For thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.] The prophet was now ninety years of age, at least: (see the note upon x. 1.) so he could not expect to live much longer; and the angel here tells him, that after his life was ended, he should rest in peace with the souls of the righteous, (compare Isa. lvii. 2. Rev. xiv. 13.) and at the resurrection, foretold ver. 2. of this chapter, he should obtain a share of that happiness which is reserved for the faithful servants of God, and shall be actually conferred upon them at the conclusion of the times here specified, ver. 12.

The righteous are said to stand in the judgment of the last day, (Psal. i. 5.) and to have boldness in the day of judgment, (1 John ii. 28. iv. 17.) whereas the wicked are described as hiding themselves for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when the great day of his wrath is come, (Isa. ii. 10. Rev. vi. 15—17.)

The word lot signifies a state or condition of life, Jer. xiii. 25. and is often used for an inheritance, because the land of Canaan was divided by lot among the Israelites; as the promised land was a figure of that better and heavenly country, which all the good men among the Jews expected, so here it signifies that heavenly inheritance which belongs to the heirs of salvation.

HOSEA.

A

GENERAL PREFACE

MINOR PROPHETS.

THE twelve minor Prophets were always comprised in one book, called the book of the Prophets, by St. Stephen, Acts vii. 42. and the book of the twelve Prophets, by St. Cyprian, Epist. 59. The son of Sirach speaks of them under one and the same character, Ecclus. xlix. 12. Let the bones of the twelve Prophets flourish out of their place. And both Jewish and Christian writers, particularly Josephus (lib. i. contr. App.) and St. Jerome, (Prolog. Galeat.) when they mention the canonical books of the Old Testament to be in number twenty-two (a number equal to the letters of the Jewish alphabet), comprehended the twelve minor Prophets under one book.

These twelve Prophets are not placed exactly in the order of time when they lived, either in the Hebrew or Greek copies; for Jonah, who was the eldest of them, is placed the sixth in order both in the Hebrew and Greek Bibles: there being in other respects some little difference between them: the series of them standing thus in the Greek, Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonas: but no variation as to the rest.

Hosea, who is placed the first in order, is as ancient as any of them, except Jonah: having prophesied before the captivity of the ten tribes, to whom he chiefly directs his prophecy, and threatens them with a sudden destruction for their great and crying sins, which he, in all probability, lived to see brought upon them.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

Under the figure of a wife living in whoredom, and bearing illegitimate children, is represented the great idolatry of the ten tribes, which provoked God to cast them off utterly: yet with the promise of repairing that loss, by bringing in the gentiles into the church: and afterward of uniting Israel and Judah under one head, the Messias. The prophet does likewise foretell the extinction of Jehu's family.

Ver. 1. THE word of the Lord that came to Hosea in the days of Uzziah—and of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel.] Jeroboam the son of Joash, who was the second king of Israel of that name, and was contemporary with Uzziah, is here mentioned, because this prophecy does chiefly concern the kingdom of Israel. And there was no need of mentioning the names of any of the succeeding kings of Israel, because Hosea mentioning his prophesying from the times of Uzziah to Hezekiah, it follows from thence, that he prophesied all the reigns of those kings of Israel who succeeded Jeroboam, the reign of Hezekiah bearing date from the third year of Hoshea, the last of those kings. From whence we may conclude, that Hosea, who often foretold the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes, lived to see an end put to that kingdom by Shalmaneser king of Assyria, as we read 2 Kings xviii. 10.

Ver. 2. The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea.] The first prophecy or message which came from God to Hosea, was as follows.

Go, take thee a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms, &c.] This may be properly understood of a wife, who after marriage should prove false to her marriage vow: this would make the case more exactly parallel with that of the Israelites, who had departed from the true God, and polluted themselves with idolatry, called often in Scripture by the names of whoredom and fornication. (See particularly the sixteenth and twenty-third chapters of Ezekiel.) Taking the words in this sense, there will be no inconvenience in supposing this relation to be literally true, and not barely a figure or parallel, as some commentators understand it, and particularly the Chaldee paraphrast, who thus expresses the sense: Go, utter a prophecy against the rebellious city. This question is handled at large in Dr. Pocock's commentary upon this place.

Ver. 3. So he went and took Gomer—who conceived, and bare a son.] This probably might be a legitimate son, according to the sense given of the foregoing verse. (See the following words.)

Ver. 4. And the Lord said unto him, Call his name Jezreel.] The word signifies either the arm of God, or the seed of God: and is taken in both those senses in the following verses. It does not seem proper to make an illegitimate child the earnest of such acts of God's justice or mercy, as are implied in any of those senses.

For yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu.] The blood of Joram the son of Ahab, whom, with all the rest of Ahab's family, Jehu slew in Jezreel. (See 2 Kings x. 11.) God made Jehu the instrument of destroying the house of Ahab, (ibid. ver. 10. 30.) but yet he was prompted to it by his own ambition and cruelty, without any regard to God's glory, whose worship he forsook, and maintained that idolatry which Jeroboam had first set up.

Wicked men are called a sword in the hand of God,

Psal. xvii. 11. to execute his judgments upon those who are as bad or worse than themselves: but when they have fulfilled God's purposes, he often punishes them for the outrages they have committed, which their own evil dispositions prompted them to do, but it was God's providence allotted upon whom the execution should fall.

And will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel.] This may be a prophecy of the destruction of the whole kingdom of Israel, which was in a declining condition from the death of Jeroboam; but it rather denotes the ceasing of the kingdom in his family, according to God's promise to Jehu, That his children should sit upon the throne of Israel to the fourth generation, 2 Kings xv. 12.

Ver. 5. And it shall come to pass at that day.] Quickly after the extinction of Jehu's family: at that day, in the prophets, commonly signifies a season marked out by Providence for some extraordinary act of God's justice or mercy. (See the note upon Isa. iv. 2.)

I will break the bow [i. e. the armies, or strength] of Jezreel.] This is commonly understood of that invasion of Israel which Tiglath-pileser made, and is mentioned 2 Kings xv. 29. wherein he subdued a great part of the kingdom, and carried the inhabitants away captive; the Assyrian army having routed the Israelites in the valley of Jezreel, which is mentioned Josh. xvii. 16. xix. 18. Judg. vi. 33. as being in the border of Issachar. But the expression may mean no more than the place where God's arm, or strength, will appear in subduing the Israelites, which is one signification of the word Jezreel. So Joel calls the place where God will gather all nations the valley of Jehoshaphat, the word signifying the valley of God's judgment, iii. 2. 12.

Ver. 6. I will no more [or, no longer: see Noldius, p. 682.] have mercy upon the house of Israel, but will utterly take them away.] I will carry them into captivity, never to return any more to their own land: (2 Kings xvii. 6. 23.) and will utterly put an end to that people, considered as a distinct kingdom from Judah. (Compare ix. 15. of this prophecy.)

Ver. 7. But I will have mercy on the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God, &c.] I will deliver the kingdom of Judah out of the hands of Sennacherib, not by any human means, but by the stroke of an angel destroying his whole army. (See 2 Kings xix. 35. compare Zech. iv. 6.) Interpreters observe the expression may allude to the salvation, to be accomplished by the Messias, who is God as well as man; the Lord being spoken of as a distinct person from the principal Author of the salvation here promised. (Compare Isa. xxxv. 4. xl. 9.) To this sense the Chaldee paraphrases it, I will save them by the Word of the Lord their God: a title he elsewhere gives to the Messias. (See the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, chap. 2. p. 70.)

Ver. 9. Ye are not my people, and I will not be your God.] Since you have disowned the covenant relation I had to you, by apostatizing from my service, I will no more own you for my people, nor continue my protection over you. (Compare Lev. xxvi. 12. Ezek. xi. 20. xiv. 11.)

Ver. 10. Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, &c.] Though God casts off the ten tribes, yet he will, in due time, supply their loss, by bringing in great numbers of true Israelites into the church, not only of the Jews, but also of the gentiles, and making them, who before were strangers to the covenants of promise, fellow-heirs with the Jews. (See Rom. ix. 25. 29. 1 Pet. ii. 10.)

Ver. 11. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, &c.] When the fulness of the gentiles is come in, this will be a means of converting the Jews, and bringing them into the church. (See Rom. ix. 25, 26.)

And shall appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land.] Upon this will follow the restoration of the Jewish nation, when they shall return into their own country, from the several dispersions where they were scattered, and become one nation or kingdom under the Messias, their head and king. (Compare Ezek. xxxvii. 21, 22. Micah ii. 13.) Israel and Judah are joined together where this general restoration is foretold. (See the note upon Jer. iii. 18.)

For great shall be the day of Jezreel.] The word Jezreel signifies both the seed of God and the arm of God, as was before observed: in both senses, great will be the day of Jezreel: God will signally exert his arm, and shew his power, in the restoration of his ancient people, and subduing their enemies: and thereby a numerous offspring of the seed of Abraham shall be added to the church.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet reproves the ten tribes for their ingratitude to God, their great benefactor, and giving the glory of all the good things they possessed to their idols; for which he threatens them with severe judgments, yet gives them some hopes of obtaining mercy and reconciliation.

Ver. 1. SAY ye to your brethren, Ammi; and to your sisters, Ruhamah.] Several interpreters join this verse with the foregoing chapter, to this sense: When that general restoration of the Jewish nation shall come to pass, ye may alter your style in speaking to those of your brethren and sisters, whom I had before disowned, and you may call them my people, and such as have obtained mercy. (See ver. 23.) This interpretation gives the plainest and easiest sense. However, other expositors join this verse with the following words, and translate it thus, Ye that are my people, and have obtained mercy, speak to your brethren and sisters, and plead with your mother. But this sense I think not so agreeable with the context, which threatens the ten tribes with the miseries of their ensuing captivity.

Ver. 2. Plead with your mother, plead; for she is not my wife, neither am I her husband.] The words are directed to those pious persons that still remained among the ten tribes, who are required to reprove, and use their best endeavours to reform, that general corruption which the nation had contracted by its idolatry: whereby they have broken the covenant I had made with them, (frequently expressed in the prophets by a marriage-contract: see Jer. iii. 1. 8. xxxi. 32.) and made a separation or divorce between them and me. (See Isa. l. 1.)

Let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts.] Let her leave off her idolatries, usually expressed by the fondness and caresses which pass between unchaste lovers. (Compare Ezek. xvi. 25, &c.)

Ver. 3. Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day wherein she was born, &c.] The punishment commonly inflicted upon harlots was to strip them naked, and expose them to the world. (See ver. 10. Jer. xiii. 22. 26. Ezek. xvi. 37.) So God threatens to deal with the nation or kingdom of Israel: to deliver her into the hands of her enemies, who shall strip her of all her wealth and ornaments, and carry her away naked into captivity, (see ver. 9.) in as forlorn and desolate a condition as she was in during her bondage in Egypt. (See Ezek. xvi. 4. compare likewise ver. 37. 41. of the same chapter.)

And make her as a wilderness, &c.] The state of captivity is fitly compared to being placed in a wilderness, in want of common necessaries. (Compare Ezek. xix. 13.)

Ver. 4. And I will not have mercy on her children; for they be the children of whoredoms.] As an injured husband has no regard for the children his wife has brought by another man: so neither will I take pity of thy children which are trained up to practise thy idolatries.

Ver. 5. For she said, I will go after my lovers, that give me my bread and my water, &c.] By lovers are meant, in the first place, the idols with whom the Israelites committed spiritual fornication: (see Jer. iii. 1.) and then the idolatrous nations, whose alliance the Israelites courted, and in order to it practised their idolatries. (See ver. 10. and the note upon Ezek. xvi. 37.) The word may be understood here in both senses: they ascribed all the plenty they enjoyed chiefly to the favour of the idol-gods which they worshipped; (see Jer. xliv. 17.) and then they placed their trust and confidence in the confederacies they had made with their neighbouring idolaters, and thought the peace and plenty they possessed was very much owing to their protection and alliance.

Ver. 6. I will hedge up her way with thorns, and make a wall, that she shall not find her paths.] I will bring her under great calamities, that she shall not know which way to turn herself, or get out of them. (Compare Job iii. 23. xix. 8. Lam. iii. 7. 9.)

Ver. 7. And she shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them.] She shall seek for help of her idols, but shall receive none.

She shall seek them, but she shall not find them.] A proverbial expression, denoting lost labour, when persons receive no assistance from those whose help they implore. (See v. 6. Prov. i. 28.)

Then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband; for then it was better with me than now.] Her afflictions will bring her to a sense of her duty, and the happiness she enjoyed as long as she cleaved steadfastly unto God. (See v. 15. and compare Luke xv. 18.)

Ver. 8. For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal.] Or, bestowed upon Baal. (Compare 2 Chron. xxiv. 7.) She did not consider, so the first part of the sentence should be translated, (compare vii. 9.) that all the necessaries she enjoyed, as well as her riches and ornaments, were my gift, which yet she ungratefully bestowed upon the service of her idols. (Compare viii. 4. and Ezek. xvi. 17—19.)

Ver. 9. Therefore I will return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, &c.] For a punishment of her ingratitude, I will take away the good things I have given her: at the very season when she expects to receive the fruits of the earth, her enemies shall invade her, and destroy them.

I will recover [or take away] my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness.] They shall strip her of her very clothes, and carry her away captive: without leaving her any covering for her nakedness. (See the note upon Isa. iii. 17.)

Ver. 10. And now will I discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers, &c.] The filthiness of her idolatries shall appear by the punishments I will inflict upon her, which shall be so remarkable, that it shall be taken notice of by the idolatrous nations round about her. (See ver. 5. and Ezek. xvi. 37. xxiii. 29.)

Ver. 11. And I will cause all her mirth to cease, her feast-days, &c.] The public festivals are frequently called days of joy and gladness: the observation of several of these festivals was retained in the worship of the golden calves: (see 1 Kings xii. 32. Amos viii. 5.) God here threatens them, that, under their captivity, they should have no opportunity to celebrate them, since they had so much abused those solemn seasons of Divine worship. (See ix. 4, 5. Amos viii. 10. and the note upon Dan. x. 4.)

Ver. 12. These are my rewards that my lovers have given me.] See ver. 5. and ix. 1.

I will make them a forest, and the beasts of the field shall eat them.] I will give up their lands unto their enemies, who shall destroy the fruits of it, or else leave it desolate, for the beasts of the field to devour. (Compare Psal. lxxx. 12, 13. Isa. v. 7.)

Ver. 13. I will visit upon her the days of Baalim, &c.] I will punish her for all the idolatries she has committed from the days of Jeroboam, who first set up the worship of false gods. (See xiii. 1.) The chief god of every country was called by the name of Baal: so Baal-Peor was the god of the Moabites; Baal-zebub was the god of Ekron; (2 Kings i. 2.) Baal-herith the god of the Phœnicians, (Judg. viii. 33.) Those several deities are called in the plural number Baalim. (See Judg. iii. 7.)

And she decked herself with her ear-rings and jewels, and she went after her lovers.] She put on her richest ornaments in their idolatrous festivals. (See Ezek. xxiii. 40. 42.)

Ver. 14. Therefore, behold, I will allure her.] Here is a plain alteration of the style, from threatenings to promises: so the first word of this verse should be translated, nevertheless. (See the note upon Isa. xxx. 18.)

I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, &c.] Or, After I have brought her into the wilderness. The state of the Jews' captivity is elsewhere expressed by a wilderness state. (See the note upon Ezek. xx. 35.) It probably means here the dispersions of the ten tribes, ever since their first captivity by Shalmaneser, 2 Kings xvii. 6.

The words, I will allure her, and speak comfortably to her, allude to the practice of fond husbands, who, forgetting past offences, use all the arts of endearment to persuade their wives, who have parted from them, to return to them again: so God will use the most powerful persuasions to bring the Israelites to the acknowledgment of the truth, notwithstanding all their former abuses of the means of grace. This verse, and the following part of the chapter, import a general promise of the restoration of the Jewish nation: which is a subject often treated of by the prophets: particularly by Ezekiel, chap. xxxiv. xxxvi. xxxvii.

Ver. 15. And I will give her her vineyards from thence.] Or, From that time: for so the word misham may be rendered. (See the notes upon Isa. xlviii. 16. lxv. 20.) Then I will restore her vineyards and fruitful fields, which I had taken from her, (ver. 12.)

And the valley of Achor for a door of hope.] As at the Israelites' first entrance into Canaan, their taking possession of the fruitful valley of Achor (see Isa. lxv. 10.) gave them encouragement to hope they should become owners of that whole land, flowing with milk and honey: the same auspicious tokens of the Divine favour should accompany them at their return into their own country.

And she shall sing there as in the days of her youth, &c.] She shall express her joy in God, as her forefathers did at their first coming out of Egypt, after their deliverance at the Red Sea, when I espoused them for my peculiar people, and entered into a covenant with them at Mount Sinai: where they solemnly promised an entire obedience to me, Exod. xix. 5. 8. (Compare xi. 1. Jer. ii. 2. Ezek. xvi. 8. 22. 60.)

Ver. 16. Thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baali.] Whereas God had formerly renounced any marriage-relation with Israel by reason of their idolatry: (see ver. 2.) he now declares himself reconciled to them again; (see ver. 20.) and permits them to call him by the name of Ishi, i. e. husband, but not of Baali, i. e. Lord. The word Baali often signifies a husband, and is particularly spoken of God as he was by his covenant-relation a husband to his people. (See Isa. liv. 5. Jer. iii. 14.) But because the word Baal had been so much profaned by being given to idols, he forbade it to be applied any more to himself. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 17. For I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth, &c.] The Jews were forbidden to mention the names of heathen idols. (See Exod. xxiii. 13. Josh. xxiii. 7. Psal. xvi. 4. compare Zech. xiii. 2. and see the note upon xiv. 2.) Baalim is sometimes equivalent to Baal: (see 1 Kings xviii. 18. compared with ver. 21. and 2 Chron. xxiv. 4. compared with 2 Kings xxiii. 4.) so Baalim and Ashtaroth, Judg. x. 6, 7. is the same with Baal and Ashtaroth, ii. 13. for the plural number in the Hebrew language sometimes expresses an excellency, as in the word Elohim. In like manner Baal was called Baalim by his worshippers, to denote that he was a principal object of their worship: but the word likewise signifies the several Baals which the idolaters worshipped under so many distinguishing characters; such as Baal-Peor, Baal-berith, Baal-zebub, and the like: and, in general, it signifies the many strange gods of the heathens. (See 1 Sam. vii. 3, 4. 2 Chron. xxiv. 7. Jer. ii. 23.)

Ver. 18. And in that day I will make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, &c.] I will protect them from that violence and annoyance which beasts and birds of prey or venomous creatures might threaten them with. (Compare Job v. 23. Ezek. xxxiv. 25.)

I will break the bow, and the sword, and the battle, out of the earth.] A universal peace and freedom, both from foreign and domestic enemies, is mentioned by the prophets as a concomitant of that flourishing state of the church, which shall commence from the restoration of the Jews, and the coming in of the gentiles. (See Isa. ii. 4. xi. 6. 9. Zech. ix. 10.)

And I will make them lie down safely.] As flocks do when they are secure from beasts of prey. (See Ezek. xxxiv. 25. Zech. iii. 13. Jer. xxiii. 6. xxx. 10.)

Ver. 19, 20. And I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, &c.] I will enter into a new covenant with my church, consisting of the converted Jews, and increased by the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles: (see ver. 23.) which covenant is described as if it were a marriage-contract: (see the note upon ver. 2.) wherein I will eminently display my attributes of righteousness and equity, of loving-kindness, mercy, and faithfulness.

And thou shalt know the Lord.] One especial part of the new covenant shall consist in imparting to the faithful a more perfect knowledge of God's will, and their own duty. (See Jer. xxxi. 34.)

Ver. 21. And it shall come to pass in that day, I will hear [or answer], saith the Lord.] I will graciously answer all the petitions my people make to me. (Compare Isa. lxv. 24. Zech. xiii. 9.) Or the words may be referred to what follows.

Ibid. and Ver. 22. I will hear the heavens, and the heavens shall hear the earth, &c.] All creatures shall answer the desires and wants of my people: the heavens shall answer the wants of the earth in sending down seasonable showers, and the earth shall answer the wants of mankind in bringing forth corn and wine, and other necessaries of life, and the very fruits of the earth shall answer the wishes of my people, now returned into their own land, by giving them due nourishment. The same sense is more plainly expressed in Zechariah, viii. 12. The seed shall be prosperous, the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things. Spiritual blessings are often described under the emblems of fruitfulness and plenty. (See the note upon Isa. iv. 2. and compare vi. 3. of this prophecy.)

And they shall hear Jezreel.] This new state of the church, increased by a numerous accession both of Jews and gentiles, is fitly called by the name of Jezreel: the word importing both the seed and the arm of God. (See the note upon i. 11.)

Ver. 23. And I will sow her unto me in the earth.] Here is a plain allusion to the word Jezreel mentioned just before, which signifies the seed of God: the prophet foretells a plentiful increase of true believers, like to that of corn sowed in the earth. (Compare Zech. x. 9.)

And I will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy, &c.] Compare i. 6. I will have mercy both on the Jews and gentiles, who shall become true converts to the Christian faith. This was in part fulfilled at the first preaching of the gospel: (see Rom. ix. 24—26.) but shall receive its completion at the restoration of the Jews, and the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles. (Compare i. 10, 11.)

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

ages without any external form of civil government, or public worship: yet with a promise of being restored to their ancient dignity and privileges in the later ages of the world.

Ver. 1. GO yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet [or, although] an adulteress.] This is probably the same woman mentioned i. 3. who, upon her ill life, was parted from her husband, who yet had a kindness for her still, and was willing to receive her upon conditions of her better behaviour. The Hebrew word reang, friend, is used for a husband, Jer. iii. 20. Cant. v. 16.

According to the love of the Lord towards the children of Israel, who look to other gods, and love flagons of wine.] Hosea's dealing thus with a wife who had injured him, exactly resembles the favour which God hath shewed towards the Israelites, who, notwithstanding all their obligations to him, retain an incurable propension to idolatry, often called by the name of spiritual whoredom.

The words which our translation renders flagons of wine, may be translated cakes made of (dried) grapes. Such were the cakes, probably, which the Jews offered to the queen of heaven, Jer. vii. 18. xliv. 19. So, Cant. ii. 5. the word ashish might rather signify cakes, or comfits, than flagons: as our translation renders it. The expression signifies, in general, those entertainments which they were partakers of in the idol temples, (Amos ii. 8. 1 Cor. x. 7. 21.)

Ver. 2. So I bought her for me for fifteen pieces of silver, &c.] The expression alludes to the custom anciently practised of men's buying their wives: and it implies, that the prophet made a new espousal or contract with her; as God intended to betroth Israel a second time, ii. 19. and the meanness of the price offered, shews of how little value the Israelites were in God's sight, since their apostacy from the worship of God to idolatry. (Compare Zech. xi. 13.) A homer was about ten bushels. (See the note upon Ezek. xlv. 11.)

Ver. 3. Thou shalt abide for me many days: thou shalt not play the harlot.] Thou shalt continue in a solitary condition (see Deut. xxi. 13.) for a considerable time, that I may make some proof of thy amendment.

Thou shalt not be for another man; so will I also be for thee.] The word another is not in the Hebrew, so the sentence may be thus translated more agreeably to the original, Thou shalt not have a husband, neither will I have thee [to my wife]; i. e. thou shalt continue some time in a state of widowhood. The Hebrew phrase Lo tehi laish properly signifies, Thou shalt not have a husband; and so it is rendered by our interpreters, Ezek. xliv. 25. and to the same sense without the negative particle, Ruth i. 12. The LXX. render it to the same sense, Οὐδὲ μὴ γένῃ ἀνδρί, and so it is used by St. Paul, Rom. vii. 3.

Ver. 4. For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, &c.] This threatening was fulfilled upon the ten tribes immediately upon their captivity by Shalmaneser, (compare ix. 4.) and upon the two remaining tribes at the destruction of their temple and commonwealth, during the Babylonish captivity. The later Jews thus express the sense of those exiles in the Song of the Three Children, as it is found among the apocryphal writings, ver. 14. Neither is there at this time prince, or prophet, or leader, or burnt-offering, or sacrifice, or oblation, or incense, or place to sacrifice before thee, and find mercy. This threatening was still more remarkably fulfilled upon the whole nation of the Jews, from the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian unto this day. From that time they have had no republic or civil government of their own; but live every where, like so many exiles, only upon sufferance: they have had neither priests nor sacrifice, their temple being destroyed where only they were to offer sacrifice: and yet the want of a place where to perform the most solemn part of their public worship, does not tempt them to idolatry, or make them fond of image-worship, or any such idolatrous practice, which was the epidemical sin of their forefathers. This seems the general import of this remarkable prophecy: but the several expressions must be more particularly explained.

Without a king.] A king in the Hebrew language signifies any sort of governor or magistrate: it is applied to Moses, Deut xxxiii. 5. and to the judges, Judg. xvii. 6. and to the four successive monarchies, Dan. vii. 17. So in the New Testament, Rev. xvii. 10. the seven kings are commonly explained of seven sorts of governments: so here a king means any civil magistrate with supreme authority.

And without a prince.] The word may be equivalent to the former: if we suppose it to denote a distinct authority, it may be fitly explained of the high-priest, and the heads of the priestly courses: called the princes of the sanctuary, Isa. xliii. 8. and governors of the house of the Lord, Jer. xx. 1. Taking the word in this sense, it fitly follows, And without a sacrifice, which could only be offered by the priests.

Without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim.] Some interpreters suppose these words to denote the several ways of lawful worship, or means of inquiring after the will of God; and by the word matzebah, they understand an altar: this sense agrees very well with the word sacrifice, going before: the same word is joined with an altar erected to God's worship, Isa. xix. 19. and signifies in that place such a religious memorial as Jacob set up, Gen. xxviii. 18. Teraphim they suppose to signify the same with the urim, or the oracle placed in the breast-plate of the high-priest, and therefore fitly joined with the ephod, which often signifies the whole priestly habit, and is particularly mentioned when there is occasion of consulting God by the high-priest, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9. xxx. 7. This interpretation is followed by the LXX. and it makes an easy and natural sense of the text; viz. that God will deprive the Jews of the principal offices, for the enjoyment of which they chiefly valued themselves, viz. that of the priesthood, and that of prophecy. The Jews had no succession of prophets for a considerable time before Christ's coming: (Ecclus. xxxvi. 15. 1 Macc. iv. 46. ix. 27. xiv. 41.) and both kingdom and priesthood were taken away within forty years after Christ's death. Dr. Spencer carries this interpretation so far, as to be very positive that teraphim means the same with the urim, and that both words denote an image enclosed within the folds of the high-priest's breast-plate, which uttered oracles by a voice. (Lib. iii. de Legib. Hæbr. Dissert. ult.) This opinion is strenuously opposed by Dr. Pocock in his notes upon this place, to which I refer the reader. Other learned men agree with Dr. Pocock, in observing that the word teraphim is, in other places of Scripture, used for a sort of divination practised by idolaters, and therefore think it unlikely that the prophet should express an oracle of God's own appointment by so infamous a name: whereupon they suppose, that Hosea here speaking to the ten tribes, means some idolatrous kind of divination practised by the priests at Dan and Beth-el, after Jeroboam's schism: as if he had threatened them, that in a short time they should have neither king, nor priest, nor sacrifice, nor any degree of prophecy or foreknowledge of what is to come. This interpretation exactly agrees with that state of the people's widowhood, described ver. 3.

To this interpretation it may be objected, that it cannot be thought a proper punishment to threaten the taking away an idolatrous sort of worship. But to this they answer, that the prophet here conforms his speech to the sentiments of those he speaks to, and threatens them with the loss of what they were extremely fond of.

Ver. 5. Afterward the children of Israel shall return, and seek the Lord their God.] They shall be touched with a true remorse for their former errors (especially that of rejecting the Messias), and shall desire to be instructed in the knowledge of the truth. (Compare Jer. l. 4.) The expression of seeking the Lord, alludes to the custom of the Jews going up in companies to celebrate their solemn feasts at Jerusalem. (Compare v. 6. Psal. cv. 4. Jer. l. 4, 5.)

And David their king.] The Messias is often called so by the prophets, as being the person that was to spring from his loins, and in whom all the promises made to David were to be fulfilled. (See Isa. lv. 3, 4. Jer. xxx. 9. Ezek. xxxiv. 23. xxxvii. 24.) So the Chaldee paraphrase expounds this and the parallel texts. David was a type of the Messias; (see Psal. lxxxix. 20. 36.) who therefore is called by the name of David: so John Baptist is called Elias, Mal. iv. 5. because he was to resemble him, and to succeed him in his office of reproving the people, and exhorting them to repentance. The expression cannot be literally understood here, David himself having been dead long before the uttering of this prophecy.

And shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days.] The goodness of God in making them partakers of the mercies of the gospel, shall engage them to yield an entire obedience to him: (compare Jer. xxxii. 9.) and this will come to pass in the latter days or times of the world. The latter days are often spoken of the times of the gospel. (See the notes upon Isa. ii. 2. Dan. ii. 28.) But the phrase does sometimes denote the very last days of the gospel age, near which time probably the conversion of the Jews will be brought to pass. (See Deut. iv. 30. Jer. xxx. 24. Ezek. xxxviii. 8. 16.)

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet denounces judgments against the sins both of the people and priests of the ten tribes; and exhorts Judah to take warning by Israel's calamity.

Ver. 1. THE Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land.] The expression is taken from the actions or pleas which one man hath against another for injuries or damages received: so here God is represented as entering into judgment with the inhabitants of the ten tribes for their impieties, as being so many injuries to his honour, for which he demands satisfaction. (Compare xii. 2. Isa. iii. 13. v. 3, 4. xliii. 26. Jer. xxv. 30.)

Ver. 2. By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing.] Stealing, and swearing, i. e. false-swearing, are elsewhere joined together; because in the Jewish courts of justice men that were suspected of theft were obliged to purge themselves by oath: and they often ventured to forswear themselves rather than discover the truth. (See Prov. xxix. 24. xxx. 9. Zech. v. 4.)

They break out.] There is an inundation of all manner of wickedness, and all law and right are broken through and violated.

And blood toucheth blood.] Compare v. 2. vi. 9. This may more particularly relate to the murder of their kings, that were slain by their successors: as Zechariah by Shallum, Shallum by Menahem, (2 Kings xv. 10. 14.) In such civil broils a great many of their friends and dependants are commonly slain with the kings themselves. (See 1 Kings xvi. 11.)

Ver. 3. Therefore shall the land mourn, and every one that dwelleth therein shall languish, &c.] These civil wars and commotions make the whole land look dismally: the inhabitants are either destroyed, or forced to leave their habitations, and languish under want of all things: the beasts of the field, and fowls of the air, are consumed by famine or pestilence: and the fishes of the rivers and great waters (called seas in the Hebrew language) are killed through drought, or the waters being tainted by the infection of the air, or corrupted by the blood of the slain. (Compare Jer. iv. 25. Zeph. i. 3.) The prophets sometimes describe a general desolation by an enumeration of particulars. (Compare Isa. xix. 5. 8.)

Ver. 4. Let no man strive, or reprove another: for my people are as they that strive with the priest.] The prophet speaks of the Israelites as one that despaired of their amendment, and thought it lost labour to reprove them, they being of that refractory temper, as not to hearken to instruction, and even to quarrel with their priests themselves, when they admonished them of their duty. This seems to be a proverbial expression to denote a stubborn and incorrigible temper: for it was a capital offence by the law for any to behave themselves in a presumptuous manner against the injunctions of the priest. (See Deut. xvii. 12.)

Ver. 5. Therefore shalt thou fall in the day, and the prophet shall fall in the night.] Thou shalt be destroyed both by open violence and by secret treachery: (compare Jer. vi. 4, 5. xv. 8.) and the false prophets shall be involved in the same destruction. (Compare ix. 7, 8.)

I will kill thy mother.] The Hebrew reads, I will cut off thy mother; i. e. the whole state or kingdom of Israel. (Compare ii. 2. Jer. vi. 2. xv. 8.)

Ver. 6. My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge.] The ignorance of the true principles of religion, which prevails among the people of the ten tribes, is the occasion of those sins which draw down such heavy judgments upon them: the Levites, who are placed in every tribe by God's appointment for the better instructing of the people, are turned out of their possessions by Jeroboam and his successors, and none left to teach them their duty. (See 2 Chron. xi. 14.)

Because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest for me.] This is spoken to Jeroboam's priests, who, being taken out of the lowest of the people, (1 Kings xii. 31.) were very ignorant themselves, and therefore unable to teach others.

Because thou hast forgotten my law, I will also forget thy children.] I will not look upon them any longer as the seed of Abraham, and children of my covenant.

Ver. 7. As they were increased, they sinned against me, &c.] Or, The more they were increased, the more they sinned against me. (See Noldius, p. 436.) The greater were the favours I heaped upon them, the more presumptuously they sinned against me. (Compare xiii. 6.) Therefore I will divest them of all those glories for which they pride themselves, and lead them away in a poor and miserable condition into captivity.

Ver. 8. They eat up the sin of my people, and they set their hearts on their iniquity.] Those idolatrous priests mentioned ver. 6. live upon the sin-offerings of the people; and are so far from restraining them, that they take delight in seeing them commit iniquity; because the more they sin, the greater is the number of their sin-offerings, which are the priests' portion.

Ver. 9. And there shall be, like people, like priest: and I will punish them for their ways, &c.] As they are alike in sinning, so shall they be in punishment.

Ver. 10. For they shall eat, and not have enough.] Or, Not be satisfied; as the word is elsewhere translated. (See Lev. xxvi. 26. Micah vi. 14.) The expression may signify, either their food shall not afford due nourishment, for want of God's blessing accompanying it; (compare Deut. viii. 3. Hag. i. 6.) or else the words imply a threatening them with famine, when they shall not have food enough to satisfy a craving appetite. (Compare Lev. xxvi. 26. Amos iv. 8. Micah vi. 14.) The contrary phrase, To eat, and be full, or satisfied, denotes plenty. (See Lev. xxvi. 5. Deut. vi. 11. viii. 10. xi. 15. Psal. xxii. 26. Joel ii. 26.)

Ver. 11. Whoredom, and wine, and new wine, take away the heart.] Deprive men of their judgment, and darken their understandings. So a gift is said to destroy the heart, Eccles. vii. 7. to bereave men of the use of their discerning faculties.

Ver. 12. My people ask counsel at their stocks.] Of their idols; for so the word nets elsewhere often signifies. (See Jer. ii. 27. x. 8. Habak. ii. 19.)

And their staff declares unto them.] This, learned men suppose to be the same kind of divination with that made by arrows, which is described, Ezek. xxi. 21. (See the note upon that place.)

For the spirit of whoredom hath caused them to err, &c.] This is to be understood of idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom. (Compare v. 4.)

Ver. 13. They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, &c.] The sacrificing upon mountains and shady groves was an ancient piece of idolatry, often mentioned and reproved by the prophets. (See Isa. i. 29. Ezek. vi. 13. xx. 20. and the notes upon those places.)

Therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, &c.] God delivers men up to vile affections, as a punishment of their idolatry. (See Rom. i. 28.)

Ver. 14. I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, &c.] I will suffer them to fall from one degree of wickedness to another. (See the foregoing verse.)

For themselves are separated with whores, and they sacrifice with harlots.] The word rendered harlot signifies such as prostituted themselves in an idol-temple, in honour of the idol: such lewd practices were frequent in the gentile temples dedicated to Venus, and such-like impure deities: (see Baruch vi. 23.) from thence the Jews learned those filthy customs. (See 1 Kings xiv. 23, 24. xv. 12.) The LXX. render the word very properly τετελεσμένων; such as are initiated into the service of the idol by such lewd rites.

Therefore the people that doth not understand shall fall.] See ver. 1. 6.

Ver. 15. Though Israel play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend.] The kingdom of Judah still retained the worship of the true God, and the ordinances of the temple-service: so the prophet exhorts that people not to be led away by the ill example of their brethren of the ten tribes.

And come not ye to Gilgal, neither go up to Beth-aven.] Gilgal was a remarkable place for the renewing of the rite of circumcision: (Josh. v. 9.) there the people afterward used to offer sacrifice: (1 Sam. xv. 21.) after Jeroboam's setting up of idolatry, it was noted for the worship of false gods, as appears by comparing this text with ix. 15. xii. 11. Amos iv. 4. v. 5. In those places of Amos, as well as in this verse, it is joined with Beth-el, noted for the worship of one of Jeroboam's calves; called here Beth-aven, and x. 5. Beth-el originally signifies the house of God; that name was given to it by Jacob, because of God's appearing to him there, Gen. xxviii. 17. But when it became the seat of idolatry, it was called Beth-aven, i. e. the house of vanity.

Nor swear, The Lord liveth.] As long as ye continue to worship idols, I will not have my name mentioned by your polluted lips, inasmuch as there is no fellowship between God and idols. Many of the Israelites halted between God and Baal, and the other idols, sometimes serving one, and sometimes the others. (See 1 Kings xviii. 21. Ezek. xx. 39. xxiii. 38, 39. Zeph. i. 4, 5.) Some understand the words, of their swearing by the name of the true God, which is a solemn act of religious worship, (see Deut. x. 20.) and yet meaning by it the god that is worshipped at Beth-el. This God forbids, as a profanation of his name. (See Amos viii. 14.)

Ver. 16. For Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer.] The word translated slideth back, properly signifies being headstrong and untractable: it is a metaphor from oxen or heifers that draw their neck back, and will not put it under the yoke. (See Jer. vii. 24.) The expression alludes to the calves, called heifers by the Septuagint, which they worshipped.

Now will the Lord feed them as a lamb in a large place.] The expression seems ironical; as if the prophet had said, they were like headstrong cattle, that would not be managed by their leaders or drivers: so God will suffer them to be scattered as sheep without a shepherd in the large country of Assyria, whither they shall be led captive.

Ver. 17. Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone.] Ephraim signifies the same with Israel, or the ten tribes. (See

v. 3.) It is to no purpose to take pains to reclaim him. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 18. Their drink is sour.] The phrase may be metaphorical, to express the corruption of their manners: (compare Deut. xxxii. 32. Isa. i. 22.) or else, if we join it in sense with the remaining part of the verse, it imports their excessive drinking, till their liquor turn sour in their stomachs; and so the whole verse taxes them for three great vices, drunkenness, whoredom, and bribery.

They have committed whoredom continually.] This may be understood of idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom: (see ver. 12.) but the literal sense agrees very well with the rest of the verse.

Their rulers with shame do love, Give ye.] i. e. Are continually asking or expecting bribes: (compare Prov. xxx. 15.) are still greedy of filthy lucre. (See Micah iii. 11. vii. 3.)

The Hebrew word translated rulers, properly signifies shields: it is taken for rulers in Psal. xlvii. 9. as well as here.

Ver. 19. The wind hath bound her up in her wings.] The words threaten them with going into captivity: for it is common with the prophets to express what is future by the preter-perfect tense: (see the note upon Isa. xxi. 9.) God's anger is often expressed by a blustering or tempestuous wind. (See xiii. 15. Jer. iv. 11, 12. li. 1.) This wind is said here to carry them away out of their country: and then they will have reason to be ashamed of their idolatrous sacrifices, which have brought such severe judgments upon them.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter, and the next to the fourth verse, threatens judgments both against Israel and Judah for their manifold sins, till they repent: upon which they may conceive hopes of pardon.

Ver. 1. HEAR this, O priests.] Or rather, O princes: which reading better agrees with the house of the king that follows: the Hebrew word is of both significations. So Gen. xlii. 45. and Exod. ii. 16. where it is in the text priest of On and Midian: but the margin reads the prince of On and Midian. (Compare vi. 9.)

For judgment is towards you (or against you), because you have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor.] Ye have laid snares for others to seize upon them and kill them: (see ver. 2.) just as hunters spread their nets upon mountains and hills in order to catch their prey. Mizpah and Tabor were two noted mountains; the former on the hither side of Jordan, the other on the farther side of it, the same with Gilead. (See Gen. xxxi. 25. 40. 49.)

Ver. 2. And the revolters are profound to make slaughter.] The ringleaders in idolatry and other wickedness lay deep designs to ensnare men's lives. (Compare iv. 4. vi. 9.)

Though I have been a rebuker of them all.] By my prophets. (Compare vi. 5.)

Ver. 3. I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me.] I know him and his doings: Ephraim is equivalent to Israel, as distinct from Judah, in this prophecy, and comprehendeth the ten tribes, ver. 5. 12. 14. iv. 17. vi. 4. 10. vii. 8. 11. viii. 9. and in several other places. Ephraim was the head of the ten tribes, both for its numbers, and because Jeroboam had placed the seat of his kingdom in that tribe. (1 Kings xii. 25.)

Ibid. and Ver. 4. Ephraim, thou committest whoredom:—the spirit of whoredom is in the midst of them.] See iv. 12.

Ver. 5. And the pride of Israel doth testify to his face.] Their indecent behaviour towards God, whose worship they despise, doth discover itself in all their behaviour: and convicts them of the just desert of their sins. (Compare Isa. iii. 9.)

Ver. 6. They shall go with their flocks and herds to seek the Lord.] The sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord; as the Scripture often observes. (See Prov. xv. 8. Isa. i. 15.) This verse is meant of the people of Judah, mentioned in the latter part of the foregoing verse: who, though they did frequent the temple-worship, yet came thither without any true sense of religion: for which the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah particularly reprove them. (See Isa. i. 11, &c. Jer. vii. 3, &c.)

But they shall not find him: he hath withdrawn himself from them.] God is said to hide and withdraw himself, when he will not answer men's prayers, nor afford them seasonable relief in time of need. (See 1 Sam. xxviii. 16. Psal. cii. 2. Lam. iii. 44. and compare Micah iii. 4.)

Ver. 7. They have dealt treacherously against the Lord.] The verb bagad, to deal treacherously, signifies properly a wife's being false to her husband: (see Jer. iii. 20.) from whence it is applied to the sin of idolatry, so often styled spiritual whoredom. (Compare vi. 7. Isa. xlviii. 8. Jer. v. 11.)

For they have begotten strange children.] Strange children may either mean children begotten of heathen women, whom they took to marriage, contrary to the law, (Exod. xxiii. 32. Deut. vii. 2.) or it may signify such children as are bred up in the idolatrous practices of their fathers.

Now shall a month devour them and their portions.] If we understand this verse of Judah (which interpretation the foregoing and following verses favour), the words may be expounded of the invasion made upon Judah by Pekah, king of Israel; of which, see 2 Chron. xxviii. 6. By a month's devouring them, is meant a sudden and speedy destruction. (Compare Zech. xi. 8.)

Ver. 8. Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah, &c.] This imports the sounding an alarm to give notice of the approaching enemy, (compare Joel ii. 1.) which threatens to invade the kingdom of Judah. (See the foregoing verse.) These were towns in the tribe of Benjamin, that lay upon the frontiers of that kingdom.

Cry aloud at Beth-aven.] To give notice of the approach of the enemy. (Compare Isa. x. 30.) Beth-aven may either mean Beth-el, (see iv. 15.) or a town of that name near to it. (See Josh. vii. 2.)

After thee, O Benjamin.] The enemy is just behind thee; or, Let him that is after thee, or behind thee, O Benjamin, prepare himself to battle; i. e. the tribe of Judah, which lay next to Benjamin.

Ver. 9. Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke.] God's judgments shall likewise overtake Israel, or the ten tribes, (see the note on ver. 3.) as well as Judah.

Among the tribes of Israel I have made known that which surely shall be.] I have denounced my judgments against the whole kingdom of Israel, as well as that of Judah, and given them warning that they may escape them by a timely repentance.

Ver. 10. The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound.] They have violated the most sacred laws of God, upon which not only the ordinances of his worship, but likewise the rights and properties of men depend; and are become guilty of the same injustice and confusion with those that remove the ancient bounds and landmarks. (See Deut. xix. 14.) Critics observe, that the note of similitude is sometimes in sense equivalent to a strong affirmation. So Isa. xiii. 6. It shall come as a destruction from the Almighty: i. e. it shall be an apparent instance of the Divine vengeance. John i. 14. We beheld his glory, as of the only-begotten of the Father: i. e. such as proved him to be the only-begotten of the Father.

Therefore have I poured out my wrath upon them like water.] Which shall overwhelm them like a deluge. Great calamities are often compared to the overflowing of water. (See Psal. xxxii. 6. lxix. 1. cxiv. 7. Isa. xxx. 28. Dan. ix. 26.)

Ver. 11. Ephraim is oppressed and broken in judgment.] He is delivered over to oppressors by God's just judgment: such were Pul and Tiglath-pileser, kings of Assyria. (2 Kings xv. 19. 29. compare Deut. xxviii. 33.)

Because he willingly walked after the commandments.] This is commonly explained of Jeroboam's command to his subjects of forsaking the worship of the true God; which they readily complied with. Of the same kind were the statutes of Omri, which are mentioned Micah vi. 16. But the LXX. render it, He walked after vanity; i. e. idolatry: either reading it shave for tsave; or else supposing the latter word put for the former: as there are frequent instances in the Hebrew text, that letters which are near the same sound are often changed one for another.

Ver. 12. Therefore I will be to Ephraim as a moth, &c.] My judgments shall consume both Israel and Judah, as a moth fretteth a garment. (See ver. 3.)

Ver. 13. When Israel saw his sickness, and Judah his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, &c.] When the king of Israel saw himself too weak to contend with Pul king of Assyria, he sent an embassy to make him his ally, and in order to it became his tributary, that his hand might be with him to confirm his kingdom to him; (2 Kings xv. 19.) which king is therefore called king Jareb, i. e. the king that should plead for him, or defend his cause against any that should oppose him. So in like manner shall Ahaz king of Judah implore the assistance of Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria against his enemies. (2 Kings xvi. 7. 2 Chron. xxviii. 16—18.)

Yet could not he heal you, nor cure you of your wound.] Yet neither of these alliances afforded any lasting benefit or succour to those that desired their help: Menahem's son being after a short reign killed by Pekah; and Ahaz being rather distressed than helped by Tiglath-pileser. (2 Chron. xxviii. 21.)

Ver. 14. For I will be to Ephraim as a lion, &c.] I will pour out my judgments upon both kingdoms without mercy. (Compare xiii. 7, 8. Psal. l. 22. Lam. iii. 10.)

Ver. 15. I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face.] I will withdraw myself from them, (see ver. 6.) till by a sincere humiliation they implore my favour. The Chaldee paraphrase expresses the sense thus: I will take away my majestic presence, or Schechinah, from among them, and will return into heaven. Ezekiel describes the destruction of the temple and kingdom, by God's removing his glory from the sanctuary and the city. (See Ezek. x. 4. xi. 23.)

In their affliction they will seek me early.] i. e. Earnestly, with great diligence and assiduity. (See Prov. i. 28. Psal. lxxviii. 34.)

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.

The three first verses of this chapter should have been joined to the fifth, as was observed in the Argument of that chapter: in the following verses God complains of their incorrigibleness, and threatens his judgments as a just consequent of their sins.

Ver. 1. COME, let us return unto the Lord, &c.] A form of supplication which the prophet dictates to them, as very proper for the occasion. (Compare xiv. 2.) The LXX. add the word λέγοντες, saying, to the end of the foregoing verse.

He has torn, and he will heal us, &c.] The same God that punisheth us, can only remove his judgments, and shew us mercy. (Compare Deut. xxxii. 39. 1 Sam. ii. 6.) The expression, he has torn, relates to what is said, v. 14.

Ver. 2. After two days he will revive us; in the third day he will raise us up, &c.] A deliverance from such miseries or calamities, from whence men despair of a recovery, is often represented as restoring them to life after death. (See Psal. xxx. 3. lxxi. 20. lxxxvi. 13.) Particularly the restoration of the Jewish nation is often described, as if it were a new life from the dead: see the note upon Ezek. xxxvii. 11. Two or three in Scripture denotes a small number: (see Isa. xvii. 6. Matt. xviii. 20.) accordingly here it signifies a short space of time. (Compare Luke xiii. 32, 33.) Dr. Wells thinks the words primarily foretell Hezekiah's recovery from his dangerous sickness on the third day: (2 Kings xx. 5.) but it is certain, taking the expression in its true and natural sense, it is a plain prediction of our Lord's resurrection, and referred to by St. Paul as a proof of it, 1 Cor. xv. 4. The prophets when they predicted temporal deliverances, were often carried out beyond themselves and their first subject, if I may so express it, to foretell the more signal mercies relating to the times of the gospel.

Ver. 3. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord.] God will bless our sincere endeavours to know his will with a proportionable success. (Compare Isa. liv. 13.)

His going forth is prepared as the morning, &c.] The comforts of the gospel are here expressed by two things, which are very proper to enliven and exhilarate our spirits, a fair morning, and a kindly season, wherein the earth plentifully yields her increase, by a due intermixture of rain and sunshine. (Compare 2 Sam. xxiii. 4. and see the note upon ii. 22.) Concerning the former and the latter rain, see the note upon Joel ii. 23.

Ver. 4. O Ephraim, what shall I do to thee? O Judah, what shall I do to thee?] Or rather, What shall I do for thee? (See x. 3.) How can I shew either Israel or Judah any mercy or favour, since there is nothing of true or solid goodness to be found in you?

Ver. 5. Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth.] The verb rendered hewed, signifies likewise to cut off, or destroy. (See Isa. li. 9.) The prophets are said to do things, when they declare God's purpose of doing them. (See Jer. i. 10. v. 14. Ezek. xliii. 3.) God's word is described as sharper than a two-edged sword, Heb. iv. 12. Rev. i. 16. because his judgments denounced by his messengers are like the sentence of a judge, which shall be certainly followed with execution.

And thy judgments are as the light when it goeth forth.] Thou wilt make the justice of thy judgments, O God, appear as clear as the light of the rising sun. It is frequent in the Hebrew language to change the discourse from the first to the second or third person.

Ver. 6. For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice, &c.] i. e. Rather than sacrifice; I am better pleased with true goodness, than with the exactest observance of the external duties of religion, unless they proceed from a sincere principle of obedience. (See Micah vi. 6—8.) The Jews use to express comparisons by negatives, or rejecting the thing less worthy: so we are to understand that expression of the prophet Joel, (ii. 13.) Rend your heart, and not your garments: and those words of Christ, (John vi. 27.) Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that which endureth to everlasting life; i. e. for this rather than the former: and that text of St. Peter, (1 Pet. iii. 3, 4.) Whose adorning, let it not be the outward adorning of plaiting the hair, or wearing gold; but let it be the hidden man of the heart.

Ver. 7. But they, like men [Hebrew, like Adam], have transgressed the covenant.] Which I solemnly contracted with them; just as Adam did in Paradise.

There they have dealt treacherously against me.] In that very instance of my loving-kindness, they made me most unsuitable returns. (See v. 7.)

Ver. 8. Gilead is a city of them that work iniquity, and is polluted with blood.] The iniquity which Gilead is here accused of is, probably, idolatry, as appears by comparing this verse with xii. 11. The Hebrew word aven, used in both places, frequently signifies so: and the blood which is said to be polluted with, may mean the blood of their children which they sacrificed to Moloch. Dr. Wells interprets the verse of those Gileadites who assisted Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah, 2 Kings xv. 25. The Hebrew phrase translated here polluted with blood, literally signifies with bloody footsteps, being taken from such who are found with their shoes stained with the blood they have shed. (Compare 1 Kings ii. 5.)

Ver. 9. And as troops of robbers wait for a man, so the company of priests murder in the way by consent.] The word cohanim, priests, does likewise signify princes: (see v. 1.) who are often reproved by the prophets as guilty of great injustice and oppression. (See Ezek. xxii. 27. Zeph. iii. 3.)

For they commit lewdness.] Or, enormity: as the margin reads to a better sense.

Ver. 10. I have seen a horrible thing in the house of Israel.] Such an apostacy from God as cannot be mentioned without horror. (Compare Jer. ii. 11, 12. v. 30.)

There is the whoredom of Ephraim.] This may be understood, both in a literal and a metaphorical sense, for idolatry. (See iv. 12—14.)

Ver. 11. Also, O Judah, he hath set a harvest for thee, &c.] Or, A harvest is appointed for thee; the active is used for the impersonal: (see the note upon Isa. xliv. 18.) i. e. thou hast made thyself ripe for destruction. (Compare Jer. li. 33. Joel iii. 13. Micah iv. 12. Rev. xiv. 15.)

When I returned the captivity of my people.] The sense would be plainer if the words were rendered, When I would have turned away the captivity of my people: when I would, upon their repentance, have averted my judgments, which will end in their captivity. The Hebrew language wants the potential mood, which is supplied by the tenses of the indicative.

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet reproves the sins of the princes and great men of Israel, and denounces judgments against the people in general for their hypocrisy.

Ver. 1. WHEN I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, and the wickedness of Samaria.] When God was just averting his judgment from Israel, the people gave him new provocations, especially the inhabitants of Samaria, the principal seat of the kingdom. (See ver. 5.)

For they commit falsehood; and the thief cometh in, &c.] Both great and small seize other men's properties by the secret methods of fraud, and the open violence of rapine and oppression. (See v. 1. vi. 10.)

Ver. 2. Now their own doings have beset them about.] They shall be taken in their own wickedness, (see Psal. ix. 16. Prov. v. 22.) and their sin shall bring its own punishment with it.

Ver. 3. They make the king glad with their wickedness, &c.] They study to please their kings and great men by complying with the idolatry they have set up. The LXX. read, kings, in the plural number, meaning the succession of kings of Israel from Jeroboam.

And their princes with lies.] Which they speak to please and flatter them. But the word lie, sometimes signifies an idol, and the practice of idolatry, as being set up in direct opposition to the true God. (Compare ver. 13. ii. 4. x. 13. xi. 12. Habak. ii. 18. Rom. i. 25. Rev. xxii. 15.) This sense agrees very well with the scope and design of the place.

Ver. 4. They are all adulterers.] The expression may be metaphorical, implying that they were apostates from God, to whose service they were engaged by the most solemn bond and covenant. (Compare Jer. ix. 2. Matt. xiv. 4. James iv. 4.) If the words be understood literally, the prophet compares the heat of their lust to the flame of an oven; as it follows.

Who ceaseth from raising after he hath kneaded the dough, &c.] When an oven is sufficiently heated, the baker doth not raise any more fire, but thinks what he has made enough to keep the oven hot, till the dough be fit to put into the oven. Some render the latter part of the sentence thus, Who ceaseth from waking, or watching (his oven): to the same sense with that of ver. 6. Their baker sleepeth all the night.

Ver. 5. In the day of our king the princes have made him sick with bottles of wine.] Or, With being overheated through wine: so the word chamath signifies, Habak. ii. 15. The day of the king's birth or inauguration was kept with riot and excess.

He stretched out his hand to scorners.] He encouraged mean and loose people to converse too familiarly with him, forgetting his rank and dignity.

Ver. 6. For they have made ready their heart like an oven, while they lie in wait, &c.] This verse pursues the metaphor begun in ver. 4. As the baker when he has thoroughly heated his oven, if he lays himself to sleep in the night, finds all in a flame in the morning: so the great men of the land kindle evil desires in their hearts, and at the first opportunity their hidden designs break out like a flame into open action.

Ver. 7. They are all hot as an oven, and have devoured their judges: all their kings are fallen.] The flame of civil discord is spread among the people in general: this hath been the destruction both of the inferior magistrates and of their kings too; an anarchy continuing for eleven years after the death of Jeroboam the Second; and afterward his son Zechariah, and his successors Shallum and Pekahiah, being slain by conspiracies formed against them. (2 Kings xv. 10. 14. 25.)

There is none among them that calleth upon me.] And yet these confusions have not brought either kings or people to a due humiliation for their sins.

Ver. 8. Ephraim hath mixed himself among the people.] Whereas Israel was by God's institution to be his peculiar people, Deut. vii. 6. he has mixed or joined himself with idolaters; (see Psal. cvi. 35.) and he shall have a just punishment for his sins, he shall be carried away captive to dwell among them. (See ix. 3. Jer. xvi. 12, 13.)

Ephraim is a cake not turned.] Baked only on one side: i. e. serving God by halves, and halting between his service and the worship of idols. The Chaldee paraphrast interprets it, Before it is baked on both sides, it is devoured by its greedy enemies; the metaphor being taken from the ravenousness of a hungry stomach. This sense agrees very well with what follows.

Ver. 9. Strangers have devoured his strength, and (or yet) he knoweth it not.] The Syrians, in the time of Jehoahaz, reduced them very low: (see 2 Kings xiii. 7.) afterward they became tributaries to Pul king of Assyria, (2 Kings xv. 20.) and at length were carried captive by Shalmaneser, (2 Kings xvii.) And yet all these afflictions do not make them sensible of the ill state of their affairs, and that the hand of God is against them. (See ii. 8. and the following verse: Isa. xlii. 25.)

Yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him.] He still declines in strength and power, like a man worn out with age, and ready to give up the ghost.

Ver. 10. And the pride of Israel testifieth to his face.] See v. 3.

And they do not return to the Lord their God, &c.] See ver. 9.

Ver. 11. Ephraim is a silly dove without a heart: they call to Egypt, they go to Assyria.] Like an unwary dove which falls into the snare that is laid for it; so the Israelites betake themselves for refuge to their enemies: sometimes they apply themselves to the king of Egypt for succour; at other times they trust to the aid of the Assyrians. (See 2 Kings xv. 19. xvii. 4.)

Ver. 12. When they shall go, I will spread a net for them; I will bring them down as the fowls of heaven.] Whithersoever they betake themselves for safety, they shall no more escape than birds can escape the snares of the fowler. (See the foregoing verse.)

I will chastise them as their congregation hath heard.] I will bring those calamities upon them, which I have denounced in my laws against the whole people of Israel, whenever they forsake me. (See Lev. xxvi. Deut. xxviii. compared with 2 Kings xvii. 13, 14.) The Chaldee paraphrast renders the latter part of the verse thus, I will chastise them because they have followed their own counsels: as if he had read in the original La Asatham, instead of Laadatham. (Compare x. 6. xi. 6.)

Ver. 13. Though I have redeemed them, yet they have spoken lies against me.] Though I have redeemed them out of Egypt, (see Micah vi. 4.) and afforded them many other signal deliverances, yet they have not given me the glory; but have represented me by their golden calves, and changed my truth into a lie, Rom. i. 25. (See the note upon ver. 3.)

Ver. 14. And they have not cried to me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds.] When they were bemoaning their calamities, as sick men bewail themselves upon a bed of sickness, yet they did not call upon me heartily and sincerely. (Compare Jer. iii. 10. Psal. lxxviii. 34. 36.)

They assemble themselves for corn and wine, and they rebel against me.] When they assembled themselves to deprecate a famine, they still retained the same disobedient temper towards me.

Ver. 15. Though I have bound and strengthened their arms, yet do they imagine mischief against me.] Though I have bound up their wounds, and given them new strength and vigour, yet they are continually devising some new idolatrous invention, whereby they may dishonour me.

Ver. 16. They return, but not to the Most High; they are like a deceitful bow.] Their conversion is only outward, not inward and sincere: they are like an ill-contrived bow, which never directs the arrow to the mark. (Compare Psal. lxxviii. 57.)

Their princes shall fall by the sword for the rage of their tongue.] For the dishonour they have done me by blasphemous speeches against me. (See ver. 13.)

This shall be their derision in the land of Egypt.] Their blasphemies and other enormities shall be a just cause of their reproach to them, when they are exiles in Egypt, whither many of them fled or were carried away captive. (See ix. 3. 6. compare viii. 13. and see the notes upon Ezek. xxxvi. 20.)

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.

God's judgments are denounced both against Judah and Israel, for their idolatries and other impieties.

Ver. 1. SET a trumpet to thy mouth: he shall come as an eagle against the house of the Lord.] Give notice of the approaching enemy; (see v. 8.) who is coming with speed and fierceness, like a bird of prey, (see Deut. xxviii. 49.) against the city and temple of Jerusalem. By the house of the Lord may be meant God's people in general, whom he formerly took a peculiar care of as his own family. (Compare ix. 15.) This may probably denote Sennacherib's invasion, 2 Kings xviii. 17.

Ver. 2. Israel shall cry unto me, My God, we know thee.] Israel is placed in the Hebrew the last word in the verse: so Dr. Wells joins it to the next verse, and understands this verse of Judah; who shall cry unto God as their protector, in the times of their fears, when the invasion mentioned in the foregoing verse threatened them. (See v. 15.) If we understand the words of Israel, according as ours and most other translators render them, the sense of them is, that the ten tribes still acknowledged the true God to be their God, and pretended that they had not forsaken him, but worshipped him at Dan and Beth-el, though under sensible representations: as we see Jehu still pretended a great zeal for the Lord, at the same time that he worshipped the golden calves, 1 Kings x. 16. 29.

Ver. 3. Israel has cast off the thing that is good, &c.] Whereas they have really cast off the true worship of God, and with that every thing that is good: and as a punishment of their impiety, their enemy the king of Assyria shall pursue them like a wild beast, and they shall become a prey to him. (Compare Psal. cxliii. 3. Lam. iii. 66. v. 5.) Dr. Wells reads the verse according to the division he has made of this and the foregoing verse: As for Israel, Israel hath cast off the thing that is good, &c.

Ver. 4. They have set up kings, but not by me, &c.] Shallum, and Menahem, and Pekah, usurped the kingdom by murder and treason; (2 Kings xv. 13, 14. 25.) not by any declaration of my will, as Jeroboam and Jehu had done, or consulting me by any prophet.

Of their silver and gold have they made themselves idols, &c.] They have abused their wealth to idolatry, which will be the occasion of their destruction. (See ii. 8.)

Ver. 5. Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off, &c.] As the people of Samaria (see ver. 6.) have cast off that which is good, (ver. 3.) so the calf which they worship shall not protect or deliver them from the evils coming upon them, now my anger is kindled against them.

How long will it be ere they attain to innocency?] I shall no longer shew any patience towards them, since it is in vain to expect any reformation from them.

Ver. 6. From Israel was it also.] This calf, as well as that made in the wilderness, (Exod. xxxii.) was an invention of the Israelites, not borrowed from any of their neighbouring idolaters.

But the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces.] And carried for a present to the king of Assyria, x. 5, 6. The sense would run better, if the words were rendered, Therefore the calf of Samaria, &c. so the particle ki often signifies. The calf of Samaria denotes the calf of Beth-el, in the kingdom of Samaria. (Compare x. 5.) Samaria being the chief seat of the kingdom of Israel, is often put for that kingdom. (See 1 Kings xiii. 33. xxi. 1. 2 Kings v. 3. xxiii. 19.)

Ver. 7. For they have sowed the wind, and shall reap the whirlwind.] A proverbial expression, to signify, that as men's works are, so must their reward be: that they who sow iniquity shall reap vanity, Prov. xxii. 8. their labour shall be fruitless, or shall turn to their hurt and damage. (See Eccles. v. 16. and x. 13. of this prophecy.) All the pains the kings of Israel and their subjects take to enrich themselves, and to strengthen their kingdom, being built upon the foundation of apostacy and idolatry, shall turn to no better account than countrymen expect from a blasted crop of corn: and whatever advantage they make, it shall at last be a prey to foreigners, to the kings of Syria and Assyria. (See 2 Kings xiii. 3, 4. xv. 29. xvii. 6.)

Ver. 8. Israel is swallowed up.] i. e. Shall as certainly be carried captive by the Assyrians, as if he was already gone into captivity. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 9.)

Now shall they be among the gentiles as a vessel wherein there is no pleasure.] They shall be despised as a vessel or utensil that is broken and become useless. (Compare Jer. xxii. 28. xlviii. 38.)

Ver. 9. For they are gone up to Assyria, &c.] To engage Pul, king of Assyria, to be their confederate, (2 Kings xv. 19.)

A wild ass alone by himself.] As a wild ass, which is altogether untractable, and will go its own way. (See Job xxxix. 5. Jer. ii. 24.) The particle as is frequently understood. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 8.)

Ephraim has hired lovers.] Procured foreign allies with great expense, and depends upon them for succour and protection, and not upon God. (See ii. 10. v. 13. xii. 1. Jer. xxii. 20. 22.)

Ver. 10. Yea, though they have hired [allies] among the nations, now will I gather them.] I will make their own allies turn their enemies, particularly the Assyrians. (See the note upon Ezek. xvi. 37.)

And they shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes.] They shall feel the burdens and oppressions laid upon them by the king of Assyria, who styles himself king of kings, as having kings and princes his tributaries. (See the note upon Isa. x. 8.) The word menat signifies in a little time here, as it does Hag. ii. 6.

Ver. 11. Because Ephraim hath made altars to sin, altars shall be to him to sin.] Or, A punishment for his sin: he shall fall from one degree of wickedness and idolatry to another; and his sin shall bring its own punishment along with it, (compare x. 8. Deut. iv. 28. Jer. xvi. 13.) and be the occasion of bringing my severest judgments upon him.

Ver. 12. I have written to him the great things of my law, but they were accounted as a strange thing.] That law which I gave them by Moses, containing rules excellent in themselves, and such as would have made them great in the eyes of their neighbours, (Deut. iv. 6. 8.) they have disregarded, as if it had neither reason nor authority.

Ver. 13. They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it; but the Lord accepteth them not.] Their sacrifices are not acceptable to God, being not brought with a religious mind. (See cv. 6. ix. 4. Amos iv. 4.) The Chaldee paraphrast renders the expression Zibche Hababai, the sacrifices of mine offerings, as if it meant the sacrifices of extortion, such as were gotten by bribes and rapine, which still adds to the wickedness of the offerers. (Compare Amos ii. 8.)

Now will he remember their iniquity.] See ix. 9. Amos viii. 7.

They shall return into Egypt.] As into a second bondage there, which God threatens the Jews as one of the severest judgments he could inflict upon them. (Deut. xxviii. 68. see vii. 16. ix. 3. 6. of this prophecy.) Or the expression may denote, that they shall go into a state of captivity and bondage, as bad as that which they suffered in Egypt. Going into Egypt was a proverbial speech for extreme misery. (See the note upon Zech. v. 11.)

Ver. 14. Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples.] To his idols, at Dan and Beth-el.

And Judah hath multiplied fenced cities, &c.] Judah puts greater confidence in their fortifications than in God's protection: but God's judgments shall destroy them as surely as if a fire had been kindled in them. (Compare Amos i. 4, &c.) God's vengeance is often compared to fire. (See the note upon Ezek. xxx. 8.)

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.

The captivity of the ten tribes is foretold as a judgment for their manifold sins.

Ver. 1. REJOICE not, O Israel, for joy, like other people.] The joy here mentioned may properly mean those rejoicings which were commonly made among all people at the end of harvest, when the gentiles offered sacrifices of thanksgiving for the plenty they enjoyed. The prophet tells the Israelites they had more highly offended by their apostacy, than the gentiles did by their ignorance. (Compare Ezek. xvi. 47, 48.)

For thou hast gone a whoring from thy God, thou hast loved a reward from every corn-floor.] Thou hast broken the covenant God made with thee, by serving other gods, (see iv. 12. v. 4. 7.) and hast offered the first-fruits, or tithes of thy increase, to idols, as an acknowledgment that the plenty thou enjoyest was their gift. (See ii. 12. Jer. xliv. 17.)

Ver. 2. The floor and the wine-press shall not feed them, &c.] I will take away their plenty of corn and wine, as a just punishment of their ingratitude. (See ii. 9. 12.)

Ver. 3. They shall not dwell in the Lord's land: but Ephraim shall return to Egypt.] God will turn them out of that inheritance he gave to their fathers, and they shall be carried into captivity and bondage a second time into Egypt. (See viii. 13.)

And they shall eat unclean things in Assyria.] Their circumstances in captivity will not permit them to observe the rules of that law relating to unclean meats, and they will be forced to partake of such meats as have been offered to idols. (Compare Ezek. iv. 13. Dan. i. 8.) The ten tribes were carried captive into the dominions of Assyria, 2 Kings xvii. 6. (Compare xi. 11. of this prophecy.)

Ver. 4. They shall not offer wine-offerings to the Lord, &c.] A more particular explanation of that threatening denounced, iii. 4. that they should be without a sacrifice: they should have no opportunity in their captivity to offer meat-offerings, or drink-offerings to God, as they did upon the high-places, or in their idolatrous temples; (see Amos iv. 4, 5.) and sometimes, perhaps, in the temple at Jerusalem. (See ver. 15.) They themselves shall be in the condition of mourners for the dead, and by that means be unqualified to offer any thing to God; nor will their offerings be acceptable. (See Deut. xxvi. 14.)

All that eat thereof shall be polluted.] As those are who come near the dead, (Numb. xix. 11.) who are thereby unqualified to attend upon God's service. (See Lev. xxi. 1. 6.)

For their bread for their souls shall not come into the house of the Lord.] The offerings they make for the expiation of souls (see Lev. xvii. 11.) shall not be fit to be brought into the house of the Lord, and the temple itself shall be left desolate.

Ver. 5. What will ye do in the solemn day, in the day of the feast of the Lord.] Ye shall have no opportunity of observing any of your solemn feasts in your captivity. (See ii. 11.)

Ver. 6. For, lo, they are gone because of destruction: Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them.] A great many of the ten tribes went into Egypt for fear of the captivity threatened by Shalmaneser: (see vii. 16. viii. 13.) accordingly the prophecies, which foretell their restoration, mention their return from Egypt. (See xi. 11. Isa. xi. 11. xxvii. 12. Zech. x. 10, 11.) The prophet threatens those that went down thither, that they should have no better a fate than their brethren, who were carried away into Assyria; but they should die there, and never see their native country any more.

Egypt shall gather them up.] Or, Gather them, as the word is translated, Ezek. xxix. 5. It signifies in both places the same with their being buried, expressed in other places by being gathered to their people.

The pleasant places for their silver.] Or, Places desirable for their silver; either as being repositories for their treasure or their plate, or as being adorned with silver.

Nettles shall possess them.] They shall be uninhabited and fall to ruin. (Compare x. 8. Isa. xxxii. 13. xxxiv. 13.)

Ver. 7. The days of visitation are come—Israel shall know it.] God's judgments (see ver. 9.) upon the ten tribes shall be so evident, that the most incredulous shall not be able to deny it.

The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad.] The false prophets (see ver. 8.) that pretend to speak by the Spirit of God, and foretell nothing but peace, shall be convinced of their folly and madness, when they see things fall out otherwise than they had foretold. (See Jer. vi. 14. xxii. 16, 17. Ezek. xiii. 10. Micah ii. 11. Zeph. iii. 4.)

For the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred.] God has delivered this people up to those delusions, as a just punishment of their many sins, and the great hatred they have against God and his worship. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 8. The watchman of Ephraim was with my God: but the prophet is a snare of a fowler, &c.] The true prophet, like a watchman sent by God, gave warning to Israel of their approaching calamities. (See Jer. vi. 17. Ezek. iii. 17. xxxiii. 2. Micah vii. 4.) But the words of the false prophet are like a snare laid on purpose to entrap men into mischief and destruction: (see v. 1.) and his false prophecies he utters purely out of hatred to God and his worship, and to deter those that hearken to him from attending upon God's service at the temple.

Ver. 9. They have deeply corrupted themselves, as in the day of Gibeah.] The men of Gibeah are described in the same characters as those of Sodom are: (compare Judg. xix. 22. with Gen. xix. 4.) to which they added the villany of forcing the Levite's concubine, (ibid. ver. 25, &c.)

Ver. 10. I found Israel as grapes in the wilderness, &c.] After I had miraculously redeemed Israel out of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness, their obedience was as grateful to me as early grapes, or the first ripe figs, are to a thirsty traveller. (Compare Isa. xxviii. 4. Micah vii. 1.) This relates to their first entering into covenant with God, and their promises of a ready obedience. (See Exod. xix. 8. xxiv. 3. Deut. v. 27—29. and compare ii. 15. xi. 1. of this prophecy.)

But they went to Baal-Peor, and separated themselves unto that shame.] The Hebrew word, yinnazeru, were separated, alludes to the order of the Nazarites, who were in a peculiar manner set apart for God's service: (see the note upon Amos ii. 11.) such as were Samson and John Baptist: whereas these dedicated themselves to the service of that filthy idol Baal-Peor, that shame or shameful thing, as it is expressed Jer. xi. 13. Bosheth, shame, was a nickname for Baal: so Jerubbaal is called Jerubbesheth, 2 Sam. xi. 21.

And their abominations were according as they loved.] They followed their own imaginations in the several idolatries which they committed. (See Numb. xv. 39. Deut. xxix. 19. Amos iv. 5.)

Ver. 11. As for Ephraim, their glory shall fly away as a bird, &c.] The multitude of their people, in which they pride themselves, (see x. 13.) shall vanish out of sight like a bird: (compare Prov. xxiii. 4.) their women shall not be so fruitful as they have been heretofore.

Ver. 12. Though they bring up their children, yet will I bereave them, that there shall not be a man left.] If after the hazards of conception and childbearing, they should breed up their children to man's estate, yet will I make them childless; the sword without, and famine and pestilence within, shall make an entire riddance of them and their posterity. (See Deut. xxviii. 62. xxxii. 25. Jer. xvi. 3.)

Yea, woe also to them when I depart from them.] They shall feel what miseries shall befal them, when I withdraw my protection from them. (See Deut. xxxi. 17. 2 Kings xvii. 18. 23.)

Ver. 13. Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus, is planted in a pleasant place,] The situation of Ephraim, and particularly of the royal city of Samaria situate in that tribe, is as pleasant as that of Tyre. (See Ezek. xxvii. 3.) But though Tyre held out against the siege of Shalmaneser, as Josephus relates, (Antiq. lib. ix. cap. ult.) yet Ephraim and the whole kingdom of Israel (see v. 3.) shall be subdued by him, and many of their children shall be a prey to his murdering sword.

Ver. 14. What wilt thou give them? give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts.] The prophet speaks as if he were in suspense, their condition being so desperate, that nothing could relieve them. But, saith he, rather let their women be barren, than bring forth children only for the slaughter. (See the foregoing verse, and compare Luke xxiii. 29.)

Ver. 15. All their wickedness is in Gilgal; (see iv. 15.) there I hated them.] Or, Therefore I hated them: so the particle sham sometimes signifies. (See Noldius, p. 766.)

I will drive them out of my house, I will love them no more.] Compare i. 6. I will not any longer treat them as my domestics, but debar them of the privilege of living in my land, (ver. 3.) of coming to my temple, (ver. 4, 5.) or enjoying any marks of my favour, (ver. 17.)

All their princes are revolters.] Their rulers and magistrates revolt from my worship, and break all the rules of justice and honesty. (Compare iv. 8. Isa. i. 23. Ezek. xxii. 27. Micah iii. 11. Zech. iii. 3.)

Ver. 16. Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit.] They are like a tree that is blasted and dead at root, and only fit to be cut down.

Yea, though they bring forth, &c.] See ver. 13.

Ver. 17. My God will cast them away, &c.] He will no more own them for his people, but leave them to wander and be dispersed among the other nations. They were afterward called by the name of the Διασπορὰ, or dispersed among the gentiles. (See John vii. 35. James i. 1. 1 Pet. i. 1.)

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet continues to threaten destruction to the ten tribes and their idols, but withal exhorts them to repentance and reformation.

Ver. 1. ISRAEL is an empty vine, he bringeth forth fruit unto himself.] The Hebrew word bokek is capable of two contrary significations; it may either signify empty, or emptying (i. e. casting) the fruit it giveth, the sense which our translators follow: or else it may signify nourishing; in which sense the LXX. and Vulgar Latin understand it, and which Dr. Pocock confirms from the use of the word in Arabic: and then the words will import, that though Israel, like a flourishing vine, abounded with plenty of all things, yet he brought forth no fruit unto God, but abused his blessings to the encouragement of sin and idolatry; as it follows in the next words.

According to the goodness of the land they have made goodly images.] See ii. 8. viii. 4.

Ver. 2. Their heart is divided; now shall they be found faulty.] They think to divide their duty and affections between God and idols. (See 1 Kings xviii. 21.) This will manifestly appear in the punishment of their sin, when God shall destroy all the monuments of their idolatry. (See ver. 5, 6. 8.)

Ver. 3. We have no king, because we fear not the Lord.] This verse relates to the time of anarchy, or an interregnum, which continued for eight or nine years, between the murder of Pekah and the settlement of Hoshea in the throne. (Compare ver. 7. 15. and see Archbishop Usher's Annals, ad A. M. 3265. 3274.)

What then should a king do to us?] Or rather, for us, as the phrase signifies, vi. 4. i. e. a king cannot protect us, if God be against us.

Ver. 4. For they have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant.] This may either relate to their breaking their solemn covenant with God; (see v. 7.) or their treachery towards their kings, against whom they had formed several conspiracies. (See 2 Kings xv. 10. 14. 25. 30.)

Thus judgment springeth up like hemlock in the furrows of the field.] Injustice being publicly countenanced, encourages the same practices in private men's dealings: thus, instead of judgment and fair dealing, injustice increases every where, as bitter and poisonous weeds grow up in a field, where there is no care taken to destroy them. (Compare Amos v. 7. vi. 12.) The word rosh is sometimes translated gall, and in other places hemlock; and signifies some bitter poisonous herb expressed by a root of bitterness, Heb. xii. 15.

Ver. 5. The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear because of the calves of Beth-aven, &c.] Samaria here signifies the kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital city. (See viii. 5, 6.) The inhabitants of that kingdom shall be seized with fear and confusion when the calf of Beth-el (see iv. 15.) shall be carried away as a present to Shalmaneser, (ver. 6.) when he made the king and kingdom of Israel tributary. (2 Kings xvii. 3.) The Jewish writers have a tradition, that the golden calf at Dan was taken away by Tiglath-pileser, when he subdued Galilee, (2 Kings xv. 29.) and the other at Beth-el by order of Shalmaneser. The plural number of the word calves, is an enallage for the singular; for the same idol is in this verse spoken of in the singular number. (Compare xiii. 2.)

For the people thereof shall mourn over it, and the priests thereof that rejoiced on it, &c.] Dr. Pocock observes, that the word yagilu, translated rejoiced, is also used in a contrary signification, as several Hebrew words are, for mourning, or being sorrowful; in which sense it is probably used, Job iii. 32. Psal. ii. 11. and then the sentence here may be word for word translated, and the priests thereof shall sorrow over it. Both priests and people shall mourn and be sorrowful, when they see its glory departed from it, (1 Sam. iv. 21.) and it is no more the object of religious worship. The word kemarim, rendered priests, is translated idolatrous priests, 2 Kings xxiii. 5. but the original word is retained in our translation of Zeph. i. 5. which are all the places in which it occurs in the Scriptures. From this word the Latin camillus is derived, which in the primary signification denotes a priest.

Ver. 6. It shall be carried to Assyria, for a present to king Jareb.] King Jareb is a king that can plead their cause, and take them into his protection, as the phrase is explained, v. 13. there it probably means Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, unto whom Menahem betook himself for safety: and here it seems to denote Shalmaneser, who took the Israelites into his protection by making them tributaries. (See the note on ver. 5.)

Ephraim shall receive shame, &c.] They shall see the unsuccessfulness of Jeroboam's policy in setting up of this idolatrous worship, and their complying with it; and shall be ashamed to find that the idol in which they trusted, could not defend itself. (Compare xi. 6.)

Ver. 7. As for Samaria, her king is cut off, &c.] This may probably be understood of Pekah, who was slain by Hoshea. (See ver. 3.) The king of Israel is styled king of Samaria, 1 Kings xxi. 1, 2. 2 Kings i. 3. as being the capital city of the kingdom.

Ver. 8. The high places of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed.] Aven is the same with Beth-aven, ver. 5. The idolatrous temples were usually placed upon mountains: (see iv. 13.) so was that at Beth-el, called the high places, the plural number being often used in the Hebrew to express a thing spoken of to be eminent or remarkable in its kind. The idolatry here practised is called the sin of Israel, as being such in an eminent manner. (See Deut. ix. 21.) So Jeroboam is said to make Israel to sin, by setting up this idolatrous worship. (See 1 Kings xii. 30. xiii. 34.)

The thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars.] Such usually growing among ruins. (See ix. 6.)

And they shall say to the mountains, Cover us, &c.] The words express the great consternation of the wicked, when God's judgments overtake them; whose guilt prompts them to cast about where to hide themselves. (Compare Isa. ii. 19. Luke xxiii. 30. Rev. vi. 16.)

Ver. 9. O Israel, thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah.] See ix. 9. Some render it, More than in the days of Gibeah.

There they stood.] The other tribes set themselves in array of battle against the Benjamites, who refused to deliver up the men who had been guilty of so much lewdness. (See Judg. xx. 13.)

The battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them.] The other tribes did not at first get the better of the Benjamites, though at last they cut all of them off but six hundred. (See Judg. xx. 46, 47.) But if the same thing were to be done now, you would not have the zeal or courage to encounter any such offenders.

Ver. 10. It is in my desire that I should chastise them.] I shall take pleasure in punishing them for their sins, and shall now rejoice over them to destroy them, Deut. xxviii. 63.

And the people shall be gathered against them.] Either the Assyrians, whose alliance they formerly sought after; or those people whose idolatry they had complied with. (See Ezek. xvi. 37.)

When they shall bind themselves in their two furrows.] The LXX. give a much plainer and easier sense of the words, who follow the marginal reading of the Hebrew, and render it, When I shall chastise them for their two iniquities; viz. the calves of Dan and Beth-el. (Compare ver. 8.)

Ver. 11. And Ephraim is as a heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn; but I passed over her fair neck, &c.] The sense would run easier if we read it, Ephraim is as a heifer that is teachable—so I passed over her fair neck. I caused Ephraim to ride, Judah did plough, and Jacob did break the clods. God sets forth the gentle and easy methods he used to bring both Israel and Judah to a sense of their duty; treating them with gentleness, as a husbandman does young bullocks or horses, stroking them, and encouraging them, till they are accustomed to the yoke: then he gave them his law, and prescribed them rules for the several duties and offices of life, and expected they should bring forth fruit answerable to the several helps and advantages which he had given them. Men's improvements in grace are often compared to the manuring of ground, in order to make it fruitful: so the church is styled God's vineyard, Isa. v. 9. and his husbandry, 1 Cor. iii. 9.

Ver. 12. Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy.] Employ yourselves in works of justice and righteousness; and by God's mercy you may still hope to reap the fruits of your repentance and reformation.

Break up your fallow ground, &c.] You have lain a long while uncultivated, so it is time for you to repent, and bring forth the fruits of good living; and you shall not fail of God's blessing upon your sincere endeavours, to make you more and more fruitful.

Ver. 13. Ye have ploughed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity, &c.] As your thoughts and designs have been evil, such has been the fruit and reward of your labours. (Compare viii. 7.)

Ye have eaten the fruit of lies.] You have received the just rewards of your idolatry. (See the note on vii. 3.)

Because thou didst trust in thy way, and in the multitude of thy mighty men.] See ix. 11. xiii. 15. This way may signify that way of worship which thou hast devised: so the word is taken, Amos viii. 14. (See the note there.)

Ver. 14. Therefore shall a tumult arise among thy people, &c.] This points at the taking Samaria, after a three years' siege, by Shalmaneser king of Assyria; which put a final period to the kingdom of Israel. (See 2 Kings xvii. 6.)

As Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle.] The prophet compares the destruction of Samaria with another terrible desolation, which the same Shalmaneser, called here Shalman, made at Beth-arbel, a place in Armenia (famous afterward for the defeat of Darius, the last king of Persia, by Alexander), where all the inhabitants were put to the sword, without any distinction either of sex or age. (Compare xiii. 16.)

Ver. 15. So shall Beth-el do unto you because of your great wickedness.] The idolatry set up at Beth-el shall be in like manner the cause of your ruin. The Hebrew reads, Because of the evil of your evil: that language expresses the greatness of any thing by repeating the word over again. The same expression is used by St. Paul, (Rom. vii. 13.) That sin might become exceeding sinful; i. e. hereby it might appear how full of evil our natural corruption is.

In a morning shall the king of Israel be cut off.] Suddenly shall Hoshea be deprived of his kingdom, and an end put to the whole state and government of Israel. The expression in the Hebrew denotes the first appearing of the morning, to signify that it shall be done early and without delay: so we read, Psal. xlvi. 3. God shall help her, and that right early: where the Hebrew reads, At the appearing of the morning: and again, Psal. xc. 14. cxliii. 8. The same thing is elsewhere expressed by rising early, Jer. vii. 13, xxxv. 15. The expression here may allude to the destruction of Pharaoh and his army when the morning appeared, Exod. xiv. 27.

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.

A continuation of threatenings against Israel, but yet with promises of shewing them mercy.

Ver. 1. WHEN Israel was a child, then I loved him.] When this people was in a state of childhood, i. e. in the patriarchal times, and during their continuance under the Egyptian bondage, from whence I delivered them.

And called my son out of Egypt.] Israel is called God's son, and his first-born, Exod. iv. 22, 23. and therein was an eminent figure of the Messias, in whom all God's promises are fulfilled. This prophecy is applied by St. Matthew, ii. 15. to our Lord's return out of Egypt, after his flight thither in his infancy: and the literal sense of the words does more properly belong to him than to Israel; which is observable in many other prophecies, which can but improperly be applied to those of whom they were at first spoken, and taking them in their true and genuine sense, are only fulfilled in Christ. (See particularly Psal. xxii. 16. 18.)

Ver. 2. As they called them, so they went from him.] Or, The more they called them, or they were called (the active being often used for the impersonal), so much the more they went from him. (See Noldius, p. 436.) The more earnestly the prophets called upon them to cleave steadfastly to the true God, (see ver. 7.) the more they were bent to depart from him to the worship of idols.

They sacrifice to Baalim.] See the note upon ii. 13. and xiii. 1.

Ver. 3. I taught Ephraim also to go, taking him by the arms.] In this time of his childhood (ver. 1.) I bare him, and carried him as a man doth bear his son, Deut. i. 31. Or, As a mother doth teach her child to go, leading it by the arms; protecting him, and providing for him in the wilderness. (See Deut. viii. 2.)

But they knew not that I healed them.] They considered not (see ii. 8. vii. 9.) that the health and safety they enjoyed was owing to me. (Compare Exod. xv. 26. xxiii. 25.)

Ver. 4. I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love.] I made use of those means of drawing them to myself, which were most proper to work upon their reason and ingenuity; viz. the methods of loving-kindness and good-will towards them.

I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws.] I removed the yoke or bondage of Egypt from off their heads. (Compare Lev. xxvi. 13.)

And I laid meat unto them.] I provided manna to sustain them in the wilderness.

Ver. 5. He shall not return into Egypt, but the Assyrian shall be his king, &c.] Though many of them have gone into Egypt for refuge against the invasion of Shalmaneser, (see viii. 13. ix. 3.) yet they shall not have any farther opportunity of betaking themselves thither, but the king of Assyria shall carry them away captive; because they refused to return to me, notwithstanding so many calls I had given them in order to their repentance.

Ver. 6. And the sword shall abide on his cities, and consume his branches, and devour them.] Both cities and villages shall be destroyed by the conqueror's sword. The word translated branches, signifies also bars; and may denote the valiant men that should defend them against the enemy's forces; so the Chaldee understands it, and in this sense the word is used, Isa. xvi. 6. Jer. xlviii. 30.

Because of their own counsels.] See x. 6.

Ver. 7. And my people are bent to backsliding from me.] See iv. 16. The original word meshubah, is the same which Jeremy often uses, speaking of this subject. (See Jer. iii. 6. 8, &c. viii. 15. xiv. 7. and compare xiv. 4. of this prophecy.) The words are thus translated by some, My people are in suspense because of their backsliding from me. Either they are in continual anxiety because of my displeasure; or else they are irresolute, and halt between God and their idols. (Compare x. 2.)

Though they called them to the Most High, none at all would exalt him.] This may relate to the several calls God gave them by his prophets. (See ver. 2.) Dr. Wells understands it of the invitation Hezekiah made to the people of Israel to join with him in celebrating the Passover, which some of the ten tribes accepted of, but others refused, (2 Chron. xxx. 1. 11.)

Ver. 8. How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee up, Israel?] God's mercies are here pathetically described as contending with his justice, to shew that he does not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men, Lam. iii. 33.

How shall I make thee as Admah? &c.] How shall I give thee up to be a perpetual desolation? (Compare Deut. xxix. 23.)

My heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together.] Thus God's compassion towards sinners is elsewhere expressed by the sounding or yearning of his bowels, Isa. lxiii. 15. Jer. xxxi. 20. a metaphor taken from the natural affection which parents have for their children.

Ver. 9. I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not return to destroy Ephraim: for I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee.] I will not deal with them like an enraged enemy, who thinks of nothing but satisfying his revenge: I will not, like such a one, return to destroy, i. e. make a second destruction, so to cut off those that escape the first fury of my vengeance: I do not give way to a blind rage, as men often do; but, as God, am unchangeable, and will still fulfil my gracious promises made to Abraham and his people, of being their God. (Compare Mal. iii. 6.)

I will not enter into the city.] A second time, in order to make an utter destruction.

Ver. 10. They shall walk after the Lord; he shall roar like a lion.] They shall follow God's call, and comply with his commands; when he shall convert them by an efficacious call of his providence, or powerful preaching of the gospel. God's voice is elsewhere compared to the roaring of a lion, because of the terror which accompanies it. (See Joel iii. 16. Amos i. 8. Rev. x. 3.)

When he shall roar, then the children shall tremble from the west.] The word tremble describes the motion which a bird makes with her wings when it flies; see the following verse. So the sense is, That at this efficacious call of God, his children, the remnant of Israel, who shall be accounted his children, and heirs of the promises made to their fathers, (see i. 10.) shall come in haste from the several places of their dispersions, and particularly from the western parts of the world; (see Zech. viii. 7.) called the sea in the original, and expressed in Isaiah, by the islands of the sea. (See Isa. xi. 11. xxiv. 14. and the notes there.)

Ver. 11. They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt [i. e. fly with haste; see the foregoing note], as a dove out of the land of Assyria.] Great numbers of Jews were exiles in Egypt and Assyria: so when the restoration of the Jews is spoken of, Egypt and Assyria are mentioned as countries from whence a considerable number of them should return. (See the note upon ix. 3. 6.)

And I will place them in their houses.] As doves naturally resort to the houses they are used to, (see Isa. lx. 18.) so shall these return and settle in their own native country. (See the note upon Ezek. xxviii. 25.)

Ver. 12. Ephraim compasseth me about with lies, &c.] In several translations this verse begins the twelfth chapter, as of right it ought to do: for the reproof which God gives here to Israel belongeth to the subject of the following chapter; and sets forth the ten tribes abounding in all manner of idolatry and wickedness. (See the note upon vii. 3.)

But Judah yet ruleth with his God, and is faithful with the saints.] Judah keeps close to that kingly government which God settled in David's family, and faithfully observes those ordinances which God gave to his saints by Moses; (see Deut. xxxiii. 3.) by which they were to be distinguished to be a holy nation, and God's peculiar people. This relates to the times of Hezekiah.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet reproves both Israel and Judah for their impieties, and puts them in mind of God's favours to their father Jacob, for which they made most ungrateful returns.

Ver. 1. EPHRAIM feedeth on wind, and followeth the east wind.] A proverbial expression to signify labour in vain, or pursuing such measures as will bring damage rather than benefit. (Compare viii. 7.) The east wind was a parching wind, which blasted the fruit of the earth: thence it denotes desolation and destruction. (See xiii. 15.)

They do make a covenant with the Assyrians, and oil is carried into Egypt.] At the same time that they engage themselves to be tributaries to the king of Assyria, they underhand send presents to the king of Egypt, that he should assist them in shaking off that yoke. (See 2 Kings xvii. 4.) The land of Judah had plenty of excellent oil. (See Deut. viii. 8. Ezek. xxvii. 17.)

Ver. 2. The Lord also hath a controversy with Judah, (see iv. 1.) and will punish Jacob according to his ways, &c.] Though Hezekiah had abolished idolatry, and restored God's worship in the temple, (2 Chron. xxix. 3. xxx. 1.) yet there was much hypocrisy and great corruption in the manners of his subjects; for which God's judgments are here threatened, and the invasion of Sennacherib was actually inflicted, (2 Kings xviii. 13, &c.)

Ver. 3. He took his brother by the heel in the womb.] From the mentioning of Jacob in the foregoing verse, the prophet takes occasion to put his posterity in mind of the particular favours God had shewed him, and bestowed upon his posterity for his sake. His taking his brother by the heel in the womb, denoted that he obtained the right of the first-born, and deprived his brother of it.

Ibid. and Ver. 4. By his strength he had power with God: yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed.] The prophet alludes to those words of his, Gen. xxxii. 26. I will not let thee go, except thou bless me; intimating the strength and prevalency of his prayers for the obtaining a blessing from God. The words, ver. 3. He had power with God, and those that follow, He had power over the angel, are equivalent; which plainly prove that this person who assumed a human shape was really God; i. e. the Son of God, and the angel of the covenant; by whom all the Divine appearances recorded in the Old Testament were performed; the affairs of the church being ordered by him from the beginning. This subject is learnedly handled by Dr. Alix, in his Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians, chap. 13—15. by Archbishop Tenison, in his discourse of Idolatry, chap. 14. and by Bishop Bull, Defen. Fid. Nicen. cap. 1. sect. 1.

Ver. 4. He wept and made supplication to him.] Jacob's wrestling with the angel was not only a corporal conflict, but likewise a spiritual one: from bodily wrestling he betook him to spiritual weapons; he poured forth tears with earnest supplications and prayers, and strove not so much for victory as for a blessing; the only way for a feeble, impotent creature, to prevail over his Creator. Jacob's supplication and tears may probably relate to those earnest prayers he made, Gen. xxxii. 9—11. The combat here referred to, by which he had power with God, ended in an assurance that his prayers were answered.

He found him in Beth-el.] This relates to God's appearing to Jacob after the former vision, Gen. xxxv. 9. 14. where God renewed his promise of giving the land of Judea to his posterity. The prophet takes particular notice of the place where he appeared, viz. Beth-el, which they had since so miserably polluted by idolatry.

And there he spake with us.] The Alexandrian copy of the Septuagint reads, There he spake with him; as if the expression alluded to Gen. xxxv. 14. where God is said to have talked with Jacob: but the present Hebrew reading yields a very good sense, importing that God did not only speak to him there, but likewise did instruct us not to set up an idol in that place which he had honoured with his presence.

Ver. 5. Even the Lord God of hosts; The Lord is his memorial.] Jehovah is the name by which he will be known, and remembered by all his servants, and distinguished from all false gods. (See Exod. iii. 5.)

Ver. 6. Therefore turn thee to thy God, &c.] Return to him and serve him faithfully, and then you may expect the continuance of his favours, and his making good the promises he made to your fathers.

Ver. 7. He is a merchant, &c.] Instead of keeping mercy and judgment, (ver. 6.) he loves those frauds and deceits, which are too commonly practised in buying and selling; and forgets those laws of God, which require the use of just weights and measures. (See Lev. xix. 35, 36. Prov. xi. 1.)

Ver. 8. And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich, &c.] He pleaseth himself with the thoughts that his riches increase, notwithstanding his unjust dealings; and from thence concludes that God is not displeased with him, nor will lay his injustice to his charge.

In all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin.] Or, They shall find neither iniquity nor sin: the particle asher is sometimes taken in a copulative sense. (See Eccles. v. 18.) The words translated iniquity and sin are equivalent. (See Psal. xxxii. 5.)

Ver. 9. And I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt.] Who brought thee out from thence, and have still continued my favours towards thee. (Compare ver. 13. xiii. 4.)

Will yet make thee dwell in tabernacles, &c.] I will in aftertimes return thy captivity, and give thee quiet possession of thy own land again, where you shall thankfully acknowledge your former delivery out of Egypt, and your settlement in your own country; which was the intent of keeping the feast of tabernacles. (See Lev. xxiii. 42, 43. 2 Macc. x. 6.) It was a feast observed with extraordinary expressions of joy by the Jews, as appears from Nehem. viii. 17. Zech. xiv. 16. John vii. 37.

Ver. 10. I have also spoken by the prophets, and have multiplied visions, and used similitudes, &c.] Here are three species of prophecy or Divine revelation distinctly mentioned: first, immediate suggestion or inspiration, when God dictates or suggests the very words which the prophet was to deliver: secondly, visions, or a representation made of external objects to the imagination in as lively a manner as if they were conveyed by the senses; and, thirdly, parables, or apt resemblances; such as that of God's church to a vineyard, Isa. v. 1. of the destruction of Jerusalem to a forest set on fire, Ezek. xx. 46. 49. and to a seething-pot, xxiv. 3. Hosea himself was a parable or type to the Jews in taking a wife of whoredoms, to represent the idolatries of the house of Israel, whereby they went a whoring after strange gods, and forsook the Lord their king and husband. It was an ancient custom in the eastern parts of the world, to convey instructions under symbols and sacred hieroglyphics: Pythagoras learned this method in his travels in the east, and the conversation he had there with the Jews, and other wise men of those parts. God saith here, that he had inspired his prophets in these different ways to bring his people to repentance, but all in vain. Some interpreters understand the words in the future tense, I will also speak by the prophets; as if God had promised to give some new effusion of his Spirit in the latter days, to facilitate the Jews' conversion. (See the note upon Isa. liv. 13.)

Ver. 11. Is there iniquity in Gilead? surely they are vanity.] If we read the former part of the sentence with an interrogation, it might be more significantly rendered, Is there not iniquity in Gilead? So the particle im signifies, Esth. iv. 14. Jer. xxxi. 20. However, the words are in sense a vehement affirmation, importing that the idolatry practised in Gilead, (see vi. 8.) could not preserve him from being carried away captive by Tiglath-pileser, (2 Kings xv. 29.)

They sacrifice bullocks in Gilgal; yea, their altars are as heaps in the furrows of the field.] Notwithstanding this judgment of God upon Gilead, and the country on the other side Jordan, they continue to offer sacrifices to their idols in Gilgal. (See iv. 15.) Their altars stand so thick, that they are discernible as stones gathered up and laid in heaps in the fields. (See viii. 11. x. 1.) Some understand the sentence as containing a threatening, that their altars should be demolished, and become so many ruinous heaps. (2 Kings xix. 25.) The word gulim, heaps, alludes to Gilgal, just before mentioned, a name derived from the same original. Some commentators explain the whole verse to this sense; That the whole kingdom of Israel, that part which is beyond Jordan, where Gilead stood, as well as the other parts on this side that river, and particularly Gilgal, are polluted with idolatry.

Ver. 12. And Jacob fled into the country of Syria, &c.] In this and the following verse, the prophet reproves their ingratitude, by putting them in mind from what small beginnings God raised them to be a mighty nation; that their ancestor Jacob (mentioned before, ver. 3, 4.) was fain to fly for his life to Laban in Syria, and sustain himself, and raise his family by keeping his uncle's flock. (Compare Deut. xxvi. 5.)

Ver. 13. And by a prophet the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, &c.] And afterward, when his posterity were detained in a miserable bondage in Egypt, God delivered them thence, and miraculously preserved them at the Red Sea, and in the wilderness, by the hand of Moses. (Compare xiii. 4, 5.)

Ver. 14. Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly.]

Digitized by Microsoft®

Notwithstanding all my favours shewed to these people and their ancestors, they have provoked me by their idolatries, and other sins, in a most outrageous manner. The word tamrurim, translated most bitterly, Schindler renders, by his heaps; i. e. his altars, which stood as heaps in the field, ver. 12. (Compare Jer. xxxi. 21.)

Therefore shall he leave his blood upon him.] Or, His blood shall return upon him, as the Chaldee paraphrase renders it: his wickedness will be the cause of his destruction. (See xiii. 9.)

And his reproach shall his Lord return upon him.] He has reproached and dishonoured God by word and deed, and God shall in a just recompence make him a reproach and by-word among the heathen. (See vii. 16. Deut. xxviii. 37. compare Dan. xi. 18.)

CHAP. XIII.

ARGUMENT.

A continuation of God's threatenings for their sins; to which are added gracious promises of deliverance from death, to be fulfilled under the gospel.

Ver. 1. WHEN Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel.] While he behaved himself submissively and obediently towards God, he was reckoned among the principal tribes of Israel. Here Ephraim is spoken of as distinct from Israel: in other places of this prophecy he is put for the whole kingdom of the ten tribes. (See v. 3.)

But when he offended in Baal, he died.] When he gave himself to idolatry, his strength immediately declined, and had manifest symptoms of ruin and destruction; as when a man falls into a languishing condition, it is the certain forerunner of death. The word Baal is here taken, in a general sense, for all false gods, or idolatrous ways of worship; so as to comprehend the worship of the golden calves, though they were designed for symbolical representations of the true God: in which sense the word Baalim may be understood, ii. 13. xi. 2. To the same sense we may most probably explain that text, 1 Kings xix. 18. Yet have I left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal; meaning that small remnant of the faithful in Israel, who had stuck close to the worship of the true God, when the whole body of the people had complied with that idolatry which Jeroboam set up and authorized as the national religion. (Compare Tobit i. 5.)

Ver. 2. But now they sin more and more, and have made them molten images according to their understanding.] Or, According to their invention, or fancy. They please themselves with some new piece of idolatry, as their fancy or imagination suggests. (Compare x. 1.)

They say of them [or, to them], Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves.] Compare 1 Kings xix. 18. The word adoration properly signifies kissing the hand, and making obeisance to the object of worship: so Job describes the adoration which the ancient idolaters paid to the heavenly bodies, xxi. 26. Afterward the same outward act of worship was paid to images; as appears by a noted passage at the beginning of Minucius Felix's Octavius. Sometimes they kissed the image itself; as appears by the description Cicero gives of Hercules's image, which Verres had took away, act. 4. in Verrem, and by those noted verses of Lucretius, lib. i.

> " ——— tum portas propter ahena
> Signa manus dextras ostendunt attenuari
> Sæpe salutantum tactu."

Some translate zibche adam, the sacrifices of men; i. e. those who offered human sacrifices: but this was an execrable piece of worship paid to Moloch, but never practised, that we find, at Dan or Beth-el. Our interpreters render the words zibche adam, very properly, the men that sacrifice; as the phrase ebijone adam, signifies the poor among men, Isa. xxix. 19.

Ver. 3. Therefore they shall be as the morning cloud, &c.] Comparisons that express their sudden disappearing and coming to nothing. (Compare vi. 4. Dan. ii. 35.)

Ver. 4. Yet I am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt, and thou shalt know no god beside me.] In thy distress thou betookest thyself to other gods, expecting relief from them; but thou shalt find that none will be able to save thee but myself, whenever thou wilt sincerely turn to me. (Compare xii. 9. Isa. xliii. 11.) This and the following verse are an introduction to the gracious promises that follow, ver. 9. 14. and chap. xiv. and import, that God will never utter lyforget the promises made to their fathers. (See Rom. xi. 29.)

Ver. 5. I knew thee in the wilderness, &c.] I took especial care of thee, fed and sustained thee for forty years in the wilderness, a place destitute of all conveniences of life: the words are taken out of Deut. ii. 7. To know, often signifies, in the Scripture phrase, to have a regard for, or take care of. See Exod. ii. 25. Psal. i. 7. xxxi. 8. cxliii. 3. Prov. xii. 10. Nahum i. 7. where our translation renders it regard.

Ver. 6. According to their pastures so were they filled, &c.] The more care I took to provide plentifully for them, both before and after they came into the land of promise, the more perverse they shewed themselves towards me; their pride made them forget me their great Benefactor. The expression alludes to Deut. viii. 12. 14. (See likewise xxii. 15.)

Ver. 7, 8. Therefore I will be to them as a lion, &c.] I will utterly consume them from being a nation, and give them up into the hands of such enemies as will shew them no mercy. (Compare ver. 16. and Jer. v. 6.)

Ver. 9. O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thy help.] Thy own sins have brought down destruction upon thee; and it is from me only thou canst expect any help, which I will in due time afford thee. (See the note upon ver. 4.)

Ver. 10. I will be thy king: where is there any other that may save thee in all thy cities?] God promises to be their immediate protector upon their repentance. But the words may better be translated, Where is thy king now, that he may save thee? &c. In this sense the LXX. understand the words, and several other interpreters; the word ehi being taken for ajeb, by a frequent transposition of letters, as it is used again, ver. 14. The words relate either to the anarchy, which continued for some years, between the murder of Pekah and the succession of Hoshea; (see x. 3.) or else to the time when Hoshea was deposed and imprisoned by the king of Assyria. (See 2 Kings xvii. 4.)

And thy judges, of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes.] They desired a king to judge them like other nations, attended by his judges and proper officers. (See 1 Sam. viii. 5. 12.)

Ver. 11. I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away (or, will take him away) in my wrath.] I complied with your request in giving you your first king Saul, though I was justly displeased at it. (See 1 Sam. viii. 7. x. 19.) And of later times I have suffered you to set up new kings, after you had murdered their predecessors; (see viii. 4.) and now I will take your present king Hoshea, and at the same time put an end to your kingdom and nation.

Ver. 12. The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up: his sin is hid.] Our translators seem to understand the verse in a favourable sense, as if God hath promised not to execute that vengeance upon Israel which was due to their sins: but the words rather imply a contrary meaning, and may be better translated, The iniquity of Ephraim is treasured up; his sin is laid up: i. e. it is laid up in my memory; and though the punishment due to it has been respited for some time, yet now the season is come when it shall be put in execution. The sentence is equivalent to that expression in Job, xiv. 17. My transgression is sealed up in a bag; i. e. thou keepest an exact account of it, as men do of money, which they seal up in a bag, to be forthcoming at a proper occasion. To the same purpose are those words of Moses, Deut. xxxii. 34, 35. Is not this laid up in store for me, and sealed up among my treasures? To me belongs vengeance, &c. (Compare Rom. ii. 5.)

Ver. 13. The sorrows of a travailing woman shall come upon him.] Great calamities are often compared to the pains of childbirth. (See Isa. xii. 8. Jer. xxx. 6. Psal. xviii. 4. and so the Greek word ὠδῖνες is used, Acts ii. 24.)

He is an unwise son; for he should not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children.] The old translation reads it to a plainer sense, Else he would not stand still like a still-born child. As a child, if it could be supposed to have understanding, would deliver itself out of the straits of the womb, and not tarry there to the manifest danger of itself and the mother: (compare 2 Kings xix. 3.) so if Ephraim, or Israel, had acted wisely, they would have prevented their approaching destruction by a speedy reformation.

Ver. 14. I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death.] If we apply this to Ephraim, or the Israelites spoken of before, it may signify, that though they be in never so hopeless and desperate a condition, God will, in due time, deliver them out of it. (See the like expressions, Psal. xxxi. 3. lxxi. 20. lxxxvi. 13.) But there is a more sublime and spiritual sense contained in the words, as will appear by the following note.

O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction.] It is usual for the prophets, when they foretell temporal deliverances, to be carried away beyond their first views by the impetus of the prophetic spirit, to predict the greater mercies and deliverances which belong to the gospel state: so here the prophet takes occasion from foretelling temporal mercies, to enlarge his views, and set forth that great and final deliverance of the faithful from the power of sin and death, which shall be completed by Christ at his second coming, when he shall swallow up death in victory, 1 Cor. xv. 54. St. Paul understood the words in this sense in the following verse of that chapter, O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? This will appear to any one, that compares that place with the Septuagint translation here. The word chi, translated I will, they render where, as it signifies ver. 10. of this chapter. The apostle, indeed, seems to quote this text from his memory, and rather represents the sense of it, than keeps close to the letter. However, the learned Dr. Pocock is of opinion, in his comment upon this place, that the Hebrew word debareka, rendered by our interpreters thy plagues, and by the LXX. thy plea, sentence, or judgment, is very properly translated thy sting by St. Paul; the word denoting, in Arabic, the sharp point of a bird's claw; and the word Deborah, a bee, being probably so called from its sting.

Ver. 15. Though he be fruitful among his brethren, yet an east wind shall come from the wilderness, &c.] The word Ephraim denotes fruitfulness. (See Gen. xli. 52.) This tribe answered his name, being the most numerous and potent of all the ten tribes. (See the note upon v. 3.) Notwithstanding the pride he takes in his fruitfulness, (see x. 13.) the king of Assyria, a country lying eastward of Judea, shall come with an army, like a parching east wind coming over a large plain or wilderness, and shall blast and wither him, as a tree that is dried up for want of moisture. (Compare iv. 19. and see the note upon Jer. iv. 11.)

He shall destroy the treasure of all pleasant vessels.] The same enemy shall plunder all their treasures, and take away their rich and costly furniture; as the word kelee is translated, Nahum ii. 9.

Ver. 16. Samaria shall become desolate; for she hath rebelled against her God.] The prophet foretells the final destruction of Samaria for her idolatry and other impieties, by Shalmaneser king of Assyria. (See 2 Kings xvii. 6.)

They shall fall by the sword; their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up.] These are the barbarous practices of conquerors, when they take cities by storm, to put all to the sword, without distinction of age or sex. (See x. 15. 2 Kings viii. 12. xv. 16. Isa. xiii. 16. Amos i. 13. Nahum iii. 10.)

CHAP. XIV.

ARGUMENT.

The prophecy concludes with an earnest exhortation to repentance, and God's gracious promises of pardon and blessing upon it.

Ver. 1. THOU hast fallen by thine iniquity.] Thy sins have been the cause of thy destruction. (See xiii. 9.)

Ver. 2. Take with you words, and turn to the Lord; say unto him, &c.] The prophet prescribes them a form of confession very proper to be used upon their repentance and conversion, beseeching God to pardon their past sins, and receive them graciously upon their repentance. Such another form we have, Joel ii. 17.

Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously.] The latter part of the sentence may be rendered, And give us what is good: bestow thy grace and blessing upon us. Many Hebrew verbs have two contrary significations, as hath been observed upon Isa. xxii. 18. To the instances there collected, we may add one taken out of xi. 8. of this prophecy; where the verb miggen signifies to deliver up, whereas its usual signification is to protect. So the verb lakach here used probably signifies to give, as well as to receive; as appears from Psal. lxviii. 18. where our translation reads, Thou hast received gifts for men: but the LXX. render it, Thou hast given gifts unto men; which sense St. Paul follows, Ephes. iv. 8. and which best agrees with the scope of the text.

So will we render thee the calves of our lips.] Instead of the sacrifices of calves or bullocks, we will offer to thee the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, which is the fruit of our lips, our reasonable service, and such as properly belongs to the times of the gospel. So that this form of confession will be most suitable for the Jews to use upon their conversion to Christianity. St. Paul applies the words to the eucharist, (Heb. xiii. 15.) the true Christian sacrifice; and follows the Septuagint translation of them, which expresses the sense rather than the words.

Ver. 3. Ashur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses.] The first part of the people's repentance is described as consisting in relying solely upon God's protection, and not putting their trust in human strength; and then in renouncing all idolatrous worship. The Israelites had formerly made an alliance with the Assyrians, (see v. 13. viii. 9. xii. 1.) and they are often upbraided by the prophets for their courting foreign alliances, and particularly strengthening themselves with horses from Egypt or Assyria. (See 2 Chron. xvi. 7. Isa. xxx. 16. xxxvi. 8.)

Neither will we say to the works of our hands, Ye are our gods.] Another part of their repentance consists in renouncing all sorts of idol-worship; which is often spoken of in the prophets, as an introduction to that state of the church which is to commence from the time of the Jews' conversion. (Compare ii. 17. and see the note on Isa. i. 29.) God interprets all image-worship, or creature-worship, as terminating in the image or creature to which it is offered.

For in thee the fatherless findeth mercy.] It is the property of God to be the helper of the friendless, or fatherless. (See Psal. x. 10.) The Chaldee expresses the sense very well, Thou didst take pity upon our forefathers, when they were like fatherless children in Egypt. (Compare Psal. lxviii. 5.)

Ver. 4. I will heal their backslidings, I will love them freely, &c.] God's gracious answer to their professions of repentance; assuring them of his being reconciled to them, and as a token of it freeing them from their sins, and the punishment due to them, (compare xi. 7.) and embracing them with a true love and affection, without any remembrance of their former provocations. (Compare Zeph. iii. 17.)

Ver. 5. I will be as the dew unto Israel.] This and the following verse contain gracious promises of God's favours and blessing upon Israel's conversion, represented by different metaphors; described in this sentence by the refreshment which large dews give to the grass in the heats of summer. (Compare Job xxxix. 19. Prov. xix. 12.)

And shall cast forth his roots as Lebanon.] As a tree of Lebanon, as the Chaldee paraphrase explains it.

Ver. 6. His beauty shall be as the olive-tree.] Compare Psal. lii. 8. cxxviii. 3. Ecclus. xxiv. 12. l. 10.

And his smell as Lebanon.] From the trees of Lebanon came many sweet spices, particularly frankincense, called Lebonah in Hebrew, from whence some derive the word Lebanon. (Compare Cantic. iv. 11.)

Ver. 7. They that dwell under his shadow shall return.] Most interpreters translate the sentence thus, They shall return and dwell under his shadow; i. e. They shall return into their own country, and rest safely under the shadow or protection of the Almighty. (Compare Psal. xci. 1. and see the note upon i. 11.)

The scent thereof shall be as the wind of Lebanon.] As fragrant and as pleasing as the richest wines, such as were made near Lebanon; where there was a city called by the Greeks Ampeloessa, for the excellency of its wine; as is related by Pliny, lib. v. cap. 18.

Ver. 8. Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? I have heard and observed him.] This verse contains a dialogue between God and Ephraim, or Israel his people, (see v. 3.) after their conversion. They begin with declaring their utter aversion to idolatry. (See ver. 3.) To which God graciously replies, that he has heard them confessing their sins, and expressing their abhorrence of them (compare Jer. xxxi. 18.) and will observe them, (for the verb asharena is in the future tense); i. e. will guide them with the eye of his providence and mercy, as the LXX. and Chaldee paraphrase express the sense.

I am like a green fir-tree: from me is thy fruit found.] Ephraim or Israel gratefully acknowledges that he is in a flourishing and thriving condition; and then God puts him in mind that his fruitfulness is wholly owing to the Divine blessing. Naturalists observe, that the fir-tree is of itself unfruitful.

Ver. 9. Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? —for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them, &c.] Whosoever is truly wise will be convinced of this great and important truth, viz. that they who are sincerely desirous to know and do God's will, will be fully satisfied of the reasonableness of God's laws, and the methods of his providence, and will readily comply with the directions of both, to the securing their own eternal happiness: whereas men of perverse and disobedient tempers take offence at God's commands, and repine against his providence, to their own ruin and perdition. The same sense is expressed in that observation of the son of Sirach, Ecclus. xxxix. 24. As God's ways are plain to the holy, so are they stumbling-blocks to the workers of iniquity. To the same purpose are those words of Christ, Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice, John xviii. 37. and, He that is of God heareth God's words, viii. 47. And St. Peter says, that Christ is become a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to the disobedient, 1 Pet. ii. 8. The observation of Grotius is very remarkable upon this subject, De Verit. Christian. Relig. lib. ii. cap. ult. where he says, that the doctrine of the gospel was designed to be "tanquam lapis lydius, ad quem ingenia sanabilia explorarentur:" as a touchstone, to try the tempers of men, whether they were corrigible or not.

JOEL.

PREFACE.

IF it were certain that the minor Prophets were placed in the order of time wherein they lived, we might conclude that Joel prophesied before Amos, who was contemporary with Uzziah king of Judah. Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3197. makes the same inference, because Joel foretells that drought, (chap. i.) which Amos mentions as actually come to pass, (iv. 7—9.) But to that argument it may be answered, that the drought there spoken of might probably be peculiar to the kingdom of Israel. And as to the precedence which the present Hebrew copies give to Joel, the LXX. place him the fourth in order, and put Amos and Micah before him.

If we consider the main design of his prophecy, we shall be apt to conclude, that it was uttered after the captivity of the ten tribes; for he directs his discourse only to Judah, and speaks distinctly of the sacrifices and oblations that were daily made in the temple. Israel is indeed mentioned, iii. 2. but it is in relation to future times, not to their present condition at the time when Joel prophesied.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

A description of a terrible famine that is coming on the land, occasioned by a long drought, and the locusts, and other noxious vermin which that produced: with an exhortation to proclaim a fast to be observed by the people, that they may humble themselves under the hand of God, and avert his judgments.

Ver. 2, 3. HEAR ye this, ye old men, and give ear all ye inhabitants of the land, &c.] The prophet shews how great and unparalleled this dearth is, by appealing to the memory of the ancients, and the observation of the present generation, whether they ever knew or heard any thing like it; so that it deserved to be recorded as a warning to aftertimes. (Compare ii. 2.)

Ver. 4. That which the palmer-worm hath left, hath the locust eaten, &c.] A succession of noxious creatures hath made a perfect riddance of all the fruits of the earth, which makes this judgment so strange and remarkable.

Ver. 5. Awake, ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, &c.] This calamity should particularly affect those that spend their time in jollity and excess, and make that the chief business of their life. (Compare Isa. xxiv. 7—9. 11.) It carries along with it evident tokens of being sent as a punishment for their disorders.

Ver. 6. For a nation is come upon my land, strong, and without number.] Insects are described as a nation, or people marching in order under their leaders, both by sacred and profane writers, because of their power to do mischief, and their being irresistible by human strength or art. (Compare ii. 2. 25. Prov. xxx. 25—27.)

Whose teeth are [as] the teeth of a lion, &c.] So the locusts are described, Rev. ix. 8. They devour every thing that comes in their way, like a lion, and none can rescue it. The particle as is frequently understood. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 1.) The word labi is sometimes rendered a great lion, as it is here: lions being common in Judea, the Hebrew language hath particular words to express the several ages and sizes of that creature.

Ver. 7. He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig-tree, &c.] Bochart, de Animal. par. ii. p. 469. n. 447. observes out of Pliny and other writers, that locusts and such noxious creatures will not only destroy the leaves and the fruit, but even devour the very bark and stock of those trees upon which they fasten. (Compare ver. 12.) The word translated barked, is read but in this one place of the Bible; so the LXX. and some others, render it to break off, and understand it of the upper branches of the tree; in which sense it is used in the Arabic language.

Ver. 8. Lament like a virgin girded with sackcloth for the husband of her youth.] The words are an apostrophe to the land of Judea: the prophet puts her in mind that she ought to be deeply affected with the sore strokes of the Divine vengeance, and express her inward sense of those calamities, with the same outward expressions of mourning, as a young virgin that was betrothed to a husband, and should lose him before they had lived together, would lament such an untimely loss. It was common among the Jews, for persons who were espoused, to spend some time together in the house of the woman's friends, before the husband took her home to live as man and wife together. (See Gen. xix. 14.) The husband of her youth is a woman's first husband, called elsewhere the guide of her youth, Prov. ii. 17. Jer. iii. 4.; as the wife of thy youth, Mal. ii. 15. is the first wife.

Ver. 9. The meat-offering and the drink-offering is cut off from the house of the Lord.] The meat-offering and drink-offering always accompanied the daily sacrifice. (See Numb. xxviii. 4. 7.) The word mincha, commonly translated meat-offering, properly signifies the bread-offering; being made of flour. (See the note upon Isa. xliii. 23.) The dearth had destroyed both the corn and the wine, ver. 10—12. and thereby disabled the performing the necessary parts of God's daily worship in the temple. This was a new cause of grief to the priests, as well as to all pious persons.

Ver. 10. The field is wasted, the land mourneth.] The fields and the whole land have a mournful appearance, being altogether bare and destitute of food, either for man or beast. (See ver. 18.)

Ver. 11. Be ye ashamed, O ye husbandmen; howl, O ye vine-dressers.] Your being disappointed of your expectations, and the fruits of your labour, is enough to cover you with shame and confusion: (compare Jer. xiv. 3.) especially when you consider these calamities as the just effects of the Divine indignation.

Ver. 12. For joy is withered away from among the sons of men.] That joy they used to shew at the gathering in of the fruits of the earth. (See Isa. ix. 3. xiv. 10. Jer. xlviii. 33.)

Ver. 13. Gird yourselves [with sackcloth]. Lament, ye priests.] See ver. 9.

Lie all night in sackcloth.] Those priests whose turn it is to keep the night-watches in the temple. (See Exod. xxvii. 21. 1 Sam. iii. 3. 1 Chron. ix. 33. Psal. cxxxiv. 2.) Let them cover themselves with sackcloth, as is usual in times of the greatest calamity, and not put it off when they take themselves to rest; but sleep in sackcloth instead of their ordinary garments. (See Dr. Lightfoot's Temple-Service, chap. 9. at the beginning.)

Ver. 14. Sanctify ye a fast, call a solemn assembly, &c.] In order to avert God's wrath, and deprecate his judgments. (See ii. 15, 16.)

Gather the elders, and all the inhabitants of the land, into the house of the Lord your God, and cry unto the Lord.] The house where God hath placed his name, and where he hath promised to hear the prayers which are made to him by his people, when they are afflicted with judgments of this kind. (See 1 Kings vii. 37, &c.)

Ver. 15. Alas, for the day! for the day of the Lord is at hand, &c.] We have just cause to lament our sins which have brought these judgments upon us, which, if not averted by our repentance, will end in our utter destruction, as coming from a God that is infinite in power, and terrible in his judgments.

Ver. 16. Yea, joy and gladness from the house of our God.] The dearth has discontinued our public sacrifices, (ver. 9. 13.) and has deprived us of those rejoicings wherewith we used to keep our solemn feasts at Jerusalem, and partake of the sacrifices which were there offered. (See Deut. xii. 6, 7. xvi. 10, 11. 14, 15. Psal. cv. 3.)

Ver. 17. The seed is rotten under their clods, &c.] The corn which is sowed dies away, and rots in the ground: so the barns and granaries become useless and desolate.

Ver. 18. How do the beasts groan? The herds of cattle are perplexed, &c.] The beasts themselves are sensible of these calamities, and pine away for want of sustenance.

Ver. 19. The fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness.] The fiery drought hath burnt up all the pasture-grounds. (See ii. 3.) The wilderness is sometimes opposed to the hills or mountains, and then it signifies the plains, and places for pasture. (See Isa. lxiii. 13. Jer. ix. 10.)

Ver. 20. The beasts of the field cry also unto thee.] They express their want of food by the mournful noise which they make; which is their natural way of making known their wants unto thee. (Compare Psal. civ. 21. Job xxxviii. 41.)

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet describes the locusts, and other noxious insects, which were the cause of the famine mentioned chap. i. as if they were a mighty army, sent by God to destroy the fruits of the earth; and continues to exhort the people to repentance, promising the removal of these calamities, and a return of God's blessings upon their reformation.

Ver. 1. BLOW the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain.] The prophet describes the locusts and the caterpillars as God's army, ver. 11. in pursuance of which metaphor he exhorts the people to prepare to meet them, in the same terms as if they were alarmed to encounter an enemy, which was by sounding of a trumpet. (See Jer. iv. 5, 6. 19.) This ceremony was not only used to give notice of an approaching enemy, but likewise to publish the times of the solemn assemblies for the worship of God. (See Numb. x. 3. 9, 10.) And this is the chief use they were to make of it upon this occasion: (see ver. 15.) for there was no other way to avert the impending judgment, but humbling themselves before God with fasting and prayer. (See ver. 15.)

Let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the Lord cometh, &c.] Let them be seized with as terrible an apprehension of this approaching judgment, as if they saw an enemy invading their country. (See ver. 11.)

Ver. 2. A day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains.] A day wherein every thing will look dark and dismal. (See Amos v. 18. 20.) The locusts will intercept the light of the sun, and diffuse a darkness over the land, in as swift a manner as the light spreads itself in the morning. Travellers inform us, that these insects will of a sudden cover the sky like a cloud. (See Bochart, de Animal. lib. iv. cap. 4, 5. compare ver. 10.) The LXX. and Chaldee paraphrase join this sentence to the following words: As the morning spread upon the mountains, a people great and strong.

A people great and strong.] See i. 6.

There has not been ever the like, &c.] The locusts which plagued Egypt are described after the same manner, Exod. x. 14. Before them there were no such locusts, neither after them shall be such. In both places we are to take it for a proverbial expression, to set forth the extraordinary greatness of the judgment, and not understand it too strictly according to the grammatical sense of the word. So we read of Hezekiah, that after him there was none like him, among all the kings of Judah, nor any that went before him, 2 Kings xviii. 5. and yet the same character is given to Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 25.

Ver. 3. A fire devours before them, and behind them a flame burns.] The locusts and the drought which ushered them in, (see i. 19.) have in a manner devoured every thing that comes in their way; and leave sad tokens of destruction wherever they have been. Those that have travelled in the eastern countries inform us, that wherever the swarms of locusts light, they make such a destruction, that there remains not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the field, as Moses speaks concerning the locusts in Egypt, Exod. x. 15.

The land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness.] The land of Judea, so famous for its fertility and pleasantness before this calamity, is now turned into a desolate wilderness, by the ravages they have made. The garden of Eden is a proverbial expression for a place of pleasure and fruitfulness, as we commonly use the word paradise. (See Gen. xiii. 10. Isa. li. 3.)

Ver. 4. The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses, &c.] See the same comparison, Rev. ix. 7. Bochart observes that locusts resemble horses, not only in their swiftness, but also in the shape of their heads. (See his Hierozoicon, par. ii. p. 474.)

Ver. 5. Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains shall they leap.] Compare Rev. ix. 9. Chariots anciently were a part of warlike preparations, as appears by many passages in Scripture. The text says, that these locusts shall resemble them in their swiftness, noise, and terror. "Tanto volant pennarum stridore, ut aliæ alites credantur:" Their wings make such a noise, as if they were winged fowls, saith Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. xi. cap. 29.

Like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble.] Which burns up combustible matter without resistance.

As a strong people set in battle-array.] See ver. 2. and i. 6.

Ver. 6. Before their face the people shall be much pained; all faces shall gather blackness.] The inhabitants of the land shall be in great pain and anguish under the apprehension of their coming; they shall be seized with such a dread and fear, as shall make their visage look black and ghastly, like persons who are dying. (Compare Jer. viii. 21. Nahum ii. 10.)

Ver. 7. They shall run like mighty men, &c.] They shall march in such a swift and orderly manner, that no place shall be inaccessible to them, nor any force be able to withstand them.

Ver. 8. Neither shall they thrust one another; they shall walk every one in his path, &c.] Of the regular and orderly motion of these insects, St. Jerome gives this account from his own experience, in his notes upon the place: "Hoc nuper in hac provincia vidimus: cum enim locustarum agmina venirent, et aerem inter cœlum et terram occuparent, tanto ordine ex disposito Dei judicio volitant, ut instar tesserularum, quæ in pavimentis artificum figuntur manu, suum locum teneant, et ne puncto quidem, ut ita dicam, aut ungue transverso, declinent ad alterum." This we lately saw in our part of the country: for when swarms of locusts came and filled the lower region of the air, they flew in such order, by the Divine appointment, and kept their places as exactly, as when several tiles or party-coloured stones are skilfully placed in a pavement, so as not to be a hair's-breadth out of their several ranks.

And when they fall upon the sword, they shall not be wounded.] By reason of their nimbleness, and the outward coat of their skin being so hard and smooth, no offensive weapon can touch them.

Ver. 9. They shall run to and fro in the city; they shall run upon the wall, &c.] We may have recourse to St. Jerome again for explaining this passage: "Nihil locustis invium est, cum et agros, et sata, et arbores, et urbes, et domos, et cubiculorum secreta penetrent." Every place (saith he) lies open to them; for they infect not only the fields and the fruits of the earth, but creep into cities, houses, and the most secret recesses.

Ver. 10. The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble: the sun and moon shall be dark, &c.] The inhabitants of the earth shall be seized with a horrible dread at their approach. (See ver. 6. and compare Amos ix. 5.) The heavens shall put on the appearance of fear by looking dark and dismal, because these noxious creatures shall come in such swarms as to intercept the rays of the sun, and the light of the moon and stars. (See ver. 2.) Pliny saith of them, that they sometimes darken the sun: ubi supra. And Moses saith of the locusts in Egypt, that the land was darkened by them, Exod. x. 15. It is likewise to be observed, that God's particular judgments being an earnest and forerunner of the general judgment, the same expressions are common to both. (Compare ver. 31. and iii. 15. Matt. xxiv. 29. and see the note upon Isa. xiii. 10.)

Ver. 11. And the Lord shall utter his voice before his army.] Like a leader or general, he shall command or encourage this his army, and can make the meanest parts of the creation the instruments of his vengeance. God's voice sometimes denotes his anger: the most terrible way of declaring his will is when he speaks to us by his judgments. (Compare iii. 16. Jer. xxv. 30. Amos i. 2.)

For his camp is very great.] See ver. 25.

For the day of the Lord is great and very terrible, &c.] The time of God's particular judgments, as well as that of his general one, is commonly expressed by the day of the Lord, the former being an earnest and imperfect representation of the latter.

Ver. 12. Turn ye even to me with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning.] Testify your inward repentance by outward expressions of true sorrow.

Ver. 13. And rend your hearts, and not your garments.] Rending of the garments was customary in times of great sorrow and affliction. (Gen. xxxvii. 34. Job i. 20. 2 Sam. i. 11.) The prophet does not forbid men using this outward sign of mourning, but puts them in mind to add an inward contrition to it. The Hebrew writers sometimes signify the preference that is due to one thing above another, in terms which express the rejecting of that which is less worthy: thus we read, Hos. vi. 6. I will have mercy, and not sacrifice: i. e. rather than sacrifice. To the same sense we are to understand the text before us.

For he is gracious and merciful, &c.] The words allude to God's own declaration of himself, Exod. xxxiv. 6. compared with Jonah iv. 2.

Ver. 14. Who knoweth if he will return and repent, and leave a blessing behind him? &c.] God's own nature, and the former instances we have found of his merciful disposition, encourage us to hope, that our sincere repentance may avail to avert God's wrath, and engage him to restore his blessings upon us and our land. (Compare 2 Sam. xii. 22. Jonah iii. 9.)

Even a meat-offering and a drink-offering unto the Lord your God.] At least sufficient provision to supply the necessary parts of God's public worship; which, since the dearth, have been necessarily omitted. (See i. 9. 13.)

Ver. 15. Blow the trumpet in Zion.] The signal for assembling the people at the solemn times of public worship. (See Numb. x. 3. 9, 10.)

Sanctify a fast, &c.] See i. 14.

Ver. 16. Sanctify the congregation.] Take care that they be purified from those legal pollutions which render persons unqualified to approach God's temple or worship. (See Lev. xv. 31. Numb. xix. 13. 20.)

Assemble the elders, gather the children, and those that suck the breasts.] Compare 2 Chron. xx. 13. Let both young and old join in this general humiliation: all ages joining in it adds much to the solemnity of it, and is very proper to work in men's minds that sincere contrition, which may avert those judgments which threaten the whole nation, and wherein their posterity may suffer.

Let the bridegroom go out of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet.] Let them prepare themselves for this solemn humiliation, by retiring into separate apartments, and abstaining from the enjoyment of each other. (Compare 1 Cor. vii. 15. Zech. xii. 14.)

Ver. 17. Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and the altar.] A principal part of the priests' office was to attend upon the altar, and offer the sacrifices there. For which reason the open court just before the porch of the temple, where the brazen altar stood, (see 2 Chron. viii. 12.) was called the priests' court, where the greatest part of those whose course it was gave their attendance. Hereupon this is mentioned as the most proper place for the priests to make their prayers and intercessions to God in behalf of the people, where they might best be heard of all the assembly, and where they had before offered the sacrifices proper for such an occasion, which were the most solemn way of calling upon the Lord, (see Gen. xii. 4. 1 Sam. vii. 8, 9.) and being joined to their prayers, were the most effectual means to make an atonement for sin, and avert the Divine displeasure.

And let them say, Spare thy people, O Lord, &c.] It was usual to prescribe certain forms of prayer, or praise, to the priests in their public ministrations. (See 1 Chron. xvi. 36. Hos. xiv. 2.) Such was this herein mentioned, wherein they beseech God to deliver his people, not for any merit of theirs, but for the glory of his own name, lest the heathen round about them should take occasion to blaspheme his name, as if he were not able to protect his people. (Compare Psal. xlii. 20. lxxix. 10. cxv. 2.)

That the heathen should rule over them.] This translation of the Hebrew verb mashal favours their interpretation, who expound the army described at the beginning of the chapter of a hostile invasion: but if we understand those expressions only as a metaphorical description of that grievous destruction the locusts and other venomous insects should make in the land (which I take to be the truer exposition), then this sentence is to be translated, That the heathen should use a by-word against them, as our margin reads; should make them the subject of their scorn and derision, as if they were forsaken by the God whom they worshipped: and the verb mashal is indifferently taken in either signification. (See Deut. xxviii. 37.)

Ver. 18. Then will the Lord be jealous for his land, and pity his people.] He will be concerned for the honour of that land, which he hath made the lot of his own inheritance, and have so much pity for it, as not to suffer it or its inhabitants to be the subject of reproach to the heathen. (See ver. 17. 19. and compare Zech. i. 14.)

Ver. 19. Behold, I will send you corn, and wine, and oil, &c.] I will restore your former plenty, and the nations about you shall have no more occasion to reproach your desolate condition: (ver. 17.)

Ver. 20. But I will remove from you the northern army, &c.] The locusts are described like an army in the former part of the chapter, (see ver. 11.) and here they are called the northern army, because they entered into the land at Hamath, one of the northern borders of it, and passed quite through it, till they came to the southern parts about the lake Asphaltites, which was barren and desolate ever since the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah; and there they were either famished or devoured in the lake, as the Egyptians were in the Red Sea. (See Exod. x. 19.)

With his face towards the east sea, and his hinder part towards the utmost sea.] In the Hebrew language all lakes or confluences of water are expressed by the name of seas. Here the lake Asphaltites, or the Sea of Sodom, is called the east sea, (compare Ezek. xlvii. 8. 18. Zech. xiv. 8.) and opposed to the utmost, or western sea, which is the Mediterranean. (See Deut. xi. 24.)

And his stink shall come up.] St. Jerome, upon the place, relates, that in his own time the heaps of locusts which were drove by the winds into the sea, afterward putrefied upon the shore, and so corrupted the air as to bring a pestilence.

Because he hath done great things.] Or rather, Although he hath done great things: though this army of insects by God's appointment has made such destruction in the land, yet it shall come to this shameful end.

Ver. 21. The Lord will do great things.] God will magnify himself as much in acts of mercy, as he did before in the strokes of his justice.

Ver. 22. Be not afraid, ye beasts of the field, &c.] As the cattle had their share in the dearth, i. 18. 20. so now they shall receive comfort in the return of plenty.

Ver. 23. For he hath given you the former rain moderately.] The season for the former rain was about the middle of our October. (See Dr. Lightfoot's Horæ Hebr. upon Luke iii. 25.) The Hebrew word rendered moderately literally signifies, according to righteousness, and is equivalent with according to judgment, Jer. x. 23. or in measure, Jer. xxx. 11. But some interpreters translate it here plentifully. Our margin reads a teacher of righteousness, which sense is followed by the Chaldee paraphrast, and the Vulgar Latin, and may be a proper introduction to the promise which follows, (ver. 28.) of pouring God's Spirit upon all flesh.

And the latter rain in the first month.] Which was Nisan, partly answering to our March: the regular season for this rain was three months before harvest, (Amos iv. 7.) i. e. before wheat-harvest, which was later than barley-harvest in Judea. (See Ruth ii. 23. 2 Sam. xxi. 9.)

Ver. 25. And I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten, &c.] The fruit of those years which the venomous insects have devoured. (See i. 4.)

My great army.] See ver. 11.

Ver. 26. And ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied.] Ye shall eat bread to the full, as it is expressed, Lev. xxiv. 5. Deut. vi. 11. viii. 10. Times of scarcity are expressed by eating and not being satisfied, Lev. xxvi. 26. Amos iv. 8. Micah vi. 14.

Ver. 27. And ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel.] God's giving tokens of his especial blessing and protection to his people is expressed by his dwelling among them, or in the midst of them; see iii. 17. Lev. xxvi. 11, 12. Ezek. xxxviii. 26. This is a favour he never promises but upon their sincere and steady obedience, as appears in the forecited places; and then the promises contained in this and the foregoing verse, will punctually be fulfilled.

And that I am the Lord your God, and none else.] You will then be convinced that I am always ready to protect you, and you need not apply yourselves to any other gods in your wants or troubles. (Compare Isa. xlv. 5. 21.)

And my people shall never be ashamed.] Shall not be any more disappointed of the trust they place in me; nor be reproached by the heathen, as if I had forsaken them. (See ver. 19. compare Isa. li. 22. Nahum i. 15.)

Ver. 28. And it shall come to pass afterward.] Or, In the last days, as St. Peter explains the phrase, Acts ii. 17. by which expression Manasseh ben Israel tells us, that all their wise men understood the times of the Messias. (See the Bishop of Litchfield's Def. of the ancient Prophecies, p. 123.) So afterward and in the latter days are equivalent, Dan. ii. 28. 45.

I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh.] The plentiful effusion of the Holy Spirit is mentioned by the prophets as the peculiar character of the gospel state: and it is elsewhere compared to the pouring waters upon thirsty land, whereby it becomes fruitful. (See Isa. xliv. 3. liv. 13. Jer. xxxi. 34. Ezek. xxxvi. 27. compared with John vii. 39.) So this text, in analogy to other parallel places, is very fitly applied by St. Peter to the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the first believers, Acts ii. 17. All flesh comprehends the gentiles as well as the Jews: which promise we see was punctually fulfilled, Acts x. 44. xi. 17. The expression of the last days is another indication that this prophecy belongs to the times of the Messias: for the Jews agree that prophecy was sealed up with Malachi, and not to be restored till the days of the Messias. (See the forementioned discourse.)

But we need not confine this prophecy to those early times; but since many prophecies have gradual completions, we may suppose this prophecy to imply, that there shall be another remarkable effusion of the Spirit bestowed upon the Jews in order to their conversion in the latter times of the world. (See the note upon Isa. liv. 13. Ezek. xxxix. 29.) This exposition agrees very well with some expressions in this prophecy, and makes a clearer connexion with the following chapter.

Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy.] The gift of prophecy was bestowed upon some women under the Old Testament, as upon Miriam, (Exod. xv. 20.) Deborah, (Judg. iv. 14.) and Huldah, (2 Kings xxii. 14.) But this gift was more frequently conferred upon them in the times of the New. Thus we read of four daughters of Philip the evangelist, who did prophesy, Acts xxi. 9. and church-history affords us several other instances; such as Perpetua and Felicitas, who were martyrs for the Christian faith, Potamiena mentioned by Eusebius, lib. iv. cap. 5. and others.

Your young men shall see visions.] In visions the inspired person was awake, but his external senses being bound up, and as it were laid in a trance, (see Numb. xxiv. 4.) he had a distinct knowledge of the things revealed to him, and that sometimes accompanied with external representations: such was that vision of St. Peter's, mentioned Acts x. 11. From visions being applied to young men, and dreams to old, some have observed that the imagination is stronger in those that are young than in the old; so that their senses need not be bound up with sleep, in order to make them capable of receiving heavenly visions.

Ver. 29. And also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my Spirit.] As every age and condition are made partakers of the common benefits of the gospel, so they shall not be excluded from the privilege of the extraordinary gifts of it. (See Coloss. iii. 11. James ii. 5.)

Ver. 30. And I will shew wonders in heaven, and in the earth, &c.] This and the following verse principally point out the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem by the Romans, a judgment justly inflicted upon the Jewish nation for their resisting the Holy Spirit, and contempt of the means of grace. So Malachi, after he had foretold the coming of the Messias, (iii. 1.) immediately adds, that his coming should be attended with terrible judgments upon the disobedient, iii. 2, 3. 5. iv. 1. The prophet here takes notice of the extraordinary signs which will be forerunners of that destruction: such were the great slaughters of men, and burning of the towns and cities of Judea, which preceded that last and finishing stroke of the Divine vengeance; and chiefly the comet which hung over their city, and the fearful sights seen in the air some time before; which are mentioned by Josephus, De Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 31. and foretold by Christ, Luke xxi. 11.

Ver. 31. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord shall come.] Compare Mal. iv. 5. Particular judgments upon kingdoms and nations, are often described in such terms as properly belong to the general judgment; as hath been observed upon the tenth verse of this chapter. The expressions here used, in the literal sense, import the failing of light in the sun and moon, whether by eclipses (when the moon looks of a bloody colour), or any other cause: and here they denote the dark and melancholy state of public affairs at the destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans; and the utter overthrow of that state and government. (See the note upon Isa. xiii. 10.)

Ver. 32. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered.] This St. Paul, Rom. x. 13. explains of those who give themselves up to Christ, and profess themselves his disciples; that being the most effectual means of escaping the judgments coming upon the unbelieving Jews, and likewise of being delivered from the wrath to come. (See Luke xxi. 22. 1 Thess. ii. 16.)

For in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, shall be deliverance.] The gospel is described as taking its rise from Jerusalem, and being from thence spread abroad into the world. (See Psal. cx. 2. Isa. ii. 3.) Accordingly Christ commanded his disciples to preach the gospel to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 47. The words may also imply, that the Christian church, often denoted by Mount Zion and Jerusalem, is the only place of salvation. (See likewise Obad. ver. 17.)

As the Lord hath said.] By me his prophet. Or the words may relate to the several promises made in the Psalms, and elder prophets, relating to the church, under the names of Zion and Jerusalem (see particularly Psal. xiv. 7. and several texts in Isaiah); for we cannot certainly conclude in what time Joel lived.

And in the remnant whom the Lord shall call.] Or, Among the remnant: this may partly be understood of those who were converted by the preaching of Christ and the apostles, and thereby escaped the vengeance which involved the rest of the nation. (See Acts ii. 40. 1 Thess. ii. 16.) These are called the Σωζόμενοι, such as should be saved, or delivered, Acts ii. 47. But there is another remnant of the Jews included in this promise, who shall be converted at the end of the world (when the obstinate and incorrigible shall be destroyed), and return home from their several dispersions. In this sense the remnant is often understood. (See Isa. xi. 11. 16. Jer. xxxi. 7. Micah iv. 7. v. 3. 7.) This conversion of the Jewish nation is frequently mentioned in the prophets. (See Jer. xxx. 3, &c. xxxvi. 25, &c. Ezek. xx. 34. 40. xxviii. 25. Amos ix. 9. and the notes upon these texts.) This sense agrees with what follows in the next chapter.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

The following prophecy relates to the latter times of the world; when, upon their conversion, God shall deliver the Jews from their oppressors, and restore them to their own land. The prophet likewise foretells the destruction of their enemies, and other unbelievers, in some decisive battle, such as that mentioned Rev. xvi. 14. and the glorious state of the church that should follow.

Ver. 1. FOR behold in those days, and at that time.] The time called the last days, ii. 28. according to St. Peter's interpretation, Acts ii. 17. which comprehends all that time which reaches from the first to the second appearing of the Messias. (See the note upon Isa. ii. 1.) The context shews, that here is meant the latter part of these last days, or times.

When I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem.] This is to be understood of that restoration of the Jewish nation and their capital city, which shall be brought to pass in the latter times of the world, according to many predictions of the prophets, as has been observed upon the last verse of the foregoing chapter. (Compare particularly this verse with Jer. xxx. 3.) The prophet's mentioning only the kingdom or tribe of Judah, is a probable argument that he was of that tribe, and lived after the captivity of the ten tribes.

Ver. 2. I will also gather all nations, and bring them down to the valley of Jehoshaphat.] The prophets speak of a general discomfiture of God's enemies in some decisive battle before the general judgment, as hath been observed in the notes upon Isa. lxvi. 16. Such probably is the battle of Gog and Magog, described Ezek. xxxix. and that of Armageddon, spoken of Rev. xvi. 14. 16. The place of this remarkable action is here called the valley of Jehoshaphat; as if the prophet had said, the place where the Lord will execute judgment, for so the word Jehoshaphat signifies in the original. So the valley of Jezreel, Hos. i. 4. means where God's arm or strength will exert itself. The expression likewise alludes to the valley of Berachah, as it was afterward called, 2 Chron. xx. 26. which was famous for the victory Jehoshaphat and his people obtained there over a great confederacy of their enemies. This valley was not far from Jerusalem, if it be the same with that described Zech. xiv. 4.

And I will plead with them there.] God pleads with men, and vindicates the cause of oppressed truth and innocence by his judgments. Then their own consciences fly in the face of the guilty, and force them to acknowledge the justice of those punishments they suffer. (Compare Ezek. xvii. 20. xx. 35. xxxviii. 22.)

For my people, and for my heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted my land.] The prophets in the Old Testament denounce several judgments against Edom, Moab, and other ill neighbours of the Jews, who took advantage of their calamities to vent their spite against them. (See ver. 19. of this chapter, Jer. xxii. 14, &c. xlix. 1, 2. Ezek. xxv. 3, &c. Amos i. 11. Obad. ver. 10. Zeph. ii. 8.) But since all nations are summoned to answer the impeachment here mentioned, we may suppose the word Israel to comprehend the faithful of all ages; and then we may observe, that the judgments denounced against the church's enemies, are chiefly for their hatred and cruelty towards God's servants. (See Rev. xi. 18. xvi. 6. xviii. 20. 24.)

Ver. 3. And have cast lots for my people.] Without troubling themselves to make any choice among the captives of my people, they have left the matter wholly to the chance of lots, which captive every man should take. (See Obad. ver. 11. Nahum iii. 10.)

And have given a boy for a harlot, &c.] And have sold their slaves to others, merely to supply their wanton and sinful extravagances.

Ver. 4. Yea, and what have you to do with me, O Tyre and Zidon, and all the coasts of Palestine.] These were some of the Jews' evil neighbours, who took all occasions to distress them. (See Amos i. 6. 9. 2 Chron. xxi. 16. xxviii. 18.)

Will ye render me a recompence?] Do you think to vent your spite against me by way of retaliation for the evils you have suffered from my people? Hardened sinners come to that degree of desperate boldness as to proclaim enmity against God, and shew their resentment towards him, for the hard usage they think that they have received at his hands: so Homer describes Achilles's fierce temper at the beginning of the twenty-second Iliad, thus speaking to Apollo:

Ἤ σ' ἂν τισαίμην εἴ μοι δύναμίς γε παρείη,

——Were it in my power, my vengeful arm should soon return the wrong.

Ver. 5. Because you have taken my silver and my gold, and have carried into your temples my goodly things.] The temple was despoiled of its ornaments, either through the necessities or the wickedness of the kings of Judah, several times. (See 2 Kings xii. 18. xviii. 16. 2 Chron xxviii. 24.) It was likewise plundered by the Chaldeans often; once in the reign of Jehoiakim, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7. then in the short reign of Jehoiachin, 2 Kings xxiv. 13. before the last destruction of it, 2 Kings xxv. 17, 18. Some part of the furniture might perhaps be sold to the merchants of Tyre and Zidon. The profanation of the temple at Jerusalem, and the sacrilegious spoils of its ornaments, have been remarkably punished by God in heathens and infidels: (see Jer. l. 28. li. 11.) so it was in Belshazzar, Dan. v. 1. in Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Macc. vi. 12. and in Pompey and Crassus afterward: because God had given remarkable proofs of a Divine presence in that place; and the heathens themselves might have discovered, by the light of nature, that there was but one true invisible God. (See Dan. v. 23.)

Ver. 6. The children also of Judah, and the children of Jerusalem, have ye sold unto the Grecians.] It was customary for the merchants of the neighbouring countries, such were those of Tyre and Zidon here spoken of, to buy the children of Israel for slaves of their conquerors, in order to sell them again. (See 1 Macc. iii. 41.) It is said particularly of Javan, i. e. Greece, that they dealt in that sort of traffic, of buying and selling of slaves. (Ezek. xxvii. 13.) The histories which relate the calamities of the Jews, speak of great numbers of them made captives, and then sold and dispersed into foreign countries: so forty thousand were sold by Antiochus Epiphanes, 2 Macc. v. 14. and the greatest part of ninety-seven thousand at the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. (See Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 9.)

Ver. 7. Behold, I will raise them out of the place whither ye have sold them.] I will restore them, or their posterity, which are to be looked upon as making one natural body, out of their several captivities, whither their enemies have dispersed them. (See Isa. xliii. 5, 6. xlix. 12. Jer. xxiii. 8.)

Ver. 8. And I will sell your sons and your daughters into the hand of the children of Judah.] This might probably come to pass when Alexander, after the taking of Tyre, sold thirty thousand of the inhabitants for slaves: Gaza, a considerable city upon the coast of Palestine, (see ver. 4.) at the same time was sacked, and the women and children sold for slaves. (See Dr. Prideaux's Connex. of Script. Hist. par. i. book vii.)

And they shall sell you to the Sabeans, to a people far off.] So the country of Sheba is described, Jer. vi. 20. (See the note there.) They are called the Sabeans from the wilderness, Ezek. xxiii. 42. i. e. who came from Arabia Deserta, or the places bordering upon it.

Ver. 9. Proclaim ye this among the gentiles.] After these particular threatenings against Tyre and Zidon, and that coast, the prophet returns to what he had mentioned, ver. 2. concerning the heathen or unbelieving world, gathering themselves either to oppose the Jews in their return homeward, or some other way to hinder the growth of Christ's kingdom.

Prepare war, make up the mighty men, &c.] The prophet, in an ironical and insulting manner, encourages them to make their utmost effort to oppose the designs of Providence: but it should be all in vain. (See the like expressions, Isa. viii. 9, 10. Jer. xlvi. 3, 4. Ezek. xxxviii. 7.)

Ver. 10. Beat your plough-shares into swords.] Let not only the military men prepare for war, but even the husbandmen and vine-dressers: all the forces you can muster together will be little enough for the enterprise you are undertaking. Peaceful times are described by the contrary expressions, of turning swords into plough-shares, and spears into pruning-hooks, Isa. ii. 4.

Let the weak say, I am strong.] Feebleness, or want of strength, should be no pretence to excuse any from this service. This is still spoken by way of irony, and insulting such a confederacy, and the preparations they make for war.

Ver. 11. Thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord.] Thy mighty angels, to discomfit thine enemies. Angels are often described as mighty in strength: (see Psal. lxxviii. 25. ciii. 20. Rev. x. 1.) and here they are spoken of as chosen warriors proper to execute any enterprise, as they are directed by God. (Compare Isa. xiii. 3. and see below, ver. 13.)

Ver. 12. Let the heathen be awakened.] Let their courage be roused up. (See ver. 9.)

And come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, &c.] See ver. 2.

Ver. 13. Put ye in the sickle; for the harvest is ripe.] God will give his commands to the angels, who are the reapers, Matt. xiii. 39. to cut off the wicked by a speedy destruction; for their iniquities are come to maturity, and are ripe for judgment. (Compare Jer. li. 33. Hos. vi. 11. Matt. xiii. 38. 41. Rev. xiv. 15.)

Come, get you down; for the press is full, &c.] The angels are again commanded to go down from heaven to the valley of decision, ver. 14. The LXX. and the Chaldee paraphrase render the words, Come, tread, deriving the Hebrew word from radah, which verb still retains that sense in the Arabic, as Dr. Pocock informs us.

For the press is full, the fats overflow; for their wickedness is great.] The wicked have filled up the measure of their iniquities. The former words allude to the time of the harvest; these to the season of the vintage. (Compare Rev. xiv. 19.) As the juice of the vine is called the blood of the grape; in pursuance of the same metaphor, God's extraordinary judgments are expressed by his treading the wine-press of his wrath. (See Isa. lxiii. 3. Lam. i. 15. Rev. xiv. 19, 20.)

Ver. 14. Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision.] This makes it probable that the battle here spoken of is the same with that of Gog and Magog, described Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. for there the valley where Gog is said to be buried, is called Hamon Gog; i. e. the multitude of Gog, xxxix. 11. The valley of decision is the same with the valley of Jehoshaphat abovementioned, the place where the great cause shall be decided between God and his enemies.

For the day of the Lord is near.] See ii. 1.

Ver. 15. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, &c.] This particular judgment shall be a forerunner of the general one, when the whole frame of nature shall be dissolved. (See the note upon ii. 10. 31.)

Ver. 16. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion.] Where he shall give tokens of his especial residence. God's anger, when he speaks to us by his judgments, is fitly compared to the roaring of a lion. (See Jer. xxv. 30. Amos i. 2. iii. 8.)

And the heavens and the earth shall shake.] Great commotions or convulsions of states and governments are expressed by shaking the heavens and the earth. (Compare Ezek. xxxviii. 19. Hag. ii. 6. 22.) But here the words may be understood in a literal sense, because the action here described in this chapter is a forerunner and token of the approaching day of judgment.

But the Lord will be the hope of his people, &c.] Though the heaven and earth pass away, his word and promise made to his servants will not pass away. (Compare Isa. li. 6. Matt. xxiv. 35.)

Ver. 17. So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God dwelling in Zion.] You shall find visible effects of my favour and protection. (See ii. 27.)

Then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no strangers pass through her any more.] This character belongs to the New Jerusalem: (compare Isa. xxxv. 8. lii. 1. lx. 21. Rev. xxi. 27.) or it may be understood of the earthly Jerusalem, as the metropolis of the converted Jews. As the inhabitants themselves shall be holy, so the city shall be called the holy city, as in former times it was. (See Dan. ix. 16. Zech. viii. 3. compare Isa. xxiv. 23. Micah iv. 17. Obad. ver. 17.) It shall no more be subject to be polluted or oppressed by unbelievers. (Compare Nahum i. 15.)

Ver. 18. The mountains shall drop down new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk.] In the millennial state there shall be plenty of all things. Vines were usually planted upon hills; (see Isa. v. 1. Psal. lxxx. 11.) these shall yield such plenty of wine, as if the mountains flowed down with it. The flocks and the herds that feed upon the hills shall afford the same plenty of milk. (Compare Amos ix. 14.)

All the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters.] Rivers shall water the driest and most barren parts of the land, and make them fertile. (Compare Isa. xxx. 25.)

And a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord.] The supplies of grace are often represented by rivers and plentiful streams, both upon account of their cleansing quality, as well as because they enrich the ground, and make it fruitful. (Compare Isa. xliv. 3. Ezek. xlvii. 1. 11. Zech. xiii. 7. xiv. 8.) This fountain is said to come forth of the house of the Lord; implying, that the church is the spring from whence all the means of grace are communicated to believers.

And water the valley of Shittim.] So the holy waters, (Ezek. xlvii.) are described as running from the altar as far as the Dead Sea, or the lake Asphaltites; the east part of which bordered upon the country of Moab, within whose border was the valley of Shittim. (See ver. 8. 10. of that chapter.) This denotes the plentiful issues of the Divine grace; an emblem of which was the streams that issued out of the rock, and followed the Israelites through a great part of the wilderness, (1 Cor. x. 4.)

Ver. 19. Egypt shall be a desolation, and Edom shall be a desolate wilderness, &c.] These two people were remarkable for the spite they bare to the Jews: the Egyptians were their oppressors when they first became a nation, and afterward exercised great cruelties upon them during the reign of the Egyptian kings, who were Alexander's successors. The Idumeans are often reproved, and threatened with judgments by the prophets, for the spite they took all occasions to vent against the Israelites, though nearly related to them. (See Jer. xlix. 7. Ezek. xxv. 12. Amos i. 11. Obad. ver. 10.) So those two nations are taken, in a general sense, for the enemies of God's people. (See the note upon Isa. xi. 14.)

Ver. 20. But Judah shall dwell (or continue) for ever, &c.] Free from the annoyance of enemies. (See ver. 17. and compare Amos ix. 15.)

Ver. 21. For I will cleanse their blood that I have not cleansed.] I will thoroughly cleanse them from their sins and pollutions; neither shall they rise up any more in judgment against them. The word blood may signify pollution in general. (See Isa. iv. 3. Ezek. xvi. 6.) But the words chiefly import, that God will pardon the Jews the great crime of shedding the blood of Christ, upon their sincere repentance; the guilt of which they had imprecated upon themselves and their posterity, Matt. xxvi. 25. and had felt the visible effects of God's displeasure upon that account for several ages.

For the Lord dwelleth in Zion.] See ver. 17.

AMOS.

PREFACE.

AMOS was contemporary with Hosea, though he did not probably live so long, but died before the reign of Hezekiah, and the captivity of the ten tribes. St. Jerome gives him this character, that though he was rude in speech, yet not in knowledge. Several of his expressions are taken from such observations as are suitable to the employment of a shepherd: as, when he compares God's anger to the roaring of a lion, i. 2. iii. 8. and the gigantic stature of the Amorites to the height of oaks and cedars, ii. 9. (See also v. 8.) But still there are many beautiful passages in this prophecy, where the expressions are very elegant, and the pathos or rhetoric very moving: such as are ii. 9—11. iv. 6, &c. v. 6. 9. vi. 1. 7. viii. 8. 10. ix. 2. 6.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

In this, and the beginning of the second chapter, the prophet denounces God's judgments against the countries bordering upon Judea; and then prophesies against Judea itself.

Ver. 1. THE words of Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoah.] See vii. 14. Tekoah was in the tribe of Judah, six miles from Beth-lehem, as St. Jerome informs us, who lived near it: the wilderness of Tekoah, mentioned 2 Chron. xx. 20. made it a convenient place for keeping cattle.

Which he saw concerning Israel.] This prophecy relates chiefly to the ten tribes, or kingdom of Israel; though the prophet briefly denounces God's judgments, not only against Judah, but likewise against the Syrians, Philistines, and other neighbouring countries.

And in the days of Jeroboam king of Israel.] See vii. 10.

Two years before the earthquake.] Amos uttered his prophecy at that time, though it is probable he did not commit his book, or collection of prophecies, to writing, till after the earthquake mentioned here, and again Zech. xiv. 15. where it is said to have happened in the days of Uzziah. Josephus relates it as a tradition among the Jews, that this earthquake was sent as a punishment for Uzziah's presumption in invading the priest's office, for which he himself was struck with leprosy, as we read 2 Chron. xxvi. 18, 19. and the whole city was terribly shaken with an earthquake. (See Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 10.) This judgment the Jews suppose to have befallen Uzziah in the twenty-fifth year of his reign; but Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3221. and other later chronologers, think it did not happen till the latter part of Uzziah's life and reign, because his son Jotham took upon him the government, who was not born till after Jeroboam's death: so the earthquake must have happened some time before Uzziah's quitting the government to his son.

Ver. 2. The Lord will roar from Zion.] See the note upon Joel iii. 16.

And the habitations of the shepherds shall mourn, and the top of Carmel shall wither.] The want of pasture here threatened was occasioned by the drought which is foretold, iv. 7, 8. Carmel was a mountainous tract of ground, which ran through the two tribes of Issachar and Zebulun: it is spoken of as one of the most fruitful places in all Judea: (see Isa. xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2.) upon which account the word is sometimes taken appellatively, and translated a fruitful field, Isa. x. 18. xxix. 17.

Ver. 3. For three transgressions of Damascus, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof.] The prophet begins with denouncing his judgments against foreign countries, and then comes to Judah and Israel. The first he threatens is Syria, the head or capital city of which was Damascus, (see Isa. vii. 8.) for the several transgressions they had committed, expressed by three transgressions, and four. It is a common way of speaking, to use a certain number for an uncertain. So we read, Job v. 19. He shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea, in seven no evil shall touch thee. (See the like phrase, Prov. vi. 16. Eccles. xi. 2. Micah v. 5.) So once and twice are used, Psal. lxii. 11. twice and thrice, Job xxxiii. 29.

Because they have thrashed Gilead with thrashing instruments of iron.] The way of thrashing in the eastern countries was by drawing heavy planks with iron wheels over the corn, having sharp stones fastened on the boards. (See Dr. Hammond's notes on Matt. iii. 12.) From hence the phrase is used to signify the weak's being crushed by the mighty. (See Isa. xli. 15. Jer. li. 33.) Here it denotes the cruelties exercised by Hazael and Ben-hadad, kings of Syria: see 2 Kings x. 32, 33. xiii. 3. 7. where the sacred historian, speaking in the phrase of the text, saith, that he made them like the dust by thrashing.

Ver. 4. But I will send a fire into the house of Hazael, &c.] God's judgments are often compared to fire. (See Psal. lxxviii. 63. and the note upon Ezek. xxx. 8.) The word is taken in this general sense in the following verses.

Ver. 5. I will break also the bars of Damascus.] Its gates and fortifications, wherein its strength consists.

And cut off the inhabitant from the plain of Aven.] Or, Bikath-aven: the word signifies the plain of vanity; from whence some conjecture it was a place in Syria remarkable for idolatry: as Beth-el is called Beth-aven for that reason, Hos. v. 15. (See the following note.)

And him that holdeth the sceptre from the house of Eden.] The house of Eden is equivalent to the house of pleasure: so it may denote one of the pleasant palaces belonging to the king of Syria, described by him that holdeth the sceptre. But Eden was likewise a country bordering upon Syria, mentioned 2 Kings xix. 12. Ezek. xxvii. 23. (See the note there.) Mr. Maundrell, in his Travels, observes, that not far from Damascus there is a plain still called the valley of Bocat, which he supposes the same with Bikath-aven here mentioned: and there is a place at this time called Eden near it. (See his Corrections upon p. 118.)

Him that holdeth the sceptre—and the people of Syria, shall go into captivity unto Kir.] This was fulfilled when Tiglath-pileser took Damascus, and carried the people of it captive to Kir, and slew Rezin their king, 2 Kings xvi. 9. Kir was a city in Media, mentioned Isa. xxii. 6. The Vulgar Latin renders it Cyrene, both here and in the second of Kings: but that does not appear to have been under the king of Assyria's dominion.

Ver. 6. For three transgressions of Gaza, &c.] This city was situate upon the coast of Palestine, and is one of those threatened by Joel, iii. 6.

Because they carried away captive the whole captivity.] Gaza was a town belonging to the Philistines, who made frequent invasions upon the Jews, and carried away considerable spoils with them. (See 2 Chron. xxi. 16. xxviii. 18.)

To deliver them up to Edom.] See ver. 11.

Ver. 7. But I will send a fire on the wall of Gaza, &c.] Compare Jer. xlvii. 1.

Ver. 8. And I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod.] Another town belonging to the Philistines, and threatened by the prophets with the same judgments which befel Gaza. (See Jer. xxv. 20. Zeph. ii. 4. Zech. ix. 5.)

And I will turn my hand against Ekron.] To turn the hand, is the same as to inflict punishment. (See Psal. lxxxi. 14. Isa. i. 25. Zech. xiii. 7.)

And the remnant of the Philistines shall perish.] These are elsewhere called the remnant of the sea-coast, Ezek. xxv. 16. and the remnant of the country of Caphtor, Jer. xlvii. 4. (See the note there.)

Ver. 9. For three transgressions of Tyrus, &c.] This is probably to be understood of the destruction of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, foretold by Isaiah, chap. xxiii. by Jeremiah, xlvii. 4. where it is joined with the Philistines, as here; and by Ezekiel, chap. xxvi. xxvii.

Because they delivered up the whole captivity to Edom.] See ver. 11.

And remembered not the brotherly covenant.] That strict league and friendship begun between David and Hiram king of Tyre, 2 Sam. v. 11. and afterward continued by Solomon, 1 Kings v. 1. ix. 11.

Ver. 11. For three transgressions of Edom, and for four, &c.] The Idumeans are often threatened for their enmity against the Israelites; who took all occasions to oppress them, and to insult over them in their distress. (See 2 Chron. xxviii. 17. Jer. xlix. 7. Ezek. xxv. 12. xxxv. 2. Joel iii. 19. Obad. ver. 1—11.)

Because he did pursue his brother with the sword.] They retained the same hatred and animosity against their brethren the Israelites, which their father Esau had expressed against his brother Jacob.

Ver. 12. But I will send a fire upon Teman, which shall devour the palaces of Bozrah.] Teman and Bozrah were two principal cities of Idumea. (See Isa. lxiii. 1. Jer. xlix. 7. Ezek. xxv. 15.) This expression imports the entire conquest and destruction of that country, according to the predictions of the prophets beforecited; to which may be added, Mal. i. 3, 4. The ancient seat of the Edomites was the same which was afterward called Arabia Petræa; from whence they were expelled by the Nabatheans, and never could recover their country, but were forced to settle themselves in the southern parts of Judea. (See Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. ad A. C. 165.)

Ver. 13. Because they ripped up the women with child of Gilead, to enlarge their border.] Hazael, king of Syria, grievously afflicted the Israelites that lay eastward of Jordan, particularly the Gileadites. (See 2 Kings x. 33.) The low condition these countries were reduced to, might probably encourage the Ammonites to possess themselves of Gilead, which lay near their own borders, and to destroy the inhabitants in that cruel manner. (Compare Jer. xlix. 1. Zeph. ii. 8. Hos. xiii. 16.)

Ver. 14. But I will kindle a fire on the wall of Rabbah, &c.] Compare Jer. xlix. 2. Rabbah was the chief city of the Ammonites. (See 2 Sam. xii. 26.)

With a tempest in the day of the whirlwind.] The destructions of war are often compared to the devastations caused by whirlwinds and tempests. (See Isa. v. 26. Jer. xxv. 32. Dan. xi. 40. Zech. ix. 14.)

Ver. 15. And their king shall go into captivity, he and his princes together.] See Jer. xlix. 3.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

After two short denunciations against Moab and Judah, the prophet proceeds to the main subject of his prophecy, viz. to denounce God's judgments against Israel.

Ver. 1. FOR three transgressions of Moab, &c.] Moab and Ammon, as they were nearly related, and bordered upon each other, so they are usually joined together in the threatenings of the prophets. (See Jer. xlviii. xlix. Ezek. xxv. 1. 8. Zeph. ii. 8.)

Ver. 2. Because he burnt the bones of the king of Edom to lime.] To plaster the walls of his house with it, as the Chaldee paraphrase explains the text; which was a cruel insulting over the dead. A piece of barbarity resembling this is told by Sir Paul Rycaut, of the wall of the city of Philadelphia, made of the bones of the besieged, by the prince that took it by storm, in The present State of the Greek Church, chap. 2. Some refer the cruelty reproved in the text to the story of the king of Moab, related 2 Kings iii. 27. But the story there recited, seems rather to be understood of the king of Moab's own son, than of the king of Edom's.

And Moab shall die with tumult, &c.] His men shall die in the tumult of war. (Compare Jer. xlviii. 15.)

Ver. 3. And I will cut off the judge from the midst thereof.] The word judge denotes the supreme magistrate or governor; (see Deut. xvii. 9.) and is here equivalent to the king. (Compare Micah v. 1.)

Ver. 4. For their lies have caused them to err, after which their fathers walked.] Many of the tribe of Judah have continued in the same idolatry and worship of false gods, which their wicked kings, such as Jehoram and Ahaziah, and their forefathers, have set up, notwithstanding all the warnings I have given them by my prophets. (See 2 Chron. xxiv. 17—19.) Idols are often called lies in the Scripture. (See the note upon Hos. vii. 3.)

Ver. 6. Because they sold the righteous for silver, &c.] They perverted the cause of the righteous, and gave an unjust sentence against him for a bribe of the smallest value. (Compare v. 11, 12. viii. 6.)

Ver. 7. That pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor.] The Vulgar Latin hath given the best sense of this sentence, "Qui conterunt super pulverem terræ capita pauperum;" Who tread down the heads of the poor into the dust of the earth: i. e. they throw them into the dust, and then trample upon them. The Chaldee paraphrase understands the verb shaaph in the sense of despising, which comes near the sense of trampling upon: the LXX. render it by καταπατέω, to tread upon, both here and Psal. lvi. 1, 2. lvii. 3. The verb shoph, which is near akin to shaaph, plainly signifies to tread upon, or bruise, Gen. iii. 15.

And a man and his father will go in to the same maid (or young woman), to profane my holy name.] One man hath cohabited with his father's wife, to the great reproach of my name and religion; being such an instance of fornication, or uncleanness, as is scarce heard of among the more civilized heathens, as St. Paul observes, 1 Cor. v. 1. And another hath lewdly defiled his daughter-in-law, as Ezekiel complains, xxii. 11. in contradiction to the express words of the law, Lev. xviii. 8. 15.

Ver. 8. And they lay themselves down upon clothes laid to pledge, by every altar.] This is to be understood of the feasts which were made of part of their idolatrous sacrifices, and were eaten in some of the apartments of their temples, according to the custom both of the Jews and gentiles. (See 1 Sam. ix. 12, 13. 22. Isa. lvii. 7. Ezek. xxiii. 41.) The prophet reproves them not only for partaking of things offered to idols, but likewise for making use of other men's furniture, left in their hands for a pledge, to set off their idolatrous entertainments. Here was another instance of their unmercifulness, to detain pledges received from the poor, contrary to the law, Exod. xxii. 26. (See the note upon Ezek. xviii. 7.)

The Jews, as well as the Romans, used to lie along at their meals in couches, as appears by this verse, compared with vi. 4. This custom continued in aftertimes, as appears by several places in the gospels, where it is in the original, Lay down to meat; though our translation renders it, Sat down. The custom of sitting at meals seems to have been the more ancient of the two. (See Gen. xliii. 33. 1 Sam. ix. 22. xvi. 11. xx. 25.)

And they drink the wine of the condemned.] The drink-offerings, made with wine, were a necessary part of the sacrifices: some of which was likewise reserved for the entertainment that followed. (See Exod. xxxii. 6.) And this was provided out of the fines or mulcts of such as had been unjustly condemned: (ver. 6.)

In the house of their god.] In the houses dedicated to the calves of Dan and Beth-el, or some other idolatrous temple.

Ver. 9. Yet I destroyed the Amorite before them.] The Amorites include the rest of the Canaanites. (See Gen. xv. 16.)

Whose height was as the height of the cedars, and he was as strong as the oaks.] Many of them were of a gigantic stature, as appears from Numb. xiii. 32, 33. Virgil makes the same comparison, speaking of the Titans, Æneid. lib. iii. ver. 677.

> "Concilium horrendum, quales cum vertice celso
> Aeriæ quercus, aut coniferæ cyparissi
> Constiterunt, sylva alta Jovis, lucusve Dianæ."
> A dreadful council, with their heads on high,
> Not yielding to the tow'ring tree of Jove,
> Or tallest cypress of Diana's grove.
> MR. DRYDEN.

Ver. 10. And led you forty years through the wilderness.] Where you wanted for nothing. (See Deut. ii. 7. viii. 2—4.)

Ver. 11. And I raised up of your sons to be prophets.] I provided for you a succession of prophets, bred up in schools erected for that purpose, (see 2 Kings vi. 1, 2.) to be your constant instructors, and to whom you might have recourse in any difficulty.

And of your young men for Nazarites.] A Nazarite signifies one separate, or set apart for the service of God. (See Numb. vi. 2. 5.) Such were Samson, Judg. xiii. 5. and John Baptist, Luke i. 15. Their vow did often include in it, beside their abstaining from wine and not shaving their heads, a constant attendance upon God's service, during the time of their separation. (See 1 Macc. iii. 49. and the note upon Hos. ix. 10.) We read of women that departed not from the temple, Exod. xxxviii. 8. such as Anna, Luke ii. 37. and there might probably be men that constantly attended upon the service there: and of such I would upon second thoughts understand the Nazarites, mentioned Lam. iv. 7. They are described in that place as remarkable for their youth and beauty: and they are styled young men here. A Nazarite is always mentioned as a title of honour, and Joseph is called, by way of eminence, a Nazarite among his brethren, as the original imports, Gen. xlix. 26.

Ver. 12. And commanded the prophets, saying, Prophesy not.] See vii. 13. Isa. xxx. 10. Jer. xi. 21. Micah ii. 6. They would not endure their idolatry and other darling sins should be reproved.

Ver. 13. Behold, I am pressed under you, &c.] Your sins have quite tired out my patience, and I am weary with bearing them. (Compare Isa. xliii. 24. Mal. ii. 17.)

Ver. 14, 15. Therefore shall the flight perish from the swift, &c.] The most likely means you can provide for your security, shall prove ineffectual. (Compare ix. 1, &c.)

Ver. 16. And he that is courageous shall flee away naked.] Having put off his armour for greater expedition. The word naked is used of those who lay aside their upper garments, or the habit proper to their quality or profession. (See the note upon Isa. xx. 2.)

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter contains a threatening of God's judgments, first against the twelve tribes in general, and then particularly against the kingdom of Israel, whose capital city was Samaria.

Ver. 1. HEAR this word that the Lord hath spoken—against the whole family which I brought up from the land of Egypt.] All that family of which Jacob, or Israel, was the head: family is equivalent to people, here and in the following verse; and so it is taken Jer. i. 15. viii. 3. x. 25. Nahum iii. 4. Zech. xiv. 18.

Ver. 2. You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities.] Your punishment shall be exemplary, because you have sinned against a clearer light, and higher obligations. For the same reason the angel is commanded to begin his execution at the sanctuary, Ezek. ix. 6. (Compare Matt. xi. 22. Luke xii. 47.)

Ver. 3. Can two walk together (as friends), except they be agreed?] So neither can I behave myself towards you as a friend or benefactor, as long as you act in perfect contradiction to my nature and laws by your manifold sins.

Ver. 4. Will a lion roar in the forest when he hath no prey?] As a lion doth not use to roar but when he hath his prey in view; so neither doth God denounce his judgments, (compared to the roaring of a lion, ver. 8.) unless your sins have made you proper objects of his displeasure.

Ver. 5. Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth where no gin is for him?] God is said to watch over sinners to bring evil upon them, Jer. xxxi. 21. Dan. ix. 14. and thus he will deal by this people, unless they repent.

Shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken up nothing at all?] In like manner you are not to expect that God should remove his judgments till they have attained their proper end, viz. the people's repentance.

Ver. 6. Shall the trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid?] The sounding of the trumpet was the signal of war: such an alarm is apt to strike men with terror: (see Jer. iv. 12.) and the warnings God gives his people by the prophets, of the judgments hanging over their heads, ought equally to affect them.

Shall there be evil in the city, and the Lord hath not done it?] You may be assured that the calamities you feel, or have just cause to fear, are not the effect of chance, but come upon you by the especial direction of Providence. (Compare Isa. xlv. 7.)

Ver. 7. Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he reveals his secrets unto his servants the prophets.] There was a succession of prophets among the Jews from Samuel's time till the captivity: the people commonly consulted them upon extraordinary occasions, and they gave them counsel and direction what was proper to be done. (See ii. 11. 1 Kings xxii. 13. 2 Kings iii. 11. xxii. 13. Jer. xxi. 2. Ezek. xx. 2.) The want of this prophetical gift was much lamented in the times of the captivity. (See Ezek. vii. 26. Lament. ii. 9. Psal. lxxiv. 9.)

Ver. 8. The lion hath roared, who will not fear? the Lord hath spoken, who can but prophesy?] As the denouncing of the Divine judgments ought to terrify you like the roaring of a lion, (see ver. 4. and i. 2.) so the prophets that are God's messengers must obey those commands and instructions he gives them, with whatever perils the discharge of their duty may be attended. (See ii. 12. vi. 12, 13.)

Ver. 9. Publish ye in the palaces of Ashdod, and in the palaces of the land of Egypt, &c.] God calls upon the heathen to be witnesses of his judgments upon his own people, that they may take warning thereby: particularly he gives notice to the Philistines and Egyptians, the Jews' inveterate enemies, that they may assemble themselves, and with pleasure behold the ravages and oppressions which their insulting adversaries will bring upon the kingdom of Israel, whose capital city was Samaria, built upon a hill of the same name: (1 Kings xvi. 24.) or the mountains of Samaria may be equivalent to the mountains of Israel, mentioned Ezek. xxxvi. 8. xxxvii. 22. Samaria being often taken for the whole kingdom of Israel. (See the note upon Hos. viii. 6.)

Ver. 10. For they know not to do right.] i. e. They will not know nor learn to do right. (See Jer. v. 4. viii. 7. ix. 3.)

Ver. 11. An adversary shall be even round about the land.] Shalmaneser the king of Assyria shall invade the land on every side, shall dismantle its fortresses, and plunder its wealthy palaces.

Ver. 12. As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear, &c.] When the lion hath for some time ravaged the flock, but is at last frighted away by the noise of the shepherds and their dogs, or by throwing darts and other offensive weapons at him; in such a case the shepherd can hope to save but only some poor remains of the prey the lion had seized upon. And thus shall it be at the sacking of Samaria; but a small remainder of the inhabitants shall escape the search of their enemies, though they try to hide themselves in their most retired apartments. (Compare 1 Kings xx. 30. xxii. 25.)

And in Damascus in a couch.] The marginal reading gives a better sense, On the bed's feet. They that follow the reading of the text, explain it of those Israelites who fled for refuge to Damascus, there being a confederacy between Israel and Syria; (see Isa. vii. 2.) but were seized there, upon the taking of Damascus. (See i. 5. 2 Kings xvi. 9. compared with xv. 29.) Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria conquered both Israel and Syria. (See the places abovecited, and compare Isa. vii. 16. xvii. 1—3.)

Ver. 13. Hear ye, and testify in the house of Jacob, &c.] The words are directed to the prophets, whom God sends to testify and declare his will.

Ver. 14. That in the day that I shall visit the transgressions of Israel upon him, I will also visit the altars of Beth-el.] In the general destruction of the ten tribes, God's judgments should be particularly visible upon the places dedicated to idolatrous worship, especially Beth-el, the principal place of that kind. (See ix. 1. Hos. x. 5, 6. 8.) Altars may stand here for altar; as we read of the calves of Beth-aven, in that place of Hosea, meaning the calf at Beth-el.

And the horns of the altar shall be cut off.] They were squares placed at the four corners of the altar, and hollow in the middle, into which some of the blood of the sacrifices was poured out. (See Exod. xxvii. 12. and Dr. Prideaux's draught of the altar, in the first part of his Connex. of Script. Hist.)

Ver. 15. And I will smite the winter-house with the summer-house.] The great men had their different houses or apartments suited to the several seasons of the year. (See Jer. xxxvi. 21.)

And the houses of ivory shall perish.] King Ahab built him an ivory house, i. e. ceiled or wainscotted with ivory, (1 Kings xxii. 39.) It is probable other great men followed his example, in adorning their houses after this costly manner. Whereupon the prophet threatens destruction to this piece of pride and state.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet reproveth the ten tribes for luxury and oppression, for idolatry and impenitency, notwithstanding the severe judgments already inflicted upon them.

Ver. 1. HEAR ye this word, ye kine of Bashan.] The luxury and insolence of oppressors is often compared to the wantonness of full-fed cattle. (See Psal. xxii. 12. lxviii. 30.) Bashan was remarkable for richness of its pastures, and its breed of cattle. (Numb. xxxii. 4. Deut. xxxii. 14. Ezek. xxxix. 18.) Grotius and some other commentators suppose this to be meant of the women of quality. (See ver. 3.)

That are in the mountain of Samaria.] See iii. 9.

Which say to their masters, Bring, and let us drink.] If we explain the former part of the verse of women, by their masters, or lords, as the word is sometimes translated, may be understood their husbands; (see Gen. xviii. 12.) or else by masters we may understand those to whom they sold the poor for slaves, (compare ii. 6.) and demanded the money due for their purchase, that they might spend it in a luxurious manner. So the text will be equivalent to that in Joel, iii. 3. They have sold a girl for wine, that they may drink.

Ver. 2. The Lord God hath sworn by his holiness.] As sure as he is holy and true, so certainly will he bring the threatened judgment upon this people. (Compare Psal. lxxxix. 35.)

That he will take you away with hooks, and your posterity with fish-hooks.] Invaders and spoilers are elsewhere compared to fishers. (See Jer. xvi. 16. Habak. i. 15.) The words besiroth diegah, translated with fish-hooks, the Targum translates, in fisher-boats; boats made in the fashion of a pot, for the word siroth properly signifies a pot. The several invaders of Israel, first, Tiglath-pileser, (2 Kings xv. 29.) then Shalmaneser, (ibid. xvii. 5.) The Syrians before, and the Philistines behind, (Isa. ix. 12.) these coming after one another, will make an entire riddance of the whole nation: so that their posterity, or remainder, as the word may be translated, which hath escaped the first invaders, shall certainly fall into the hands of those that come after.

Ver. 3. And ye shall go out of the breaches, every cow at that which is before her.] The prophet pursues the metaphor taken from the kine of Bashan, ver. 1. and tells the people, that as cattle strive to get out at every breach they can find in a mound or fence, so shall they with all possible haste make their escape at the several breaches which shall be made in the walls of Samaria. (Compare 2 Kings xxv. 4. Ezek. xii. 12.)

And ye shall cast them into the palace.] The sentence may be thus translated, Ye shall cast out yourselves; i. e. Ye shall with haste betake yourselves to Harmon; so the Vulgar Latin: or, to the mountains of Mona; by which the Chaldee understands Armenia, others the mountains of the Maonites, or Mehunims, as they are called, Judg. x. 12. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7. They are called Minæi by Strabo, and reckoned inhabitants of Arabia Felix: (lib. xvii. p. 768. edit. Casaub.)

Ver. 4. Come to Beth-el, and transgress.] A permission spoken by way of sarcasm and irony, sharply upbraiding them as incorrigible, and not to be reformed by all the reproofs and admonitions that have been given them: like that of Ezekiel, xx. 39. Go ye, serve every man his idols. (See the note there.)

At Gilgal multiply transgressions.] Gilgal was a place noted for idolatry, as well as Beth-el. (See the note upon Hos. iv. 15.)

And bring your sacrifices every morning.] According to the law of the daily burnt-offering, (Numb. xxviii. 4.) which they observed in the worship of the golden calves, intending by that outward representation to worship the God of Israel. (Compare viii. 5. 10.)

And your tithes after three years.] At the end of three years, when the tithe, spent the other two years at Jerusalem, was distributed among the poor. (See Deut. xiv. 22, 23. 28.) Upon which account the third year is called the year of tithing; Deut. xxvi. 12. (See Dr. Wootton upon the Mischna, par. i. p. 115.) The Hebrew reads, After three days, which our margin supplies, After three years of days. The word yamim, days, often signifies years. (See Exod. xiii. 10. Lev. xxv. 29. 1 Sam. i. 3. 2 Sam. xiv. 26. compare Gen. xxiv. 55.) So the phrase which we translate, The yearly sacrifice, is, in the Hebrew, The sacrifice of days: 1 Sam. i. 21. xx. 6.

Ver. 5. And offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven.] Or, With leavened bread; as the law prescribes, Lev. vii. 13. Beside the cakes which were to be unleavened, because it was an offering made by fire: ibid. ver. 12, 13. and ii. 4, &c.

And proclaim and publish the free-offerings.] Or, free-will-offerings; as the word is in other places translated. (See Lev. xxii. 18. 21.) These offerings were such as the sacrificers did partake of; whereupon they gave notice of their intention to their friends, and invited them to the feast. (See Deut. xii. 6, 7.)

For this liketh you, O house of Israel.] Your hearts are so set upon your idolatrous worship, that it is in vain to use any arguments to persuade you to the contrary. (See Psal. lxxxi. 12.)

Ver. 6. And I also have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities, &c.] Or, For this cause I have given you. (See Noldius, p. 337, 338.) The famine I have sent upon the cities and territories of Israel hath not brought you to a sense of your sins, or any sincere purposes of amendment.

Ver. 7. And also I have withholden the rain from you, when there were yet three months to the harvest.] This was called the latter rain, and the season for it was in the first month, answering to our March, which was three months before the wheat-harvest. (See the note upon Joel ii. 23.)

And I caused it to rain upon one city, and caused it not to rain upon another city.] This may import, that God punished them with drought, at the same time when he sent rain upon the cities of Judah; making that remarkable difference between Israel and Judah, as he did formerly between Egypt and the land of Goshen. (See Exod. viii. 22. ix. 4. 26. x. 23.)

Ver. 8. So two or three cities wandered to one city, to drink water; but they were not satisfied.] They had not enough to quench their thirst: the contrary phrase, To eat or drink, and be satisfied, denoteth plenty. (See the note upon Joel ii. 26.)

Ver. 9. I have smitten you with blasting and with mildew.] A judgment threatened to their sins by Moses, Deut. xxviii. 22.

When your gardens and your vineyards increased, the palmer-worm devoured them.] The palmer-worm and other devouring insects, occasioned by the drought beforementioned. (Compare Joel i. 4.)

Ver. 10. I have sent among you the pestilence after the manner of Egypt.] The several infectious diseases wherewith I plagued Egypt. (See Exod. ix. 3. xii. 29. Deut. xxviii. 27. 60.)

And have taken away your horses.] The enemy hath seized them. (See 2 Kings xiii. 3. 7.) Horses were scarce in Judea, and the Jews used to furnish themselves with horses from Egypt: so such a loss was not easily recruited. (See 1 Kings x. 29. Isa. xxxi. 1. xxxvi. 9.)

And I have made the stink of your camps to come up into your nostrils.] The kings of Israel had frequent wars with the Syrians. (See 2 Kings xiii. 25. xiv. 28.) This made it necessary for them to keep up standing forces: and when diseases spread in their camps, the noisome smell of the carcasses produced a pestilence.

Ver. 11. I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.] Your cities are burnt with fire, (Isa. i. 7.) and utterly consumed, as Sodom and Gomorrah were, by fire from heaven, (Gen. xix. 24, 25.)

And ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning.] Those that remained very narrowly escaped. A proverbial expression, used both in sacred and profane authors, to signify a narrow escape out of an imminent danger. (Compare Zech. iii. 2. 1 Cor. iii. 15. Jude ver. 23.)

Ver. 12. Therefore thus will I do unto thee.] I will send these several judgments upon thee altogether, till I make an entire destruction of thee.

And because I will do this unto thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.] Expect that he will come to take full vengeance upon thee, and consider whether thou art able to contend with him; so the expression of meeting an adversary is understood, Luke xiv. 31. Or, if that be impossible, try to avert his anger by thy humiliation and repentance, before it actually breaks out upon thee.

Ver. 13. For, lo, he that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind.] The former the most solid, the other the most subtile and active part of the material world.

And declareth unto man what is his thought.] Whose knowledge is infinite, as well as his power; who searches the thoughts and intents of the heart; and, upon some occasions, discovers them for men's conviction. (See Dan. ii. 28.)

That maketh the morning darkness.] Who turns day into night, overcasting the heaven with clouds; (see v. 8.) or else, darkens the earth in the clear days, by an extraordinary eclipse of the sun: (see viii. 9.) and can in like manner turn the most flourishing condition into a state of misery. (Compare v. 18, 19.) Affliction is often expressed by darkness. (See v. 18. Job xxii. 11. Isa. v. 30. viii. 22.)

And treadeth upon the high places of the earth.] Who can subdue cities or fortresses of the greatest strength, whose walls reach up to heaven, as it is expressed Deut. i. 28. (compare xxxiii. 29.) and takes delight to humble the great and mighty, denoted elsewhere by the mountains and hills. (See Isa. ii. 14. Psal. lxxii. 3.)

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.

A pathetical lamentation for the sins of Israel, which, upon their impenitency, the prophet foresaw would end in their destruction: whereupon he earnestly exhorts them to a sincere repentance and reformation, without which all their outward exercises of religion would avail nothing.

Ver. 1. HEAR you this word, which I take up against you, even a lamentation, O house of Israel.] The words might be better translated thus, Hear you this word, even a lamentation which I take up over you. The text alludes to the lamentations made at funerals. (See ver. 16. Jer. ix. 17. Ezek. xix. 2. xxvii. 2.) So the prophet bemoans the state of the kingdom of Israel, as dead and irrecoverably lost.

Ver. 2. The virgin of Israel is fallen; she shall no more rise.] She that never was conquered by any, is fallen from her glory, and shall never be restored to her former state, as a kingdom or nation. Those cities or kingdoms are called virgins who were never conquered. (See Isa. xxiii. 12. xxxvii. 22.) The virgin of Israel may likewise import her that was espoused to God, as a chaste virgin to a husband, (see 2 Cor. xi. 2.) and had the benefit of being under his protection, but is now, for her idolatries and other sins, delivered up to the will of her enemies. (Compare Jer. xviii. 13.)

She is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her up.] Like an infant that is exposed, or fallen upon the ground, and hath none to take it up.

Ver. 3. The city which went out by a thousand shall leave a hundred, &c.] A city which was able to furnish out a thousand men fit for war, shall have but a hundred of them left. And so it shall be in proportion for any less number: but one in ten of them shall escape the sword, and other chances of war.

Ver. 4. For [or rather, therefore] thus saith the Lord, Seek ye me, and ye shall live.] i. e. Ye shall be prosperous. Life is taken for prosperity or happiness: (see 1 Sam. xxv. 6.) as death is used for misery, Exod. x. 17. Hos. xiii. 1.

Ver. 5. But seek ye not Beth-el, nor enter into Gilgal.] See iv. 4.

And pass not to Beer-sheba.] A place remarkable for Abraham's dwelling there, and planting a grove for the worship of God, (Gen. xxi. 33. xxii. 19.) It is likely a grove might still be continued there, and abused to idolatry. (See vii. 9. viii. 14.) Beer-sheba did formerly belong to Judah: (see 1 Kings xix. 3.) but it seems in latter times to have been taken from it by some of the kings of Israel.

For Gilgal shall go into captivity.] There is an allusion in the Hebrew between the word Gilgal and Galah, which signifies captivity. Such paronomasias are now and then used by the sacred writers. (See the note upon Isa. xxiv. 17.)

And Beth-el shall come to nought.] The original runs thus, Beth-el shall become Aven. Beth-el signifies the house of God: when the place was defiled by idolatry, it was named by way of reproach, Beth-aven, i. e. the house of vanity, or idolatry: (see Hos. iv. 15.) and it is here called so in another sense, viz. as vanity is the same with a thing of nought, or of no continuance.

Ver. 6. Lest he break out like fire [see i. 4.] in the house of Joseph.] The ten tribes are called by the name of Joseph, as they are elsewhere by that of Ephraim, the son of Joseph; because that was the chief tribe of the kingdom of Israel. (See Ezek. xxxvii. 19.)

And there be none to quench it in Beth-el.] The idol you worship will not be able to deliver you, but will itself be involved in the common calamity. (See the note upon Hos. x. 6.)

Ver. 7. Ye who turn judgment into wormwood.] Or, Into hemlock, as the word laannah is translated, vi. 12. Ye that pervert the law which was designed to protect innocence, and under colour of it exercise the greatest oppression.

Ver. 8. Seek him that makes the seven stars and Orion.] The Hebrew names of these constellations are Kima and Kesil, which are translated to the same sense, Job ix. 9. xxxviii. 31. These, and other constellations, were commonly thought to have a great influence upon the seasons. (See the forementioned place of Job.) Whereupon their rising and setting used to be particularly taken notice of by husbandmen and shepherds; whose employments lying abroad, made them more observant of the heavenly appearances. So this is an instance of Providence very suitable for one of Amos's profession to mention.

That turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night.] The vicissitudes of day and night, and the light's breaking out of darkness, are just matter of admiration, did not the constant recourse of them lessen the wonder. Clemens Alexandrinus cites these verses out of Pindar to the same sense:

Θεῷ δὲ δυνατὸν ἐκ μελαίνας
Νυκτὸς ἀμίαντον ὥρσαι φῶς·
Κελαινῷ νέφει δὲ σκότου καλύψαι
Καθαρὸν ἀμέρας σέλας.

God can create the light,
And make it spring from darkest night:
And when he covers o'er the day,
The darkness chases light away.

That calleth for the waters of the sea, and poureth them out upon the face of the earth.] Who commandeth the seas and the rivers to overflow the earth in great inundations. The Jews call all great bodies of water by the name of seas. The words may likewise be explained of the raising vapours out of the sea, to supply rain for the earth, the clouds retaining none of the saltness of the sea-water. (Compare Job xxxviii. 34.)

Ver. 9. That strengtheneth the spoiled against the strong, &c.] That giveth strength to him that hath been conquered, and enableth him to subdue his conquerors, and become master of their fortifications. And such deliverance God is able to work for Israel. (See 2 Kings xiii. 17, &c.)

Ver. 10. They hate him that reproveth in the gate.] The oppressors of the poor, (see ver. 11, 12.) hate those magistrates that would punish the injurious, and do right to the oppressed. It was the custom for judges to execute their office sitting in the gates of the city. (See the note upon Isa. xxix. 21. and ver. 15. of this chapter.)

Ver. 11. Forasmuch as your treading is upon the poor, and ye take from him burdens of wheat.] Or, Choice gifts, as the LXX. render it, agreeably to the sense of the Hebrew, where the word massah often signifies a gift or reward; (see Jer. xl. 5. Ezek. xx. 40.) and bar, the choice or best of any thing.

Ye have built houses of hewn stone, but ye shall not dwell in them, &c.] God often threatens to deprive men of the enjoyment of their ill-gotten substance. (See Deut. xxviii. 38, 39. Micah vi. 15. Zeph. i. 13.)

Ver. 12. For I know your manifold transgressions, and your mighty sins.] Your daring impieties, your sins of the first magnitude, such as idolatry and oppression, reproved in the foregoing part of the chapter: or your numerous sins, as the word may be translated; in which sense it is taken, Isa. xlvii. 9.

Ver. 13. Therefore the prudent shall keep silence in that time, &c.] In such times as these, the wisest way for private persons is not to be too free in reproving public vices; which will bring trouble upon themselves, and do no good upon those who are hardened in their sins. (Compare Hos. iv. 4. Matt. vii. 6.)

Ver. 14. Seek good, and not evil, that ye may live.] See ver. 4.

And so the Lord, the God of hosts, may be with you, as ye have spoken.] Ye use to boast of your interest in him, and of the promises he hath made to your fathers: and obedience is the condition required on your part to qualify you for his favour.

Ver. 15. Establish judgment in the gate.] See ver. 10.

It may be the Lord will be gracious to the remnant of Joseph.] Your case is not so desperate, but repentance may avert God's judgments: (compare Jer. xxxvi. 3.) and he may be gracious to the small remains of the ten tribes, (see ver. 6.) after those grievous invasions wherewith the kings of Syria first, and afterward Tiglath-pileser, have wasted them. (See 2 Kings xiii. 7. 23. xiv. 26, 27. xv. 29.)

Ver. 16. Wailing shall be in all—and they shall call the husbandman to mourning, &c.] There shall be a general lamentation of all orders and degrees of men; of the citizens, for the loss of their wealth and substance, plundered by the conquerors; of the husbandman and vine-dressers, for the loss of the fruits of the earth, destroyed or devoured by a foreign army.

And such as are skilful in lamentation to wailing.] Let such whose profession it is to make lamentation at funerals join in this public mourning, to make it more solemn. (See ver. 1.)

Ver. 17. And in all vineyards shall be wailing.] Where there used to be shouting and rejoicing, when the summer-fruits were gathered in. (See Isa. xvi. 10. Jer. xxv. 30. xlviii. 33.)

For I will pass through thee, saith the Lord.] He will come like an enemy, that invadeth and destroyeth a country as he marches through it. (Compare Exod. xii. 12. Nahum i. 15.)

Ver. 18. Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord.] Infidels made a mock of the words of the prophets, when they told them, the day of the Lord was at hand: (see Joel ii. 2. 11. Zeph. i. 14.) and out of a principle of unbelief they expressed their desire of seeing this day, that they might be convinced of the truth of such predictions by ocular demonstration. (Compare Isa. v. 19. Jer. xvii. 15. Ezek. xii. 22. 27. 2 Pet. iii. 4.)

To what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light.] To what purpose should you desire to see the day of the Lord? It will certainly be a very uncomfortable time, when evils shall succeed one another so fast, that he who seeks to escape one shall fall into a worse. (Compare Joel ii. 2. and see the note upon iv. 13.)

Ver. 19. As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him.] You may think that day will put an end to the evils which you now complain of; but it will indeed make your condition worse than it was before: as if a man fled from a lion, a creature that has something of generosity in his nature, and a bear should meet him, which never spares any thing that comes in its way.

Or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him.] Or as if a man should go into the house to avoid the severity of the weather abroad; and a viper, whose sting is incurable, should creep out of the wall and bite him.

Ver. 20.] See ver. 18.

Ver. 21. I hate, I despise your feast-days, &c.] This and the three following verses are the same in sense with Isa. i. 11. 16. Jer. vi. 20. vii. 21—23. Hos. vi. 6. viii. 13. all which places import, how little the external rites of religion are valuable, unless they are accompanied with a universal obedience.

And I will not smell in your solemn assemblies.] Or, I will not smell the sacrifices of your solemn assemblies. The word chag signifies both a solemn feast, and the sacrifice offered at it: (see Exod. xxiii. 18.) and by the same reason the word astereth may be capable of both those significations.

Ver. 22. Neither will I regard the peace-offerings of your fat beasts.] They made choice of the fairest and fattest cattle, when they offered peace-offerings, or offerings of thanksgiving. So we read Psal. lxvi. 15. I will offer unto thee burnt-offerings of fatlings with the incense, or burnt fat, of rams.

Ver. 23. Take from me the noise of thy songs, &c.] The psalms and hymns were sung in the temple with vocal and instrumental music. As the worshippers at Beth-el imitated the temple-worship in other particulars, (see iv. 4.) so it is likely they did in this part of the public worship. (See viii. 3.) The prophet calls their songs a noise, like that of an untuneful voice, because their melody not proceeding from a true principle of religion, it was not grateful to God.

Ver. 24. But let judgment run down like waters, &c.] Rather let justice have its free course, so that the meanest persons may feel the benefit of it.

Ver. 25. Have ye offered to me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel?] When your forefathers offered sacrifices of slain beasts, and added their meat and drink-offerings to them, during their abode in the wilderness; they performed these services with as little sincerity and devotion to me, as you do at present. To me, is the same as to my honour. (See Isa. xliii. 23. Zech. vii. 5. Rom. xiv. 6.) The prophets often upbraid the Jews with the sins of their forefathers, and threaten them with remarkable judgments upon that account, when their posterity continue in the same or worse impieties. (See Hos. ix. 9, 10. x. 9. compare Matt. xxiii. 35.)

Ver. 26. Yea, ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch, and Chiun your images.] Your ancestors want of true devotion towards me appears from hence, that they were so prone to continue in those idolatrous practices which they learnt in Egypt; to which they added the worship of the idols they saw in the countries through which they travelled. (See Lev. xvii. 3. xviii. 3. Numb. xv. 39. xxv. 2. Josh. xxiv. 14. Ezek. xx. 7. 16. xxiii. 3. 8.) The tabernacle of Moloch was a shrine with the image of the deity placed within it: such were the silver shrines of Diana, Acts xix. 24. and the Thensæ or Lecticæ among the Romans. These their votaries carried in procession, as a solemn piece of worship, or a pledge of the presence of their gods among them. (See Isa. xlvi. 7.) Moloch is an idol often mentioned in Scripture; to whom they offered their children in sacrifice. It is probable the Israelites were addicted to this kind of worship in the wilderness, because it is so severely prohibited by Moses, Lev. xx. 2. 5. Chiun is generally supposed by learned men to be the same with Saturn. (See particularly Lud. de Dieu, upon Acts vii. 43. and Dr. Spencer, de Legib. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 3.) The same idol was called Remphan, or Rephan, by the Egyptians, as you may see proved in the places abovecited: for which reason the Seventy interpreters translate Chiun by Rephan; which is an argument that those interpreters were natives, or, at least, inhabitants, of Egypt, as Dr. Hody observes, de Vers. Græc. Auctoribus, lib. ii. cap. 4.

The star of your god.] As the heathens had images that represented the heavenly bodies: (see 2 Kings xxiii. 11. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4.) so the image of Chiun represented the star Saturn, as that of Moloch did the sun. If we suppose with some learned men that Remphan, or Rephan, was a famous Egyptian king, it was a common opinion among the heathens to suppose the souls of their deified heroes to be placed in the stars. So Virgil speaks of the star that appeared quickly after Cæsar's death, Eclog. ix.

" Ecce dionæi processit Cæsaris astrum."

See Cæsar's star is lighted in the skies.

Ver. 27. Therefore I will cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus.] Ye shall be removed farther from your own country, than when Hazael king of Syria carried away so many Israelites captives to Damascus: (see i. 4.) and, consequently, shall have less hopes of returning home. The king of Assyria carried the ten tribes captives as far as Media, (2 Kings xvii. 6.) St. Stephen, in his speech recorded by St. Luke, expressing rather the sense than the words, reads, I will carry you away beyond Babylon, Acts vii. 43. Media being at a much greater distance than Babylon. Both readings import, that the captivity of the ten tribes would be far worse than that of the two remaining, and with less hopes of returning to their own country.

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.

A reproof of those who indulge their ease and pleasures without having any sense of God's afflicting hand, which threatens ruin and desolation to the whole kingdom of Israel for their pride and incorrigibleness.

Ver. 1. WOE to them that are at ease in Zion.] Or, Are secure, as the margin reads: who live fearless of God's judgments, and resolved to indulge themselves in their voluptuousness, notwithstanding the evident tokens of God's displeasure against the whole nation, both Israel and Judah. For these and the following words contain a threatening against both kingdoms, both Israel and Judah, (see ver. 2.) though the chief design of this prophecy is against the ten tribes, or kingdom of Israel. But the LXX. translate the words thus, Woe unto them that despise Zion. [But the learned Dr. Grabe conjectures, that instead of Ἐξουθενοῦσι, despise, it should be read Εὐθυμοῦσι, are prosperous: for so the LXX. render the word shaanannim, Psal. cxxiii. 4. See the Prolegom. to his edition of the Prophets.] The word shaanannim, which our translation renders are at ease, signifying also to be insolent: in which sense the words may fitly belong to the ten tribes, who despised Zion and the temple, which God chose out of all the tribes of Israel, to place his name there.

And trust in the mountain of Samaria.] In the strength of their capital city, built upon the hill of Samaria. (See iv. 1.)

Which are named chief of the nations, to whom the house of Israel came.] Zion, or Jerusalem, and Samaria, are the chief seats of the two kingdoms, whither is the greatest resort of the whole nation. The word gojim, nations, usually signifies the heathen nations, but sometimes denotes the Jews, and is equivalent to ammim. (See Zeph. ii. 9.) The Chaldee interprets it, Who give names to their children, according to the names of the chief of the heathen, to whom the house of Israel apply themselves for protection. Thus, in the later times, some of the Jews took the names of Alexander, Antipater, Agrippa, and the like, to compliment some great men among the Greeks or Romans of those names. The Jews making alliances with the heathens, is often reproved by the prophets. (See 2 Chron. xvi. 7. Isa. xxx. 1, 2. Hos. v. 13. vii. 11. xii. 1.)

Ver. 2. Pass ye to Calneh, and see.] Calneh, called Calno, Isa. x. 9. was a city in the land of Shinar, or the territory of Babylon, Gen. x. 10. St. Jerome supposes it the same with Ctesiphon. This was taken probably by some king of Assyria, not long before the uttering of this prophecy.

Thence go ye to Hemath the great.] St. Jerome supposes this to be the same city which was afterward called Antioch: this was taken too by Sennacherib, or some of his predecessors. (See 2 Kings xviii. 34.) It is called here Hemath the great, to distinguish it from another Hemath, mentioned ver. 14. which is the boundary of Palestine, and therefore called the entering in of Hemath in that verse, and 1 Kings viii. 65. 2 Kings xiv. 25. That town is since called Epiphania.

Then go down to Gath of the Philistines.] Taken by Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.

Be they better than these kingdoms, &c.] Are they in a better condition than you are, both in Israel and Judah? Or have they a larger and more plentiful country to live in? If they have not, why are you so ungrateful to God, as not to be sensible of those his mercies? The word border is equivalent to country. (See the note upon Mal. i. 4.)

Ver. 3. Ye that put away the evil day far from you.] Who persuade yourselves that God's judgments will not overtake you so soon as the predictions of the prophets import. (See v. 18. ix. 20.)

And cause the seat of violence to draw near.] Ye take hold of every opportunity of perverting justice, by pronouncing unrighteous decrees, and turning the seat of justice into the seat of oppression. (See ver. 12. and compare Psal. xciv. 20.)

Ver. 4. That lie upon beds of ivory, &c.] This and the two following verses are an elegant description of the ill uses men too often make of a plentiful fortune: that it shuts out all serious considerations, makes them void of compassion towards those that are in misery, and to regard nothing but the present gratification of their senses. Lying upon beds of ivory, and stretching themselves upon their couches, express the posture they used at their meals. (See ver. 7. and ii. 8.)

Eat the lambs out of the flock, &c.] The choicest and best of them.

Ver. 5. Invent to themselves instruments of music, like David.] Such variety of music as he appropriated to the service of God, (see 1 Chron. xxiii. 5.) that they contrive for their own diversion.

Ver. 6. And are not grieved for the afflictions of Joseph.] They do not humble themselves under God's afflicting hand, nor lay to heart the miseries the Divine judgments have brought upon the kingdom of Israel, called by the name Joseph, and the house of Joseph, v. 6. 15. The words allude to the afflicted state of Joseph, when he was sold by his brethren into Egypt.

Ver. 7. And the banquet of them that stretched themselves shall be removed.] Their luxurious way of living shall be at an end. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 8. I abhor the excellency of Jacob, and hate his palaces.] Whatever the kingdoms of Israel and Judah value themselves for is hateful to me, as having been abused by them, and made instrumental in dishonouring me. If we understand this of Israel, the ten tribes valued themselves as being the most potent kingdom. (See 2 Kings xiv. 9.) If we suppose the words comprehend Judah, (see ver. 1.) they valued themselves for having Jerusalem and the temple situate in their territories, where God had placed his name; and is peculiarly called the honour, or excellency of Jacob, Psal. xlvii. 4. Ezek. xxiv. 21.

Therefore will I deliver up the city, &c.] I will deliver up Samaria first, and then Jerusalem, into the hands of their enemies.

Ver. 9. If there remain ten men in one house, that they shall die.] Those that escape the hands of the enemy shall die by the pestilence. (Compare Ezek. v. 12.)

Ver. 10. And a man's uncle [or near kinsman] shall take him up.] His nearest kinsman must be forced to perform the last office for him, and carry him to his burial.

And [or] he that burns him to bring out the bones out of the house.] And is equivalent to or here. (See Noldius, p. 271.) The undertakers of the funeral first burnt the body, in order to carry out the remaining bones to be buried. It was usual to burn the bodies of kings and great persons with odours and spices: (see Jer. xxxiv. 5. 2 Chron. xvi. 14.) and it may be, they might use the same custom in this case for fear of infection.

And shall say to him that is by the sides of the house [in or near the house], Is there any more with thee?] Alive or dead.

Then shall he say, Hold thy tongue; for we may not make mention of the name of the Lord.] Silence best becomes such astonishing calamities: or, It is to no purpose to call upon God, or to implore his help in our afflictions. An expression betokening despair, joined with impenitency: like that of Joram, 2 Kings vi. 33. What should I wait for the Lord any longer? The verb zacar, to remember, or make mention, when it is spoken of God, signifies his worship, as Dr. Spencer observes, de Leg. Heb. lib. ii. cap. 5.

Ver. 11. He will smite the great house with breaches, and the little house with clefts.] People of all ranks, high and low, shall be sufferers in the common calamities. (See iii. 15.)

Ver. 12. Shall horses run upon the rock? will one plough there with oxen? for ye have turned judgment into gall, and the fruit of righteousness into hemlock.] Your perverting of judgment, and thereby making oppression the seeming fruit or effect of righteousness, is as much the inverting the nature and order of things, as it would be to undertake to run a race upon a rock, or to cultivate it by ploughing or sowing there. The word rosh, translated here and in other places gall, signifies a weed growing among corn, as bitter as wormwood: and laannath, rendered hemlock, is translated wormwood, v. 7. and in other places.

Ver. 13. Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought.] Ye pride yourselves in your own strength, which will stand you in no stead, without God's blessing and assistance.

And say, Have we not taken to us horns by our own strength?] A horn is often used in Scripture for power, strength, or authority; the metaphor being taken from the horns of an ox or bullock, wherein his strength lies. The boast of the Israelites seems chiefly grounded upon the success their king Jeroboam the Second had in restoring the ancient dominion of Israel, and recovering it from the Syrians, who had brought them very low. (See 2 Kings xiii. 3. 7. xiv. 25.)

Ver. 14. But, behold, I will raise up a nation against you —and they shall afflict you from the entering in of Hemath, to the river of the wilderness.] The prophet means the Assyrians, who should afflict them from one end of the land unto the other. The entering in of Hemath was the northern boundary of their country, (see the note upon ver. 2.) and the river of the wilderness is the same with the river of Egypt, Gen. xv. 18. Josh. xv. 47. 1 Kings viii. 65. Isa. xxvii. 12. which arises out of Mount Paran, and is the southermost bound of Judea. It is called the sea of the plain, as our interpretation renders it, Deut. iii. 17. or the sea of the wilderness, as it is translated here; the original word Arabah being the same in both places.

CHAP. VII.

By three several visions God represents to Amos the judgments he is bringing upon Israel, which are mitigated by the intercession of the prophet; who being accused of sedition by Amaziah the priest of Beth-el to king Jeroboam, he denounces judgment against Amaziah and his family.

Ver. 1. HE formed grasshoppers in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth.] Most commentators suppose this vision to denote the invasion of Pul king of Assyria, mentioned 2 Kings xv. 19. But this and the following calamities may as probably relate to those tumults and commotions which happened after Jeroboam's death, during an anarchy which lasted eleven years, from that time till his son's settlement on the throne, as appears by comparing the times of the kings of Israel and Judah. This was cutting Israel short, after they had begun to flourish again under the prosperous reign of Jeroboam, and so might fitly be represented by the grasshoppers devouring the latter or second growth of the grass.

It was the latter growth after the king's mowings.] The first crop of grass was set apart for the use of the king's stables.

Ver. 2. By whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small.] If thou suffer these calamities to proceed to extremity, by what means shall the small remains of the riches and strength of the kingdom be rescued from utter destruction? Some translate the words, Who shall rise up, or stand for Jacob? but the interrogative pronoun mi, who, may stand for bemi, by whom; as it does, Isa. li. 19.

Ver. 3. The Lord repented for this, &c.] The Lord was pleased to hearken to my earnest supplication, and to promise, that the threatened judgment should not proceed to an utter destruction of the whole kingdom.

Ver. 4. The Lord God called to contend by fire, which devoured the great deep, and did eat up a part.] This represents a sorer judgment than the former, and in the opinion of most expositors denotes the invasion of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who carried a great part of Israel away captive, (2 Kings xv. 29.) and so was properly represented by a raging fire, which consumed the sea by turning it into vapours, and then devoured a great part of the land.

Ver. 7, 8. The Lord stood by a wall made by a plumb-line, &c.] God's judgments are sometimes represented by a line and a plummet, to denote that they are measured out by the exactest rules of justice. (See 2 Kings xxi. 13. Isa. xxviii. 17.) The instruments which are designed for building are sometimes used to mark out those places which are to be pulled down or destroyed. (See 2 Sam. viii. 2. Isa. xxxiv. 11. Lam. ii. 8.) The vision imports, that as God formerly built up his people, he would now pluck them down and destroy them. (See Jer. i. 10. xxxi. 28.)

Ver. 8. I will not again pass by them any more.] I will not any longer pass over their transgressions. (Compare viii. 2. Micah vii. 18.) Or, I will not pass through them to destroy them any more, (see v. 17.) because I will do it once for all. (Compare Nahum i. 9.)

Ver. 9. And the high places of Isaac shall be desolate.] The altar and grove at Beer-sheba, where Isaac dwelt and built an altar, (Gen. xxvi. 25. xlvi. 1.) This place was afterward abused to idolatry. (See the note upon v. 5.)

And the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste.] The places set apart for idolatrous worship: such were Beth-el, Gilgal, and Beer-sheba. (See iii. 14. v. 5.) The word sanctuary is used for an idolatrous temple, Isa. xvi. 12.

And I will rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword.] This was fulfilled when Shallum conspired against Zechariah the son of Jeroboam, and slew him, (2 Kings xv. 10.) who was the last of that family who reigned.

Ver. 10. Then Amaziah, the priest of Beth-el, sent to Jeroboam.] This was a priest, not of the tribe of Levi, but such a one as those were, whom Jeroboam, the first of that name, had consecrated to perform the idolatrous service at Beth-el. (See 1 Kings xii. 31.)

Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel.] i. e. In an open and barefaced manner. He traduces the prophet as a stirrer up of sedition: the same crime was objected to Jeremiah, Jer. xxvi. 9, 10. to Christ, Luke xxiii. 2. and to St. Paul, Acts xxiv. 5.

The land is not able to bear all his words.] The friends of the government cannot patiently hear them, and the enemies of it will take advantage from them to make some disturbance.

Ver. 11. For thus Amos saith, Jeroboam shall die by the sword.] This was a plain perverting of the prophet's words; for he did not prophesy against the king himself, but against his family or posterity.

Ver. 12. O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there.] There thou mayest find better encouragement and reception, than thou art like to do here.

Ver. 13. For it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court.] Beth-el is the place where the king performs his religious worship in person, and often resides there with his court, that he may the better attend upon the service performed at this place. (See 1 Kings xiii. 1.)

Ver. 14. Then answered Amos—I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son.] I was not a prophet by profession, nor bred up in the schools of the prophets, as those usually were who took that office upon them. (See 2 Kings ii. 5, &c. iv. 38. vi. 1.)

But I was a herdman.] A herdman, or a husbandman, is spoken of as an employment not consistent with that of a prophet, Zech. xiii. 5. except where there is an extraordinary call.

And a gatherer of sycamore fruit.] One that gathered a sort of wild fig, by some called an Egyptian fig. They that gathered it opened the skin, that the fruit might ripen the sooner: so the LXX. interpret the Hebrew word boles, κνίζων συκάμινα, opening the sycamore fruit: which agrees with Pliny's account of ordering this fruit. (Nat. Hist. lib. xiii. cap. 7.)

Ver. 16. Drop not thy word against the house of Isaac.] The verb hittith, to drop, signifies in its primary sense to instil doctrine or instruction by easy and gentle degrees: (see Deut. xxxii. 2.) from thence it comes to denote prophecy, being one sort of instruction accompanied with exhortation. See Ezek. xxi. 2. Micah ii. 6. where the word is translated prophesy by our English interpreters. The house of Isaac may be taken in the same sense with the high places of Isaac, ver. 9. meaning Beer-sheba: or it may be equivalent to Jacob or Israel, in which sense most expositors understand it.

Ver. 17. Thy wife shall be a harlot in the city.] When Beth-el shall be taken by the Assyrians, (see Hos. x. 5, 6.) the soldiers shall abuse thy wife, and treat her as a common harlot. (Compare Isa. xiii. 16. Lam. v. 11. Zech. xiv. 2.) And this shall befal her as a punishment of her idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom. (See Hos. iv. 13.)

Thy land shall be divided by line.] Among the Assyrians: in the division of land it was customary to mark out every one's share by a line. (See Psal. lxxviii. 55.)

And thou shalt die in a polluted land.] Thou shalt be carried captive out of thine own country, and die in a land where the inhabitants are idolaters, and where it will be impossible to converse without committing legal pollutions. (See Ezek. iv. 13. Hos. ix. 3.)

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet by a fourth vision gives notice of the certainty and nearness of the destruction of the ten tribes: he reproves them for oppression, and foretells that the sun shall be darkened by an eclipse upon their solemn festivals, which shall turn their present joy into mourning, and shall be esteemed a prognostication of more dismal calamities to come; amongst which a famine of God's word here threatened may be esteemed the greatest.

Ver. 1, 2. BEHOLD, a basket of summer fruit—Then said the Lord unto me, An end is come upon my people of Israel.] The basket of ripe summer fruit, which Amos saw in a vision, was to denote that Israel's sins were now ripe for judgment; as the time of judgment is elsewhere expressed by a harvest or a vintage. (See Joel iii. 13.) The two Hebrew words, kacks, summer fruit, and kets, an end, have an affinity in their sound: such paronomasias are to be found in other texts of Scripture. (See Isa. xxiv. 17. Jer. i. 11, 12.) Many instances of this kind are to be found; Micah i. 10, &c.

I will not again pass by them any more.] See vii. 8.

Ver. 3. And the songs of the temple shall be howlings in that day.] The songs or hymns sung in the temple at Beth-el, shall be turned into howlings or lamentations. (See v. 23.) This may relate to the time when the golden calf was carried away by Shalmaneser. (Compare Hos. x. 5, 6.)

There shall be many dead bodies on that day: they shall cast them forth with silence.] The Assyrians (see ver. 8.) will make such a slaughter among the people, that there will be no opportunity of using public mournings or lamentations at their funerals, as was usual in other cases; but their friends will hurry them to their graves with as much silence and privacy as they can. (Compare Jer. xxii. 18.)

Ver. 4. Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy.] Or, Trample upon them. (See the note on ii. 7.)

Ver. 5. When will the new moon be gone, &c.] This was one of their solemn feasts, the use of which they retained with their idolatrous worship. (See ver. 10.)

Making the ephah small, and the shekel great, &c.] The ephah was the measure wherewith they sold, containing about one of our bushels: this they made smaller than the just standard. The shekel was the money they received for the price of their goods: and by falsifying the balances, when they weighed it, they diminished its just value, and demanded a greater price for their goods. So both ways they overreached those that dealt with them. (See Micah vi. 11.)

Ver. 6. That we may buy the poor for silver, &c.] Who must be forced to sell themselves to us for slaves, to satisfy the debts they owe to us. (See ii. 6.)

Yea, and sell the refuse of the wheat.] The traders by these deceitful arts made corn so dear, that people were glad to buy the worst of it, and such as was not fit to make bread.

Ver. 7. The Lord hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob, &c.] By himself, who is truly the glory of Jacob, or Israel, (see Psal. lxviii. 34.) whatever other excellency or advantage they may make the subject of their glory. (See vi. 8.)

I will never forget any of their works.] God is said to remember men's sins when he punisheth them. (See Hos. viii. 13. ix. 9. Isa. xliii. 25. Jer. xxxi. 34.)

Ver. 8. And it shall rise up wholly like a flood, &c.] Or a river. The LXX. with a very small alteration in the Hebrew points, give a plainer sense of the words thus: Destruction shall rise up like a flood: the calamity of a hostile invasion by the Assyrians shall be like an inundation, which in a short time overruns a whole country. (Compare Isa. viii. 7, 8. Jer. xlvi. 8. Dan. ix. 26.)

And it shall be cast out and drowned, as by the flood of Egypt.] Or rather, The river of Egypt. The inhabitants of the land shall be cast out of their possessions, or the land itself shall be swallowed up, as Egypt is by the inundation of the river Nile. To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase expounds the place: He shall make a king come against it [the land] with a numerous army like a flood, and he shall drive out the inhabitants thereof, and [the land itself] shall be drowned, as when the flood of Egypt [overflows].

Ver. 9. I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day.] Calamitous times are expressed by the failing of the light of the sun, and the day's being overspread with darkness. (See Isa. xiii. 10. lix. 9, 10. Jer. xv. 9. Job v. 14. xxii. 11.) But Archbishop Usher hath observed in his Annals, ad A. M. 3213, that about eleven years after the time when Amos prophesied, there were two great eclipses of the sun, one at the feast of tabernacles, the other at the time of the Passover: so the text may probably be understood of that darkness; which, to be sure, was looked upon as ominous, and gave men more than ordinary apprehensions by falling out upon these solemn festivals: which if they were not celebrated with such solemnity among the ten tribes, as they were in Judea, where the temple was situate, yet were observed by many of the Israelites, according to the traditions they had received from their fathers. (See ver. 5. of this chapter, and iv. 5.)

Ver. 10. And I will turn your feasts into mourning.] God commanded the Jews to celebrate their festivals with joy and gladness: (see Deut. xii. 7. 12. xvii. 14, 15.) which it would be impossible for them to do under such melancholy circumstances and prognostications of the Divine displeasure.

And all your songs into lamentations.] There were particular psalms and hymns that used to be sung at the Passover, and other great festivals. (See Lightfoot's Temple-Service, chap. 13, 14. 16. and Dr. Hammond upon Matt. xxvi. 30.)

And I will bring up sackcloth upon all loins, and baldness upon every head.] See Isa. xv. 2. Jer. xlviii. 37. Ezek. vii. 18.

And the end thereof as a bitter day.] Those feasts, however begun in joy, shall end in bitterness; and the calamities which follow them shall still increase the sorrow.

Ver. 11. I will send a famine upon the land, not a famine of bread, but of hearing the word of the Lord.] It was usual among the Jews to resort to the prophets for counsel under any difficulty. (See ii. 11. Ezek. xiv. 7. xx. 1.) Amos tells them, that in a little time there will be no prophets for them to consult; and this shall be a just punishment for their despising their former prophets, and their instructions. This was fulfilled upon the whole nation at the time of the Babylonish captivity: (see 2 Sam. ii. 9. Psal. lxxiv. 9. Ezek. vii. 26.) and after their return from captivity they had no succession of prophets from the time of Malachi till the coming of Christ. (See 1 Macc. iv. 46. ix. 27.)

Ver. 12. And they shall wander from sea to sea.] From the sea or lake of Sodom, called the eastern sea, to the Mediterranean, which lay upon the western coasts. (See Joel ii. 20.)

And from the north even to the east.] The prophet omits naming the south; because the idolaters, to whom he directs his discourse, would choose to inquire any where, rather than of the true prophets of the Lord, (see 1 Kings xxii. 7. 2 Kings iii. 11.) who dwelt in the tribe of Judah, that was situated in the southern parts of the nation.

Ver. 13. In that day shall the fair virgins and the young men faint for thirst.] They who are in the bloom of their youth and in the strength of their age shall faint and be dispirited, like those that want necessary refreshment. (Compare Jer. xlviii. 18.) A place that wants the necessaries for life, is expressed by a dry and thirsty land. (Psal. lxiii. 1. Ezek. xix. 13.)

Ver. 14. They that swear by the sin of Samaria.] The calf set up at Beth-el by Jeroboam, who committed a great sin in so doing, and made Israel to sin. (1 Kings xii. 30. xiv. 16. compare Micah i. 5.) Swearing is a solemn invocation of the name of God, and, as such, a proper part of Divine worship: (see Deut. vi. 13. x. 20.) and therefore ought not to be given to an idol.

And the manner [or way] of Beer-sheba liveth.] The LXX. render it, The god of Beer-sheba liveth, expressing the sense rather than the words. The way or manner signifies the same with the way of worship: in this sense it is probably taken, Hos. x. 13. and the phrase is often used so in the Acts; particularly xix. 23. xxiv. 14. Here it is taken metonymically for the god or object of their worship. Beer-sheba was a place noted for idolatry, as hath been observed upon v. 5.

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet seeth a fifth vision, representing the final destruction of the kingdom of Israel; but he concludes his prophecy with promises of restoring the kingdom of David, and the Jewish nation, under the Messias, when the church shall be enlarged by the gentiles coming in to it.

Ver. 1. I SAW the Lord standing upon the altar.] This may most probably be understood of the altar at Beth-el. (Compare iii. 14.) God's standing upon the altar, may likewise denote the destruction of the idolaters themselves, as so many victims slain to atone the Divine vengeance. (Compare Ezek. ix. 2. xxxix. 17. Isa. xxxiv. 6.) This appearance of God was, by a visible and glorious light, commonly called the Schechinah by the Jewish writers; concerning which the reader may consult Archbishop Tenison's treatise of Idolatry, chap. 14.

Smite the lintel of the door, that the posts may shake.] This denotes the approaching ruin of that idolatrous temple, which should put an end to the worship performed there. (See viii. 3.) The altar of burnt-offerings probably stood near the outward door of the temple, as it did at Jerusalem.

And I will cut them in the head, all of them; and I will slay the last [or residue] of them with the sword.] I will give them a mortal wound, (compare Psal. lxviii. 21. Isa. li. 9. Habak. iii. 13.) so that there shall be no residue or remainder left to escape. (Compare Ezek. xxiii. 25.)

He that fleeth of them shall not flee away, &c.] See ii. 14.

Ver. 2. Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them, &c.] Though they hide themselves in the deepest holes or caverns of the earth, (see Isa. ii. 19.) or take refuge in the highest fortresses, they shall not escape my vengeance.

Ver. 3. Though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel.] There were great caves formed by nature in the tops of some mountains, where men used to secure themselves in the time of danger. Such was the cave in a mountain in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxiii. 14. (See the note upon Ezek. xxxiii. 27. and Dr. Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. p. 88.)

Though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command a serpent, and he shall bite them.] The word serpent is usual for a water-animal, Isa. xxvii. 1. and is joined there with leviathan and tannin, which last word signifies, not a dragon, as it is translated, but a whale. In like manner the word nahash, used here, may signify some carnivorous fish.

Ver. 4. And if they go into captivity before their enemies, thence will I command the sword, and it shall slay them.] The same judgment is denounced against them, Lev. xxvi. 33. Deut. xxviii. 65. compare likewise Ezek. v. 13.

Ver. 5. And [or, for] the Lord of hosts toucheth the land, and it shall melt.] The least token of God's displeasure will put the whole frame of nature out of order. (Compare Isa. lxii. 1. 3. Micah i. 4. Habak. iii. 10.) And when God's hand is visibly stretched out against a land, or people, they become altogether dispirited; the stoutest men lose their courage; (see ii. 16.) their hearts failing them for fear, and out of a dreadful expectation of the miseries which are coming upon them.

And it [this calamity] shall rise up wholly like a flood, and [they that dwell in the land] shall be drowned, as by the flood of Egypt.] See viii. 8.

Ver. 6. It is he that buildeth his stories in the heavens.] An awful description of God's irresistible power, discovering itself in the works of the creation, particularly in his appointing several regions of the air, as so many apartments that lead to the highest heavens, the seat of his own glory. (See Psal. civ. 3.)

And hath founded his troop in the earth.] The old English translation hath rendered the sense very perspicuously thus: And hath laid the foundation of his globe of elements in the earth. The word agudah, troop, signifies the collection of elements and other creatures, which furnish the earth, expressed by the word isaba, the host, Gen. ii. 1. The Chaldee paraphrase expresses the sense thus: It is he that hath placed the Schechinah or tabernacle of his glory in the height above, and made his church glorious upon earth.

He that calleth for the waters of the sea, &c.] See v. 8.

Ver. 7. Are you not as the children of the Ethiopians to me?] Are ye not under a curse, as the Ethiopians, the posterity of Ham, were, (see Gen. ix. 35.) by reason of your multiplied sins and apostacies? Cushi, or Cushim, often signifies the Arabians, but it is sometimes understood of the Ethiopians, properly so called, as hath been observed in the notes upon Jer. xiii. 23.

Have I not brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt? and the Philistines from Caphtor?] You may think my former kindness in delivering you out of the Egyptian bondage, and giving you the land of Canaan, obliges me still to continue your protector. But I have shewed the like favour to other nations, particularly to the Philistines, who had their original from Caphtor, and afterward dispossessed the old inhabitants of Palestine, and dwelt in their stead; (see Deut. ii. 23. and the note upon Jer. xlvii. 4.) and yet against these very Philistines I have denounced my judgments for their sins. (See the forementioned place of Jeremy, and i. 8. of this prophecy.)

And the Syrians from Kir?] Some copies of our English Bible read Assyrians, but it is a mistake of the print; the more correct editions read Syrians, which answers the Hebrew Aram. Some understand the words of the new colonies which Tiglath-pileser transplanted from Kir, and placed in Syria in the room of the native Syrians, whom he had carried captive to Kir. (See i. 5.) But it may be understood of some more ancient removal of the Syrians from Kir, not elsewhere taken notice of.

Ver. 8. Behold, the eyes of the Lord God are upon the sinful kingdom, &c.] See ver. 4.

Saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob.] God still promises to preserve a remnant in the midst of his heaviest judgments, that he may perform to them the promises he made to their fathers. (See Jer. xxx. 11. Joel ii. 32. Rom. xi. 28, 29.)

Ver. 9. I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve.] I will mingle or scatter the Israelites among all nations, just as good and bad grain are mingled in a sieve; but will so order it, that none of the good grain shall be lost, or fall to the ground. (Compare Matt. iii. 12.)

Ver. 10. All the sinners of my people shall die by the sword.] They shall be cut off by some judgment sent from God. (See the note upon Zech. xi. 17.)

Which say, The evil shall not overtake us, nor prevent us.] Who indulge themselves in their carnal security, without any apprehension or dread of the Divine judgments denounced against them. (Compare vi. 3.)

Ver. 11. In that day.] When I come to make a remarkable difference between the good and the bad, (ver. 9.) The phrase denotes some extraordinary time or season, prefixed by God, for restoring the good estate of his people the Jews, or bestowing great blessings upon the world. (See the note upon Isa. iv. 2.) The sense of it is expressed by Μετὰ ταῦτα, afterward, Acts xv. 16. which phrase is equivalent to the last days, Joel ii. 28. which both Jews and Christians expound of the days of the Messias.

Will I raise up the tabernacle of David which is fallen down, &c.] At that time I will restore the kingdom to the house and family of David, in the person of the Messias, so often styled in the prophets the seed or offspring of David, and known by that title among the Jews of our Saviour's age. (See Matt. xii. 23. xx. 30. xxi. 9.) And whereas that family had been, for several years before his coming, reduced to a mean and obscure condition, (see Micah v. 2. Luke i. 48. 52.) it shall now recover its ancient splendour and dignity. The tabernacle of David is an expression met with but twice in Scripture, here and Isa. xvi. 5. It may allude to his having been a shepherd, and dwelling in tents, before he was advanced to a kingdom, but since that reduced in his family to as low a condition as it was in at first: but I conceive the phrase does mystically denote the church, whereof the Messiah, here foretold, was to be the head; which is elsewhere styled God's tabernacle, as being a place of his especial residence, as the tabernacle in the wilderness was. (See Lev. xxvi. 11. Ezek. xxvii. 17. compared with Rev. xxi. 3.) Tobit understood this text of the days of the Messiah, xiii. 10. where he exhorts Zion to praise God that his tabernacle may again be built in her.

Ver. 12. That they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen that are called by my name.] [If we follow the English translation, the words foretell the same event which is foretold by Obadiah, ver. 19. of his prophecy; and by Balaam, Numb. xxiv. 18.] The words in the Hebrew are capable of another translation, thus: The remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen that are (or shall be) called by my name, may possess me, the Lord: i. e. that both those of Edom, which are near neighbours, but fierce enemies to the Jews, (see the notes upon Isa. xi. 14.) as well as the other gentiles which were afar off, may be made subjects to the kingdom of David, now again erected. This sense of the text is followed by the LXX. and approved by Lud. de Dieu, and our learned Dr. Pocock, in order to reconcile the Greek translation with the original. (See Dr. Pocock's Not. Miscell. cap. 4. p. 46.)

But others suppose the LXX. read, with a small alteration from the present Hebrew, yidreshu, seek, for yireshu, possess; and that instead of the particle eth, they read othi, me; and, lastly, instead of Edom, they read Adam, these two words differing only in their points, which are generally acknowledged to be of a much later date than the original.

For the fuller explaining the text, I shall refer the reader to the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's learned Defence of the ancient Prophecies, p. 168.

Ver. 13. Behold, the days come, that the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, &c.] As the prophecy in the foregoing verse was to commence from the coming of Christ, but not to receive its utmost completion till the fulness both of Jews and gentiles come in to the church; so this and the following verses ought to be understood of the happy state of the millennium, which may be supposed to begin after the Jews are restored to their country. (Compare Joel iii. 18.) Then the text says, The ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed: where the sense would be clearer if the words were translated, The ploughman shall meet the reaper, &c. So the Chaldee and Septuagint understand the place: to the same sense the word niggash is often translated in the Greek: and then the words import, that there should be such an increase of the fruits of the earth, that as soon as the harvest is got in, it will be time to plough for the next year, which was not usual in those hot countries, where the corn was ripe early in the summer, in the month of May or June at farthest. And in the like manner, the vintage should be so plentiful, that whereas it used to begin in August, it should not be over till the seed-time, the earliest season of which was November.

And the mountains shall drop with sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt.] i. e. Shall flow down with wine or milk. (See the note on Joel iii. 18.) The Chaldee paraphrase, the Septuagint, and Vulgar Latin, understand the Hebrew verb, translated melt, of being cultivated, the stony ground being made softer by ploughing and manuring. The prophets sometimes describe the days of the Messias in the same terms the poets do the golden age. (See Psal. lxxii. 16. Isa. xxxv. 1. xli. 19. lv. 13. Hos. ii. 21, 22.)

Ver. 14. And I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel.] I will restore them to their own country, and settle them in it. (See the following verse, and the note upon Ezek. xxviii. 25.)

And they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them, &c.] Compare Isa. lxi. 4. Ezek. xxxvi. 33. 36. This and the following part of the verse contain a promise to them, that they shall enjoy the fruits of their labours, in opposition to that curse denounced against them, v. 11. Deut. xxviii. 30. that they should build houses, and not dwell in them. (Compare Isa. lxv. 22.)

Ver. 15. And I will plant them in their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land.] They shall dwell in it secure from any annoyance of enemies. (Compare Jer. xxiii. 6. xxxii. 41. Ezek. xxxiv. 28. Joel iii. 20. Micah iv. 4. Zeph. iii. 13.)

OBADIAH.

PREFACE.

GROTIUS, Huetius (in his Demonstratio Evangelica), and Dr. Lightfoot (in his Harmony of the Old Testament), are of opinion, that Obadiah was contemporary with the elder prophets, Hosea, Joel, and Amos: the reason they chiefly allege is, that the compilers of the Old Testament canon had a regard to the order of time in their placing the minor Prophets. But this reason seems to be of little force, since we find that Jonah is placed the fifth in order, nay, the sixth in the Greek copies, who was confessedly ancienter than any of those that are placed before him.

The more probable opinion is, that Obadiah prophesied about the time of the taking of Jerusalem: and thereupon, in foretelling the destruction of Edom, he uses several expressions which Jeremiah had done before him, speaking upon that subject. (Compare Obad. ver. 1. 8. with Jer. xlix. 9. 14—16.) Ezekiel agrees with Jeremiah and Obadiah, in assigning the same reason for the judgments threatened against the Edomites, viz. their insulting over the Jews in the time of their distress. (See Ezek. xxv. 12. xxxv. 5, &c.)

Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3419. supposes this prophecy to have been fulfilled about five years after the taking of Jerusalem.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet, after having denounced utter destruction upon Edom for their unnatural enmity against the Jews, foretells their restoration, and flourishing state in the latter times.

Ver. 1. WE have heard a rumour from the Lord, and an ambassador is sent among the heathen [or nations], &c.] The prophets sometimes represent Almighty God as summoning armies, and setting them in array of battle, against those people he designs to destroy. (See Jer. li. 27, 28.) And here, according to the custom of earthly princes, he is described as sending ambassadors to invite the nations to join in a confederacy against the Idumeans. (Compare Jer. xlix. 14.) The words are the same in both places, only what Jeremiah speaks in the singular number is expressed here in the plural, to intimate that Obadiah had received the same commission from God which was signified to Jeremiah before.

Ver. 2. I have made thee small among the heathen [or nations], &c.] Thou art contemptible in the sight of the Chaldeans and their confederates, who think they can easily subdue thee. This verse and the two following are almost word for word the same with the fifteenth and sixteenth verses of the forty-ninth chapter of Jeremiah.

Ver. 3. The pride of thy heart hath deceived thee, O thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, &c.] Thou valuest thyself too much upon the strength of thy situation, being placed among rocks which thou thinkest inaccessible by the enemy. St. Jerome, who dwelt in that neighbourhood, observes upon the place, that the Idumeans dwelt in caves dug out of the rocks. (See likewise Numb. xxxiv. 3, 4. 2 Kings xiv. 7.)

Ver. 4. Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, [see the note upon Jer. xlix. 16.] and though thou set thy nest among the stars, &c.] Upon the highest mountains, that seem to reach up to heaven. (Compare Isa. xiv. 14, 15. Jer. li. 53. Amos ix. 2. Habak. ii. 9.)

Ver. 5. If thieves come to thee, if robbers by night, &c.] See Jer. xlix. 9.

Ver. 6. How are his hidden things sought up!] Those treasures and riches which he took all possible care to conceal, that they might not be discovered by the enemy. (See Jer. xlix. 10.)

Ver. 7. All the men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to thy borders.] The confederates marched out with thee till they came to the borders of thy country, and then they treacherously joined with the enemy's forces.

They that ate thy bread have laid a wound under thee.] Those that were maintained at thy cost, as thine allies have given thee a secret blow, which thou wast not aware of.

Ibid. and Ver. 8. There is no understanding in him. Shall I not in that day—even destroy the wise men out of Edom, &c.] These two sentences contain the same sense; and instruct us, that when God designs a people for destruction, he deprives them of that discretion and foresight which is necessary for the due management of their affairs. (See Isa. xix. 11, 12.)

Ver. 9. And thy mighty men, O Teman, shall be dismayed, &c.] A panic fear shall seize those that were remarkable for their courage. (Compare Deut. xxviii. 25. Isa. xix. 16. Jer. l. 37. Amos ii. 16. Nahum iii. 13.) Teman was one of the chief provinces or cities of Idumea, called so from Teman, Esau's grandson. (See Jer. xlix. 7. Amos i. 12.)

Ver. 10. For thy violence against thy brother Jacob shame shall cover thee.] The prophet uses the expression, Thy brother Jacob, in allusion to Esau's animosity against his brother, (Gen. xxvii. 41.) The same reason is assigned in other prophets for God's displeasure against the Edomites. (See the note upon Amos i. 11.)

And thou shalt be cut off for ever.] The Nabatheans drove the Edomites out of their ancient habitations, since called Arabia Petræa; which country they could never afterward recover. (See Ezek. xxxv. 9. Mal. i. 3, 4. Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. ad A. C. 165.)

Ver. 11. In the day that strangers carried away captive his forces, &c.] When Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, thou didst join with the enemy. (See Psal. cxxxvii.)

And cast lots upon Jerusalem.] What captives fell to the share of each of the commanders. (See the note upon Joel iii. 3.)

Ver. 12. But thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy brother.] Thou oughtest not to have taken pleasure at the sight of thy brother's calamity. So the expression of looking upon an enemy, signifies the beholding his fall with satisfaction, Psal. liv. 7. lix. 10. xcii. 10. cxii. 8. Our translators render it in those places, See my desire upon mine enemies. (Compare Micah iv. 11. vii. 10.)

The day of thy brother.] The day of his calamity, as it is expressed ver. 13. (Compare Psal. xxxvii. 13. cxxxvii. 7.)

In the day that he became a stranger.] When he was driven from his own inheritance, and went captive into a strange land.

Ver. 14. Neither shouldest thou have delivered up those that did remain.] Or, Shut up those, as the margin reads. The word signifies, to shut up all the ways of escaping to the conquered, in order to take them and deliver them up to the enemy. (See Psal. xxxi. 8.) So the Greek word which answers it is taken, Gal. iii. 23. Συγκεκλεισμένοι εἰς τὴν μέλλουσαν πίστιν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι, which should be translated, not shut up, but delivered over to the faith, which should afterward be revealed: just as a schoolmaster delivers up his scholar when he comes to age; as the comparison there follows.

Ver. 15. For the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathens.] If judgment begin at the house of God, we may certainly conclude, that they who are more professedly wicked shall not escape. (Compare Jer. xxv. 15. 29. xlix. 12. 1 Pet. iv. 17.)

As thou hast done it shall be done unto thee.] Others shall rejoice at thy calamities, as thou hast insulted over theirs. As thou hast spoiled and plundered thy neighbours, thou shalt be served thyself. (See Ezek. xxxv. 15. Hab. ii. 8.)

Ver. 16. For as ye have drunk upon my holy mountain, so shall all the heathen drink continually, &c.] Since ye, O my people, have drunk the cup of my wrath, which has been executed upon you in Mount Zion (see ver. 17.) and at Jerusalem, where my name was placed; there is no reason that those who are strangers and foreigners to my name and worship should expect to be excused. (See the note upon ver. 15.)

The prophet speaks of the Jews here, as already under a state of captivity; as they actually were, before this prophecy was fulfilled.

God's judgments are commonly represented by a cup of intoxicating liquors. (See the note upon Jer. xxv. 15.)

And they shall be as though they had not been.] They shall be utterly destroyed. (Compare Ezek. xxvi. 21.)

Ver. 17. But upon Mount Zion shall be deliverance.] This was remarkably verified at the first preaching of the gospel, when God's law came forth from Zion: (Isa. ii. 3. Joel ii. 32. Psal. cx. 2.) and there shall be another completion of it, at the restoration of the Jewish nation, which is spoken of in this and the following verses.

And there shall be holiness.] See Joel iii. 17.

Ver. 18. And the house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau for stubble.]

The Jews, when they are restored to their own land, shall devour all their enemies that shall give them any disturbance there. (See Isa. xi. 14. xxxi. 9. Joel iii. 19. Micah v. 8. Zech. xii. 6. Ezek. xxxviii. 14. 23.)

Ver. 19. And they of the south shall possess the mount of Esau.] They that dwell in the southern parts of Judea shall possess the mountainous country of Edom, (see Mal. i. 3.) elsewhere called Mount Seir. (See Ezek. xxxv. 2, 3.) The tribe of Judah, which inhabited the southern part of Judea, bordered upon Edom. (See Josh. xv. 21.) Here it is foretold they should enlarge their borders that way.

And they of the plain, the Philistines.] The plain lay lower, and was better watered, than the south part of Judea, and it lay towards the Philistines' country. (See Josh. xv. 33. 45. and the note upon Zech. vii. 7.) These were likewise ill neighbours to the Jews, whom they should at last conquer, and possess their land, as the prophet here foretells. (Compare Zeph. ii. 7.)

And they shall possess the land of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria.] The prophet speaks of those places as possessed by idolaters, for so they were in his time; viz. that colony which the king of Assyria settled there, who served their own idols, together with the god of the land, 2 Kings xvii. 24. 33. So the words import the conquest of the Jews over their idolatrous neighbours. (See the note upon ver. 18.)

And Benjamin shall possess Gilead.] Benjamin, although one of the smallest tribes, shall enlarge his borders as far as the land of Gilead beyond Jordan.

Ver. 20. And the captivity of this host of the children of Israel shall possess that of the Canaanites, even unto Zarephath.] The ten tribes, when they shall return from their captivity, shall possess all the country where the Canaanites formerly lived, even unto Zarephath, or Sarepta, a city near Sidon, in the northern borders of Judea, 1 Kings xvii. 9. The Canaanites, properly so called, were ancient inhabitants of that district. (See Judg. i. 32, 33. Matt. xv. 21, 22.)

And the captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad, shall possess the cities of the south.] Dr. Lightfoot, in his Chorographical Notes upon St. Luke, chap. ii. supposes Sepharad to be a part of the country of Edom; and explains the text of the Jews who were captives in Edom, that they should possess the cities of the south that lay near that country. (See the beginning of the nineteenth verse.) Others translate the sentence thus, The captivity of Jerusalem shall possess that which is in Sepharad, and the cities of the south. In the former part of the verse the prophet mentioned the resettlement of the ten tribes after their restoration: here he mentions that of Judah, under the name of Jerusalem. Israel and Judah are commonly joined together, as equally sharers in the general restoration of that nation. (See the note upon Jer. iii. 18.) Of the latter it is here foretold, that they should possess the country called Sepharad. If that word be taken as an appellative, it signifies a border, and may denote that part of Arabia which bordereth upon the south of Judea, or the cities of the south, here mentioned.

Ver. 21. And saviours shall come up on Mount Zion to judge the Mount of Esau.] By saviours may be understood the leaders of the Jews, who shall fight their battles, and vanquish their enemies, denoted by the inhabitants of Mount Esau. In this sense the word saviour is taken, Judg. iii. 9. Isa. xix. 20. Or we may understand the word in a spiritual sense, for the preachers of salvation, whose office it is to convert unbelievers and aliens to the commonwealth of Israel. (Compare ver. 17. and Amos ix. 22.) Instead of saviours, the LXX. with a small alteration of the Hebrew points, read, those that are saved, or escape: the same with the remnant often mentioned in the prophets, and particularly Joel ii. 32. (See the note upon that place.)

And the kingdom shall be the Lord's.] This will be fulfilled when the four monarchies are destroyed, and the stone which smote the image becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth. (See Dan. ii. 35. 44. vii. 14. 27. Zech. xiv. 9. Zeph. iii. 9. Rev. ix. 15.)

JONAH.

PREFACE.

JONAH was the ancientest of all the prophets whose writings are preserved in Scripture canon. Bishop Lloyd, in his Chronological Tables, supposed him to have prophesied in the latter end of Jehu's, or the beginning of Jehoahaz's reign; at which time the kingdom of Israel was brought very low by the oppressions of Hazael, king of Syria. (2 Kings xiii. 22.) This might be a proper reason for Jonah to foretell the success which Jehoahaz's grandson, Jeroboam, should have in restoring the coasts of Israel; 2 Kings xiv. 25. He was of Gath-hepher, a town in the tribe of Zebulun, (Josh. xix. 13.) not far from Sephorim, or Dio-cæsarea, as St. Jerome informs us in his Commentary upon Jonah: who adds, that Jonah's sepulchre was shewed there in his time. This town was situate in Galilee, and so confutes that observation of the pharisees, that out of Galilee there did arise no prophet, John vii. 52. He was sent to Nineveh, to denounce destruction to that city, within forty days' time, if they repented not. But they complying with the summons of the prophet, God deferred the executing his judgments till the increase of their iniquities made them ripe for destruction, about one hundred and fifty years afterward; as we shall see more particularly, when we come to explain the prophecy of Nahum.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

Jonah, being sent by God to Nineveh, fleeth to Tarshish, meets with a tempest, is thrown into the sea, and swallowed by a fish.

Ver. 1. NOW the word of the Lord came unto Jonah.] The Hebrew reads, And the word of the Lord: it is usual in that language to begin a discourse, or a writing, with the particle And. (See the note upon Ezek. i. 1.)

Ver. 2. Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city.] See iii. 3.

For their wickedness is come up before me.] The cry of their wickedness is come up before me; as the LXX. express the sense. (See Gen. xviii. 20. James v. 4. Rev. xviii. 5.) For this cause heinous offences are called crying sins.

Ver. 3. But Jonah rose up [or went away: see Gen. xxv. 34. Numb. xxiv. 25.] to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord.] He might think that that impulse which wrought in the prophets might not exert itself but in the land of Judea: or he might go away out of a sudden fear, as our first parents hid themselves from the presence of God among the trees of the garden, Gen. iii. 8. It is certain that Jonah, in his sedate thoughts, acknowledged God's omnipresence. (See the ninth verse of this chapter, and ii. 2.)

And he found a ship going to Tarshish.] Learned men suppose that there were several places of that name noted for trade; one in Spain, another in India: and this might probably be in Cilicia. Ships of Tarshish generally signify any trading or merchant-ships. (See the note upon Isa. ii. 16.) The reason of Jonah's unwillingness to undertake the delivery of the Divine message, shall be considered in the note upon iv. 2.

Ver. 5. Then the mariners were afraid, and cried every man unto his god.] To their several idols, as being heathens, and ignorant of the true God.

But Jonah was gone down into the sides of the ship.] Into a cabin in one of the sides of the ship. So we read that Jephthah was buried in the cities of Gilead, Judg. xii. 7. where our interpreters rightly express the sense, in one of the cities of Gilead.

Ver. 7. Come, and let us cast lots.] This was a usual method of referring things to the appointment or discovery of Providence. (See 1 Sam. x. 20, 21. xiv. 42. 44. Prov. xvi. 33. Acts i. 26.)

Ver. 9. I fear the Lord God of heaven.] Or rather, Jehovah, the God of heaven; Jehovah being the peculiar name of the true God, by which he was distinguished from those who had the names of gods and lords among the heathen.

Ver. 10. Why hast thou done this?] You have been guilty of great profanation to disobey his command, whom yourself acknowledge to be Lord and Maker of all things.

Ver. 11. For the sea wrought, and was tempestuous.] The Hebrew reads, The sea went, and was tempestuous; i. e. grew more and more tempestuous, as our margin reads. We find the same phrase, Exod. xix. 19. The trumpet waxed louder and louder; where it is in the Hebrew, The trumpet was going and strengthening.

Ver. 14. Wherefore they cried unto the Lord.] They were convinced by the account Jonah gave of himself, that the God whom he worshipped (ver. 9.) had brought this tempest upon them: so they made their petitions to him.

Let us not perish for this man's life.] For exposing this man's life to inevitable danger; since it is done out of extreme necessity to save ourselves, and by his own desire.

Ver. 16. Then the men feared the Lord exceedingly.] They were convinced of the power and greatness of that God whom Jonah worshipped; which appeared both in raising this storm, and so suddenly laying it.

And offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, and made vows.] The words may be translated to a plainer sense, thus, And offered sacrifice unto the Lord, that is, they made vows to do it as soon as they had opportunity. The copulative particle vau is sometimes used by way of explication; as hath been observed in the note upon Isa. li. 19. (See Noldius, p. 280.) This sense suits best here.

Ver. 17. Now the Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah.] Naturalists give an account of some sorts of fish which are large enough to swallow a man; particularly the canis charcarias, or dog-fish, called by some writers lamia. (See Bochart. de Animal. lib. v. cap. 12.)

And Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights.] The Hebrew language hath no one word to express what we call a natural day; so what the Greeks express by Νυχθήμερον, they denote by a day and a night. Therefore the space of time, consisting of one whole revolution of twenty-four hours, and part of two others, is fitly expressed in that language, by three days and three nights. Such a space of time our Lord lay in the grave; and we may from thence conclude, that Jonah, who was an eminent figure of him in this particular, was no longer in the fish's belly.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

It contains the prayer of Jonah, when he was in the fish's belly; and his deliverance from thence.

Ver. 1. THEN Jonah prayed unto the Lord out of the fish's belly.] Those devout thoughts which he had at that time, he afterward digested into the following prayer; and added a thanksgiving for his deliverance at the end of it. So several of David's Psalms were probably composed after his trouble was over; but in a manner suitable to the thoughts he had at the time of his affliction, and with a grateful sense of God's mercies for his deliverance out of it. (See Psal. liv. cxx.)

Ver. 2. Out of the belly of hell cried I.] The word sheol signifies the state of the dead. (See the note on Isa. xiv. 9.) So it may most properly be rendered the grave here, as the margin reads: the belly of the fish was to Jonah instead of a grave.

Ver. 4. Then I said, I am cast out of thy sight: yet I will look again towards thy holy temple.] My first apprehensions were, that as I had justly forfeited thy favour by my disobedience; so thou wouldest cast me out of thy protection: (see ver. 7. and compare Psal. xxxi. 22.) yet, upon recollecting myself, I thought it my duty not to despair of thy mercy, but direct my prayer towards thy heavenly habitation. (See ver. 7.)

Ver. 5. The waters compassed me even to the soul.] When I was thrown into the sea, I thought myself just ready to be drowned. (Compare Psal. lxix. 1.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 6. I went down to the bottom of the mountains, &c.] I went down to the bottom of the sea, where the foundations of the mountains lie. (See Psal. xxiv. 2.) I found myself enclosed on every side, so that I had no prospect of deliverance.

Ver. 7. My prayer came in unto thee, into thy holy temple.] My prayer reached unto heaven, the place of thy peculiar residence. (See Psal. xi. 4. xviii. 6. cii. 19. Micah i. 2. Habak. ii. 20.)

Ver. 8. They that observe lying vanities forsake their own mercy.] They that seek to or trust in idols, often called by the names of vanity and lies, (see Psal. xxxi. 6. Jer. x. 8. xvi. 19.) forsake him who alone is able to shew mercy to them, and preserve them in the time of danger.

Ver. 9. But I will sacrifice to thee with the voice of thanksgiving; I will pay that which I have vowed.] I will offer to thee those thanks which I solemnly promised to pay in the time of my trouble, and which will be as acceptable to thee as the fattest sacrifices of slain beasts. (See Psal. l. 14. cxv. 17, 18. Hos. xiv. 2.)

Ver. 10. And the Lord spake unto the fish, &c.] God's almighty power is represented in Scripture as bringing things to pass by his bare will and command. (See Gen. i. 3. Rom. iv. 17.) Huetius (Demonst. Evang. prop. iv.) supposes, that Jonah's deliverance from the whale's belly gave occasion to the Greek story of Arion, who, after he was cast into the sea, was conveyed by a dolphin to the port of Corinth.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

Jonah is sent again to the Ninevites, and preacheth to them with good success.

Ver. 3. NOW Nineveh was an exceeding great city, of three days' journey.] The Hebrew reads, A city great to God; so the mountains of God are the same with great mountains, Psal. xxxvi. 6. and the cedars of God are translated goodly cedars, Psal. lxxx. 10.

Diodorus Siculus informs us, that Nineveh was four hundred and eighty furlongs in compass, which makes sixty of our miles: (see Dr. Prideaux, ad A. C. 612.) so that it was bigger than Babylon; which, according to his account, was but forty-eight. Diodorus's account agrees with the description the prophet gives us, that it was three days' journey in compass: twenty miles was a day's journey in common computation for a foot-traveller. (See Casaubon's notes upon Strabo, lib. i. p. 35.)

Ver. 4. Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.] God was pleased to allow them sufficient time to repent, and give some proof of their reformation. The copies of the LXX. read, three days: it is no easy matter to guess at the occasion of the mistake, although Is. Vossius is willing to believe that this was the original reading. (See his book de LXX. Interp. cap. 23.) Some copies of Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho, (p. 316. edit. Lond.) read forty-three days; but that number is probably owing to the copiers, who joined the two readings of the Hebrew and LXX. together.

Ver. 5. So the people of Nineveh believed God, &c.] The fame of the wonderful works God had wrought for the Jews, was spread over the eastern parts of the world. This might make the Ninevites hearken to a man of that nation, that came to them as sent by God: and it is likely that he gave them an account of the miraculous circumstances which attended his own mission. But without question, a sense of their own guilt, and their deserving whatever punishment Heaven could inflict, was a principal reason that moved them to have a regard for his message. And by the men of Nineveh's repenting at the preaching of Jonas, God designed to upbraid the stubbornness of his own people, and shame them, as it were, into repentance, for fear the men of Nineveh should rise up in judgment against them; as our Saviour speaks of the Israelites in his own time, Matt. xii. 41.

Ver. 6. For word came unto the king of Nineveh.] Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3233. supposes this prince to have been Pul the king of Assyria, Nineveh being then the capital city of that empire; who afterward invaded the kingdom of Israel, in the days of Menahem; (2 Kings xv. 19.) it being very agreeable to the methods of Providence, to make use of a heathen king that was penitent, to punish the impenitency of God's own people, Israel.

And he arose from his throne, and laid aside his robe from him.] He laid aside all his state, and put on the habit of a penitent.

Ver. 7. Let neither man nor beast—taste any thing.] Such general shows of sorrow add to the solemnity of the humiliation, and may be proper to work upon men's minds, and bring them to a true contrition.

Ver. 8. But let man and beast be covered with sackcloth.] The covering horses and mules with sackcloth adds to the solemnity of a funeral: in like manner, their mournful garb was an affecting circumstance in this public sorrow and humiliation.

Let them cry mightily unto God; yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands.] Natural religion instructed them, that their earnest prayers, without true amendment, would not avail them before God: nor would their repentance be thought sincere, unless they restored to the true owners what they had gained by violence and injustice.

Ver. 9. Who can tell if God will turn and repent?] Compare Joel ii. 14. 2 Sam. xii. 22. Even wicked men, upon their repentance, are apt to conceive hopes of obtaining mercy.

Ver. 10. And God repented of the evil which he said he would do unto them; and he did it not.] According to the general declaration he hath made of his will in this case Jer. xviii. 1. therefore the threatenings of temporal evils are to be understood conditionally; viz. unless the execution of them is suspended by men's repentance.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

Jonah repining at God's mercy in sparing the Ninevites, is reproved by the type and figure of the gourd.

Ver. 1. BUT it displeased Jonah exceedingly, &c.] God's mercy in sparing the Ninevites was very displeasing to Jonah; and he expressed a great impatience under it, lest he should be esteemed a false prophet, and treated as such.

Ver. 2. And he prayed unto the Lord, and said, &c.] He uttered his complaint in his prayers to God, wherein he pleaded an excuse for his disobedience to God's first commands.

Therefore I fled into Tarshish, &c.] This made me unwilling to go upon this message to the Ninevites, because I knew by the declaration thou madest to Moses, (Exod. xxxiv. 6.) and by several instances of thy mercy, that thou dost not always execute the punishments thou threatenest against sinners.

Ver. 3. Therefore now, O Lord, take, I beseech thee, my life from me, &c.] I had rather die, than live under the imputation of being a false prophet. Josephus (Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 19.) tells a story parallel to this, concerning one Judas, an Essene, who had foretold that Antigonus should be murdered on a certain day at Straton's Tower, which was another name for the town of Cæsarea. On the very same day he saw this Antigonus in the temple, at which he fell into a great passion, and wished himself dead: but before the day was over, he received news that Antigonus was slain just under that tower of the palace in Jerusalem, which was called Straton's Tower.

Ver. 5. So Jonah went out of the city.] The words should have been translated, Now Jonah had gone out of the city: for the particulars related in the foregoing verses happened after his departing out of the city, and sitting somewhere in view of it, expecting some extraordinary judgment should come upon it: but being disappointed, he broke out into that expostulation with God already mentioned.

And sat on the east side of the city.] Probably in some solitary place, where he might not be discovered, and which did not lie in the way towards his own country, but quite opposite to it: so that if the Ninevites had a mind to have pursued him, they might not apprehend him.

Ver. 6. And God prepared a gourd, &c.] What sort of plant or shrub this should be, was a question before St. Jerome's time, as appears by his commentary upon the place. He translates it ivy, not that he thought it meant so, but in compliance, as he tells us, with some ancient interpreters; although the Septuagint, and all the ancient versions, agree in translating it a gourd.

That it might be a shadow over his head, and deliver him from his grief.] From the burning heat of the sun, which still added to his former grief and vexation; the booth which he made at first being withered by the heat.

Ver. 8. When the sun did arise, God prepared a vehement east wind; and the sun did beat upon the head of Jonah, that he fainted, &c.] The winds in the hot countries are oftentimes more suffocating than the heat of the sun, when they blow from the sandy deserts; and they make the sunbeams give a more intense heat. The word charishith, vehement, signifies likewise silent, as it is translated in the margin. Taking it in that sense, it denotes such a wind, as causes a small motion in the air, and makes it sultry hot.

Ver. 9. Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd?] Dost thou think fit to persist in thine impatience, notwithstanding the punishment I have sent upon thee for thy former guilt in this kind?

I do well to be angry, even unto death.] I have just cause to be angry, even to that degree as to wish myself dead. The prophet here records his own impatience, without concealing any circumstance of it, as Moses and other holy writers have done.

Ver. 10. Thou hast had pity on the gourd, &c.] Thou wast concerned at the loss of that short-lived plant.

Ver. 11. And should not I spare Nineveh, that great city.] The lives of so many thousand men are much more valuable than that of a single plant.

Wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left.] i. e. Infants, who know neither good nor evil, as it is expressed, Deut. i. 39. Isa. vii. 15. 16. If we compute these at a fifth part of the inhabitants of Nineveh, the whole sum will amount to six hundred thousand inhabitants; which are as few as can well be supposed to live in a city of such large dimensions.

And also much cattle?] God's providence extends its care to beasts, as well as men: (see Psal. xxxvi. 6. civ. 27, 28.) so he is willing to spare them, as well as the more noble parts of the creation.

This reason seems to have silenced Jonah's complaints, and made him sensible of his fault, in repining at God's mercies.

MICAH.

PREFACE.

THE Prophet Micah was probably of Judah, because he reckons the time of his prophesying by the reigns of the kings of Judah. He is called the Morasthite here, and Jer. xxvi. 18. from the place of his nativity, Morasthi, which St. Jerome distinguishes from Mareshah, mentioned i. 15. though he places them both in the tribe of Judah. (Lib. de Locis Hebr.)

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet begins with an awful description of God's coming to execute his judgments, first upon Samaria, and then upon Jerusalem.

Ver. 1. THE word of the Lord that came to Micah concerning Samaria and Jerusalem.] Concerning both the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, whereof Samaria and Jerusalem were the metropoles.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 2. Hear, all ye people; and hearken, O earth, and all that therein is.] Or, Hearken, O land [of Israel], and all its inhabitants. A form of speech bespeaking men's attention. (See Deut. xxxii. 1. Isa. i. 2.) The prophets sometimes address their speech to inanimate things, to upbraid the stupidity of men. (See below, vi. 1, 2. Ezek. vi. 2.)

And let the Lord be witness against you.] I call him to witness, that I have forewarned you of the judgments that hang over your heads, unless you speedily repent. And he himself will become a witness against you, and convince you of your sins, in such a manner, that you shall not be able to deny the charge. (Compare Psal. l. 7. Mal. iii. 5.)

The Lord from his holy temple.] From heaven his holy habitation. (See the following verse, and the note upon Jonah ii. 7.)

Ver. 3. For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place.] God is described as coming from heaven to judgment, because of the visible effects of his power and presence upon earth. (See Isa. xxvi. 21.)

And he will come down, and tread upon the high places of the earth.] When he comes to execute his judgments, he will subdue places of the greatest strength, and bring down the men of the highest rank. (See Amos iv. 13.)

Ver. 4. And the mountains shall be molten under him, and the valleys shall be cleft, &c.] An allusion to God's coming upon Mount Sinai, when thunder and lightning shook the mountain, and violent rains, which accompanied this tempest, made the hills look as if they were melted down. (Compare Judg. iv. 4, 5. Psal. lxviii. 8. xcvii. 5. Isa. lxiv. 1, 2. Habak. iii. 6. 9, 10.) Or the words may be referred to the general judgment, of which all particular judgments are an earnest; when the heavens and the earth shall be dissolved at God's appearing. (Compare Nahum i. 5. Isa. li. 6.)

Ver. 5. What is the transgression of Jacob? is it not Samaria?] Where is the chief cause of Jacob's or Israel's sin and apostacy? Is it not in Samaria, the chief seat of that kingdom, the residence of the king and his princes, who have set up the idolatry of the golden calves, and made it the established religion of the kingdom?

And what are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem?] Doth not the idolatrous worship, practised in the high places, receive its chief encouragement from Ahaz, and the great men that join with him in that idolatry? (See 2 Kings xvi. 4.)

Ver. 6. Therefore I will make Samaria as a heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard.] It shall be turned into a heap of ruins. (Compare iii. 12. 2 Kings xix. 25. Nehem. iv. 2.) It shall be reduced into such heaps of stones as are laid up together in a field lately ploughed, or a vineyard newly planted, after the stones have been gathered out of it. (Compare Isa. v. 2. Hos. xii. 11.) The Vulgar Latin translates the sentence thus: I will make Samaria as a heap of stones in a field, when a vineyard is planted.

And I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will discover the foundations thereof.] Samaria stood upon a hill; (1 Kings xvi. 24.) so, when it was demolished, many stones would fall down from the high and stately buildings into the valley beneath, and leave the foundations naked and bare. (Compare Jer. li. 25.)

Ver. 7. All the hires thereof shall be burnt with fire.] i. e. The city shall be destroyed; all its wealth and substance shall be consumed in the fire; the increase of which they looked upon as so many rewards of their idolatry. (See Hos. ii. 5. 12.)

For she gathered it of the hire of a harlot, and it shall return to the hire of a harlot.] She imagines that she gaineth her wealth as a reward of her idolatry, and it shall return or be made a prey to idolatrous Assyrians. Nothing is more abominable than the hire of a harlot, implying two great wickednesses, covetousness and impurity. (See Deut. xxiii. 18.)

Ver. 8. Therefore I will wail and howl; I will go stripped and naked.] I will sympathize with the calamities of my countrymen. (Compare Isa. xxii. 4. Jer. iv. 19.) I will put on the habit and dress of mourners, whose custom it was to go without their upper garments; or with those they wore, rent and torn. This will fitly denote the naked condition to which the ten tribes will be reduced by their enemies. (See Isa. xx. 2—4. and the notes there.)

I will make a wailing like the dragons.] The word tannin is often translated a dragon by our interpreters; but it signifies most commonly some great fish, such as a whale, or crocodile. (See the note upon Isa. xxvii. 1. Ezek. xxix. 3.) It seems to be taken for a land-animal here, as Dr. Pocock observes upon the place; and so it is taken Lam. iv. 3. where our English reads, The sea-monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones: but the text must be understood of a land-animal, sea-monsters having no breasts.

And mourning as the owls.] Compare Job xxx. 29. Psal. cii. 6. Bochart (de Animal. lib. ii. cap. 14.) thinks the word translated owls signifies properly an ostrich. It is generally supposed, that the Hebrew yaanih is derived from the loud noise this bird maketh. The LXX. translate it here by Σειρῆνες, sirens; by which Vossius understands a sort of wasp or hornet, of a melancholy note; which kind never goes in swarms, but wanders about in a solitary manner. (See his Dissert. de Orac. Sibyll. cap. 13.)

Ver. 9. For her wound is incurable; it is come to Judah: he is come to the gate of my people, even to Jerusalem.] The captivity and desolation of the ten tribes can neither be prevented, because they persist in their impenitence; nor can any relief be applied to it, because it will end in their utter destruction. And one aggravating circumstance attends it, that it is the forerunner of those evils which will befal Judah and Jerusalem; whose gates Sennacherib shall attempt to besiege, with a design to make himself master of that city and the kingdom. (See 2 Kings xviii. 17. 2 Chron. xxxii. 2. compare ver. 12. of this chapter.)

Ver. 10. Declare it not in Gath.] The words are taken out of David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 20. This manner of speech does not imply, in either place, that such ill tidings could be concealed; but only expresseth the prophet's concern, lest the Philistines should take occasion from thence to rejoice over the calamities of his people.

In the house of Aphrah roll thyself in the dust.] Or, Wallow in the ashes; as was commonly practised in times of great mourning. (See Esther iv. 3. Jer. vi. 20.) The word Aphrah signifies dust; and the prophet, it is likely, puts it here for Ophrah, a town in the tribe of Benjamin; that the name may better suit their present condition.

Ver. 11. Pass ye away, thou inhabitant of Saphir, having thy shame naked.] Or, Thy nakedness uncovered. The word Saphir imports a fair and delightful habitation, and denotes either Samaria or Jerusalem. The prophet threatens the inhabitants of that place, that they shall go into captivity in a way very unsuitable to their former softness and luxury; even without so much as a covering to hide their nakedness. (See Isa. iii. 17. xlvii. 2, 3. and the notes there.)

The inhabitant of Zaanan came not forth in the mourning of Beth-ezel.] The inhabitants of Zaanan were so much concerned to provide for their own security, that they took no notice of the mournful condition of their neighbour: so Beth-ezel signifies. Grotius supposes Zaanan to denote Zion, and Beth-ezel to signify Beth-el, called here by another name, importing the house of separation, according to his interpretation; because it was the principal seat of idolatrous worship.

He shall receive from you his standing.] The inhabitant of Zaanan may make a conjecture of his own strength or condition, whether he is like to stand or fall by the fate which he sees doth befal the people of Beth-ezel.

Ver. 12. For the inhabitant of Maroth waited carefully for good; but evil came down, &c.] The words may be better translated, Although the inhabitant of Maroth waited for good; yet evil, &c. So the particle ki is translated when it is repeated in the middle of the sentence, as it is here. (2 Sam. xxiii. 5.) By Maroth, which signifies bitterness, or trouble, Grotius understands Ramoth: there were several Ramahs, expressed sometimes by Ramoth, in the plural number; one in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. i. 1. another in the tribe of Benjamin near Beth-lehem, Jer. xxxi. 15.

But evil came down from the Lord unto the gate of Jerusalem.] Such a calamity as stopped not at Ramah, but reached even to Jerusalem; those two places being not far asunder. (See Judg. xix. 10. 13.)

Ver. 13. O inhabitants of Lachish, bind the chariot to the swift beast.] In order to flee from the approaching enemy. Lachish was one of the first cities that Sennacherib besieged, when he invaded Judea, (2 Kings xviii. 13, 14.)

She was the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion; for the transgressions of Israel were found in her.] She was the first among the cities of Judah which practised those idolatries, which the kings and people of Israel had begun.

Ver. 14. Therefore shalt thou give presents to Moresheth-gath.] Either to defend thee against the enemy, or to receive thee under their protection. Moresheth-gath was probably a place that once belonged to Gath of the Philistines.

The houses of Achzib shall be a lie unto the kings of Israel.] Achzib signifies a lie. There is a town of that name belonging to the tribe of Judah, mentioned Josh. xv. 44. This place the prophet foretells will answer its name, and disappoint the kings of Israel that depended upon its strength and assistance. [See 2 Chron. xxi. 2. xxviii. 19.] Israel is sometimes used for Judah: (see below, iii. 9, 10.) so it may probably be taken here, and ver. 15.

Ver. 15. Yet I will bring an heir to thee, O inhabitant of Mareshah.] This is another town belonging to Judah, mentioned Josh. xv. 44. The name signifies an inheritance: so the prophet, by way of allusion, foretells that a new heir shall come and take possession of it, viz. a conquering enemy.

He shall come to Adullam, the glory of Israel.] The enemy shall enlarge his conquests even to Adullam, one of the frontier cities of Judah, fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 7. Israel is put here for Judah, as in the foregoing verse. The margin reads, The glory of Israel shall come to Adullam: i. e. the great and honourable men shall be forced to hide themselves from their enemies, in the cave of Adullam, as David did when he fled from Saul, 1 Sam. xxii. 1.

This may relate to the great depredations which Pekah king of Israel, in conjunction with Rezin king of Syria, made in the kingdom of Judah, in the reign of Ahaz. (See 2 Chron. xxviii. 5. 8.)

Ver. 16. Make thee bald, and poll thee [or, shave thy hair] for thy delicate children; for they are gone into captivity from thee.] Cutting the hair, or shaving it close, were expressions of mourning and lamentation, anciently used among most nations. (See Job i. 20. Jer. vi. 29. Amos viii. 10. and the notes upon Isa. xv. 2.)

Enlarge thy baldness as an eagle.] When she moults her feathers.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The chapter begins with a reproof for the sins of oppression, and contempt of God's word, but concludes with the promise of a restoration. Some learned men think that the reproofs of this chapter relate to the times of king Ahaz.

Ver. 1. WOE to them that devise iniquity, and work evil upon their beds, &c.] Whose thoughts are big with mischief, so that they contrive schemes of wickedness upon their beds, in order to put them in practice when they arise in the morning. (Compare Psal. xxxvi. 4.)

Because it is in the power of their hand.] They make their strength the law of justice, according to the character given of such men, Wisd. ii. 11.

Some take the Hebrew word El to signify God, which is its most usual signification; in which sense the Vulgar Latin translates it, "Contra Deum est manus illorum;" their hand is against God. But the phrase in the original is used in the same sense in which our translators understand it, Gen. xxxi. 29. Deut. xxviii. 32.

Ver. 2. So they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage.] They take from him both his house and his land.

Ver. 3. Behold, against this family do I devise an evil, &c.] As they devise mischief against others, so will I devise an evil against them, as a due punishment for their sin. As they have unjustly deprived others of their inheritance, so a conquering enemy shall dispossess them, and carry them into captivity. (See the following verse.) The word family is equivalent to people, as appears from Jer. i. 15. compare viii. 3. x. 25. of that prophecy; where the families which have not called upon thy name, mean the same with the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name, Psal. lxxix. 6.

Ver. 4. In that day shall one take up a parable against you.] A parable denotes a speech out of the ordinary way, as the Greek word Παροιμία imports, and illustrated with metaphors or rhetorical figures. (See Job xxvii. 1. Ezek. xx. 49. Habak. ii. 1.) So speaking in parables (for so the words should be translated) is opposed to speaking plainly, John xvi. 25. 29.

And lament with a doleful lamentation.] The expression alludes to the lamentations made at funerals. (See the note upon Amos v. 1.)

He hath changed the portion of my people; how hath he removed it from me?] He hath removed his people out of their ancient inheritance, that portion which he himself had allotted them, and given it away to other owners.

Turning away he hath divided our fields.] Turning us into captivity; or, as the margin reads, Instead of restoring us, he hath divided our lands among our enemies.

Ver. 5. Therefore thou shalt have none that shall cast a cord by lot in the congregation of the Lord.] Israel was the Lord's people or congregation; (compare Deut. xxiii. 1, 2.) they were the lot of his inheritance, (Deut. xxxii. 9.) and he divided their land among them by lot: but now they shall be utterly expelled out of it, and sent captives into a foreign country.

Ver. 6. Prophesy ye not, say they to them that prophesy.] They do not care to hear the prophets speak ungrateful truths. (See Isa. xxx. 10. Amos vii. 16.) The word is the same here which is used in that text of Amos. (See the note there.) Say they, is understood by a like ellipsis, Nahum xi. 8.

They shall not prophesy to them, that they shall not take shame.] Or rather, For they will not take shame. It is to no purpose to prophesy to them, for they still persist in a shameless course of sin. (Compare Zech. iii. 5. Jer. vi. 15.) The latter part of the sentence may be thus translated, Their shame shall not depart, or be removed from them; i. e. God hath determined to bring that shame upon them which their sins deserve.

Ver. 7. O thou that art named the house of Jacob.] But dost not act suitably to the piety of thy father Jacob.

Is the Spirit of the Lord straitened? are these his doings? &c.] Is God's hand or power shortened? (Compare Isa. lix. 1. Zech. iv. 6.) Are the judgments he brings upon you the genuine effects of his power and goodness? and not rather such acts as your sins do in a manner constrain him to exercise? as punishments are called his strange work, Isa. xxviii. 21. Certainly both his laws and the words delivered by his prophets would turn to your good, if you would obey them.

Ver. 8. Even of late my people is risen up as an enemy.] This Dr. Wells refers to the invasion of Judah by Pekah, and the devastations which followed upon it. (See 2 Chron. xxviii. 5. 8.)

Ye pull off the robe with the garment from them that pass by securely, &c.] Or, Ye take the robe from off the garment; so Noldius translates it, p. 611. By the robe is meant the upper garment, called the cloak, Luke vi. 29. where the phrase seems to be taken from this place. The words import, that the Israelites invaded their countrymen of Judea, who had given them no provocation, and were willing to live peaceably with them; and in a violent manner stripped them of all their substance, even to their wearing apparel.

Ver. 9. The women of my people have ye cast out from their pleasant houses, &c.] This probably relates to the invasion just now mentioned, when the Israelites carried away captive of their brethren two hundred thousand, women, sons, and daughters, 2 Chron. xxviii. 8.

From their children have ye taken away my glory for ever.] Ye have taken their children captive with a design to sell them to the heathen, (see Joel iii. 6.) that they may be bred up in idolatry, and forfeit all their right to the privileges of my temple and worship. The temple is called the beauty of holiness, Psal. xxix. 2. xcvi. 9. where the word is the same which is here translated glory. Some understand the words of Pekah and Rezin's design to set up another king in Judah, (see Isa. vii. 6.) not allied to the house of David, and thereby to defeat the promises made to that family, that the Messias should descend from thence, and withal deprive the posterity of the Jews of the most glorious part of God's promises to them.

Ver. 10. Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest.] The prophet still directs his discourse to the Israelites that invaded Judea, and tells them, that as a just punishment for their oppressing and spoiling their brethren, they themselves should be carried captive out of their land, where God had promised to give them rest. (See Deut. xii. 9. Psal. xcv. 2.)

Because it is polluted, it shall destroy you, even with a sore destruction.] The land, being polluted with your sins, shall spew you out, as it did its former inhabitants, the Canaanites, (Lev. xviii. 28.)

Ver. 11. If a man walking in the spirit and falsehood.] Or, Of falsehood. Noldius gives several instances where the copulative particle supplies the place of the genitive case. (See his Concordance, p. 315.)

I will prophesy unto thee of wine and strong drink; he shall even be the prophet of this people.] If a prophet pretend to foretell all manner of plenty and prosperity, such a one shall be hearkened to by this people, though it be never so unlikely to come to pass. Such were those that prophesied of peace, whom Jeremiah reproves, vi. 14. viii. 11. and spoke smooth things, to please their hearers, Isa. xxx. 10. The words may be thus translated, I will prophesy unto thee for wine and strong drink: i. e. if it appears, both by his words and actions, that he doth not design the serving God, but his own belly, as St. Paul speaks, Rom. xvi. 18. yet such a one shall be followed by those that love soothing teachers. (Compare iii. 5.) Wine and strong drink are often mentioned together; the latter may best be explained in the words of St. Jerome (Epist. 2. ad Nepotianum): "Sicera Hebræo sermone omnis potio nuncupatur, quæ inebriare potest, sive illa quæ frumento conficitur, sive pomorum succo; aut cum favi decoquuntur in dulcem potionem, aut palmarum fructus exprimuntur in liquorem, coctisque frugibus aqua pinguior coloratur." The Hebrew word Sheker signifies any strong drink, whether it be made with any sort of grain (like our malt), or with the juice of apples; or when a sweet liquor is made by the infusion of honey, or when a juice is pressed out of the dates of the palm-tree; or water hath a strength and colour added to it by the infusion of any other fruit.

Ver. 12. I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee; I will surely gather the remnant of Israel.] Here follows a promise of mercy, such as is often subjoined to the threatenings of impending judgments. This promise relates to the general restoration of the Jewish nation, which yet is here and elsewhere confined to that remnant, that shall escape the punishments that will come upon the rebellious. (See the note upon iv. 7.)

I will put them together as the sheep of Bozrah, &c.] God is often styled the Shepherd of Israel, and his care over his people is compared to that of a shepherd over his flock, when he gathers them into the fold, and defends them from beasts of prey, while they are there. (Compare Jer. xxxi. 10.) Bozrah is a noted place in Idumea, where there were large flocks of sheep.

They shall make a noise by reason of the multitude of men.] The noise a multitude makes both discovers their numbers, and is a sign of their being lively and in good condition. The words may be rendered, keeping close to the original, They shall increase with men: the same word in the Hebrew signifying both a noise and a multitude. (Compare Ezek. xxxvi. 37.)

Ver. 13. The breaker is come up before them.] He that shall break the bonds of their captivity, or break through all obstacles that hinder their return home. The word porets is usually understood in a bad sense, for a thief or a destroyer; but the context here determines it to a more favourable acceptation. To this sense the Vulgar Latin renders it, Pandens iter, He that opens the way. The Jewish commentators generally understand the breaker, and their King, that follows, of the same person, viz. the Messiah; as may be seen in Dr. Pocock upon the place. Bishop Pearson cites the words of Moses Hadarsan to the same purpose, in his Exposition of the sixth article of the Creed. The words seem parallel to that expression of Zechariah, (xii. 8.) As the angel of the Lord before them, or, at the head of them. (See the note there.) Some of the Jews, indeed, with a little variation, expound their King of the Messiah, and the breaker of his forerunner Elijah; as Dr. Pocock observes, the Chaldee paraphrase translates it, Those that are saved; as if the word were in a passive form.

They have broken up, and have passed through the gate, and are gone out by it.] The expressions allude to a flock of sheep, who, as soon as a passage is opened for one to get out, do all of them follow.

And their King shall pass before them, and [or, even] the Lord on the head of them.] The Messiah, who is both their God and their King, (see the note upon Isa. vii. 14.) shall lead and conduct them as their captain and general. (Compare Isa. lii. 12. Hos. i. 11.)

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

Both the princes and prophets of Judah are reproved for their sins, and the destruction of Jerusalem is foretold, as a punishment for these enormities.

Ver. 1. HEAR, O ye heads of Jacob, and ye princes of the house of Israel.] Israel stands for Judah here, as appears by ver. 9, 10. (See likewise, i. 14, 15.)

Ver. 2, 3. Who pluck off their skin from off them, &c.] Who exercise all manner of cruelty upon their inferiors, as if they were so many butchers cutting meat for the shambles.

Ver. 4. He will even hide his face from them at that time, as they have behaved themselves ill in their doings.] As they have shewed no pity to others, God will have no pity for them.

Ver. 5. That bite with their teeth, and cry, Peace.] Though they speak smooth things, yet are no better than ravening wolves, and bring destruction upon those that are deluded by them. (See ii. 11.)

And he that putteth not into their mouth, they even prepare war against him.] If men will not still caress and maintain them, they bring them into trouble by raising false accusations against them, as if they were enemies to the government. (Compare Ezek. xiii. 19.)

Ver. 6, 7. Therefore night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision, &c.] The false prophets shall see their own prophecies confuted by experience, so that they shall no more pretend to the gift of prophecy, and shall be covered with shame and confusion for making false pretences to it.

And the sun shall go down over the prophets, and the day shall be dark over them.] As they shall have no light or revelation from heaven, so dark days or dismal calamities shall overtake them, as a just punishment for their frauds and impostures. (Compare Isa. viii. 20. xxix. 10. Jer. xv. 9. Amos viii. 9, 10.)

Ver. 7. Yea, they shall cover their lips: for there is no answer from God.] Men used to cover their mouth, or their face, when they were under any great affliction. (See Ezek. xxiv. 17.) This likewise shewed that they were utterly silenced, and had nothing to say, either by way of revelation from God, or in behalf of themselves. (Job xl. 4.)

Ver. 8. But truly I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord, and of judgment, and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgression, &c.] Whereas I, that am a true prophet, and moved by God's Spirit, have the honesty and courage to reprove the crying sins of the nation, though practised and encouraged by the greatest men in it; (see ver. 9.) contrary to the base flatterings and soothings of the false prophets. (See Ezek. xiii. 10, &c.) Geburah properly signifies might, or courage; so it is used, Isa. xi. 2. (See the note there.)

Ver. 9. Hear this—ye heads of the house of Jacob, and princes of the house of Israel.] See ver. 1. This address to the great men, shews the prophet's courage and impartiality.

Ver. 10. They that build up Zion with blood, &c.] Who think to increase the wealth, or secure the safety, of the public, by putting the innocent to death. (Compare Habak. ii. 12.)

Ver. 11. The heads thereof judge for reward.] See vii. 3. Isa. i. 23. Hos. iv. 18. Ezek. xxii. 12. 27. Zeph. iii. 3.

Her priests teach for hire.] It was the duty of the priests to instruct the people, as well as to attend upon the service of the temple; for which cause they had cities allotted to them in all parts of Judea. (See Deut. xxxiii. 10. Ezra vii. 10. Jer. xviii. 18. Mal. ii. 7.) The priests, not content with that plentiful revenue which the law allowed them, made a corrupt gain of their office.

And the prophets divine for money.] See ver. 5. Jer. v. 31. vi. 13. This is to be understood of the false prophets. (See Zeph. iii. 4. Zech. xiii. 2.)

Yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, Is not the Lord among us [or, in the midst of us]? none evil can come upon us.] Notwithstanding these general corruptions, they will rely upon God's protection, and think themselves secure, because he hath chosen the temple as the place of his peculiar residence. (Compare Jer. vii. 4. Zeph. iii. 5.) St. Paul alludes to this place, when he describes the Jews as resting or relying upon the law, Rom. ii. 17. The Greek word ἐπαναπαύη, is the same which the LXX use here.

Ver. 12. Therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field, &c.] This prophecy had its utmost completion in the final destruction of the city and temple by the Romans. (See the note upon Jer. xxvi. 18.)

And Jerusalem shall become heaps.] The word heaps alludes to the heaps of stones laid up together in fields newly ploughed. (See i. 6. compare Psal. lxxix. 1.)

And the mountain of the house [of the Lord] as the high places of the forest.] The place where the temple stood, which was upon Mount Moriah, shall be overrun with grass and shrubs, like a thicket or forest.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet foretells the proclamation of the gospel, and the increase of Christ's kingdom, in the latter ages of the world: and exhorts God's people not to be discouraged at the apprehension of their approaching captivity, because the church should in due time surmount all difficulties, and break in pieces all the kingdoms of the earth; as Daniel afterward prophesied, ii. 35. 44.

Ver. 1. BUT in the last days it shall come to pass.] The times of the Messias are usually expressed in the prophets by the last days. (See the note upon the parallel text, Isa. ii. 2.)

That the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established upon the tops of the mountains.] See iii. 12. The temple standing upon Mount Moriah, is often styled God's holy mountain; from thence the phrase is taken to denote the Christian church in the prophetical writings. (See Isa. xi. 9. lxvi. 20. Jer. xxxi. 23. Ezek. xx. 40. Joel iii. 17. Zech. viii. 3.) Our Lord himself compares his church to a city set on a hill, Matt. v. 14.

And people shall flow unto it.] Heathens shall resort thither to be instructed in the ways of salvation. (See the following verse.)

Ver. 2. And many nations shall come, and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord—and he will teach us of his ways, &c.] The expressions allude to the Jews' going up in companies to Jerusalem at their solemn feasts. (See the notes upon the parallel text of Isaiah.)

Ver. 3. And he shall judge among many people—and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, &c.] See the notes upon the same place. It is farther observable, that our Saviour was born at a time when there was peace all the world over; after Augustus, having put an end to the civil wars, had shut up the temple of Janus, in token of his having procured a settled peace.

Ver. 4. But they shall sit every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid.] This shall be the effect of that peace, foretold in the foregoing verse, when every man may securely enjoy his own possessions, and the fruits of his labour. (See Isa. xxxvi. 16. 1 Kings iv. 25. Zech. iii. 10. compare Jer. xxiii. 4. 6.)

Ver. 5. For all people will walk every one in the name of his god, and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever.] Or, Although all nations should walk every one in the name of his god, yet we will walk, &c. Since all people are fond of the religion of their forefathers, though false and absurd; it much more becomes us to cleave steadfastly to the service of the true God, and not forsake his laws and ordinances, as we have too often done. And this will be remarkably fulfilled at the general conversion of the Jews, when this prophecy shall receive its utmost completion; as hath been observed in the notes upon the parallel text of Isaiah. (See likewise the following verses of this chapter.)

Ver. 6. In that day will I assemble her that halteth.] Or, I will heal her that halteth: (compare Zeph. iii. 19.) for so the verb asaph, assemble, is translated 2 Kings v. 3. 6. The word which we render halteth, signifies in general one that is weak and feeble, or bowed down by any disease or calamity. (See Psal. xxxv. 15. xxxviii. 17.)

And I will gather her that is driven out.] This relates to the calling of the Jews from their several dispersions into the church: (see the notes upon Ezek. xxxiv. 13. 16.) although it may in some degree have been fulfilled in their return from the Babylonish captivity. (Compare Psal. cxlvii. 2.)

Ver. 7. And I will make her that halteth a remnant.] To this remnant are many promises made, which may in some degree be applied to the state of the Jews after their return from captivity; (see Zeph. ii. 9. Zech. viii. 6. 11.) but are chiefly to be understood of those who were to be called by the gospel, when the main body of the Jewish nation were rejected. (See ii. 12. v. 3. 7, 8. vii. 18. Isa. i. 9. x. 21, 22. Jer. i. 20. Joel ii. 32. Zeph. ii. 9. iii. 13. and the notes upon those places.)

And her that was cast off a strong nation.] The Jews, when they return from their several dispersions, (see ver. 6.) shall be victorious over all their enemies. (Compare v. 8. Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. and see the note upon Obadiah, ver. 8.)

And the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even for ever.] Compare Joel iii. 17. God will dwell and reign among his saints in the New Jerusalem, that comes down from heaven, Rev. xxi. 2, 3, &c. and then the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever, Rev. xi. 15. compared with xix. 6. Isa. xxiv. 23. Dan. vii. 27.

Ver. 8. And thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion, &c.] The church, of which the earthly Jerusalem was but a figure, shall be the seat of this sovereign dominion, which God shall render conspicuous to the whole world, spoken of ver. 7. The tower of the flock, or of Eder, is best explained by the strong hold of the daughter of Zion, which follows. The Chaldee paraphrase expounds the words of the Messiah, in whom the ancient kingdom shall be revived; i. e. the kingdom of David, the Beth-lehemite; the tower of Eder being in or near Beth-lehem, (Gen. xxxv. 19. 21.) This notion is countenanced by Jonathan's Targum upon Gen. xxxv. 19. where mention being made in the text of the tower of Eder, beyond which Israel spread his tent, he adds, by way of explanation, from hence King Messias shall manifest himself in the latter days.

Ver. 9. Now why dost thou cry out aloud? is there no king in thee? is thy counsellor perished? for pangs have taken thee as a woman in travail.] Why dost thou cry out, as a woman in the anguish of her travail, as if God himself, thy king and counsellor, had forsaken thee? (Compare Jer. viii. 19.) Some understand it of the time when Zedekiah and his counsellors were seized by the Chaldeans, (2 Kings xxv. 6. 18, &c.) Calamities are often compared to the pangs of child-bearing. (See Isa. xiii. 8. Jer. xxx. 6. l. 43.)

Ver. 10. Be in pain, and labour to bring forth, O daughter of Zion.] There is reason for your being in pain and anguish; but, as the pangs of a woman in travail, they shall have a happy conclusion; as it follows in the next words.

For now shalt thou go forth out of the city, and dwell in the field, and thou shalt go even to Babylon.] The Jews' captivity is expressed by their going out of the city, and dwelling in the field; because their city and temple being destroyed, they should live in an obscure state, without any visible form of government or worship. The same condition is elsewhere expressed by their living in the wilderness. (See the note upon Ezek. xx. 35. and Hos. ii. 14.) So the church under persecution is described as flying into the wilderness, Rev. xii. 14.

There shalt thou be delivered, &c.] God shall wonderfully restore thy captivity from thence by Cyrus, as he hath foretold by Isaiah, a prophet contemporary with Micah. (Isa. xliv. 28. xlv. 1. compare vii. 8. 11. of this prophecy.)

Ver. 11. Now also many nations are gathered against thee, and say, Let her be defiled, and let our eye look upon Zion.] The heathen round about will take occasion to insult the Jews' calamity, will please themselves with seeing the temple profaned, and gratify their spite with viewing Jerusalem in a forlorn condition. (See Lam. ii. 16.) To look upon our enemies, is to behold their fall with delight. (Compare vii. 10. and see the note upon Obad. ver. 12.)

Ver. 12. But they know not the thought of the Lord—for he shall gather them as sheaves into the floor.] They are ignorant of God's purpose, which is to punish them with an entire destruction, after he hath executed his judgments upon his own people. (See Jer. xxv. 27—29.) Great calamities are compared to the thrashing of corn in a floor. (See the following verse, and the note upon Isa. xxi. 10.)

Ver. 13. Arise and thrash, O daughter of Zion; for I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass.] The expressions allude to the manner of treading out the corn in the eastern countries, which was by the feet of oxen: (see Deut. xxv. 4.) so the word horn is equivalent to the hoofs which follow. The words, as they relate to Zion, may be expounded in a spiritual sense, of bringing in the gentiles to the obedience of Christ. (See the following note.) Or else we may suppose this promise will be fulfilled, when all the enemies of the church shall be subdued, and the saints reigning with Christ shall have power over the nations, and shall rule (the refractory) with a rod of iron, Rev. ii. 26, 27. (Compare this text with v. 8. 15. of this prophecy, and with Isa. xiv. 2. xli. 15. lx. 12. lxi. 5. and see the notes upon those places.)

And I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth.] This denotes the conversion of the gentiles, which is elsewhere expressed by their bringing gifts and offerings to God's temple; because that was the most solemn part of religious worship practised among the Jews. (See Psal. lxviii. 29. Isa. xviii. 7. xxiii. 18. lx. 6. 9. and compare Rev. xxi. 24. 26.) The word translated consecrate, properly signifies to devote, and alludes to the action of conquerors, who use to dedicate part of their booty to God, as a thankful acknowledgment for their victory.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet, that he may comfort the Jews under the calamities foretold in the last chapter, foretells the birth of Christ, whose kingdom should at last become victorious over all its enemies.

Ver. 1. NOW gather thyself in troops, O daughter of troops: he hath laid siege against us.] This verse is to be understood of some foreign invasion of Judea, by a nation that had numerous troops; and may relate to the conquest of Judea by the Babylonians. The daughter of troops is a phrase of the same kind with the daughter of affliction; i. e. one that is surrounded with affliction: so the son of death is one condemned to die, 1 Sam. xx. 31. Psal. cii. 20.

They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek.] This may be understood of Zedekiah, who was treated in a contumelious manner by the Babylonians, as a common captive, (2 Kings xxv. 6, 7.) Smiting on the cheek, signifies treating one in a despiteful manner, Lam. iii. 31. Matt. v. 39. The Judge of Israel is equivalent to the King of Israel. (See Amos ii. 5.)

Ver. 2. But thou Beth-lehem-Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah.] Ephrath, or Ephratah, was another name for Beth-lehem in the tribe of Judah. (See Gen. xxxv. 19.) And both names are joined together, to distinguish it from another Beth-lehem, situate in the tribe of Zebulun, mentioned Josh. xix. 15. It is called little among the thousands, i. e. among the families, or cities of Judah. (Compare Judg. vi. 15. 1 Sam. x. 19.) The expression is taken from the first division of the people into thousands, hundreds, and other subordinate divisions. (See Exod. xviii. 21. 25.) Both the city and family of David were in a mean condition at the time of Christ's birth; whereupon the blessed Virgin, in her song, thankfully commemorates God's extraordinary favour, in honouring that low estate to which they were reduced, with the birth of the Messiah, (Luke i. 48. 52, 53.)

But the word tsair, little, hath likewise a contrary signification, as many Hebrew words have, (see the note upon Isa. xii. 17.) and signifies one of note or esteem; in which sense it is taken by the Chaldee paraphrast upon Jer. xlviii. 4. and by some copies of the LXX. Zech. xiii. 7. (See Dr. Pocock, in his notes upon Porta Mosis, cap. 2. p. 18, 19.) And in this sense St. Matthew understands the text, and translates it, Art not the least among the princes of Judah, ii. 6.

Yet out of thee he shall come unto me that is to be ruler in Israel.] The scribes and pharisees understood this prophecy of the birth of the Messiah, as appears from Matt. ii. 5, 6. and so did the generality of the Jews of that age, who speak of it as an undoubted truth, that Christ was to come of the seed of David, and of the town of Beth-lehem, where David was, (John vii. 42.) The Chaldee agrees with their sentiments, and expressly applies the prophecy to the Messiah: and our Lord was born at Beth-lehem, by an especial act of Providence, that this prophecy might plainly be fulfilled in him. (See Luke ii. 4.) To come forth is the same as to be born. (See Gen. x. 14. xvii. 6. xxv. 25. 1 Chron. ii. 53. Isa. xi. 1.)

Whose goings forth have been from of old, even from everlasting.] The words do naturally import an original, distinct from the birth of Christ, mentioned in the foregoing sentence; which is here declared to be from all eternity: for so the words mikkedem (translated here from of old, but rendered from everlasting, Habak. i. 12.) and mimé olam, from the days of eternity, do plainly signify. (See Psal. lv. 19. xc. 2. Prov. viii. 23.) If we expound it with the Chaldee paraphrast, Whose name was foretold of old, the expression contains a plain description of the Messias.

Ver. 3. Therefore will he give them up, until the time that she that travaileth hath brought forth.] The particle laken, translated therefore, should be rendered nevertheless, here, and in some other places; as Dr. Pocock hath observed upon the place: and see the note upon Isa. xxx. 18. Notwithstanding the promise of so great a blessing, God will give up his people into the hands of their enemies, or leave them to be exercised with troubles and afflictions, till the appointed time of their deliverance cometh, which shall be greater than that from Babylon. (See iv. 10.) This deliverance may be understood of the church's bringing forth children by the preaching of the gospel: (see Gal. iv. 27.) but will be more fully completed in the general restoration of the Jewish nation, to be expected in the latter ages. (Compare Isa. lxvi. 7, 8.)

Then the remnant of his brethren shall return to the children of Israel.] Or, Shall be converted with the children of Israel. (See the note upon Mal. iv. 6.) Then the remnant of the dispersed Jews, (see the note upon iv. 7.) upon their conversion, shall join themselves to the true Israelites, and make one church with them. Both the LXX. and Chaldee read, The remnant of their brethren. But if we follow the present Hebrew, we may understand it of the believers that shall be added to the church, for Christ vouchsafes to call all believers his brethren. (See Matt. xii. 50. Heb. ii. 11.)

Ver. 4. And he shall stand and feed [or, rule] in the strength of the Lord, and in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God, &c.] Christ shall diligently perform the office of a shepherd or governor over his church: (compare vii. 14.) and it will appear by the success which attends him, that God is with him, and is glorified in and by him. (John xiii. 31, 32.) For his kingdom shall extend itself all the world over, (Psal. ii. 8.) and his faithful servants shall continue secure under his protection.

Instead of the verb yashalu, they shall abide, the Chaldee and Vulgar Latin read, yashubu, they shall be converted, or return from their captivity; which agrees very well with the sense of the verse foregoing.

For now shall he be great unto the ends of the earth.] The words of the angel, Luke i. 32. allude to this text, He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, &c. He is dignified with such titles as were never given to any creature, as the apostle at large proves, Heb. i. 4, &c. (Compare Isa. lii. 13. and see the note there.)

Ver. 5. And this man shall be the peace.] This title in a peculiar manner belongs to the Messiah, and is spoken of as a blessing attending his kingdom. (See Psal. lxxii. 7. Isa. ii. 4. ix. 6, 7. xi. 6. Hag. ii. 9. Zech. ix. 10. Luke ii. 14. Ephes. ii. 14. Heb. vii. 2.) This sentence may be best explained as coherent with the former verse.

When the Assyrian shall come into our land, and when he shall tread in our borders.] I take the sense which Mr. Mede hath given to this passage to be most agreeable to the scope and design of the following part of the chapter. See his Works, p. 796. where he expounds the place of the general destruction of some remarkable enemy, or enemies, to God and his truth, which should come to pass before the consummation of all things: an event foretold in several places of Scripture. (See Psal. cx. 5, 6. Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. xxxiv. 1, &c. lxvi. 16. Jer. xxx. 7. 10. Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. Joel iii. 9. 14. Obad. ver. 15, &c. Zeph. iii. 8. Hag. ii. 22. Zech. xii. 1. xiv. 8. Rev. xix. 19. xx. 9.) This enemy is probably called by the name of the Assyrian by Isaiah, xiv. 25. as well as by Micah here. (See the note upon that place.) Mr. Mede ingeniously conjectures, that this name was given him by these two prophets, because that ever since the invasion of Sennacherib, the very name of Assyrian carried terror along with it, being esteemed by the Jews as their most formidable enemy.

Then we shall raise up against him seven shepherds, and eight principal men.] Or, rulers. Under his conduct we shall be furnished with commanders sufficient to oppose the enterprises of the enemy. Shepherds are elsewhere equivalent to princes or generals. (See Jer. vi. 3. xxv. 34. Nahum iii. 18.) The words seven and eight are used for an indefinite number: (see Eccles. xi. 2.) so once and twice, six and seven, are used, Job xxxiii. 14. v. 19. Prov. vi. 16.

Ver. 6. And they shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword, and [or even] the land of Nimrod in the entrances thereof.] In its borders, where its garrisons are, and its chief strength lies. Assyria is called the land of Nimrod, because he was the first king of that country, as appears from Gen. x. 2. where the marginal reading rightly translates the text, Out of that land he (i. e. Nimrod, spoken of ver. 9.) went out into Assyria, or invaded and conquered it; as the phrase, went forth, commonly signifies. (See Psal. lx. 10. Zech. xiv. 3.)

Ver. 7. And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord.] That remnant, mentioned ver. 3. and iv. 7. shall be the instruments of converting those gentiles among whom they live: (see the notes upon Isa. lxvi. 12. 19.) and thereupon may fitly be represented by the dews and rains which come from heaven, and are the means of making the earth fruitful. (Compare Deut. xxxii. 2. Psal. lxxxii. 6. Hos. vi. 3.)

Which tarries not for man, nor waits for the sons of men.] The dews and the rains are the gift of God, (see Isa. lv. 10. Jer. xiv. 22.) and are spoken of here, by way of distinction from those fountains and canals of water, which men convey into their fields and gardens by their own industry. (Compare Deut. xi. 10, 11.) [Some of the rabbins apply the text to the birth of the Messiah, spoken of ver. 2. who shall be born, not in the ordinary way of generation, but by the miraculous power of God.

Digitized by Microsoft®

(See the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, chap. 4. sect. 2.) To the same sense we may probably interpret Psal. cx. 3. The dew of thy birth is of the womb of the morning.]

Ver. 8. And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people, as a lion among the beasts of the forest, &c.] The former verse described the benefits the converted Jews should bring to those gentiles that were disposed to embrace the gospel: this instructs us how terrible adversaries they will prove to such as persist in their enmity to them and to the truth. (Compare Obad. ver. 18, 19. Zech. xii. 6. and see the note upon ver. 5. of this chapter.)

Ver. 10, 11. And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord, that I will cut off thy horses out of the midst of thee, &c.] I will afford deliverance to my people, not in the ordinary way of second causes, but immediately by myself; so that they shall not need to trust in the strength of their forces, or of their garrisons. (Compare Hos. i. 7. Zech. ix. 10.)

Ver. 12—14. And I will cut off witchcrafts out of thy land, and thou shalt have no more soothsayers: thy graven images also will I cut off, &c.] The prophet may be supposed to mention here those sins wherein the Jews of his own age were chiefly faulty, thereby to signify, that, in aftertimes, when the promises here mentioned should be fulfilled, such offences should not be found among them. (Compare Isa. ii. 6—8. with the context here.) We may in general take notice, that the destruction of idolatry is often mentioned in the prophets as a principal circumstance in their descriptions of the flourishing state of the church, which should come to pass in aftertimes. (See the note upon Isa. i. 29.) This appears to have been the sentiment of the ancient Jews, from that passage in Tobit, xiv. 6. where, speaking of the times of the Messias, he saith, All nations shall turn and fear the Lord truly, and shall bury their idols. No nation has been more addicted to the several sorts of divination than the Jews, both in ancient and modern times: (see Juvenal, Sat. vi. ver. 545. and the note upon Mal. iii. 5.) and several of them comply with the idolatries practised in those countries where they are dispersed. See the note upon Zech. xiii. 2. where there is the same prediction of the utter abolishing of idolatry among them.

Ver. 15. And I will execute vengeance in anger, and fury upon the heathen, &c.] When I have purged my people from their corruptions, I will severely vindicate their cause, to the utter destruction of all their unbelieving enemies. (See the notes upon ver. 5. 8.)

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter relates to the prophet's own time; wherein he first upbraids the people for their ingratitude towards God: then he instructs them in the true way of performing acceptable service to him: lastly, he reproves them for their injustice and idolatry, and tells them that these sins are the causes of their being unsuccessful in all their undertakings.

Ver. 1. ARISE, contend thou before the mountains, &c.] God often appeals to inanimate creatures for the justice of his proceedings, thereby to upbraid the stupidity of men. (See i. 2. Deut. iv. 26. xxxii. 1. Psal. l. 4. Isa. i. 2.)

Ver. 2. For the Lord hath a controversy with his people, &c.] He will enter into judgment with them for their impieties, as being injurious to his honour, and for which his justice demands satisfaction. (See Hos. iv. 1.)

Ver. 3. O my people, what have I done to thee? or wherein have I wearied thee? witness against me.] The words allude to the forms of courts of justice, wherein actions are tried between man and man. God allows his people to offer any plea in their own behalf, and demands what injustice he hath done them, and what grievances they can complain of, either in the laws or the rules of worship which he hath prescribed them. (Compare Jer. ii. 5. 31.)

Ver. 4. For I brought thee out of the house of Egypt, and redeemed thee out of the house of servants, &c.] On the other side, God puts them in mind of the great favours he had bestowed upon them, in delivering them out of the Egyptian bondage, by the conduct of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam their sister, who is here mentioned as having been endued with the spirit of prophecy, and by whom upon some occasions God made known his will to the Israelites. (See Exod. xv. 20. Numb. xii. 2.)

Ver. 5. O my people, remember what Balak king of Moab consulted, and what Balaam son of Beor answered him.] Remember how Balak sent for Balaam to curse Israel, and he contrary to his own intentions blessed them. (See Numb. xxiv. 10—12.)

From Shittim unto Gilgal, that ye may know the righteousness of the Lord.] To make the sense perfect, we must supply it from the beginning of the verse, as the Chaldee paraphrast doth, Remember what I have done for you, from Shittimun to Gilgal; i. e. from your encamping in the plains of Moab near Shittim, by Jordan: (see Numb. xxii. 1. compared with xxxiii. 48, 49.) where you continued till you passed over that river, and encamped in Gilgal in the land of Canaan. (See Josh. ii. 1. compared with iv. 19.) If you duly consider these things, you will be convinced of God's great goodness to you, and of his faithfulness in fulfilling the promises made to your fathers.

A learned prelate, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 290. supposes the phrase, From Shittim to Gilgal, to be a proverbial expression, for a sudden change of an enemy's wicked passions and designs. And then the words will imply thus much:—Remember how I would not suffer Balaam, though when led to it by his inclinations and interests, to curse you, though he removed from one place to another, to find a seasonable time and prospect for his enchantments, and surveyed the army of Israel, going over them with his eye, from Shittim where they lay encamped, to the utmost extremity of them over against Gilgal, or Jericho, by Jordan: (see Josh. iii. 1. compared with iv. 19.) But the Lord thy God made him turn his curse into a blessing, Deut. xxiii. 5.

Ver. 6. Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God.] After this reproof of the people's ingratitude, they are introduced by the prophet, as anxiously inquisitive how they may propitiate God's displeasure, and avert his judgments. They declare themselves, in the following verse, ready to offer any expiatory sacrifices, though never so costly, for that purpose.

Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old?] Will God accept of the ordinary sacrifices, such as we offered upon other occasions as an atonement for sin? (See Lev. iv. 3. ix. 2.)

Ver. 7. Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or ten thousands of rivers of oil?] Or doth he expect a more costly sacrifice? We are ready, if that will appease him, to offer up to him thousands of rams, and to add in proportion meat-offerings prepared with oil; (see Lev. ii. 1. 4. 15.) though it should cost us an unmeasurable quantity of that liquor. (Compare Job xxix. 6.)

Shall I give my first-born for my transgression? &c.] They farther declare themselves ready to sacrifice their first-born, though looked upon as the strength and stay of their family, if that would appease God's wrath, and procure their pardon. Such inhuman sacrifices several of the idolatrous Jews offered up to their idols; for which they are severely reproved by the prophets. (See 2 Kings xvi. 3. xxi. 6. Jer. vii. 31. xix. 5. Ezek. xvi. 20, 21. xxiii. 37.)

These two verses are an exact description of the temper of hypocrites and habitual sinners, who hope to obtain God's favour by performing the external duties of religion; and are willing to purchase their own pardon upon any terms but that of reforming their lives.

Ver. 8. He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good, &c.] Both the dictates of reason, and the laws of God, sufficiently inform men what are the substantial parts of their duty; viz. the practice of justice and mercy, and a reverent behaviour towards God, and looking up to him as our Lord and Maker. This is a more acceptable service than the most costly sacrifices. (Compare Deut. x. 12, 13. 1 Sam. xv. 22. Isa. i. 11, &c. Hos. vi. 6.)

Ver. 9. The Lord's voice cries unto the city.] The exhortations God hath given you by his prophets are chiefly directed to the city of Jerusalem and its principal inhabitants, whose injustice and oppression of their neighbours cry aloud for vengeance.

And the man of wisdom shall see thy name.] He that is truly wise will easily discover God's authority in such a message. Wisdom, in the Hebrew, is here put for the wise man, the abstract being often used for the concrete: so righteousness signifies the righteous man, Isa. xli. 2. Some translate the sentence thus, They will learn wisdom [or, shall obtain salvation] who fear thy name. The derivatives from yare, to fear, and raar, to see, are often used promiscuously in the Hebrew language.

Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it.] Hear what severe judgments are threatened against your sins, and who it is that threatens them, and is able to put them in execution.

Ver. 10. Are there yet the treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked?] Notwithstanding all the exhortations and reproofs given you upon this subject, still there are many that use unjust and fraudulent means to enrich themselves, and keep scant measures to sell their goods by, which the law of God often declares to be an abomination to him. (See Lev. xix. 35, 36. Deut. xxv. 13. 16. Prov. xi. 1. xx. 10.) The word translated measure is ephah in the Hebrew; so the reproof is the same with that of Amos, viii. 5. where he charges the tradesmen with making the ephah small. (See the note there.)

Ver. 12. Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances?] See Hos. xii. 7.

Ver. 13. Therefore also will I make thee sick in smiting thee.] The punishment wherewith I will afflict thee shall waste thy strength, like a consuming sickness, which preys upon the vitals.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt eat and not be satisfied.] Either thy food shall not give thee due nourishment, or else thou shalt not have enough to satisfy a craving appetite.

And thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee.] The miseries that bring thee low, shall be like an incurable disease in thy bowels. (See ver. 13.)

And thou shalt take hold, but shalt not deliver, &c.] Whatever advantages thou shalt make by thy industry, or whatsoever thou shalt gain by conquest, thou shalt not be able to keep it, but it shall become a prey to thine enemies. A contrary form of speech we read in Isaiah, v. 29. where the prophet, speaking how successful the attempts of their enemies should be, saith, They shall lay hold of the prey, and shall carry it away safe, and none shall deliver it, or retake it. The rabbins generally interpret the text here to this sense: Thou shalt conceive seed, but shall not be safely delivered of the child; or, if thou be, it shall be slain by the enemy. The verb palat, here used, is spoken of cattle which are safely delivered of their young. (Job xxi. 20.)

Ver. 15. Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap, &c.] Thou shalt not enjoy the fruits of thy labours: a curse often threatened for their disobedience. (See Deut. xxviii. 38, 39. Amos v. 2. Zeph. i. 13.)

Ver. 16. For the statutes of Omri are kept, and all the works of the house of Ahab.] It is said of Omri, that he did worse than all that were before him, 1 Kings xvi. 25. and his son Ahab added the worship of Baal to the idolatry of the golden calves, ibid. ver. 32. which is spoken of there as the worse degree of idolatry, because it was the introducing a heathen idol; whereas the golden calves were only an idolatrous representation of the true God. Manasseh followed Ahab in his wickedness. (See 2 Kings xxi. 3.)

That I should make thee a desolation, and the inhabitants thereof a hissing.] The subject of scorn and derision to their enemies. (See 1 Kings ix. 8. Jer. xviii. 16. Lam. ii. 15.)

Therefore ye shall bear the reproach of my people.] The prophet still directs his discourse to the great and rich men, (ver. 12. 15.) and tells them, that since they have given the chief occasion to those reproaches, which unbelievers have thrown out upon God's people, as if they were rejected and cast off by him, therefore they shall bear the principal share of that shame and contempt wherewith their enemies shall treat them. (Compare Psal. xlii. 10. Isa. xxv. 8.)

The LXX. read, The reproach of the people; to the same sense with those words of Psal. lxxxix. 50, 51. I bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people, wherewith thine enemies have reproached—. Buxtorf, in his Vindiciæ contra Capellum, shews this interpretation to agree with the Hebrew, supposing the word ammi to stand for ammim in the plural; of which syntax he alleges several instances.

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet, speaking in the person of the church, laments the decay of piety, and growth of wickedness: possessing her soul in patience by faith, she foresees her future restoration in the latter times; a subject with which most of the minor prophets conclude their prophecies.

Ver. 1. WOE is me! for I am as when they have gathered the summer-fruits, &c.] Good men are become like a gleaning after the harvest or vintage, scarce two or three to be found after the most diligent search. (Compare Isa. xvii. 6. xxiv. 13.)

My soul desireth the first ripe fruit.] It would be the same refreshment to me to meet with a truly pious man, as it is to a thirsty traveller to find the early fruits in the summer season. (Compare Isa. xxviii. 4. Hos. ix. 10.)

Ver. 2. The good man is perished out of the earth, &c.] The same complaints we find in other holy writers, lamenting the scarcity of good men, and the increase of the wicked. (See Psal. xii. 1. xiv. 2, &c. Isa. lvii. 1.)

They hunt every man his brother with a net.] They make a prey of their neighbours, and even of their friends and nearest relations. (See Habak. i. 14, 15.)

Ver. 3. That they may do evil with both hands earnestly.] The words may be translated, That they may prepare their hands, for committing evil: the verb herib sometimes signifies to fit or prepare. (See Exod. xxx. 7. Hos. x. 1.)

The prince asketh, &c.] See iii. 11.

So they wrap it up.] The prince, the judge, and the great man, agreeing in their ill designs, make a threefold cord of iniquity: or they twist one sin upon another, the latter to maintain or cover the former. The Chaldee renders it, So they deprave or pervert it; i. e. the soul, or mind; which word is found in the Hebrew of the foregoing sentence.

Ver. 4. The best of them is as a brier; the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge.] Those that have the fairest character among them are set upon mischief. Sinners are elsewhere compared to briers and thorns, both upon the account of their unfruitfulness, and because of their hurtful qualities. (See the notes upon Isa. ix. 18. lv. 13. and compare 2 Sam. xxiii. 6, 7. Heb. vi. 8.)

The day of thy watchmen, even thy visitation cometh, &c.] The time of vengeance is coming, which hath been foretold by the prophets of former times, as well as the present; called here watchmen, as they are by Ezekiel, iii. 7. and by Hosea, ix. 8. then God will visit for all the sins thou hast committed against him. Watchmen may signify magistrates, as well as prophets: (see the note upon Isa. lvi. 10.) and then the words import the time when God will call both princes and prophets to account for their unfaithfulness in the discharge of their several offices. (See iii. 11.)

Ver. 7. Therefore I will look unto the Lord, &c.] The church here expresses her confidence in God alone, since no trust can be placed in man.

Ver. 8, 9. Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy, &c.] Let not the enemies of God and his truth insult over me, as if he had utterly forsaken me. (See ver. 10. Psal. lxxix. 10.) After he hath chastened me for my sins, which I will patiently bear, out of a just sense of my demerits, he will deliver me out of my low and desolate condition, and will cause the light of his countenance to shine upon me, and plead the cause of his oppressed truth. (Compare Psal. xxvii. 1.) This was in some degree fulfilled in their deliverance from the captivity. (See ver. 11. and compare iv. 10.)

Ver. 10. Mine eyes shall behold her: for now shall she be trodden down as the mire of the streets.] As the heathen beheld the desolations of God's church and temple with delight; (see iv. 11.) so it shall come to my turn to see God's judgments executed upon the Babylonish empire, and that brought down to as low a condition as ever they had reduced God's people. (See Isa. li. 26. and compare with the latter part of the sentence, 2 Sam. xxii. 43. Zech. x. 5.)

Ver. 11. In the day that thy walls shall be built, in that day shall the decree be far removed.] When God shall visit his people, and repair their decayed estate, (compare Amos ix. 11.) then the tyrannical edicts of their persecutors shall be utterly abolished. This may partly relate to the recalling those edicts which put a stop to the rebuilding the city and temple of Jerusalem. (See Ezra iv. 23, 24. vi. 14. Nehem. ii. 8. 17.)

Ver. 12. In that day.] The phrase signifies in the prophets some remarkable time prefixed by God for restoring the Jews' affairs, or some other signal events of Providence. (See the note upon Isa. iv. 2. and the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, p. 168.)

He shall come unto thee from Assyria, and from the fortified cities, and from the fortress even to the river, &c.] By the single person, he, is meant the people, or the dispersion of Israel: so the Chaldee paraphrast understands it. (See ver. 15.) I observed in my notes upon Isa. xix. 6. that this text might more perspicuously be translated thus, He shall come unto thee from Assyria even to the cities of Egypt, and from Egypt even to the river [Euphrates]: the word matsor, fortress, likewise signifying Egypt; as Bochart observes, Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 24. The words imply, that the Jews shall return from their several dispersions whither they were scattered: this the prophets elsewhere express by their return from Assyria and Egypt. (See Isa. xi. 15, 16. xix. 23—25. xxvii. 13. Hos. xi. 11. Zech. v. 10, 11.) Jeremiah compares the captivity of the ten tribes, who were carried away by Shalmaneser into Assyria, to the bondage of their forefathers in Egypt, and promises them a like deliverance, Jer. xxi. 14. xxiii. 7, 8. This may be the reason of joining Egypt and Assyria together in the forementioned texts: though it be also true, that about the time of Shalmaneser's invasion, many of the Jews fled for refuge into Egypt; as appears from Hos. vii. 16. viii. 13. ix. 3. 6.

Ver. 13. Notwithstanding the land shall be desolate because of them that dwell therein, &c.] The marginal reading is to be preferred, After that the land hath been desolate, &c. The words import, that the general restoration of the Jews shall not be brought to pass till after their land hath lain desolate for some ages, as a testimony of God's displeasure against its ancient inhabitants for their sins, especially that heinous one of rejecting the Messias.

For the fruit of their doings.] The miseries, which are the effects of men's sins, are called the fruit of their ways, or doings. (See Prov. i. 31. Jer. xxi. 14.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 14. Feed thy people with thy rod, even the flock of thine heritage.] The words contain the prophet's earnest wish or prayer to God that he would send the Messiah to perform the office of the good Shepherd, in feeding or protecting his flock, the remnant of the true Israelites, in the age of renovation; as the Chaldee paraphrase explains it; i. e. in the times of the Messiah, when all things shall become new. The prophets describe the Messias under the character of a shepherd. (See above, v. 4. Isa. xl. 11. xlix. 10. Ezek. xxxiv. 23.)

Which dwell solitarily.] The expression may relate to the state of the Jews in their dispersions, where they are preserved separate from, and unmixed with, the several nations whither they are scattered. But I rather believe the expression is borrowed from Numb. xxiii. 9. and Deut. xxxiii. 28. where Israel is described as dwelling alone; so our translators render the word badad in both those texts; i. e. in a large and plentiful country, secure under the Divine protection, without standing in need of foreign alliances. In this sense the words relate to their future happiness and security. (Compare Jer. xxiii. 6.)

In the wood, in the midst of Carmel.] The same place is called the forest of Carmel, Isa. xxxvii. 24. and spoken of there as a place remarkable for its fruitfulness: compare Isa. x. 18. xxxv. 2. where our translation reads, The glory of his forest and his fruitful field, or his Carmel, as it is in the original. Bashan, which follows here, and Carmel, are joined together as the most fruitful parts of Judea, Isa. xxxiii. 9. Nahum i. 4.

Let them feed in Bashan and Gilead, as in the days of old.] These countries were noted for their rich and fat pastures. (See Numb. xxxii. 1. 33. Deut. xxxii. 14.) The expressions denote, that the Jews shall enjoy full and free possession of their land after their return to it, with the same security and happiness with which they possessed it, in their most flourishing state, under the reigns of David and Solomon. (See 1 Kings iv. 25. compare Zech. x. 10.) We are likewise to suppose these temporal blessings to be emblems and figures of the spiritual benefits conveyed by the gospel. (Compare Isa. lxv. 10. Jer. l. 19. Zeph. iii. 13. and see the notes there.)

Ver. 15. According to the days of thy coming out of Egypt will I shew him marvellous things.] The words are an answer to the prophet's prayer in the foregoing verse; wherein God tells him, that the wonders he will perform in bringing back his people into their own country, shall be as conspicuous as those which he shewed in their deliverance out of Egypt, and giving them the first possession of it. The sense is equivalent to that of Psal. lxviii. 22. The Lord hath said, I will bring my people again as I did from Bashan; I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea.

Ver. 16. The nations shall see, and be confounded at all their might.] The heathen shall feel the same confusion as men do under a great disappointment, when they shall see that power and force defeated, which they had gathered together to oppose God's people, and hinder them from enjoying the quiet possession of their land. (See Ezek. xxxviii. 8, &c.) Others understand their might of the might and power of God's people, whom no force will be able to withstand. (See v. 8.)

They shall lay their hands upon their mouths, their ears shall be deaf.] The evident tokens of a Divine presence with his people shall stop the mouths of their adversaries, so that they shall be struck dumb with admiration and astonishment. (See Job xxi. 5. xxix. 9. Isa. lii. 15.) They shall hardly believe their own ears, when they hear those wonderful works which God hath wrought for them.

Ver. 17. They shall lick the dust like a serpent.] The enemies of God's people shall be very humble and submissive, and ready to fall down at their feet. (Compare Psal. lxxii. 9. Rev. iii. 9. Isa. xlix. 23. lx. 14. and see the notes there.) To the same sense we may understand those words of Isa. lxv. 25. Dust shall be the serpent's meat: where the prophet applies the curse threatened to the serpent, Gen. iii. 14. to the times of the millennium; as if then that curse should be completely fulfilled, when the righteous should have an entire victory over Satan and all his offspring, and tread them under their feet, so as never to rise up again to annoy them. (Compare Rom. xvi. 20.)

They shall move out of their holes like worms of the earth.] They shall be afraid to stir out of their lurking holes; and if they creep out like worms, they shall presently hide their heads again. (See Psal. xviii. 45.)

They shall be afraid of the Lord our God, and fear because of thee.] When they see Almighty God appear so conspicuously in thy favour. The text is parallel to that of Jer. xxxiii. 9. They shall fear and tremble for all the goodness, and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it.

Ver. 18. Who is a God like thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage?] The remnant of God's heritage, are those Jews, which are reserved to be partakers of the benefits which shall be made good to that nation, upon their conversion and restoration here spoken of. (Compare iv. 7. v. 7, 8.) God shall then make manifest his mercy towards them, in pardoning all their former stubbornness and disobedience, and receiving them into his former favour, upon their repentance: (see Zech. iii. 10. xii. 10. compare Jer. l. 20.) thereby fulfilling that gracious declaration he made to Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.

He retains not his anger for ever, because he delights in mercy.] To the same purpose he is said to blot out men's iniquities, and not remember their sins, to their condemnation, Isa. xliii. 25. because he delights in mercy, as it follows here; so acts of judgment are called his strange work, Isa. xxviii. 21. such as he would not put in execution, if they were not necessary for the great ends of government.

Ver. 19. He will turn again, he will have compassion upon us.] Or, He will again have compassion upon us; for the verb shub, to turn, is often used adverbially. (See the note upon Isa. vi. 13.)

He will subdue our iniquities, and thou wilt cast all our sins into the depths of the sea.] Thou wilt utterly abolish them, that they shall not have dominion over us; as thou didst destroy Pharaoh and his army in the Red Sea, (Exod. xiv. 13.) This victory will be obtained by the merits of Christ, and the grace of the gospel. (See Colos. ii. 14. Rom. vi. 14.)

Ver. 20. Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, which thou hast sworn unto our fathers, &c.] The promises given to Abraham were made to him, and to his seed after him, Gen. xvii. 8. So the Scripture speaks of the blessings bestowed upon the children, as if they were actually made good to their progenitors. (See Gen. xlvi. 4. Exod. vi. 4.) Thus God is said to perform his truth unto Jacob, and his mercy unto Abraham; or to deal mercifully with our fathers, as the sense runs in the original, Luke i. 72. by fulfilling the promises to their posterity, the whole family being reputed one aggregate body. And these promises will receive their final accomplishment in the conversion and restoration of the Jewish nation in the latter times. That people are said to be beloved for their fathers' sakes, Rom. xi. 28. and therefore we have reason to expect, that the mercies promised to their fathers should, in God's due time, be made good to them: for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance, Rom. xi. 29.

NAHUM.

PREFACE.

THE destruction of Nineveh, here prophesied of, is recorded in the book of Tobit, xiv. 15. It is said there to be taken by Nebuchodonosor and Assuerus; which account Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, A. M. 3378. Dr. Prideaux, Script. Connex. p. 47, 48. and other learned men, understand of Nabupolassar, father to Nebuchadnezzar (called in the Greek translation Nebuchodonosor), and Cyaxares king of Media, called by Daniel Ahasuerus, Dan. ix. 1. This remarkable transaction is placed by Dr. Prideaux in the twenty-ninth year of king Josiah, about twenty-four years before the destruction of Jerusalem; and the fixing it to this time exactly agrees with the account given by the heathen historians, Herodotus and others; as St. Jerome has observed in his preface upon Jonah. The Ninevites would not take warning by Jonah's prophecy; so not only Nahum, who probably lived in the reign of Hezekiah, but also Zephaniah, who lived in the time of Josiah, foretold the destruction of Nineveh, ii. 13.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

The burden of Nineveh is the title of this prophecy, being the chief subject of it: though this chapter is in the nature of a preface to the succeeding prophecy; setting forth God's goodness to his people, and his severity towards his enemies. Concerning the sense of the word burden, see the note upon Jer. xxiii. 33.

Ver. 1. THE book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite.] The title of Elkoshite is probably taken from the place where he lived. St. Jerome informs us, that there was a village in Galilee called Elkegai; the ruins of which were shewed to him, when he travelled over those parts. (See the preface to his comment upon Nahum.)

Ver. 2. God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth, &c.] As he is very jealous of his honour, so he will not fail to execute his judgment on those that affront and dishonour him: and though he doth not always punish sinners immediately, yet he will exercise his severity upon them in due time.

Ver. 3. The Lord is slow to anger, and great [rather, although he be great] in power, and [or, but] will not at all acquit the wicked.] The last sentence runs in the Hebrew, nakkeh, lo ye nakkeh; which is capable of a double interpretation, either as our translation renders it, or else it may be translated, He will utterly destroy: in which sense it is taken, Exod. xxxiv. 7. Numb. xiv. 18. The sense which our interpreters follow agrees best with the context here. (See the note upon Jer. xxx. 11.)

The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind, and the clouds are the dust of his feet.] An allusion to his coming down upon Sinai, when darkness and tempests surrounded him; (see Exod. xix. 16. 18. Deut. v. 22, 23. compare Psal. xviii. 7. xcvii. 2.) and he will come again in the same manner to the last judgment; of which, particular judgments are the earnest. (See Psal. l. 3. Dan. vii. 13.)

Ver. 4. He rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry, &c.] The rivers and the sea itself are dried up at his rebuke, as the Red Sea and Jordan were of old; (compare Isa. l. 2. Habak. iii. 8.) and the most pleasant and fruitful countries, such as Bashan, Carmel, and Lebanon, are parched up with drought when he is displeased. (See Isa. xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2. Micah vii. 14.)

Ver. 5. The mountains quake at him, the hills melt, &c.] This may likewise allude to God's coming down upon Mount Sinai; (compare Exod. xix. 18. Judg. v. 4. Psal. lxviii. 8. xlvii. 5. Micah i. 4.) or else it may relate to the last judgment, as the following words plainly do. (See the note on ver. 3.)

Ver. 6. His fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him.] God is a consuming fire, when he comes to execute his judgments, Deut. iv. 24. and as fire is of a sufficient force to dissolve the hardest rocks, so God's vengeance can humble the most obdurate sinners.

Ver. 7. He knoweth them that trust in him.] i. e. He takes a particular care of them. (Compare Psal. i. 7. 2 Tim. ii. 19. and see the note upon Hos. xiii. 5.)

Ver. 8. But with an overrunning flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof.] An army's overrunning a country is often compared to an inundation. (See Isa. viii. 7, 8. Dan. ix. 26. xi. 10. 20. 40.) Thus God will bring the great city of Nineveh to utter ruin, so that there shall be no remains thereof in aftertimes. For the ruins which are to be seen of Mosul, are on the opposite side of the river Tigris.

The place thereof.] The affix or relative plainly relates to Nineveh, against which city this prophecy is directed, ver. 1.

And darkness shall pursue his enemies.] i. e. Ruin and destruction. (Compare Isa. viii. 22.)

Ver. 9. Adversity shall not rise up the second time.] I will make an utter destruction all at once: When I begin, I will also make an end, as it is expressed 2 Sam. iii. 12. The words may be understood with relation to the destruction of Nineveh prophesied of in the following chapters; viz. that at the same time an end should be put to the family which then reigned over Assyria, and the seat of the empire should be translated to Babylon. (See the note upon iii. 18.)

Ver. 10. For while they be folden together as thorns.] Or, For as they are folden together like thorns. The particle ad translated while, may be a term of comparison. (See Noldius, p. 668.) The destruction of sinners is elsewhere compared to the burning of thorns. (See the note upon Isa. ix. 18.)

And while they are drunken as drunkards.] Compare iii. 11. God's vengeance is often called the cup of his fury, because it deprives men both of strength and reason. (See the note upon Jer. xxv. 15.)

Ver. 11. There is one come out of thee, that imagineth evil, &c.] This probably is meant of Sennacherib, that uttered so many reproaches and blasphemies against the true God. (See ver. 14, 15.) Nineveh was one of his royal seats, at the time when Nahum delivered this prophecy.

Ver. 12. Though they be quiet [or rather, prosperous], and likewise many, yet thus shall they be cut down when he shall pass through.] Though the Assyrians be never so numerous, and puffed up with their prosperous success against Egypt; (see the note upon iii. 8.) which will encourage Sennacherib to march directly against Jerusalem; yet God shall cut them off at one stroke by his angel, who slew in one night in the camp of the Assyrians one hundred and eighty-five thousand, (2 Kings xix. 25.) The verb translated pass through, is often used of a hostile invasion. (See Isa. viii. 8. Dan. xi. 10. Joel iii. 17.) It is taken in that sense, ver. 15. of this chapter, and in both places is to be understood of Sennacherib, the enemy mentioned ver. 11.

Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more.] Rather, no longer, by Sennacherib or his forces. (See ver. 13, 14.) So the particle nûd is plainly taken, Ezek. xii. 28. Hos. i. 6. (See Noldius, p. 682.)

Ver. 13. For now I will break his yoke from off thee, &c.] Hezekiah and his people shall no longer be tributaries to the king of Assyria, as they have been for a considerable time. (See 2 Kings xvi. 17. xviii. 14.)

Ver. 14. The Lord hath given a commandment concerning thee, that no more of thy name be sown.] God had decreed that Sennacherib's family should not long preserve their royal state and dignity: his son and successor, Esarhaddon, was now probably at man's estate; for he succeeded his father in a little time after his defeat, (2 Kings xix. 37.) and reigned with great felicity almost forty years; but his next successor, or the next but one, was dispossessed of his kingdom by Nabupolassar, father to Nebuchadnezzar, whose family enjoyed the empire of Assyria, or Babylon, as it came then to be called, till the conquest by Cyrus. (See Dr. Prideaux, under the fifteenth and twenty-ninth years of Josiah.) Some explain the words thus: Thou shalt do no more remarkable actions, whereby thy name may be remembered. So the Chaldee understands it.

Out of the house of thy gods will I cut off the graven image, and the molten image.] When God executes his judgments upon any heathen prince or nation, he is said to punish the idols of that people, because the conquerors triumph over their idols as well as their worshippers, and bring in their own idols into the room of those they vanquish. (See the notes upon Isa. xix. 1. xlvi. 1. Jer. l. 2.)

I will make thy grave; for thou art vile.] We may supply the sense from the former sentence. The house of thine idol shall become thy grave, when thou shalt be dishonourably slain by thine own sons, (2 Kings xix. 37.) as a just punishment for thy blasphemies against the God of Israel, (ibid. ver. 6. 16.)

Ver. 15. How beautiful are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace.] The same words are to be found in Isaiah, lii. 6. There they relate to the joyful news of the Jews' return from Babylon, and in a more eminent sense to the glad tidings of the gospel: here they may be fitly understood of the good tidings of the miraculous defeat of Sennacherib's army, and the raising of the siege of Jerusalem, which was the consequence of it; to which the following words do plainly relate.

O Judah, keep thy solemn feasts, perform thy vows.] Thou hast now a free access to the temple, to keep the stated feasts with their usual solemnity, and particularly to perform the vows thou madest to God in thy late distress.

For the wicked [or, the wicked one] shall no more pass through thee.] See ver. 9. 12. 14.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

This and the following chapter contain a description of the taking of Nineveh by the Babylonians and Medes. (See the note upon i. 1.)

Ver. 1. HE that dasheth in pieces is come up before thy face.] An enemy that will break down thy walls and destroy thine inhabitants, O Nineveh, is come to besiege thee. The words may be literally translated, The hammer is come up against thee; in the same sense as the Chaldeans are called the hammer of the whole earth, Jer. l. 23. The original word indeed is not the same in both places, but they are synonymous.

Keep the munition, watch the way.] There is need of thy utmost industry to defend thyself in strengthening the garrisons, and guarding the passes. (Compare iii. 13, 14.)

Make thy loins strong, &c.] Stir up all thy strength and courage.

Ver. 2. For the Lord hath turned away the excellency of Jacob as the excellency of Israel.] Some translate the words thus, The Lord hath returned [or, will revenge] the pride, or injurious dealings, against Jacob, and the pride against Israel; i. e. he will requite the injuries and oppressions which Sennacherib and Shalmaneser, the kings of Assyria, have exercised upon Judah and Israel. This interpretation agrees better with the scope of the text, than that which most translators follow, and suits very well with the Hebrew idiom. Compare Joel iii. 19. Habak. ii. 8. 17. Obad. ver. 10. where the second of two substantives is taken in the same sense by our translators.

Digitized by Microsoft®

For the emptiers have emptied them out, and marred their vine-branches.] The Assyrian conquerors have plundered them of all their wealth, and bereaved them of their children, often compared in Scripture to branches. (See particularly, Gen. xlix. 22. compared with Deut. xxxiii. 17.)

Ver. 3. The shield of his mighty men is red, the valiant men are in scarlet.] This may be understood either of the colour of their shields and clothes when they were made, or of their being died in blood afterward. (Compare Isa. lxiii. 2.)

The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation.] Or, Like flaming torches. (See the following verse.) The Hebrew particles beth and caph, as they are alike in figure, so they are often in signification. (See Noldius, p. 162.) Thus those words of Isaiah, xlviii. 10. might be best translated, I have refined thee, but not as silver; i. e. not with so fierce a fire.

And the fir-trees shall be terribly shaken.] The spears and lances made of fir, and which were so long and large, that they looked like so many trees.

Ver. 4. The chariots shall rage in the streets.] They shall drive furiously against one another; as it follows.

They shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings.] They shall resemble flames or lightning in their swiftness, and their wheels continually striking fire out of the stones and pavements of the streets. (See iii. 2.)

Ver. 5. He shall recount his worthies: [but] they shall stumble in their walk.] The king of Nineveh shall muster together his choicest troops; but they shall be disordered, and give way, or be discomfited, as they march against the enemy.

They shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence shall be prepared.] On, the other side, the besiegers shall make their regular approaches towards the walls of Nineveh, and prepare their defences against the assaults of the besieged.

Ver. 6. The gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved.] Or, melt. At length the enemies shall possess themselves of all the avenues towards the several streams of the river Tigris, and so become masters of the city. This shall make the heart of the king and all his court to melt for fear, and quite lose all their courage. To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase explains the latter part of the verse.

Ver. 7. Huzzab shall be led away captive, she shall be brought up.] Rather, removed, or taken away. (Compare Jer. xlviii. 15. Psal. cii. 24.) By Huzzab, the Chaldee understands the queen of Nineveh: but the word may probably mean Nineveh itself; the word denoting a strong or impregnable fortress.

Her maids shall lead her as with the voice of doves, &c.] Nineveh is described as a great princess carried captive with her maids of honour attending her, and bewailing her's and their condition, with beating their breasts, and other expressions of lamentation; denoting the lesser cities under their jurisdiction, that should be sharers with her in the same calamity. So Babylon is represented as a tender and delicate lady, undergoing the hardships of a captivity. Isa. xlviii. 1. 5. 7, 8.

As with the voice of doves.] Birds remarkable for their melancholy note. (Compare Isa. xxxviii. 14. lix. 11.)

Ver. 8. But [or, surely] Nineveh is of old as a pool of waters: yet they shall flee away.] The words may be translated, The waters of Nineveh are as a pool of waters; i. e. as the city is well watered by being situated upon the river Tigris, so it is vastly populous. A multitude is elsewhere compared to many waters. (See Jer. li. 13. Rev. xvii. 1. 15.) But they shall all flee for fear of the enemy, and run away like water. (Compare Psal. lviii. 7.) The sense in the LXX. of Dr. Grabe's edition runs very clear, if it can be reconciled with the original, Nineveh is like a pool of water; waters are her wall, or defence.

Stand, stand, shall they cry, &c.] When the commanders bid them stand to their arms, none shall turn back to make head against the enemy, but shall shift for themselves as fast as they can. (See ver. 10. iii. 17.)

Ver. 9. Take the spoil of silver, &c.] The enemy may easily plunder the city of all its riches and costly furniture, for there is none to make any resistance.

Ver. 10. She is empty; and the heart melteth.] The inhabitants have no heart nor courage to defend themselves, (see iii. 13.) but leave the city to be plundered and laid waste by the enemy.

The knees smite together, &c.] Expressions of much fear, and terrible apprehensions of the approaching evils. (Compare Jer. xxx. 6. Dan. v. 6. Joel ii. 6.)

Ver. 11, 12. Where is the dwelling of the lion, and feeding-place of the young lions? &c.] What is become of the stately palaces of the king and princes of Nineveh, who like so many lions preyed upon the neighbouring countries, and enriched their city with spoils they took from others? (Compare Job iv. 10, 11. Psal. xxxiv. 10. Ezek. xix. 2. 7.)

The lion—strangled for his lionesses, &c.] The lions provide food for the females, till their young ones are able to shift for themselves.

Ver. 13. I will burn their chariots in the smoke.] They shall be destroyed in the fire which consumes the city. (See iii. 15.)

The sword shall devour the young lions, &c.] See ver. 12.

And the voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard.] Thou shalt no more send ambassadors to distant countries, either to encourage thine allies, or to terrify thine enemies. (See Isa. xviii. 2.)

CHAP. III.

See the Argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 1. WOE to the bloody city, &c.] Where princes and great men shed innocent blood to enrich themselves with the spoils of the slain. (Compare Ezek. xxii. 2, 3. xxiv. 6—9.)

The prey departeth not.] They are still increasing their conquests by ruin and oppression, till it will come to their own turn to be spoiled and conquered. (Compare Isa. xxxiii. 1.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 2. The noise of a whip, &c.] See ii. 3, 4. and compare Jer. xlvii. 3.

Ver. 4. Because of the multitude of the whoredoms of the well-favoured harlot, &c.] Great cities are often called harlots, upon the account of those vices which prevail in them, and infect others by their example. (See Isa. xxiii. 16.)

The mistress of witchcrafts.] The arts of luxury which are encouraged in such places are called witchcrafts, because they have a sort of charm in them to draw others aside. (Compare Isa. xlvii. 9. Rev. xviii. 23.)

That selleth nations through her whoredoms, and families through her witchcrafts.] That makes whole nations a prey to their enemies, by teaching them the arts of softness and effeminacy, and so rendering them weak and defenceless. Families are equivalent to kingdoms. (See the note upon Jer. i. 15. and compare Amos iii. 2. Zech. xiv. 18.)

Ver. 5. I will discover thy skirts upon thy face, &c.] I will send thee into captivity naked and bare. (See Isa. xx. 4. 8. xlvii. 2, 3. Jer. xiii. 22. Micah i. 11.) Thus will I expose thy shame to the world; which was a punishment often inflicted upon harlots. (See the note upon Ezek. xvi. 37.)

Ver. 6. I will cast abominable filth upon thee, &c.] I will deprive thee of all thine ornaments, and will cover thee with shame and reproach, and make a public example of thee. Such was the usage that common prostitutes met with. (See Ezek. xxiii. 25, 26.)

Ver. 7. All that look upon thee shall flee from thee.] As being affrighted at the sight of thy dismal condition.

Who will bemoan her? whence shall I seek comforters for her?] An allusion to the lamentations used at funerals, and performed by persons hired for that purpose. (See the notes upon Jer. ix. 17, 18. Ezek. xxviii. 2.) The words imply, that if we seek for any mourners to perform this office over departing Nineveh, none will be found to do it; every one rejoicing over her destruction.

Ver. 8. Art thou better than populous No?] Which was sacked, and its inhabitants made captives, as it follows. The Hebrew reads, No Ammon; the same city which is called Hammon No, Ezek. xxx. 15. and Ammon Minnu, Jer. xlvi. 25. where our English reads, the multitude of No, as it does render it populous No here; though the place probably took its name from Ham, the founder of the Egyptian kingdom, (thence called the land of Ham, Psal. cvi. 22.) who was worshipped there under the name of Jupiter Hammon: accordingly the LXX. render it Diospolis, upon that place of Jeremiah: it was likewise called Thebes by Homer, who describes it as famous for its hundred gates.

That was situate among the rivers, &c.] Which was defended by the river Nile on the one side, and the Red Sea on the other, as by so many walls and ramparts.

Ver. 9. Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength.] Dr. Prideaux's Scripture History, under the fifteenth of Hezekiah, with great reason supposes this calamity to have been brought upon No by Sennacherib, about three years before he besieged Jerusalem, in the time of Hezekiah. At that time Sevechus, the son of Sabaccon, or So, mentioned 2 Kings xvii. 4. was king both of Egypt and Ethiopia; so they are mentioned here as confederates, and Isaiah foretells that they should be vanquished by Sargon, or Sennacherib: Isa. xx. 4. Whereas the destruction of No, foretold by Jeremiah, xlvi. 25. and Ezekiel, xxx. 14. was, after this, brought to pass by Nebuchadnezzar.

Put and Lubim were thy helpers.] Put, or Phut, is rendered Libya by our translators, Ezek. xxx. 5. and the Libyans, Jer. xlvi. 9. but this text proves that they were a distinct people. Phut probably denotes Mauritania. (See Bochart's Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 33.)

Ver. 10. They cast lots for her honourable men.] The conquerors used to cast lots what captives should come to each man's share. (See Joel iii. 3. Obad. ver. 11.)

Ver. 11. Thou shall be drunken.] See i. 10.

Thou shalt be hid, thou also shalt seek strength, because of the enemy.] Or, Thou shalt repair to thy fortress, because of the enemy. Thou shalt not dare to shew thyself to the enemy, but shalt betake thyself to thy munitions (see ii. 1.) and places of strength. (Compare ver. 13. 17.)

Ver. 12. All thy strong holds shall be like fig-trees with the first ripe figs, &c.] As figs drop off when they are ripe, so shall thy strong holds fall into the enemy's hands, upon the first assault.

Ver. 13. The gates of thy land shall be set wide open unto thine enemies, &c.] The several passages by which the enemy may invade thee shall be left defenceless: (see ii. 1.) so that they may easily set on fire thy fortifications.

Ver. 14. Draw the waters for the siege.] In order to maintain the siege.

Go into the clay, and tread the mortar, make strong [or repair] the brick-kiln.] In order to repair the breaches of thy walls, or make new ones within, if the old ones should be taken by the enemy. In those countries they used brick instead of stone. (See Gen. xi. 3.)

Ver. 15. There the fire shall devour thee.] Whilst thou art repairing the old fortifications, or making new ones, the enemy shall set thy works on fire. The particle sham, there, may signify then. (See Noldius, p. 767.)

It shall eat thee up like the canker-worm.] The sword of thine enemies, who shall be as numerous and destructive as locusts, or canker-worms, shall destroy thee. (See Joel i. 4.)

Make thyself many as the canker-worm, &c.] Though thou multiply thine armies, like locusts or caterpillars, yet the enemy shall destroy them.

Ver. 16. The canker-worm spoileth and flieth away.] As the locusts destroy the fruits of the earth, and fly away to another place, so shall thy soldiers pillage all the wealth thou hast gained by traffic, and then leave thee.

Ver. 17. Thy crowned are as the locusts, &c.] The word Minnazaraik may be literally rendered the Nazarites: that title is given to persons remarkable for their youth and beauty, (Lam. iv. 7. see the note upon Amos ii. 11.) and so may not improperly be applied to the officers in the Ninevites' army: these the prophet compares to locusts and grasshoppers, both for their number, (see ver. 15.) and for another quality, that they shun the heat of battle, just as the grasshoppers do the heat of the sun.

Thy captains.] The Hebrew word is Taphsir or Tiphsar, as it is read Jer. li. 27. which some suppose to be derived from the Persian word Satrapas, the letters being transposed.

Ver. 18. Thy shepherds slumber, O king of Assyria: thy nobles dwell in the dust.] By shepherds are meant captains or generals. (Compare Jer. vi. 3. xxv. 34.) These are said to slumber, as having lost their courage, or as being gone to their last sleep, are dead and buried. (Compare Psal. lxxvi. 5, 6.) By the king of Assyria, Dr. Prideaux, in the place abovecited, understands Saracus, who was now vanquished by Nabupolassar (who had before possessed himself of the kingdom of Babylon), and Cyaxares the king of Media. (See the Argument of this prophecy.) The fall of this prince is elegantly described by Ezekiel, xxxi. 3, &c. The words of Jeremiah, l. 18. I have punished the king of Assyria, are to be understood of the same person.

Thy people is scattered upon the mountains, and no man gathereth them.] Their generals are called shepherds at the beginning of the verse: the same metaphor is here continued, and the people are said to be dispersed, now their leaders are fled or destroyed, as sheep are scattered where they have no shepherd. (Compare 1 Kings xxii. 17.)

Ver. 19. There is no healing of thy wound.] Thy destruction is unavoidable. The Chaldee expounds it, None is sorry or grieved at thy destruction: which sense agrees very well with the original, and what follows: They that hear the bruit of thee [and thy fall] clap their hands over thee, as rejoicing over thy calamities. (Compare Lam. ii. 15. Ezek. xxv. 6. Zeph. ii. 15.)

For upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually?] All the neighbouring countries have felt the effects of thy cruelties and oppressions.

HABAKKUK.

PREFACE.

THE Prophet Habakkuk was probably contemporary with Jeremiah, and prophesied in the reign of Josiah; for the subject of his prophecy is the same with that of Jeremiah, and upon the same occasion; viz. the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for their heinous sins and provocations. We may observe, as Nahum, the preceding prophet, foretold the destruction of the Assyrians, who carried the ten tribes captive; so Habakkuk foretells the judgments that should come upon the Chaldeans, who completed the captivity of the two remaining tribes.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet complaining of the growth of iniquity among the Jews, God foreshews him the desolations the Chaldeans will make in Judea, and the neighbouring countries, as the ministers of his vengeance. The prophet thereupon falls into a holy expostulation with God about these proceedings, moved thereunto, as it seems, by the impatience of the Jews, who justified themselves in comparison of their conquerors: to which he receives an answer in the following chapter.

Ver. 1. THE burden which Habakkuk the prophet did see.] The word burden is commonly explained of a burdensome prophecy, big with ruin and destruction. (See the note upon Jer. xxiii. 33.) But a learned prelate, in his Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, p. 10. observes, that the Hebrew, massa, signifies no more than barely a prophecy, and so is translated in our English Bibles, Prov. xxxi. 1. and is often translated by vision and prophecy in the LXX. and other ancient versions; the word being used in that sense, from the prophet's bearing or feeling within him the influence of God's Spirit: for which reason they were called in Greek, Θεοφόροι, and Πνευματοφόροι.

Ver. 2. How long shall I cry unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save?] The prophet proposes the common objections against providence, taken from the prosperity of the wicked, and the oppression of the righteous, which has been a stumbling-block even to good men. (See Job xii. 1. 6. xxi. 7. Psal. xxxvii. lxxiii. Jer. xii. 1.)

Ver. 3. And there are that raise up strife and contention.] Or, There is strife, and contention carries it: they that are best skilled in the arts of contention carry the cause.

Ver. 4. And judgment doth never go forth.] Or, Doth not go forth to perfection; is never rightly and duly administered.

For the wicked doth compass about the righteous.] Doth overpower him.

Ver. 5. Behold ye among the heathen, and regard and wonder marvellously, &c.] For a punishment to such exorbitant practices, behold God's making the heathen, viz. the Chaldeans, (ver. 6.) instruments of his vengeance: this is a judgment, you despisers of God's prophets will hardly believe, when you consider that at present the Chaldeans are your friends and confederates: as appears by Josiah's fighting with the king of Egypt, as being a confederate of the king of Assyria or Babylon. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 29. and Dr. Prideaux, under the thirty-first year of Josiah.) St. Luke quoting this text according to the LXX.'s translation, Acts xiii. 41. reads it thus, Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish. The learned Dr. Pocock, in his miscellaneous notes in Portam Mosis, cap. 3. shews, that the interpretation is agreeable to the present Hebrew copy: the word bagojim, which we translate among the heathen, he derives from the verb baga, which still signifies, in Arabic, to be proud, or scornful: the following words the same translation renders, And wonder and perish; which sense he proves the word tamah will admit.

Ver. 6. For, lo, I will raise up the Chaldeans, that bitter and hasty nation, &c.] Who should make several invasions into Judea, and at last utterly conquer it. (See 2 Kings xxiv. xxv.) They are said here to be cruel in their temper, and vigorous in their warlike expeditions. (Compare ver. 8.)

Ver. 7. Their judgment and their dignity [or, authority] shall proceed of themselves.] They will be their own judges of what is right or wrong. The marginal reading in our English Bible does not seem to agree with the original.

Ver. 8. Their horses are more fierce than evening wolves.] Or, Are swifter than evening wolves, when they go out for their prey, and are pinched with hunger. (See Psal. civ. 20. Jer. v. 6.) The words might be translated to an easier sense: Their horsemen are fiercer than evening wolves, and shall spread themselves, or shall be multiplied.

And their horsemen shall come from far; they shall fly as an eagle, &c.] The words plainly allude to Deut. xxviii. 49, 50. (Compare Jer. v. 15.) The Chaldeans are said to come from far in respect of their neighbours the Philistines, Syrians, and Moabites, who used to infest Judea.

Ver. 9. Their faces shall sup up as the east wind.] They shall destroy every thing where they march, as the east wind blasts the fruits of the earth. (Compare Ezek. xvii. 10. Hos. xiii. 15.) Some render the words, Whatsoever they gather, they shall carry it towards the east, meaning to Babylon, which lay north-east from Judea.

And they shall gather captivity as the sand.] Not only in Judea, (see Jer. lii. 28—30.) but in all the neighbouring countries which they shall conquer. (See the following note.)

Ver. 10. And they shall scoff at the kings, &c.] The Hebrew uses the singular number as well here as in the following verse; and is to be understood of the king of Babylon, who conquers kings and princes, and treats them with scorn and contempt: so they used Zedekiah and his princes, (see 2 Kings xxv. 6, 7. 18. 21.) and so they shall serve the kings of Egypt and Tyre, and the princes of Moab, Edom, and the Philistines; who shall all of them successively be conquered by Nebuchadnezzar. (See Ezek. xxv. xxvi. xxix. xxxii.)

For they shall heap dust, and take it.] Cast up mountains against them, and so take them. (See Jer. xxxii. 24. xxxiii. 4.)

Ver. 11. Then shall his mind change, and he shall pass over, and transgress, &c.] The prophet speaks of the several kings of Babylon as if they were one and the same person; (see the note upon Isa. xxiii. 15.) and saith, that he shall change his mind with his fortune, and impute his success to his idol Belus; which was remarkably true of Belshazzar, Nebuchadnezzar's successor: (see Dan. v. 4.) but we may understand the words of Nebuchadnezzar himself, if we translate the latter part of the verse thus, This his strength is his God; i. e. imputing all his success to his own prowess: (compare ver. 16.) and afterward, for those arrogant words of his, mentioned Dan. vi. 30. he was degraded into a beast.

Ver. 12. Art not thou from everlasting—we shall not die.] Thou that livest for ever, and whose word is as unchangeable as thyself, wilt preserve us from utter destruction, and in due time make good thy promises to us. (See Psal. cii. 27, 28.)

Thou hast ordained them for judgment, &c.] Thou hast appointed the Chaldeans to be instruments of thy vengeance upon sinners. (See 2 Kings xix. 25. Isa. x. 5—7. Psal. xvii. 13. Ezek. xxx. 25.)

Ver. 13. Thou art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity.] With any complaisance, or approbation.

Wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously, and holdest thy tongue when the wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous than he?] Seemest to connive at, or dost not shew any dislike at, the violence of those idolatrous Chaldeans.

Ver. 14, 15. And makest men as the fishes of the sea, &c.] Suffereth the Chaldeans to treat them no better than fishes, who become a general prey to the fisherman's net or angle.

Ver. 16. Therefore they sacrifice to their net, and burn incense to their drag.] They impute all their victories to strength and skill, and make no acknowledgments to God for their success. (See ver. 11. Isa. x. 13. Deut. viii. 17, 18.)

Ver. 17. Shall they therefore empty their net?] Carry away the riches and treasures of their conquest (see 2 Kings xxiv. 13.) in order to undertake more; just as fishermen empty their nets to fill them again. But the words may be rendered, Shall he (see ver. 10.) cast or spread his net? The Hebrew verb is used of drawing a sword or spear: (see Ezek. xxviii. 7. Psal. xxxv. 3.) to this sense the Greek and Chaldee here understand it.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

In answer to the complaints of the prophet in the foregoing chapter, God tells him that he will in due time perform the promises made to his people, of deliverance by the Messiah; and that in the mean time good men will support themselves by faith; and then foreshews him the ruin of their great adversary, the Babylonian empire, and the judgment he will inflict upon them for their covetousness, their cruelty, and idolatry.

Ver. 1. I WILL stand upon the watch-tower, &c.] It was the business of a watchman, in the time of war, to descry from an eminent station what messengers were coming, and to make known the message as soon as possible. (See 2 Kings ix. 17, &c.) The prophet puts himself in such a posture, that he may receive God's answer to the complaints he made in the foregoing chapter.

And what I shall answer when I am reproved.] Or rather, What I shall answer as to what I have argued; viz. to the expostulations I made with God just before.

Ver. 2. Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, &c.] When the prophets are commanded to write any thing, it denotes the great importance of it, that the notice of it may be transmitted to posterity. (See the note upon Isa. viii. 1. xxx. 8.) So God here commands the prophet, to write the contents of this vision in such legible characters as were used in public tables that were hung up in temples and market-places, that every one might have cognizance of them.

Ver. 3. For the vision is for an appointed time.] God has determined a set time when it shall be fulfilled, and not before. (Compare Dan. viii. 19. xi. 27. 35, 36.) According to the common translation of the following words, by this vision we are to understand the destruction of the Babylonian monarchy, which is plainly foretold from the fifth verse to the end of the chapter, and is a proper answer to the complaint or argument the prophet had made in the foregoing chapter. But the learned Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 160. observes, that the prophet, by way of preface to that prediction, confirms the Jews in the general expectation of their deliverer the Messias, whose coming had been so often promised, and which profane persons began to question, when they saw God gave up his people into the hands of a cruel and idolatrous nation.

But in the end, it shall speak, and not lie.] The same learned prelate, p. 162. observes, that the verb puach properly signifies to break forth, as the morning light does; (see Cant. ii. 17. iv. 6.) to which sense the LXX. and Vulgar Latin translate it here; so he renders the sentence, At the end, it (or, he) shall break forth, and not deceive.

Though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry.] There are two different words in the Hebrew, which our English expresses by that one word tarry: so the same learned person translates the sentence thus, Though he tarry, expect him; because he that cometh will come, he will not go beyond the appointed time, but will make good the promises of deliverance given to your fathers. To this sense the LXX. render the words, very agreeably to the original; and the apostle follows their interpretation, (Heb. x. 37.) and understands them of the Messias, who is often called, He that cometh, or should come, into the world: (see Psal. cxviii. 26. Zech. ix. 9. John vi. 14.) the verb stands impersonally in the Hebrew text; but in such a syntax the person is commonly understood.

Ver. 4. Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him.] The Septuagint translate the sentence thus: If he (i. e. the just, as it follows) draw back, my soul (the present Hebrew copies read his soul, understanding it of God) shall have no pleasure in him. This version Bishop Pearson hath proved to be agreeable to the original text, Prolegom. to the LXX. and the apostle confirms this exposition by following that translation, Heb. x. 38.

Ver. 5. Yea also, because he transgresseth by wine, he is a proud man, neither keepeth he at home, &c.] If we suppose a new paragraph to begin here, according to the exposition given of the foregoing verses, the sense would run plainer if the words were thus translated, Moreover he that, like a man transgressing by wine, is proud, shall not continue, or prosper. The copulative joined to the last word in the Hebrew is often redundant. The words would yield a plainer sense, if they were thus translated: Moreover, (like) a man transgressing by wine, he is proud, and shall not continue, or prosper. To this sense, the Chaldee paraphrast and Vulgar Latin explain the words; the particle of comparison, as, being often understood. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 8.) The prophet having assured the Jews of a deliverance in God's appointed time, proceeds now to denounce his judgment against the Babylonian monarchy, speaking of it as comprised under one person at the head of it. (See the note upon i. 11.) Here he describes him as one intoxicated with his successes, and not knowing how to set any bounds to his ambition; but still, as his conquests enlarge, his desire of having more increases. Hell, or death, and the grave, are proverbial emblems of an insatiable temper. (See Prov. xxvii. 29. xxx. 16.)

But gathereth to him all nations, &c.] Extends his dominions far and near. (See i. 17.)

Ver. 6. Shall not all these take up a parable against him, and a taunting proverb, &c.] A parable or proverb signifies a metaphorical or figurative saying out of the common way, as the Greek word Παροιμία imports; so it is opposed to speaking plainly, without figure or such-like ornament, John xvi. 29. Thus the ancient sages clothed their instructions in apt stories and suitable comparisons; upon which account Solomon joins together a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings, Prov. i. 6. Such were the symbols of Pythagoras, and some other celebrated wise men among the gentiles. Of this kind is the parable, or taunting and satirical proverb, here uttered against the king of Babylon, and the insatiable ambition of that monarchy.

Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his! how long? &c.] Woe to him that is still increasing his own dominion by invading his neighbours; surely he will not continue long so to do without some remarkable check from Providence! and so what he thus increases will not be for himself (for so the words in the former part of the sentence may be translated), but for the Medes and Persians, who shall conquer him, and enrich themselves with his spoils. (See the following verse.)

And to him that ladeth himself with thick clay.] His gold and silver, which is nothing originally but earth or clay, shall turn to no benefit, but be rather his burden; adding weight to his sins and punishment.

Ver. 7. Shall not they suddenly rise that shall bite thee, &c.] Cyrus took the city of Babylon (and thereby put an end to the Babylonish empire) by a sudden assault, taking advantage of a festival, celebrated by night according to custom, and then draining the river without being perceived, and making it fordable for his army; according to the account Herodotus and Xenophon give of the taking of Babylon, wherein they exactly agree with the prophecy of Jeremiah, chap. l. li. foretelling the same event.

Ver. 8. Because of men's blood, and for the violence of the land, &c.] As a just return for thy cruelty in the slaughter of many thousands killed by thee in battle; and particularly for the violence offered to the land of Judea, and the city of Jerusalem and its inhabitants. The words might have been more plainly translated, for the violence against the land, &c. for so the same phrase is rendered, Obad. ver. 10. (Compare here ver. 17. and Jer. li. 35.)

Ver. 9. That he may set his nest on high, &c.] Strong fortresses and citadels are compared, for their height, to nests, which birds are led by their instinct to make upon the tops of trees, to place themselves and their young ones out of the reach of danger. (Compare Jer. xlix. 6. Obad. ver. 4.)

Ver. 10. Thou hast consulted shame to thy house by cutting off many people, &c.] Thy cruelty towards others will turn at last to thy own confusion, and utter extirpation of thy family, of which there will be left neither name nor remnant, son nor grandson; as God threatens Nebuchadnezzar, Isa. xiv. 22. Belshazzar being the last of that family, whose death put an end to the Babylonian monarchy.

Ver. 11. For the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it.] The houses and towns which have been destroyed by the Chaldeans, shall cry for vengeance against the destroyers. It is a great question, what is the proper signification of the Hebrew caphis, being found but in this one place of the Bible: our translators render it beam; others think it signifies a brick.

Ver. 12. Woe to him that buildeth a town with blood, &c.] Who hath raised the greatness of his capital city Babylon upon the ruins of many other cities, and the destruction of their inhabitants. (Compare Micah iii. 10.)

Ver. 13. Behold, is it not of the Lord of hosts that the people shall labour in the very fire? &c.] The latter part of the verse is with very little alteration repeated, Jer. li. 58. where he describes the destruction of Babylon. I observed in my notes upon that place, that the sentence might be better translated thus: The people shall labour for that which shall be [fuel] for the fire, and the people shall weary themselves for a thing of nought; i. e. all the pains the Chaldeans have taken in enlarging and beautifying their city, shall be lost in the flames which shall consume their stately buildings. (See the notes upon Jer. li. 25.)

Ver. 14. For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, &c.] For God's providence in governing the world shall conspicuously appear in the downfal of the Babylonian empire; especially as it is described in the prophets as an earnest and type of the fall of mystical Babylon, which will be a decisive stroke, that will thoroughly vindicate oppressed truth and innocence.

Ver. 15. Woe to him that giveth his neighbour drink, that puttest thy bottle to him, &c.] The desolation of any country is often compared to drunkenness: (see the note upon Jer. xxv. 15.) so the king of Babylon, who subdued the neighbouring countries round about him, and perhaps got an advantage over some of them by gifts and presents, or by counterfeit leagues and friendship, is compared to a man that gets an advantage over another by persuading or forcing him to drink too much. The word chemath, translated bottle, signifies likewise that heating or poisonous quality which attends wine taken in excess; (compare Hos. vii. 5.) and is often taken for any poisonous juice. (See Deut. xxxii. 24. 33. Job vi. 4. xx. 16. Psal. lviii. 4.)

That thou mayest look on their nakedness.] The too frequent effects of drunkenness, is to engage others to commit lewdness, and thereby expose them to shame; so the king of Babylon intoxicates the minds of his neighbours, by his arts of policy, in order to discover the weakness of their country or government, called the nakedness of the land, Gen. xlii. 9. and thereby get the better of them.

Ver. 16. Thou art covered with shame for glory: drink thou also, &c.] Thy glory shall now be turned into shame: for it shall come to thy turn to feel the fury of God's judgments, often expressed by the cup of his wrath; when thy people shall be made captives, and stripped bare without any covering to their nakedness. (See Isa. iii. 17. Nahum iii. 5.)

Ver. 17. For the violence of Lebanon shall cover thee.] God shall execute his vengeance upon thee for the violence thou hast offered to the temple at Jerusalem; (compare Jer. l. 28. li. 11.) which is here compared to the cedars of the forest of Lebanon, for its height and stateliness of its buildings. (Compare Zech. xi. 1.) Or else the prophet compares the cruelty of the Medes and Persians to the violence of wild beasts in the forest of Lebanon: so the following words import.

And the spoil of beasts, which made them afraid.] The relative which, added by our translators, obscures the text; which might be more plainly rendered, The spoil of (or, made by) beasts shall make them afraid, or make thee afraid; as the Septuagint and the Chaldee, with a very little alteration, read the text. As thou hast spoiled others, without any sense of common humanity, so the army of the conqueror shall deal by thee; (see ver. 8.) and shall tear thee in pieces, as wild beasts do their prey. (See Isa. xiii. 15. 18.)

Because of men's blood, &c.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 18. What profiteth the graven image, &c.] The last sin the prophet takes notice of, for which God will execute his judgments upon Babylon, is idolatry: (compare Jer. l. 2. li. 44. 47.) and he tells the king of Babylon, that when he sees Bel and the rest of his graven images carried away by the conquerors in triumphant procession, (see Isa. xlvi. 1, 2.) he will be convinced that his idols could bring no advantage or protection to their worshippers.

The molten image, and a teacher of lies.] The setting up, and paying adoration to them, tend to encourage the ignorant in their absurd fancy, that God is like the work of men's hands, and that images have some Divine power lodged within them: to the same purpose the stock is called, the doctrine of vanities, Jer. x. 8.

To make him dumb idols.] Who have mouths and speak not, Psal. cxv. 5. (Compare 1 Cor. xii. 2.)

Ver. 19. Woe unto him that saith to the wood, Awake, &c.] Woe to him that calls upon idols, as if they could awake and hear his prayers, as God is said to awake, when he answers our prayers; (see Psal. xliv. 23.) or as if they could give their worshippers directions how to escape the evils which threaten them.

It is laid over with gold and silver, and (or, but) there is no breath at all in it.] They are beautified with a great deal of cost, on purpose to delude their ignorant worshippers, and make them fancy some divinity lodged within them; whereas they are altogether without life or sense.

Ver. 20. But the Lord is in his holy temple, &c.] The true God has his throne in heaven, as the place of his peculiar residence; (see Jonah ii. 7.) from whence he will answer the prayers of his servants, though the temple of Jerusalem should be destroyed.

Let all the earth keep silence before him.] Or, Stand in awe before him, as the LXX. render it: the consideration of his sovereignty and dominion should strike them with a reverential awe, and especially should dispose them to a profound submission towards him, when they see him execute his judgments in the world, as he will shortly do upon the Chaldeans. The expression is taken from the reverent behaviour which inferiors shew by keeping silence in the presence of their betters; or it alludes to such a silence as is kept in courts of justice, when a judge pronounces the sentence. (See Job xxix. 9, 10. Psal. lxxvi. 8, 9. Zeph. i. 7. Zech. ii. 13.)

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet in this hymn recounts, in a poetical style, God's wonderful works, in conducting his people through the wilderness, and giving them possession of the promised land: from whence he encourages himself, and other pious persons, to rely upon God for making good his promises to their posterity in after-ages.

Ver. 1. A PRAYER of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth.] Or, as the marginal reading explains it, According to the tunes called in Hebrew Shigionoth; which were musical compositions used in the public service of the temple. (Compare the title of Psal. vii.) It is called a prayer, because it begins in the form of a supplication, although the following parts are rather in the nature of a hymn, or a thanksgiving.

Ver. 2. O Lord, I have heard thy speech, and was afraid: O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make [it] known, &c.] I have heard what thou hast revealed to me concerning thy judgments upon thy people: the terribleness of them strikes me with a reverential awe and dread; (compare ver. 16.) yet I earnestly beg of thee, if it be thy gracious will, to exert thy power, and renew thy former wonders, for the deliverance of thy people, before the seventy years determined for their captivity be expired: and in the midst of judgment to remember mercy.

Ver. 3. God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran.] The prophet, to encourage the faithful still to trust in God, recounts some remarkable instances of the protection he afforded their forefathers in the wilderness, where they were destitute of all visible means of sustaining themselves. First of all, he takes notice of the wonders he did for them when they came near the border of Edom, when the Edomites came out with a mighty force to oppose their passage: (see Numb. xxi. 20.) the like wonders he had shewed in their former journeys from Mount Sinai to Paran: Numb. x. 12. (Compare Deut. xxxiii. 2.)

Ibid. and Ver. 4. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. His brightness was as the light.] He manifested his glory by that terrible appearance of his presence upon Mount Sinai, where the lightnings shone in the air, Exod. xix. 16. and the pillar of fire enlightened the earth, and conducted them in their journeys: Exod. xiii. 21.

Ver. 4. He had horns coming out of his hands: and there was the hiding of his power.] The Hebrew word keren signifies both horns and rays of light. (See Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30.) So the marginal reading here is to be preferred: He had bright beams coming out of his side. The Schechinah or symbol of the Divine presence had rays of light issuing out on every side, and yet that was but a hiding or veil to the Divine Majesty, who covereth himself with light as with a garment, Psal. civ. 2.

Ver. 5. Before him went the pestilence, and burning coals went forth at his feet.] As thunder and lightnings are his harbingers; (see Psal. xviii. 8.) an emblem of his being a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24. when he comes to execute vengeance upon his enemies; of which the Egyptian plagues, and the discomfiture of Sihon and Og, were a terrible proof.

Ver. 6. He stood, and measured the earth: he beheld, and drove asunder the nations.] Like a conqueror, he divided the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel; having first scattered and discomfited the former inhabitants.

And the everlasting mountains were scattered, the perpetual hills did bow.] The mountains and hills are said to quake at God's presence, Nahum i. 5. so here the whole land of Canaan is said to tremble, and even the mountains themselves, the most solid and impregnable parts of it, because the hearts of the stoutest of the old inhabitants fainted and lost their courage. (See Josh. ii. 24.) [By the mountains and hills may be meant the greater and lesser principalities or kingdoms in the land of Canaan, see Psal. lxxii. 3.] The mountains and hills are spoken of as emblems of eternity, because time seems to make no change or alteration in them. (See Gen. xlix. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 15.)

His ways are from everlasting.] His purposes are decreed from all eternity, and will infallibly be executed in their appointed time.

Ver. 7. I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction, &c.] I beheld the Arabians, called Scenitæ, from their dwelling in tents, and their neighbours the Midianites, in great consternation, upon the approach of the Israelites towards their borders: (see Numb. xxii. 3. Exod. xv. 15.) whom they afterward destroyed in battle. (Numb. xxxi. 2, &c.)

Ver. 8. Was the Lord displeased against the rivers? &c.] When God dried up the channel of the Red Sea, (Exod. xiv. 22.) and afterward that of the river Jordan, (Josh. iii. 16, 17.) it was not out of any displeasure against the waters, but for the safety of his people, for whose deliverance he appeared in as illustrious a manner, as if he had been seen riding in the clouds, and carried upon the wings of the wind, as in a chariot. (Compare Deut. xxxiii. 26. Isa. xix. 1. Psal. lxviii. 4. civ. 3.)

Ver. 9. Thy bow was made quite naked, according to the oaths of the tribes, even thy word.] Thou didst fight for Israel, and didst make bare thine arm in their defence, as evidently as if thou hadst been seen with a bow in thine hand; that thou mightest fulfil the oaths and promises thou hadst made to give the tribes of Israel full possession of Canaan: thy word being in itself as immutable, as when it is confirmed by the solemnity of an oath. (See Heb. vi. 18.)

Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers.] Thou didst cleave the hard rocks, and the earth about them, and make the waters to run down in a great stream or channel, like a river, which followed them a great part of their journey. (See Psal. lxxviii. 15, 16. cv. 41. 1 Cor. x. 3.)

Ver. 10. The mountains saw thee, and they trembled.] Mount Sinai, and the hills adjoining, felt the effects of thy presence. (Compare Exod. xix. 16. 18. Judg. v. 4. Psal. lxviii. 8. lxxvii. 16. cxiv. 4.)

The overflowing of the water passed by.] Or rather, The stream of water overflowed; for in that sense the verb abar is often used. (See Isa. viii. 8. Dan. xi. 10.)

The deep uttered his voice, and lifted up his hands on high.] The waters gushed out of the bottom of the rock with a mighty noise, as if the fountains of the great deep had been opened, (Psal. lxxviii. 16.) and forced its way upward, as a man gets up an ascent by the strength of his hands.

Ver. 11. The sun and moon stood still in their habitation.] At the command of Joshua. (See Josh. x. 12.)

At the light of thine arrows they went, &c.] When the people marched against their enemies, God sent hailstones and lightnings from heaven to discomfit them. (See Josh. x. 11. and compare Psal. xviii. 14. cxliv. 6.) Or the words may be translated thus; Thine arrows went at the light and shining of thy glittering spear. Hailstones, the artillery of heaven, came down upon the heads of the enemies, accompanied with thunder and lightning. As the blaze of lightning is here elegantly compared to the glittering of a spear, so the lustre of arms is often compared by the poets, particularly Homer, to the flashes of lightning; so we read Iliad. xi. ver. 65.

Πᾶς δ' ἄρα χαλκῷ
Λάμφ', ὥςτ' στεροπὴ πατρὸς Διὸς Αἰγιόχοιο.

His brazen arms like flames of lightning shone,
Which the great Thunderer launches from his arm.

The same thought occurs again, Iliad. x. ver. 155. (See the note upon Ezek. xxi. 15.)

Ver. 12. Thou didst march through the land [of Canaan] in indignation, thou didst thrash the heathen in anger.] i. e. Thou didst subdue them, not only by giving success to the arms of the Israelites, but likewise thyself fighting against them from heaven, (ver. 11. 13. compare Isa. xxi. 10. xli. 15. Jer. li. 33.)

Ver. 13. Thou wentest forth for salvation with thine anointed.] With thy peculiar favourites, such as Moses, Joshua, and David, all set apart by thy appointment to be leaders and rulers of thy people. (Compare Psal. cv. 15.)

Thou woundedst the head out of the house of the wicked.] The heads (see ver. 14.) or confederate princes of the Canaanites. (See Josh. x. 3. xi. 1.)

By discovering the foundation to the neck.] Or, Rasing the foundation, as the word aroth signifies, Psal. cxxxvii. 7. by undermining them from bottom to top.

Ver. 14. Thou didst strike through with his staves the head of his villages.] Or, Thou didst strike through the head of his warriors among his tribes, or families. Thou didst discomfit all the petty kings of their several clans, or families, carrying on the war against Joshua. (See Josh. xii. 9, &c.) The word perazav, his villages, in our translation, the Septuagint translate warriors, or generals: and so they understand it, Judg. v. 7. 11. which sense agrees best with this place.

When they came out as a whirlwind to scatter me.] Armies are elsewhere compared to whirlwinds. (See Zech. ix. 14.)

Their rejoicing was as to devour the poor secretly.] The metaphor is taken from wild beasts, who carry their prey into their dens, and there devour it.

Ver. 15. Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses, &c.] Thou didst conduct thy people through the Red Sea, and the river Jordan, as safely as if they had rid on horseback. (See ver. 8.)

Ver. 16. When I heard, [thy judgment decreed against thy own people, ver. 2.] my belly trembled, &c.] I was all over in a shaking and consternation, and no strength remained in me. (Compare Jer. xxiii. 9. Dan. x. 8.)

That I might rest in the day of trouble, &c.] Noldius, p. 108. 110. of his Concordance, hath given the easiest sense of the latter part of the verse, translating it thus: Yet I shall rest in the day of trouble, when he shall come up against the people, even he who shall invade them with his troops: the prophet speaks in the person of the pious man; I shall rest secure under the Divine protection, when the Chaldeans shall come to invade Judea. (See ver. 17, 18.)

Ver. 17, 18. Though the fig-tree shall not blossom, &c.] Though all outward means of nourishment or preservation should fail, yet will I still trust and depend upon God's promises.

Ver. 19. The Lord will make my feet like hinds' feet, and will make me walk upon my high places.] This verse is taken out of Psal. xviii. 33. He will restore my former strength, nimbleness, and agility, in war, and make me again possessor of the chief places of strength in my native country. (See Deut. xxxii. 13. xxxiii. 29. Psal. xviii. 33.)

To the chief singer [or musician] on my stringed instruments.] This hymn was designed to be sung in the temple-service, (see ver. 1.) and for that purpose was delivered to the chief musician, to be set to musical notes. (Compare the title of the fourth Psalm.) This direction might probably be given by order of king Josiah.

ZEPHANIAH.

PREFACE.

THIS Prophet lived in the reign of Josiah, as he himself informs us, and prophesieth chiefly against Judah, who continued very corrupt, notwithstanding the king's pious zeal for reformation, and the good example he gave to his subjects.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet denounces God's severe judgments against Judah for their idolatry, and other heinous sins.

Ver. 1. THE word of the Lord that came to Zephaniah, the son of Cushi—the son of Hizkiah.] Hizkiah is read with the same points in the Hebrew with Hezekiah, the name of the king of Judah: but Zephaniah being here reckoned as the fourth by descent from Hizkiah, that person cannot be the same with king Hezekiah, there being not a sufficient distance of time between them for four descents.

Ver. 2, 3. I will utterly consume all things from off the land—I will consume man and beast, &c.] A general desolation is threatened, by enumerating the particulars that shall be involved in it. (See the note upon Hos. iv. 3.)

Ver. 3. And the stumbling-blocks with the wicked.] Or, Of the wicked; for the particle eth often denotes the genitive case. (See Noldius, p. 122.) Stumbling-blocks are the same with idols, called the stumbling-blocks of iniquity, Ezek. vii. 19. xiv. 3, 4.

Ver. 4. And I will cut off the remnant of Baal from this place.] Those altars, or places of worship, dedicated to the service of Baal, which escaped the reformation of king Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 5. compare Jer. iii. 6.

And the names of the Chemarims with the priests.] Or, The names of the idolatrous priests; for so the word Chemarim is translated, 2 Kings xxiii. 5. (compare Hos. x. 5.) I will destroy these together with the priests of the tribe of Levi, who have joined in the worship of idols. (See Ezek. xliv. 10.)

Ver. 5. And them that worship the host of heaven upon the house-tops.] See the note upon Jer. xix. 13.

And them that worship and swear by the Lord, and that swear by Malcham.] That join the worship of idols to that of the true God, who is a jealous God, and will not admit of any rival in his worship. (See Hos. iv. 15.) Malcham is the same with Moloch, to whom the people of Judah continued to offer their children, as Jeremiah upbraids them, vii. 31. xix. 5. notwithstanding the reformation that Josiah had made, 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Swearing is an act of religious worship, or a solemn invocation of God, as a witness and a judge, (see Deut. x. 20.) and therefore expressly forbid to be used to idols, (Josh. xxiii. 7.)

Ver. 6. And them that are turned back from the Lord; and those that have not sought the Lord.] Both those that are apostates to idolatry, and such as live without any sense of religion, and without God in the world.

Ver. 7. Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God: for the day of the Lord is at hand.] Keep silence in token of an awful reverence towards God, now he is coming to execute his judgments upon the land. (Compare Psal. lxxvi. 8, 9. Habak. ii. 20. Zech. ii. 13.) Humble thyself under his mighty hand, without repining or murmuring at his corrections, which thy sins do justly deserve. (See Psal. xxxix. 9.)

For the Lord hath prepared his sacrifice, he hath bid his guests.] The slaughter of the wicked is called a sacrifice, because it is in some sense an atonement to God's justice. (Compare Isa. xxxiv. 6. Jer. xlvi. 10. Ezek. xxxix. 17. Rev. xix. 17.) The latter part of the sentence alludes to the custom of those that offered sacrifice, which was to invite their friends to partake of the feast which accompanied it. So God will call the Chaldeans to have a share in this slaughter.

Ver. 8. I will punish the princes, and the king's children.] As having been the encouragers of idolatry, by their authority and ill example. Both the sons of Josiah who succeeded him in the throne, are said to have done evil in the sight of the Lord, 2 Kings xxiii. 32. 37.

And all such as are clothed with strange apparel.] There were peculiar vestments belonging to the worship of each idol. (See 2 Kings x. 22.) So in aftertimes there were peculiar habits belonging to the priests of Saturn, and priestesses of Ceres, which are mentioned in the martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, cap. 18. and in Tertullian, de Pallio, cap. 4. The text may likewise be explained of such men as wore women's apparel, and such women as wore that belonging to men; which was contrary to an express law, Deut. xxii. 5. and was a rite observed in the worship of some idols.

Ver. 9. In the same day also will I punish all those that leap on the threshold.] Or rather, Leap over the threshold. The expression probably denotes some idolatrous rite, like that which was practised in the temple of Dagon, where the priests did not tread upon the threshold, 1 Sam. v. 5. To this sense, the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it of those, that walk after the laws or rites of the Philistines. Others expound it of those, who enter into other men's houses, and take away their goods by violence; according to what follows: who fill their masters' houses with violence and deceit.

Ver. 10. And it shall come to pass in that day—that there shall be the noise of a cry from the fish-gate.] At that time, (see ver. 12.) there shall be an outcry of the Babylonish army coming to invade the city on the side of the fish-gate; i. e. the gate which stood near the fish-market. (See 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. Nehem. iii. 3.)

And a howling from the second gate.] Or rather, From the middle part of the city. (See 2 Kings xxii. 14.)

And a great crashing from the hills.] From the mountains of Sion and Moriah, whereon the temple and the king's palace were built. (See 2 Chron. iii. 1.)

Ver. 11. Howl, ye inhabitants of Maktesh.] A part, or street, of Jerusalem: the Chaldee interprets it of the inhabitants near the brook Kidron.

For all the merchant people are cut down, &c.] They that carry on their trades by going to marts or fairs, with great sums of ready money. The original reads, The people of Canaan, which word signifies a merchant: (Hos. xii. 7.) but the Chaldee understands it of those who resemble the Canaanites in their idolatries and corrupt manners: so Judah's mother is called a Hittite, and her father an Amorite, because they did after the works of the Canaanites, the ancient inhabitants of the land, Ezek. xvi. 45.

Ver. 12. And it shall come to pass at that time, that I will search Jerusalem with candles.] I will deliver up Jerusalem into the hands of the Chaldeans, who shall let no corner of it escape them, but shall diligently search the houses, and plunder the wealth of them. (See the following verse.)

And punish the men that are settled on their lees, &c.] Who having lived securely in ease and plenty, (compare Jer. xlviii. 11.) have not God in all their thoughts, but imagine that he doth not concern himself with the affairs of the world, and that neither good nor evil is brought to pass by his providence.

Ver. 13. Therefore their goods shall become a booty, and their houses a desolation: they shall also build houses, and not inhabit them, &c.] The enemy shall plunder their goods, and then demolish their houses; so that they shall not enjoy these possessions which they have gotten by fraud or violence. (See ver. 9. and Amos v. 11.)

Ver. 14. The great day of the Lord is near—(compare Joel ii. 1. 11.) even the voice of the day of the Lord: the mighty man shall cry there bitterly.] A great noise and distraction shall attend the taking of Jerusalem. (See ver. 10. Isa. xxii. 5.) Some translate the latter part of the sentence thus, The voice of the day of the Lord is bitter: then the mighty man crieth out. The adverb sham, translated there, signifies time as well as place. (See the note upon Isa. xlviii. 16. Hos. ii. 15.)

Ver. 15. That day is a day of wrath, of trouble and distress, &c.] See ver. 18. Joel ii. 2. Amos v. 18.

Ver. 16. A day of the trumpet and alarm.] See Jer. iv. 19.

Ver. 17. And I will bring distress upon men, and they shall walk as blind men, &c.] Not knowing whither to go, or which way to take for safety. (Compare Deut. xxviii. 29. Isa. lix. 10.)

And their blood shall be poured out as the dust, and their flesh as the dung.] Or, Their carcasses as the dung: so the Chaldee explains the word flesh. The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be slain in the streets of the city, and their carcasses left there to rot and putrefy.

Ver. 18. Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them.] This is spoken of the merchants and rich citizens. (See ver. 11—13. and compare Ezek. vii. 19.)

But the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy.] God's vengeance is frequently compared to fire; see Nahum i. 6. This shall consume the land and its inhabitants for their heinous offences, and chiefly for their idolatry; because that sin does peculiarly entrench upon his honour, which is incommunicable to others, whereupon he is called a jealous God, Exod. xx. 5. xxxiv. 14.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet exhorts the Jews to repentance before God's judgments overtake them; which he likewise denounces against the neighbouring countries, the Philistines, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Ethiopia, and Assyria; which were all subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, either before or after the captivity of the Jews. (See Jer. xxv. 20—22. 26. Ezek. xxv. xxix. xxxi. and Dr. Prideaux, under the twenty-first, thirty-first, and thirty-second years of Nebuchadnezzar.)

Ver. 1. GATHER yourselves together.] Assemble yourselves in order to make a public humiliation. (See Joel ii. 16.)

O nation, not desired.] The Greek and the Chaldee interpret it, O nation, that will not receive instruction, and is not to be amended but by the discipline of God's judgments. Glassius (Grammat. p. 410.) renders it to the same sense, O nation, not to be moved with desire; i. e. of growing better. The word niksaph is taken for having a desire or longing, Gen. xxxi. 30. Psal. lxxxiv. 2.

Ver. 2. Before the decree bring forth, before the day pass as the chaff.] The words are differently translated by interpreters, but much to the same sense: they may be rendered nearer to the Hebrew thus, Before the day bring forth the decree, which shall pass away, as chaff is dispersed before the wind. The judgments of God, consuming the wicked, are often compared to the dispersing of chaff. (See Job xxi. 18. Psal. i. 3. Isa. xvii. 13. Hos. xiii. 3.)

Ver. 3. Seek righteousness, seek meekness.] Continue to seek and practise them. (Compare Psal. xxxiv. 14.)

It may be ye shall be hid from the Lord's anger.] This is the most likely way of securing the Divine protection in the time of a general destruction. (See the note upon Jer. xxxvi. 3.) Such a protection is elsewhere expressed by being hid or covered under the shadow of his wings. (Compare Psal. xxxii. 7. xci. 1.)

Ver. 4. For Gaza shall be desolate, and Ashkelon a desolation.] There will be no escaping into the neighbouring countries, such as the Philistines are, in particular; for their cities shall likewise become a prey to the forces of Nebuchadnezzar. (See Jer. xlvii. 1. with the Argument to that chapter.)

They shall drive out Ashdod at noon-day.] The same forces will take the courage to attack Ashdod (another city of the Philistines, 1 Sam. v. 1.) in the open day, and not to betake themselves to nightly stratagems. (See Jer. vi. 4. xv. 8.)

Ver. 5. Woe to the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites.] The Philistines who live upon the coast of the Mediterranean Sea; (compare Ezek. xxv. 16.) called there as well as here, Cherethites, or Cherethims. The word is translated Κρῆτες, Cretans, by the LXX. in this and other places where it is found: they are supposed to have been a colony removed from Crete to Palestine. (See the note upon Jer. xlvii. 4.)

O Canaan, the land of the Philistines, I will even destroy thee, &c.] The Canaanites, properly so called, are the same with the Philistines, and seated in that part of Palestine. (See Josh. xiii. 3.)

Ver. 6. And the sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, &c.] A proverbial description of an utter desolation. (Compare ver. 14, 15. and see the note upon Isa. xiii. 20. xvii. 2.)

Ver. 7. And the coast shall be for the remnant of the house of Judah, &c.] The sea-coast (ver. 5.) shall in after-times belong to the Jews, who shall possess all the Philistines' country: as it appears they did in the first times of Christianity. (See Acts viii. 26. 40.) Those that returned from the captivity are called a remnant, Hag. i. 12. ii. 2.

They shall feed thereupon: in the houses of Ashkelon shall they lie down in the evening.] The words are an allusion to what is said ver. 6. As the cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, &c. were places for wild Arabs, or other wandering people to pitch their tents, and feed their flocks; so they shall hereafter become the settled habitations of the Jews. (Compare Isa. lxv. 10.

For [or, when] the Lord shall visit them, and turn away their captivity.] What is promised in this verse, was partly fulfilled after their return from Babylon, and may hereafter receive a farther completion. (See Obad. ver. 19. and the note there.)

Ver. 8. I have heard the reproach of Moab, and the revilings of the children of Ammon.] These countries were destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. (See the Argument to Jer. xlviii.) They are threatened with destruction, both here and Jer. xlviii. 17. xlix. 1. and Ezek. xxv. 3. 8. for their insulting over the Jews in their calamities.

And magnified themselves against their border.] Have invaded the territories of the Jews, when they were carried captive, (see Jer. xlix. 1.) and used the inhabitants with great cruelty, as they had done in former times. (See Amos i. 13.)

Ver. 9. Surely Moab shall be as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrah, &c.] Proverbial expressions of utter desolation. (See Deut. xxix. 23. Isa. xiii. 19. xxxiv. 13. Jer. xlix. 18. l. 40.)

And a perpetual desolation.] Never more to be possessed by its former inhabitants.

And the residue of my people shall spoil them, and the remnant of my people shall possess them.] Judas Maccabeus and his brethren subdued the Ammonites, as appears from 1 Macc. v. 6. But this and the seventh verse will receive their utmost completion at the general restoration of the Jewish nation: those that then escape, and return from their several dispersions, are elsewhere called by the name of the residue and the remnant. (Compare iii. 13. and see the note upon Micah iv. 7.)

Ver. 10. This shall they have for their pride, &c.] See Isa. xvi. 6. Jer. xlviii. 29.

Ver. 11. For he will famish all the gods of the earth.] He will deprive them of their worship and sacrifices, which the gentiles thought to be the food of their gods. (See Deut. xxxii. 38.) The LXX. render it, He will destroy their gods. The destruction of idolatry is usually mentioned when the prophets describe the flourishing state of the church. (See the note upon Micah v. 13, 14.)

And men shall worship him, every man from his place.] Or, In his place. And so the phrase may best be rendered Ezek. iii. 12. (See Noldius, p. 553.) Men shall worship him every where, and not only in Jerusalem. (Compare Mal. i. 11. John iv. 21.)

Even all the isles of the heathen.] Or, The isles of the gentiles, as the phrase is translated, Gen. x. 5. (See the note upon Isa. xi. 11. xli. 1.) The Jews call all places islands, to which they went by sea.

Ver. 12. Ye Ethiopians also, ye shall be slain by my sword.] Ye shall be subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, who is a sword in my hand; (Psal. xvii. 10.) i. e. an instrument to execute my vengeance. The Ethiopians seem to comprehend the Egyptians too, whose confederates they were, and so underwent the same fate with them, when Nebuchadnezzar conquered Egypt. (See Jer. xlvi. 9. Ezek. xxx. 5. 9.)

Ver. 13. And he will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria; and will make Nineveh a desolation.] As Nebuchadnezzar subdued the countries lying southward of Judea, Egypt, and Ethiopia, (ver. 12.) so will he extend his conquests towards the north, and destroy Savacus the king of Assyria, whose royal seat was Nineveh. (See the Preface to Nahum, and the note upon iii. 18.) This action preceded the desolations mentioned in the foregoing verses. Archbishop Usher placeth it in the sixteenth year of king Josiah, and Dr. Prideaux in the twenty-ninth year of the same reign.

And dry like a wilderness.] The inhabitants of Nineveh are compared to many waters, Nahum ii. 8. She shall be now exhausted of her people, and be uninhabited like a wilderness.

Ver. 14. And flocks shall lie down in the midst of her, &c.] See ver. 6.

All the beasts of the nations.] The Chaldee interprets it, The several kinds of wild beasts: as if the Hebrew goji, nations, were to be understood of the several species of wild beasts, as the word is used of several sorts of caterpillars, Joel i. 6. In like manner the ants are called a people, Prov. xxx. 25.

Both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; their voice shall sing in the windows.] These birds frequent desolate and forsaken places, and shall take up their habitation in the ruinous houses of that once populous city. (Compare Isa. xiii. 21. xxxiv. 11. 14.)

For he shall uncover the cedar work.] The fine carved work or ceilings made of cedar, (see Jer. xxii. 14.) shall be exposed to the injuries of the weather, and so quickly come to ruin.

Ver. 15. This is the rejoicing city, that dwelt carelessly, that said in her heart, I am, and there is none beside me.] Its inhabitants indulged themselves in their ease and pleasures, and they arrived at that degree of presumption, as to fancy that no strength or power could bring them down from their height, or make them cease to be the capital city of the world. Babylon is charged with the same degree of pride and carnal security, Isa. xlvii. 8.

Every one that passeth by shall hiss, and wag his head.] See Nahum iii. 19.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

Jerusalem is severely reproved and threatened for her sins: yet the righteous are comforted with the hopes of a general conversion and restoration of the nation in God's due time.

Ver. 1. WOE unto her that is filthy [or glutinous] and polluted, to the oppressing city!] The city Jerusalem, which is defiled with the sins of luxury and cruelty. (See ver. 3, 4.)

Ver. 2. She obeyed not the voice.] Of God's messengers, the prophets.

Ver. 3. Her princes within her are roaring lions; her judges are evening wolves.] Like so many beasts of prey, they devour the people by oppression and injustice. (Compare Ezek. xxii. 27. Micah iii. 9—11. Habak. i. 8. Zech. x. 13.)

They gnaw not the bones until the morrow.] They devour all presently, and leave not so much as the bones till the next day, as the most voracious creatures commonly do.

Ver. 4. Her prophets are light and treacherous persons.] This is to be understood of the false prophets, who seduced the people by lying pretences to inspiration. (See Jer. xxiii. 11. 32. Hos. ix. 7. Micah iii. 11.) The LXX. often render the Hebrew nabi, prophet, by ψευδοπροφήτης, false prophet, in Jeremiah, and Zech. xiii. 2.

Her priests have polluted the sanctuary, they have done violence to the law.] They have presumed to attend upon my service in the temple after they had polluted themselves with idolatry, and thereby have profaned my holy place; (see i. 4.) and have broken the ordinances of my law, by not observing the differences that it prescribes between what is clean and unclean. (See Ezek. xxii. 26.)

Ver. 5. The just Lord is in the midst thereof, he will not do iniquity.] The inhabitants of Jerusalem presume upon God's protection, having placed his name in their temple: so they say, Micah iii. 11. Is not the Lord among us? or in the midst of us, as the word is here translated; but they should withal consider, that he is just and holy, who will neither do iniquity, nor suffer it, without calling the offender to account.

Every morning doth he bring his judgment to light, he faileth not; but the unjust knoweth no shame.] He doth not fail to give us every day fresh evidences of his justice, though the wicked continue hardened in their sins, and are grown past shame. (See Jer. vi. 13. Micah ii. 6.) The expression, every morning, alludes to the custom of administering justice in the morning. (See Psal. ci. 8. Jer. xxi. 12.)

Ver. 6. I have cut off the nations: their towers are desolate; I have made their streets waste, &c.] I have executed my vengeance upon that great city Nineveh, (ii. 13.) and have brought my judgments nearer to you, by giving up your brethren of the ten tribes into the hands of Shalmaneser, who hath put an end to that kingdom, and hath carried its inhabitants captives into a strange land. (See 2 Kings xvii. 6.)

Ver. 7. I said, Surely thou wilt fear me, thou wilt receive instruction.] God is introduced as speaking after the manner of men, and expecting what effect such proceedings might in reason have produced. (Compare Isa. v. 4. Jer. viii. 6.) In this sense we may most probably understand that expression of Isaiah, (lxiii. 8.) He said, Surely they are my people, children that will not lie: so he was their Saviour: i. e. God might justly conclude, that after such experience of his goodness, they would not prove false or treacherous to him.

So their dwelling should not be cut off, howsoever I punished them.] Or, Whereinsoever I punished them. (See Noldius, p. 175.) I might reasonably expect, that lesser corrections might reform them; and I need not be forced to proceed to such an utter excision, as I executed upon the ten tribes. (See ver. 6.)

But they rose early, and corrupted all their doings.] They still increased their corruptions, notwithstanding all the advances king Josiah made to a general reformation. (See the notes upon i. 4, 5.) The phrase, rising early, denotes diligence and assiduity. (See Jer. vii. 13. xxv. 3. xxxv. 15.)

Ver. 8. Therefore wait upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I arise to the prey, &c.] The connexion of this verse with what went before would better appear, if we translate the particle laken, nevertheless; as it plainly signifies Jer. v. 2. Micah v. 3. and in other places. Notwithstanding these provocations, saith God, I exhort the godly among you to expect the fulfilling the promises I have made of restoring the Jewish nation to my wonted favour, in the latter ages of the world; in order to which great crisis, I will execute remarkable judgments upon the unbelievers and disobedient. (See the note upon Micah v. 5.)

For my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms to pour out upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger.] This may perhaps be meant of the same general summons which Joel speaks of, when the nations shall be gathered into the valley of Jehoshaphat. (See Joel iii. 2. 12. and the notes there.)

For all the earth shall be devoured by the fire of my jealousy.] The tender regard I have for my honour, which hath particularly been injured by that idolatry which is spread over the world, will provoke me to execute my vengeance upon the whole earth. (See i. 18.)

Ver. 9. For then I will turn to the people a pure language, &c.] Or, I will restore to the people a pure language; i. e. I will turn them from their idolatry and other wickedness, (see ver. 13.) to glorify me with one mind and one mouth. The same thing is expressed by speaking the language of Canaan, Isa. xix. 18. This is a blessing reserved for the latter ages, after the conversion of the Jews, and the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles, when there shall be one Lord, and his name one, Zech. xiv. 9.

To serve him with one consent.] The Hebrew reads, With one shoulder. The metaphor is taken from beasts drawing together under one yoke; or men's setting their shoulders together to carry the same burden.

Ver. 10. For from beyond the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering.] The Jews who are dispersed into the most distant countries, such as was Ethiopia, which lay beyond Egypt, shall come into the Christian church, and make their religious acknowledgments there. The expression, From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, may be translated, From the borders of the rivers of Ethiopia, both here and Isa. xviii. 1. where the same phrase occurs; the word in the Hebrew signifying indifferently the hither, or farther side of a river. Ethiopia is described in both places as lying among the rivers, which may probably be understood of the several sluices and channels which the inhabitants are forced to keep open, thereby to prevent the Nile from overflowing their own country, or Egypt. (See Dr. Heylin's Geography, in Ethiopia.)

The daughter of my dispersed, is the same with my dispersed, as the daughter of Zion is equivalent to Zion. (See the note upon Jer. iv. 31.) The phrase of bringing an offering, is taken from the sacrifices and oblations brought to the temple; and is in other places of the prophets applied to those that come into the Christian church. (See Isa. xviii. 7. lx. 6, 7. 9. Mal. i. 11.)

Ver. 11. In that day thou shalt not be ashamed for all thy doings, wherein thou hast transgressed against me.] Or, Thou shalt not be put to shame for all thy doings. (Compare ver. 19.) Thou shalt not be made a public example by such remarkable judgments, (see ver. 15.) which have formerly made thee a reproach among the heathen. (See Amos iii. 2. Micah vi. 16. and the notes there.)

For I take away out of the midst of thee them that rejoice in thy pride; and thou shalt no more be haughty because of my holy mountain.] I will purge out of thee those hypocrites who continued in their sins, and relied upon their outward privileges, such as being of the stock of Abraham, or having the temple of the Lord placed among them, as if these would secure them from guilt or punishment; and thereupon despised the gentiles as not worthy of the same favours with themselves. (See the notes upon Micah iii. 11.)

Ver. 12. I will also leave in thee an afflicted and poor people.] Or, A meek and poor people: the blessings of the gospel are peculiarly promised to the poor. (See Isa. xi. 4. xiv. 32. lxi. 1. Zech. xi. 11.) Christ and his apostles apply these promises to those that were converted by their preaching, Matt. v. 3. xi. 5. 1 Cor. i. 26, 27. James ii. 5. which texts are meant of such as are endued with a true spirit of poverty, such as consists in a lowliness of mind, contempt of the world, and a resigned will. Afflictions are very useful to produce such a temper of mind, and therefore are often the lot of true disciples. (See Acts xiv. 22. Heb. xii. 7. 1 Pet. i. 7.) By the afflicted may be meant those that come out of great tribulation. (See Ezek. xxxviii. 8. and the note upon Isa. iv. 2.)

Ver. 13. The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies, &c.] The remnant of Israel is explained in the note upon Micah iv. 7. These shall be holy; the rebels being purged out of them, (Ezek. xx. 38.) as Jerusalem itself shall then be holy. (Compare Isa. xxxv. 8. lx. 21. Joel iii. 17. 21. Zech. xiv. 21. and see the notes there.)

For [or, therefore] they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid.] The great Shepherd the Messias shall both feed and protect them. (Compare Ezek. xxxiv. 28. Micah iv. 4. v. 4. vii. 14.)

Ver. 14. Sing, O daughter of Zion, &c.] These hymns of joy properly belong to the times of the gospel, and especially to the triumphant state of the church. (Compare Isa. xii. 6. liv. 1. Zech. ii. 10. xi. 9.)

Ver. 15. The Lord hath taken away thy judgments, he hath cast out thine enemy.] God hath removed thine enemies, who were the instruments of his vengeance.

The King of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee.] He gives manifest tokens of his presence in thee, and protection over thee. (Compare ver. 5. 17. Isa. iv. 5, 6. Rev. vii. 15. xxi. 3.)

Thou shalt not see evil any more.] For all thine enemies shall be subdued. (See the former part of the verse, and compare Isa. xxxv. 10. li. 22. Joel iii. 17. Rev. xxi. 4.)

Ver. 16. Let not thine hands be slack.] Or weak, as the word is rendered in the parallel text, Isa. xxxv. 3. The prophet comforts the feeble-minded, those whose spirits were sunk under their former afflictions; and exhorts them to perform their duty with cheerfulness and diligence, as being assured of God's assistance and protection. (Compare Heb. xii. 12.)

Ver. 17. He will rejoice over thee with joy; he will rest in his love.] He will take pleasure in doing thee good. (Compare Deut. xxx. 9. Isa. lxii. 5. lxv. 19. Jer. xxxii. 41.) He will rest, or take satisfaction in continuing his favour towards thee. (Compare Hos. xiv. 4.)

Ver. 18. I will gather them that were sorrowful for the solemn assembly, who are of thee, &c.] I will assemble those Israelites who are dispersed in their several captivities, both that of Babylon and those of following times, who mourn for the loss of the public assemblies, (compare Lam. ii. 6.) and were grieved at the reproaches wherewith their enemies upbraided them, as if they were utterly forsaken of God. (Compare Psal. xlii. 3.)

Ver. 19. I will save her that halteth, and gather her that is driven out.] See Micah iv. 6, 7.

And I will get them praise and fame in every land where they have been put to shame.] God will give visible tokens of his care over them, in gathering them from their several dispersions over the world, and bringing them back into their own country. (See Ezek. xxxviii. 8. 12. and the following verse.)

Ver. 20. At that time will I bring you again, even in the time that I gather you.] I will gather you from your several dispersions, in order to bring you back into your own land. (Compare Isa. xi. 12. xxvii. 12. lvi. 8. Ezek. xxviii. 25. xxxiv. 13. Amos ix. 14.)

For I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth, when I turn back your captivity before your eyes.] I will make you the subject of men's praise and admiration, who shall be induced to glorify God, when they shall see the wonderful works he hath wrought for you, in restoring you from your several dispersions, and giving you a joyful meeting together.

HAGGAI.

PREFACE.

OF what family this Prophet was, he hath given us no intimation: but the time when he prophesied he has distinctly noted, viz. in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes. The occasion of this prophecy was the stop that was put to the building of the temple, after the foundation had been laid, according to the commandment of Cyrus, about seventeen years before.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet reproveth the people's delays in rebuilding the temple, and tells them, this their neglect was the cause they prospered no better: he encourageth them to set about it, and promises God's assistance in it.

Ver. 1. IN the second year of Darius the king.] Compare Ezra iv. 24. v. 12. This is the same Darius who is called in the heathen writers Darius Hystaspes; as shall be proved in the note upon ii. 3. and Zech. i. 12.

Came the word of the Lord by Haggai unto Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah.] Called Zorobabel the son of Salathiel, Matt. i. 12. Luke iii. 27. He was grandson to Jeconiah king of Judah, who was carried captive to Babylon; (see 1 Chron. iii. 17. 19.) whom king Cyrus made Æchmalotarches, or governor of the Jews, who returned from the captivity; as being the eldest person of the royal family: he had the name of Shezbazzar given him by the Chaldeans; (see Ezra i. 8. compared with ii. 2.) as Daniel was called by them Belteshazzar, (Dan. i. 7.)

And unto Joshua the son of Josedech the high-priest.] Called Jeshua in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah: his father Josedech, or Jehozadah, was carried captive to Babylon. (See 1 Chron. vi. 15.)

Ver. 2. This people say, The time is not come that the Lord's house should be built.] They pretended they had not the encouragement and protection of the king of Persia. This prophecy seems to be delivered before Darius had granted his decree for building the temple. (Compare Ezra v. 1. with vi. 1.)

Ver. 4. Is it time for you—to dwell in your ceiled houses, and this house lie waste?] You complain of the times; yet they have not been so difficult, but that you have found means and opportunity to build fine houses for yourselves, though ye are content to let the house of God lie in ruins. It argues a great contempt of God and religion, when men think no cost or finery too much to bestow upon themselves, and the meanest accommodation good enough for the service of God.

Ver. 5, 6. Consider your ways. Ye have sown much, and bring in little, &c.] Consider both your ingratitude in thus neglecting to restore my house and worship, and what you have got by these your dealings, viz. how none of your undertakings thrive, or are successful; nor do you enjoy the fruits of your labours. (See Micah vi. 15. compare Ezek. viii. 10.)

He that earneth wages, earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes.] Whatever gains he makes, they are followed by such losses, as leave him no richer than he was before: or provisions are so dear, (see ver. 11.) that men can but just live by their labour.

Ver. 8. Go ye up to the mountains, and bring wood, and build the house.] Go to any of the forests upon the mountains, (see Nehem. ii. 8.) and cut down timber to carry on the building. They entered upon the work before they had any decree from Darius to forward the work. (See Ezra v. 2, 3.) It is probable, that afterward they had leave to fetch cedar from Mount Lebanon. (See Ezra iii. 7.)

And I will take pleasure in it, and I will be glorified.] Or, I will place my glory there, as the Chaldee expounds it. (See ii. 7.)

Ver. 9. Ye looked for much, and it came to little.] See ver. 6. and ii. 16.

And when ye brought it home, I did blow [or, I had blown] upon it.] I had blasted the fruits of the earth, while they were in the field. (See ver. 11. and ii. 17.)

Because of my house that is waste, and ye run every man to his own house.] Ye make what haste ye can to build your own houses, and let mine lie in ruins.

Ver. 10, 11. The heaven is stayed from dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit, &c.] I have punished you with great drought, wherein the dew itself ceases to fall. (See 1 Kings xvii. 1.) This blasted and withered the fruits of the earth; a curse formerly denounced against you for your disobedience. (See Lev. xix. 24. Deut. xxviii. 23.)

Ver. 12. Then Zerubbabel, &c.] Compare Ezra v. 2.

Ver. 13. Then spake Haggai the Lord's messenger.] Or, prophet. (Compare Isa. xliv. 26. Mal. iii. 1.)

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet encourageth the builders by a promise, that the glory of the second temple should be greater than that of the first; and that in the following year God would bless them with a fruitful harvest. In the conclusion he foretells the setting up the kingdom of Christ, under the name of Zerubbabel.

Ver. 3. WHO is left among you that saw this house in her first glory? &c.] When the foundation of the house was laid in the second year of Cyrus, many of the ancient men that had seen the first house, wept to see how much the second temple would fall short of the glory of the first. (Ezra iii. 12.) The second year of Cyrus was fifty-three years after the destruction of the first temple; so the oldest men among those that returned home might very well remember how glorious that was. The prophecy was uttered fifteen years after the foundations of the second temple were laid; so there might some still survive that saw the first. This is an evident proof, that the Darius mentioned in this prophecy must be Darius Hystaspes: for they that suppose Darius Nothus to be here meant, must allow the distance of one hundred and sixty-six years between the destruction of the first temple and the time of this prophecy: and it cannot be imagined, that any number of men could be capable of comparing the difference between the two temples, at that distance of time: see this farther proved in the note upon Zech. i. 12.

Ver. 5. According to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so my Spirit remaineth with you.] I will fulfil those promises I made with you, when I delivered you out of Egypt; that, upon your obedience, I would not leave you, nor forsake you, but guide and prosper you in all your undertakings. (See Nehem. ix. 20. Isa. lxiii. 11.)

Ver. 6. Yet once it is a little while.] Or, Once more, as the LXX. render it, whom St. Paul follows, Heb. xii. 26. The phrase implies such an alteration as shall not give way to any farther change, as the apostle there expounds it. The space of time from this prophecy to the coming of the Messias may be called a little while, in comparison of the several ages expired since the first promise of a Redeemer. A learned prelate, in his excellent Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, (p. 88.) translates the words to this sense: After one kingdom [viz. the Grecian, which succeeded the Persian monarchy, at this time subsisting] it is but a little while; and [or, after that] I will shake all nations, &c.

I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land.] Great commotions and changes in the world are expressed by shaking the heavens and the earth. (See Ezek. xxv. 15. xxxviii. 19. Joel iii. 16.) These expressions may denote here the great commotions that should be in the Roman empire (see the last note), from the death of Julius Cæsar till near the birth of Christ: or it may in general signify the introducing such a kingdom or religion, of which the Messiah is to be the head; which shall in the end break in pieces, and destroy all the other dominions of the world. (See the notes upon ver. 21, 22.)

Ver. 7. And the Desire of all nations shall come.] He shall come to this house, that shall answer the wishes and desires of mankind, by supplying all those defects that hindered them in the performance of their duty. Such a guide and director, as the wisest men among the heathens wished for, and whose coming was the hope of Israel, and completion of all the promises made to their fathers: Acts xxvi. 6. xxviii. 20. see Gen. xii. 3. xlix. 10. where the old translations read the latter part of the verse to this sense: His (or, to him) shall be the expectation of the people, Mal. iii. 1.

And I will fill this house with glory.] Though it wants the cloud of glory overshadowing the mercy-seat, which was a symbol of the Divine presence peculiar to Solomon's temple, (see Psal. lxxx. 1.) yet I will honour this second temple with a much greater glory; viz. the presence of the Messiah, in whom shall dwell all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, Colos. ii. 9. where he shall publish his saving doctrine to the world. (See Luke xix. 47. xx. 1. xxi. 38. John xviii. 20.)

Ver. 8. The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts.] Solomon's temple was more richly adorned with silver and gold than this; and I, that am the Lord of all the world, could easily command the riches of it, and bring them together, for beautifying this my house, if I took delight in richness of ornaments.

Ver. 9. The glory of this latter house shall be greater than that of the former; and [or, for] in this place will I give peace.] The glory of this second temple shall exceed that of the former, not in riches or costly ornaments, but in this respect, that there the Prince of peace shall make his appearance, and the gospel of peace shall be preached and published. (See Isa. ix. 6. Micah v. 5. Eph. ii. 14.) The modern Jews expect a third temple, in which this prophecy will be verified; whereas the prophet plainly speaks of the same temple which they then saw, and was in their eyes as nothing, in comparison of the former. The ancient Jews speak of the temple, from the time of Zerubbabel to its destruction under Vespasian, as one and the same temple; particularly Josephus, de Bello Jud. lib. viii. cap. 18. (See the abovecited treatise.)

Ver. 11. Ask now the priests concerning the law.] Whose office it was to put a difference between holy and unholy, and between clean and unclean, Lev. x. 10.

Ver. 12. If one bear [or, carry] holy flesh in the skirt of his garment, &c.] By the rules of the law, things immediately dedicated to God's service did convey some degree of holiness to common things that touched them; so the altar sanctified the gift that was laid upon it, Exod. xxix. 37. and whatsoever touched the flesh of the sin-offering was holy, Lev. vi. 27. But this rule did not extend so far as to make the garment that touched any of the offerings capable of conveying holiness to any thing else.

Ver. 13. If one that is unclean by a dead body touch any of these things, shall it be unclean? And the priests answered and said, It shall be unclean.] The law was plain in that case, (see Numb. xix. 11.) The least defect is sufficient to make a thing evil or sinful; whereas to make it good and perfect, a concurrence of all good qualities is requisite.

Ver. 14. So is this people, and so is this nation before me, saith the Lord, &c.] In like manner, saith God, the inward contempt and disregard of my worship, which this people discover by their backwardness to carry on the building of my temple, makes every thing they undertake, and even the sacrifices they offer on my altar, hateful and unacceptable.

Ver. 15. Consider from this day and upward, from before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple of the Lord.] From the time that a stop had been put to the building of the temple, after the first foundations of it were laid. (Compare Ezra v. 3.)

Ver. 16. Since those days were, when one came to a heap of twenty measures, there were but ten, &c.] The fruits of the earth did not yield their usual increase, because of the unkindly seasons wherewith I punished them. (See the following verse, and i. 2. Zech. viii. 10.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 17. Yet ye turned not unto me, saith the Lord.] Ye did not lay my judgments to heart, nor consider that they were inflicted for your sin, in neglecting to rebuild my temple, and restore my worship in it.

Ver. 18. Consider now from this day and upward, &c.] The word mollah, upward, signifies likewise forward, (see 1 Sam. xvi. 13.) and so it should be translated here. In the fifteenth verse the prophet exhorted them to reflect upon the calamities they had suffered from the time the building of the temple was left off: now he bids them look forward from the day the building was renewed, (see i. 15.) and they would find a visible change of their affairs for the better.

Even from the day that the foundation of the Lord's temple was laid.] The prophet expresses the carrying on of the building as if it were a new foundation, because the work had been so long interrupted. (Compare Zech. viii. 9.)

Ver. 19. Is the seed yet in the barn, &c.] Is the harvest already laid up in the barn? or any fruits of the earth gathered in? No, certainly; this is but the ninth month (answering to our November), when no judgment can be made what will be the increase of the year following: yet from this time I promise you the blessing of a fruitful year, as an encouragement to you to carry on the building. (Compare Zech. viii. 12.)

Ver. 21. Speak to Zerubbabel, governor of Judah.] The same title which is given to him, i. 1. wherein he was the type of the Messiah, to whom the following words belong.

Ibid. and Ver. 22. I will shake all nations; and I will overthrow the thrones of kingdoms, &c.] This prophecy plainly relates to the second coming of Christ, or to that illustrious appearance of his kingdom, which shall put a period to the kingdoms of the earth, and the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdom of the Lord and his Christ. (See Dan. ii. 44. Rev. xi. 15.)

I will overthrow the chariots, and them that ride in them, &c.] Compare Micah v. 5. 10. and see the notes there.

Ver. 23. In that day I will take thee, O Zerubbabel, my servant—and make thee as a signet, &c.] I will invest thee with my power and authority, as the head of my church, and judge of the world. So kings depute their viceroys by giving them their signet, (see Gen. xli. 42.) which was particularly the custom of the Persian monarchs, whose deputy Zerubbabel was; (see Esth. iii. 10. viii. 2.) or else the expression may denote one particularly near and dear unto God, who was always under his eye and care. (Compare Jer. xxii. 24. Cant. viii. 6.) This could not be fulfilled in Zerubbabel, who did not, in all likelihood, live many years after the finishing of the temple; and, to be sure, did not see any of those great changes here foretold: and therefore the Messias must be here described under the name of Zerubbabel; as he elsewhere is under that of David. (See the abovecited treatise, p. 248.)

ZECHARIAH.

PREFACE.

ZECHARIAH was the son of Barachiah, and the grandson of Iddo: he is called the son of Iddo, Ezra v. 1. vi. 14. the grandson being often called the son in the Scriptures; as hath been observed upon Dan. v. 2. He was contemporary with Haggai, and prophesied in the second year of Darius Hystaspes. (See the note upon Hag. ii. 3. and upon Zech. i. 10.) There is an Iddo mentioned Nehem. xii. 4. among those Levites that came from Babylon with Zerubbabel; from whence Dr. Alix infers, that the prophet Zechariah's grandson must have prophesied some considerable time after the first return from the captivity, and therefore would understand the Darius here mentioned to be Darius Nothus. This argument is altogether inconclusive; for if Iddo was advanced in years when he returned, he might have a grandson thirty years of age in the second year of Darius Hystaspes, which was sixteen or seventeen after the first of Cyrus. And it appears that Zechariah was a young man when he saw the vision related at the beginning of this prophecy. (See ii. 4.) Beside, there is no necessity of supposing the Iddo that was grandfather of Zechariah to be the same person that is mentioned in Nehemiah. In the books of Ezra and Nehemiah there is mention of two Ezras, (compare Ezra vii. 1. with Nehem. xii. 1.) of two Nehemiahs, (compare Nehem. i. 1. with iii. 16.) and there is a Daniel mentioned Ezra viii. 16. a distinct person from the famous prophet of that name: and it may as well be supposed that there were two Iddos.

The design of the first part of this prophecy is the same with that of Haggai, viz. to encourage the Jews to go on with rebuilding of the temple, by giving them assurance of God's assistance and protection: from whence he proceeds to foretell the glory of the Christian church, the true temple or house of God, under its great high-priest and governor Christ Jesus, of whom Zerubbabel and Joshua the high-priest were figures. The latter part of the prophecy, from chap. ix. probably relates to the state of the Jews under the Maccabees, and then foretells their rejecting the Messias, and their conversion afterward, and some remarkable passages that should happen to them in the latter ages of the world.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

After an exhortation to repentance, the prophet relates two visions shewed to him, implying the restoration of the Jewish state, and security from their enemies, while they were rebuilding the temple.

Ver. 1. IN the eighth month, in the second year of Darius, &c.] See the Preface.

Ver. 2. The Lord hath been sore displeased with your fathers, &c.] Though God hath been justly displeased with your fathers, and punished them and their children with seventy years' captivity, yet now he declares himself willing to be reconciled to you upon your repentance.

Ver. 4. Be not as your fathers, to whom the former prophets have cried, saying, &c.] Such exhortations the former prophets gave your forefathers, particularly Jeremiah, whose words are here referred to. (See Jer. xxv. 5. xxxv. 15.) Do not imitate them in their obstinacy.

Ver. 5, 6. Your fathers, where are they? and do the prophets live for ever? &c.] Though the prophets, and those to whom they delivered their message, are dead, yet the commandments delivered by their ministry still continue in full force; which appears by the judgments which came upon your fathers for transgressing them, as they themselves could not but acknowledge. And the same punishments will overtake you, if ye continue disobedient.

Ver. 6. And they returned and said, Like as the Lord of hosts thought to do to us, &c.] Your fathers were forced to acknowledge with sorrow, that God had exactly fulfilled all his threatenings denounced against them. (See Lam. ii. 17.)

Ver. 7. The eleventh month, which is the month Sebat.] This is the Chaldee name of the eleventh month; as Nisan, Elul, Chisleu, Tebeth, and Adar, are the names of other months mentioned in the books written after the captivity. The Jews distinguish their months only by the order of their succession, as the first, second, &c. So that if the books of Kings were writ by Jeremiah, as some suppose, the Chaldee names of the months which occur 1 Kings vi. 2. 38. viii. 2. were added afterward by Ezra.

Ver. 8. I saw by night, and behold a man riding upon a red horse.] A red horse is an emblem of war and bloodshed, (see Rev. vi. 4.) The man, or angel, (ver. 11.) riding upon him, denotes the Logos, or Son of God, appearing as the captain of God's hosts, or armies. (See Josh. v. 13, 14. and the notes upon ver. 12, 13. 20.)

And he stood among the myrtle-trees that were in the bottom.] As if he and his companions were refreshing themselves in a shady valley, after the fatigues of war. The vision denotes the peace which ensued after Darius had executed God's vengeance upon the inhabitants of Babylon, and made himself master of their city by the stratagem of Zopyrus. (Compare ver. 11. and see Dr. Prideaux, under the fourth, fifth, and sixth years of Darius.)

And behind him were there red horses, speckled, and white.] These may denote the various successes of Darius's arms during his reign, which were sometimes fortunate, at other times not so.

Ver. 9. The angel that talked with me.] The angel that made known this night-vision to me: so an angel is said to speak with Jacob in a dream, Gen. xxxi. 11.

Ver. 10. And the man that stood among the myrtle-trees answered and said.] This was an angel of an order superior to him that was mentioned ver. 9. who prevents that angel, and takes upon him to return an answer to the prophet's question; or else sends his answer to Zechariah by that angel mentioned ver. 9. as Christ sent his Revelation to St. John by an angel, Rev. i. 1.

These are they whom the Lord hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth.] To these angels he hath entrusted the administration of the affairs of the Persian empire. (See vi. 10.)

Ver. 11. And they answered the angel of the Lord that stood among the myrtle-trees.] They answer this man, (ver. 8.) or angel, as if he were their superior and commander: (see ver. 10.) he is distinguished from the other angel of the Lord, ver. 12. by the circumstance of his standing among the myrtle-trees.

Behold, all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest.] Now all the enemies of the Persian empire in general, and of all the Jews in particular, (see ver. 9.) are quiet: so this seems a proper time for setting forward the building of the temple, which hath been so long interrupted.

Ver. 12. Then the angel of the Lord answered and said, O Lord of hosts.] The angel mentioned ver. 9. makes his supplication to the superior angel, ver. 8. 10. who was indeed the Logos, or Son of God, being called by the name of Jehovah, here and ver. 13. 20. (Compare iii. 1, 2. xii. 8. 10.)

How long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem, and on the cities of Judah.] Cyrus only gave orders for the rebuilding the temple, (Ezra i. 3. vi. 3.) so a great part of the city lay in ruins till Nehemiah procured an order from Artaxerxes for rebuilding it. (See Nehem. i. 3. ii. 3. 8. 17. vii. 4.) The Jews, after the captivity, repaired to the several cities where their inheritance lay, (Ezra ii. 70.) but had not ability to rebuild or fortify them in a regular manner.

Against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years?] There are three ways of computing the seventy years' captivity taken notice of in Scripture. The first is, beginning from the fourth year of Jehoiakim to the first of Cyrus; this is Jeremiah's account, Jer. xxv. 1. 11. which Daniel follows, Dan. ix. 2. Another may be computed from the besieging of Jerusalem, in the ninth year of Zedekiah, and in the tenth month, for which a solemn fast was kept by the Jews: (compare 2 Kings xxv. 1. with Zech. viii. 19.) this computation ends in the second year of Darius, which is the reckoning Zechariah here follows. Or, lastly, if we compute the beginning of the seventy years from the destruction of Jerusalem, and the first temple, which came to pass in the eleventh year of the same reign, (ibid. ver. 2.) they will be accomplished in the fourth year of Darius; and this computation agrees with what is said below, vii. 1. 5. The two last ways of reckoning the seventy years may be reduced to one, only by supposing, that the prophet in this verse sets down a complete number for an incomplete, and calls that space of time seventy years, which wanted very little of it: a way of speaking, of which several instances may be produced.

Ver. 13. And the Lord answered the angel with good and comfortable words.] The Lord of hosts, mentioned in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 14. I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with great jealousy.] Or, I am zealous for Jerusalem with great zeal; for so the word kinnah often signifies. See Isa. ix. 7. xxvi. 11. lxiii. 15. where the translators read, Their envy at the people; but the words might be better rendered, Thy zeal for the people. God here tells the prophet by his angel, that he has a great concern for the welfare of his people, of which he will give evident proofs.

Ver. 15. I am very sore displeased with the heathen that are at ease.] Who have not yet felt the severity of my judgments, but they shall not escape unpunished. This may be understood of the Babylonians, Samaritans, and other neighbours of the Jews, who had not been made such examples of God's severity, as the Jews were. (Compare Jer. xxv. 29.)

For I was but a little displeased, and they helped forward [or, increased] the affliction.] I made the Babylonians instruments of my vengeance upon the Jews, but they exceeded their commission, and acted as they were prompted by their own ambition and cruelty. (Compare Isa. xlvii. 6. and see the note there.) The former part of the verse may be thus translated; For I was but for a little time displeased; I punished them with a seventy years' captivity: a short punishment in comparison of the many years that they had offended me; but these their many enemies have brought new troubles upon them after their return home, and hindered them from rebuilding their temple. (See Ezra iv. 1. 4, &c.)

Ver. 16. I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies, &c.] I am returned to dwell in Jerusalem, and will remove all former marks of my displeasure, and will cause the temple to be rebuilt in it for the place of my residence, (see ii. 10.) which I had for some time forsaken.

And a line shall be stretched upon Jerusalem.] In order to rebuild the streets and walls of it. (See ii. 2.)

Ver. 17. My cities through prosperity shall yet spread abroad.] The lesser cities shall likewise be multiplied, and increase in inhabitants.

For the Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem.] The Lord shall comfort Zion by shewing his wonted kindness to her after her affliction, (compare Isa. li. 3.) and making Jerusalem the place of his residence. (See ver. 16.)

Ver. 18. Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and behold four horns.] Horns often signify the power and strength of princes or people; the metaphor being taken from those cattle whose strength lies in their horns. The four horns may denote the Samaritans, the Arabians, the Ammonites, and the Philistines, who were the great hinderers of the Jews rebuilding the temple; (see Nehem. iv. 7.) or else they may signify in general those their enemies, among whom they were dispersed to the four winds of heaven, (ii. 6.)

Ver. 19. Those be the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem.] Israel being mentioned distinctly from Judah, means those of the ten tribes, which were carried away into Babylon with the tribe of Judah, and returned with them. (See the note upon viii. 13.)

Ver. 20. And the Lord [see ver. 13.] shewed me four carpenters.] Or smiths, according to the number of the horns. These were to repair the destructions which the horns had made.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The flourishing state of Jerusalem is foretold, and the Jews still remaining at Babylon are warned to leave it, that they may not be involved in the calamities which are coming upon it.

Ver. 1, 2. BEHOLD, a man with a measuring line in his hand, &c.] An angel in human appearance; see ver. 3. This angel appeared with a measuring line in his hand, to take the proportions of the city, in order to the rebuilding it, as architects used to do. (See Ezek. xi. 3.)

Ver. 3. And, behold, the angel that talked with me, &c.] See i. 9.

And another angel went out to meet him.] Or, The other angel; i. e. the angel with the measuring line in his hand.

Ver. 4. And said unto him, Run, speak to this young man, saying.] The second angel spoke to the former, to inform me farther concerning the flourishing state of Jerusalem. Zechariah might probably be a young man when he was first honoured with the gift of prophecy, as Jeremiah and Daniel were. (See Jer. i. Dan. i. 17.)

Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle therein.] The inhabitants of Jerusalem will multiply so fast, that the houses within the walls will not be able to contain them, and their cattle will increase in proportion. (See Jer. xxxi. 27.) Under the captivity the land was made a desolation without man or beast; (Jer. xxxiii. 12.) now the contrary blessing is promised.

Ver. 5. For I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her.] Its inhabitants may safely live without the walls of the city, (ver. 4.) for I the Lord will defend it by my angels, as so many flames of fire surrounding it; (Psal. cvi. 4.) as I did Elisha against his enemies, (2 Kings vi. 17.) And my especial presence shall be its protection, of which the cloud of glory in the first temple was a figure. This promise will receive its utmost completion in that New Jerusalem described Rev. xxi. 10. where the glory of God and the Lamb are said to be the light thereof, ver. 11. 23. (Compare Isa. lx. 19.)

Ver. 6. Ho, ho, come forth, and flee from the land of the north.] Chaldea, and Babylon the principal city of it, are called by that name, because they lay northward of Judea. (See Jer. i. 14. iv. 6. vi. 1.) The Jews who still remained in Babylon and the country thereabout, are exhorted to return with all speed from thence, for a reason assigned, ver. 9.

For I have spread you abroad [or, scattered you] as the four winds of heaven.] Compare Ezek. xvii. 21. As I have scattered you and your brethren of the ten tribes all the world over, so in due time I will gather you from your several dispersions, of which your present restoration from Babylon shall be an earnest.

Ver. 7. That dwellest with the daughter of Babylon.] The daughter of Babylon is the same with Babylon. (See Psal. cxxxvii. 8. and the note upon Jer. iv. 31.)

Ver. 8. After the glory he hath sent me unto the nations that spoiled you.] After I have given you the promise of restoring Jerusalem to such a glorious state (so the Chaldee explains it), I, the prophet Zechariah, am sent to execute God's judgments upon the Chaldeans, who spoiled you of all your wealth and ornaments.

For he that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye.] God is very sensible of every injury offered to his people: (compare Psal. cv. 15.) it is like hurting the eye, which is the most tender and sensible part of the body. (See Psal. xvii. 8.) And though he made the Babylonians instruments of his vengeance, yet now he will call them to account for exceeding their commission. (See the note upon i. 15.)

Ver. 9. For, behold, I will shake my hand upon [or, over] them, and they shall be a spoil to their servants.] The words are a continuation of God's message, who proceeds to speak thus to the Jews by Zechariah: I will hold my rod over the Babylonians, (compare Isa. xi. 15. xix. 16.) and I will deliver their city into the hand of the Persians, who were formerly their servants, (see the note upon Isa. xxii. 6.) who shall become masters of its wealth. This threatening was fulfilled when Darius took Babylon after a siege of twelve months, beat down its walls, and put three thousand of the principal citizens to death. (See Dr. Prideaux, under the fifth and sixth years of Darius.)

And ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me.] These words are to be understood as spoken by the prophet himself; when this judgment is executed upon the Chaldeans, it will be an undoubted sign and proof of the truth of my mission. (Compare Ezek. xxxiii. 33.)

Ver. 10. Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for, lo, I come, and will dwell in the midst of thee.] Here God speaks again to his people, and saith he will give them manifest tokens of his presence among them. (See the note upon ver. 5. and compare Lev. xxvi. 12. Ezek. xxxvii. 27.)

Ver. 11. And many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day, and shall be my people.] The church shall be enlarged by the accession of the gentiles to it; and shall receive a farther increase, when, upon the conversion of the Jews, the fulness of the gentiles shall be brought into it. This promise relates chiefly to the latter times. (Compare viii. 21—23.)

And thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto thee.] The fulfilling of these my words, saith the prophet, shall be an undeniable evidence of the truth of my mission. (See ver. 9.)

Ver. 12. And the Lord shall inherit Judah, his portion in the holy land.] God shall give visible tokens that the land of Judea and its inhabitants are his peculiar people; according to the tenor of that covenant he made with their fathers, The land is his, Lev. xxv. 32. and therefore is called the holy land, as Jerusalem is named the holy city: where the temple shall again be built, a token of his presence: and as the people shall constantly profess themselves his worshippers, so he will afford them gracious instances of his favour and protection. This may perhaps be more fully verified at the general restoration of that nation.

Ver. 13. Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord: for he is raised up out of his holy habitation.] Let all men be silent in token of the profoundest reverence and submission, (see Habak. ii. 20.) when God comes down from heaven, (compare Micah i. 3.) or gives visible signs of his appearance to execute judgment upon his adversaries, or to shew mercy unto his servants. Heaven is called the habitation of God's holiness, Deut. xxvi. 15. Isa. lxiii. 15.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

Under the figure of Joshua the high-priest, clothed with new priestly attire, is set forth the glory of Christ, as the corner-stone of the church.

Ver. 1. AND he shewed me Joshua the high-priest standing before the angel of the Lord.] The angel that talked with me, (ii. 3.) represented to me a new vision: viz. that of Joshua the high-priest standing before the angel of the Lord, or the Logos, mentioned i. 11. He is called the Lord in the following verse.

And Satan standing at his right hand to resist him.] i. e. To be his accuser, as the devil is called, Rev. xii. 10. so here he is represented as aggravating the faults, or infirmities of Joshua, the representative of the whole body of the Jews (see the following words); by this means to prevail with God to permit the Jews to be still under the power of their adversaries. So the prince, or tutelar angel, of the kingdom of Persia, is represented as resisting the angel Gabriel, Dan. x. 13. 20. It was the custom in courts of judicature, for the accuser to stand at the right hand of the accused. (See Psal. cix. 6.)

Ver. 2. And the Lord said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan; even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem.] The Logos, or Son of God, said unto Satan, The Lord, even God the Father, rebuke thee, and not suffer thy mischievous imagination against Jerusalem and the temple to prosper: he that hath chosen that place for his especial residence. This text seems parallel with Gen. xix. 24. where it is said, The Lord rained fire from the Lord out of heaven; a text alleged, both by ancient and modern writers, to prove, that a distinction of persons in the blessed Trinity, was a doctrine delivered in the Old Testament, though but imperfectly. The words may be rendered, The Lord hath rebuked thee, or rejected thy plea; having long ago chosen Jerusalem.

Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?] Is not this small remnant returned from captivity, miraculously rescued from utter destruction, like a brand plucked out of the fire? And can it be thought that God will not preserve them? (Compare Amos vi. 11. Jude ver. 23.)

Ver. 3. Now Joshua was clothed with filthy garments.] Denoting the sins and pollutions of the people, of whom he was the representative. (See ver. 2. 4.) The sins particularly taken notice of, might be their marrying with strangers, contrary to the law: (see Ezra ix. 2. 11, 12. Nehem. xiii. 24.) so the Chaldee understands it.

Ver. 4. And he answered, and spake to those that stood before him, &c.] To the inferior angels that were in his retinue. (Compare ver. 5. 7. i. 8—11. and see the note upon Dan. x. 10.)

And unto him [i. e. Joshua] he said, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment.] In token of my pardoning the public and national sins of the Jews, and that I will restore them to a more prosperous condition, I have commanded the angels, my attendants, to clothe thee with new and clean raiment, an emblem of purity, (Rev. xix. 8.) as well as of joyfulness and prosperity. (See Eccles. ix. 8. Isa. lxi. 10.) The word rendered in our English, change of raiment, the LXX. translate Ποδήρη, a garment down to the foot, meaning the linen ephod, which was the priests' habit; regarding the sense rather than the literal signification of the word.

Ver. 5. And I said.] i. e. I, the Lord, farther said, or commanded.

Let them set a fair mitre upon his head, &c.] As the new garments put upon Joshua were such as belonged to the high-priest, and were contrived for glory and beauty, (Exod. xxviii. 2.) so the mitre was the proper ornament for his head, (ibid. xxix. 6.)

And the angel of the Lord stood by.] The angel that talked with me (see ver. 6. and ii. 3.) still stood by, or attended, and made that solemn protestation which follows.

Ver. 7. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, If thou wilt keep my charge, then thou shalt also judge my house, and shalt also keep my courts.] If thou wilt take care that the several offices which belong to the service of my temple, be carefully performed by thyself, and the priests and Levites placed under thy command, then thou shalt exercise all that authority and jurisdiction which belongs to the high-priest's office, in respect of those controversies and questions which are brought before him to determine: (see Lev. x. 10. Deut. xvii. 12. Jer. xviii. 18. Mal. ii. 7.) and thou shalt preside as chief over my house, without any interruption, or molestation. The word mishmar, charge, is often used in the book of Numbers, to denote the several offices and duties of the priests and Levites.

And I will give thee places to walk among them that stand by.] Or, Stand before me, (see iv. 14.) Hereafter I will give thee a place in heaven among these angels my attendants. The priesthood under the Old Testament, and the evangelical ministry under the New, is compared to the angelical office: (see Mal. ii. 7. Rev. i. 20.) so they that discharge this office well, shall have an eminent degree of glory in heaven, and be made equal to the angels themselves. (See Matt. xix. 28. xxiv. 47. Luke xxii. 29, 30.)

Ver. 8. Hear now, O Joshua the high-priest, thou, and thy fellows that sit before thee.] The angel directs his speech to Joshua and his assessors, or assistants in council, of whom Zerubbabel without question was one. The rabbins call these the heads of the captivity, and the men of the great synagogue; by whom they suppose the Jewish affairs, both ecclesiastical and civil, to have been settled after the captivity, and the canon of the Old Testament to have been completed. The angel bespeaks their attention to what follows, as containing matter of great importance.

For they are men wondered at.] The margin reads, Men of wonder. The word mophet signifies not only a wonder, but likewise a sign, or a type. Thus Isaiah's walking naked and barefoot was for a sign and wonder [or rather, a type or example] to Egypt and Ethiopia; (Isa. xx. 3.) i. e. a sign or emblem that they should be carried away captive without any covering to their nakedness: so the word is used again, Isa. viii. 18. So when Ezekiel was commanded to dig through the wall and carry out his goods in the twilight, xii. 7. he was therein a sign [mophet], ver. 11, 12. to the Jews, and to Zedekiah himself; foreshewing what he and they should do, when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldean army. So, likewise, Ezek. xxiv. 24. he is said to be a sign unto them in not mourning for the death of his wife; because according to all that he had done, should they do; where the same word is used in the original. The word is to be understood in this sense in the text before us, which should be translated, They are men intended for signs or tokens, they are typical men, as a learned prelate very properly translates the phrase, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, chap. 3. sect. 1. 4. To the same sense the Vulgar Latin translates it, Viri portendentes; Men that foreshew something to come. They, with Joshua the high-priest at the head of them, are a figure of the restoration of the church under the government of the Messias.

For, behold, I will bring forth my servant, The BRANCH.] I will point out, or foretell, the coming of the Messiah into the world, as a person altogether distinct from Joshua, or any other present among you, and I will make him known to you under the name of the Branch: a title often given to the Messiah in the prophets, as descending from the stock of David: see Isa. iv. 2. Jer. xxiii. 5. and again in this prophecy, vi. 12. in all which places the word in the original is Tsemach. The Chaldee explains every one of these texts of the Messias; who is elsewhere called God's Servant, in an eminent sense, because he was sanctified and sent into the world upon a message of the highest importance. (See Isa. xlii. 1. xlix. 3. lii. 13. liii. 11. Ezek. xxxiv. 23, 24.) The word Tsemach, Branch, the LXX. render here and in most of the parallel texts, Ἀνατολὴ, the East, or sun-rising; from whence it is applied to Christ, Luke i. 78. and is translated there the day-spring: thence the name of Oriens was probably given to the supposed king of the Jews, in the Roman writers. (See Tacit. Hist. lib. v. cap. 13.)

Ver. 9. For, behold, the stone which I have laid before Joshua.] I have ordered a principal stone (see the following note) to be laid before Joshua (in allusion to the present building of the temple, about which his thoughts are employed); denoting the Messias, represented by the former prophets as a corner-stone, or foundation, elect and precious. (See Psal. cxviii. 22. Isa. xxviii. 16.)

Upon one stone shall be seven eyes: behold, I will engrave the engraving thereof, saith the Lord of hosts.] As it is usual to adorn the principal stones of a building with carvings and hieroglyphics, such as heads, eyes, and the like; so will I perform in reality what artists do in imagery: viz. I will appoint the seven angels of the highest order to attend upon the Messias, represented by this stone, and to execute his commands all the world over, for the good of his church. (Compare iv. 10. Rev. v. 6.) The one stone here mentioned is the same with the head-stone, iv. 7. and might be better translated here the chief or principal stone: in which sense the word achad is used, Gen. xlviii. 22. as the Chaldee there explains it.

And I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day.] I will proclaim a free pardon of sins by the publishing of the gospel: (see Jer. xxxi. 34.) or the words may relate to the pardoning the Jews upon their general conversion. (Compare xiii. 1. Jer. l. 20. Micah vii. 18, 19.) The following verse favours this exposition.

Ver. 10. In that day, saith the Lord.] At that remarkable time, when I will forgive all your iniquities, ver. 9. (See the note upon xii. 3.)

Ye shall call every man [to] his neighbour under the vine and under the fig-tree.] Men shall call or discourse with their neighbours in a friendly and sociable manner, as they are sitting at ease under the shadow of their vines and fig-trees. A proverbial expression, denoting peace and plenty: compare Micah iv. 4. where the words follow the promise of a universal peace. (See the notes there, and upon Isa. ii. 4.)

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

Under the figure of the golden candlestick and the two olive-trees, is represented the success of Zerubbabel and Joshua, in rebuilding and finishing the temple.

Ver. 1. AND the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man is wakened out of his sleep.] The last vision was so pleasing to me, that it cast me into a deep sleep; (compare Jer. xxxi. 26.) from which the angel that before had talked with me, (ii. 3.) awaked me, to discover to me the following vision.

Ver. 2. I have looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold, &c.] This figured the temple-service, and the whole polity of the Jewish constitution, which depended upon the restoration of the temple. (See the note upon ver. 14.)

And his seven lamps thereon.] According to the fashion of the golden candlestick in the temple. (Exod. xxv. 37.) As that candlestick figuratively signified the church, whose office it was to enlighten others: (see Rev. i. 20.) so the seven lamps mystically represented the seven spirits of God, (Rev. iv. 5.) i. e. the various dispensations of his providence over it. (Compare ver. 10. of this chapter.)

Ver. 3. And two olive-trees by it, &c.] Which did in a secret unperceivable manner convey oil for supplying the lamps. (See ver. 6.)

Ver. 5. Knowest thou not what these be?] The words may be rendered, both here and ver. 13. Knowest thou what these be? (See the note upon Jer. xxxviii. 15. and Noldius's Concord. p. 256.)

Ver. 6. Not by might, not by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts.] Zerubbabel and Joshua, with the Jews under their conduct, shall finish the temple, and re-establish the Jewish state, not by force of arms, or of human power, but by the secret assistances of my providence; just as the lamps are supplied with oil, in a secret and invisible manner. (See ver. 12. 14.)

Ver. 7. Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shall become a plain.] Removing mountains, and levelling them into plains, are proverbial expressions, to denote the overcoming the greatest difficulties, and removing all obstacles that lie in our way: (see Isa. xl. 4. Matt. xxi. 21.) so the angel here encourages Zerubbabel to go on with his undertaking, assuring him that nothing shall be able to withstand him.

And he shall bring forth the head-stone thereof with shoutings, saying, Grace, grace, unto it.] He shall put the top or finishing stone upon the walls of the temple; which action the standers-by shall accompany with their wishes and prayers, that God's grace and favour may protect that holy place so happily finished, and with such joyful acclamations as they used at laying its foundations. (See Ezra iii. 10, 11.) The chief, or principal, stone, mentioned iii. 9. denoted the Messias, called the Branch, ver. 8. and the words before us mystically represent the same person: viz. that God shall bring forth, or bring him into the world, as the top or head-stone, the last and finishing ornament and perfection (expressed by Grace, grace, i. e. the chief grace) of the church, God's spiritual house, (Eph. ii. 21.) To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase expounds the words, His Messias shall come forth, who was named from all eternity, and shall obtain the empire of all the kingdoms of the earth: and St. Jerome tells us upon the place, that the ancient Jews explained it so.

Ver. 9. The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundations of this house; his hands also shall finish it.] He shall have the happiness of seeing the great work which he had begun finished and brought to perfection. (See Ezra iii. 10. vi. 15.)

And thou shalt know, &c.] See ii. 9.

Ver. 10. For who hath despised the day of small things? for they shall rejoice, and shall see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel.] Or, For whoso hath despised the day of small things, they shall rejoice, &c. The particle mi is sometimes used, without an interrogation, for whosoever. (See Noldius, p. 602.) Whoever despised the small beginnings of this building, when the foundations of the temple were first laid, may now utter their joyful acclamations, when they see, under the conduct of Zerubbabel, the walls rise, and the top-stone laid upon them in order to their finishing, (ver. 7.)

With those seven; they are the eyes of the Lord, which run to and fro through the whole earth.] The LXX. translate the words to a better sense, taking them for a distinct sentence from what goes before, These seven are the eyes of the Lord, &c. The sentence relates to the head-stone, (ver. 7.) upon which these seven eyes were to be engraved, (iii. 9.) hieroglyphically representing the angelical ministry, which always attend upon this head or Prince of the church. The Scriptures mention this as a prerogative of the Messias, that the angels were to minister to him: (see Psal. xci. 11, 12. Matt. iv. 11. John i. 51. 1 Tim. iii. 16.) and it is a saying recorded by the oldest writers among the Jews, that the Messias should be higher than the angels; a doctrine often delivered by St. Paul, Eph. i. 21. Phil. ii. 10. Heb. i. 4.

Ver. 11. Then answered I, and said unto him.] The verb anah is not only used of answering to a question, but likewise signifies to begin or continue a discourse: (see Job iii. 2.) and so the word answer is used, Matt. xi. 25.

Ver. 12. What be these two olive-branches?] Young olives. (See ver. 3.)

Which through the golden pipes empty the golden oil, &c.] There were two greater pipes in the candlestick through which the oil was conveyed into the five lesser. (See ver. 3.)

Ver. 14. These are the two anointed ones, that stand by [or, before] the Lord of the whole earth.] These signify the kingdom and the priesthood, as they are exercised at present by Zerubbabel and Joshua (and belong to their respective families), who having finished the temple, and restored the public worship of God, will constantly attend upon his service, and take care that it be duly performed there. The candlestick represented the Jewish church and temple, (ver. 2.) and these two, Zerubbabel and Joshua, supply the place of the two olive-trees, that feed it with oil and keep it bright and burning. To stand before the Lord, (for so the words should be rendered, as they are vi. 5.) and to minister to him, are the same. (See Deut. x. 8. 1 Kings xvii. 1.)

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.

By the representation of a flying roll, God's judgments are denounced against robbery and perjury: and the Jews are warned against such sins as occasioned their former captivity, for fear of incurring the same, or a worse calamity.

Ver. 1. I TURNED, and lifted up mine eyes.] Or, Again I lifted up mine eyes: for the Hebrew verb shub, to return, is often used adverbially. (See Eccles. iv. 1. ix. 11. and the note upon Isa. vi. 13.)

And, behold, a flying roll.] The roll of a book, as it is expressed, Jer. xxxvi. 1. Ezek. ii. 9. The ancient way of writing being upon long scrolls of parchment. It is described as flying, to denote the swiftness of God's judgments.

Ver. 2. The length thereof is twenty cubits, and the breadth ten cubits.] Such scrolls were usually longer than they were broad; so this was represented as ten yards in length, and five in breadth. The curses therein contained, might probably be writ in capital letters. (See the note upon Isa. viii. 1.)

Ver. 3. This is the curse that goeth over the face of the whole earth.] Or rather, Of the whole land; meaning the land of Judea. This roll contained the curses; i. e. the judgments denounced against the Jews, who were guilty of the sins here specified. (Compare viii. 17. Deut. xi. 29. xxviii. 15. xxx. 19. Nehem. x. 29.)

For every one that stealeth shall be cut off as on this side, according to it, &c.] The roll was written upon both sides, as that mentioned Ezek. ii. 10. On one side was contained the judgments against stealing, and on the other against false-swearing. These two sins are joined together, because in the Jewish courts men were compelled to purge themselves by oath, in the case of theft; so they often would forswear themselves rather than discover the truth. (See Hos. iv. 2. Prov. xxix. 24. xxx. 9.) Stealing may here particularly denote the defrauding the temple of the tithes and offerings that were to be brought thither for the maintaining of God's worship; a sin for which the Jews of that age are severely reproved. (See Mal. i. 8, &c. iii. 8, 9. Nehem. xiii. 10, 11.)

Ver. 4. And I will bring it forth, and it shall enter into the house of the thief; and it shall consume it, with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof.] The curse denounced in this roll, or book, shall take hold of the man and his family, and shall never leave them till they are utterly consumed. It shall be like the leprosy that infects a house, and cannot be purged till the house itself be pulled down. (See Lev. xiv. 45.) The oracle at Delphi denounced a like punishment against perjury, as it is recorded by Herodotus, lib. iii.

—— Κραιπνὸς δὲ μετέρχεται, εἰσόκε πᾶσαν
Συμμάρψαι ὀλέῃ γενεὴν καὶ οἶκον ἅπαντα.

The curse shall swiftly enter, and shall bring
The man himself, and all his house to ruin.

Ver. 5. Then the angel that talked with me [see iv. 1.] went forth.] Or, Went on. The verb yatsa signifies to go, to go on, or forward: so it is used 2 Chron. xxi. 19. Jer. xxv. 32. and so it may signify at the end of this verse, and in the next, where it occurs again.

Ver. 6. And I said, What is it? and he said, This is an ephah that goeth forth.] Dr. Wells observes, that this vessel or barrel was made in the shape of an ephah: yet it was of a much bigger size, large enough to contain a woman in it; which was the reason Zechariah did not know what it was. An ephah contained about the quantity of our bushel, and being the measure of dry things, denotes the Jews' unjust dealings in buying and selling. (See Amos viii. 5.)

He said moreover, This is their resemblance through all the earth.] Or, Through all the land. By this you may make an estimate of their unjust dealings all the land over. (Compare ver. 3, 4.) The LXX. give a very easy sense of the words: This is their iniquity throughout all the land; changing only one letter in the original text, and reading onam for enam.

Ver. 7. And, behold, there was lifted up a talent of lead.] To denote the weight or severity of the judgments here threatened.

And this is a woman sitting in the midst of the ephah.] What thou seest besides, is a woman in the midst of, or within, the ephah; as Noldius interprets it, Concordant. p. 83. The Hebrew reads one woman, but the adjective one is sometimes equivalent to the article a, or the, commonly placed before substantives. (See Dan. viii. 3. x. 5.)

Ver. 8. And he said, This is wickedness.] Public states or societies are oftentimes represented by women, and as the mothers of their people or inhabitants, as we see in the ancient coins. By the same analogy corrupt societies are figuratively expressed by harlots, and women of lewd characters; such are Aholah and Aholibah, described Ezek. xxiii. so here the corrupt state of the Jews is set forth by a wicked woman.

And he cast it into the midst of the ephah; [or, within the ephah, see ver. 7.] and he cast the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof.] To signify, that when a people have filled up the measure of their iniquity they sink under the weight of their sins, and cannot escape the judgment of God.

Ver. 9. I looked, and, behold, there came out [or, appeared] two women, and the wind was in their wings, &c.] These may probably signify the empires of Assyria and Babylon. Empires and kingdoms are commonly described as having wings, to denote the swiftness of their conquests. (See Deut. xxviii. 49. Jer. xlix. 22. Hos. viii. 1.)

And they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven.] i. e. The Assyrians carried away captive the ten tribes, and then the Babylonians took away the remainder of the Jews, and made an entire riddance of the people of the land.

Ver. 11. And he said unto me, To build it a house in the land of Shinar: and it shall be established, &c.] Or, To build her, i. e. the woman, a house, &c. The design of the vision is to instruct the Jews, that as their fathers were carried into a seventy years' captivity to Babylon; so, if their posterity should not take warning by their punishment, a worse captivity should befal them, one of so long a continuance, as should make them despair of ever returning home, and resolve to settle themselves in those countries where they were dispersed. This is expressed by removing them to Babylon; which was a proverbial expression for utter ruin and desolation: just like that of sending them into Egypt, which God threatens the Jews with in the prophets, as a judgment of which they had the most dreadful apprehension; so it became a proverbial speech for extreme misery. (See Deut. xxviii. 64. Isa. x. 24. Hos. viii. 13. ix. 3.) [A learned prelate, in his Vindication of the Defence of Christianity, b. i. chap. 1. sect. 4. supposes the vision to denote the translation of sin or punishment from Judea to Babylon, of which the two kingdoms of Media and Persia were the instruments; denoted by the two women who had the wings of a stork. Babylon itself being signified by the woman enclosed in an ephah, or bushel, and covered with a leaden lid, implying that it was sealed up there, and irrecoverably doomed to destruction, agreeably to the other prophecies denounced against Babylon. See Isa. xiii. 19. Jer. l. 40.]

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.

The first vision in this chapter, of the four chariots drawn by several sorts of horses, denotes the succession of the four empires. The second, concerning the crowns put upon the head of Joshua, sets forth the glory of Christ the Branch, who is to be both King and High-priest of the church of God.

Ver. 1. BEHOLD, there came four chariots from between two mountains; and the mountains were mountains of brass.] Horses and chariots are the usual emblems of conquerors. (See Isa. xxi. 7. 9. and x. 3. of this prophecy.) The four chariots denote the four great empires, which subdued the biggest part of the then known world. And they are represented as coming from between two mountains; because mountains are the natural barriers which divide kingdoms, which are here, though they be as strong as brass, supposed to be broke through by those that invade and conquer their neighbours. And it is observable, that some of the mighty conquerors owed the beginning of their greatness to their successful passage through the straits of mountains, where a small force might have maintained the passes against a powerful army. So the beginning of Alexander's success against the Persians, was his passing through the Portæ Ciliciæ without any opposition: the like success the Roman emperor Severus had against Pescenninus Niger at the same place: and the great incursions the Turks made through the Portæ Caspiæ, was the first step towards making them appear formidable in the world.

Ver. 2. In the first chariot were red horses.] To signify the bloody cruelties of the Babylonish empire, especially towards the Jews. (See i. 15. Jer. li. 34. Habak. i. 6. 10, 11. viii. 12. compare i. 8. Rev. vi. 4.)

And in the second chariot were black horses.] Black is the colour of mourning; (compare Rev. vi. 5.) so this denotes the sad and mournful estate of the Jews under the successors of Cyrus in the Persian empire, when their enemies forged calumnies against them, and thereby put a stop to the building of the temple; (see Ezra iv. 4, &c. Nehem. iv. 1, 2. 4, &c. ix. 36, 37.) and the whole nation was in danger of being destroyed by the interest of Haman in the Persian court.

Ver. 3. And in the third chariot were white horses.] Signifying the victories of Alexander, the third great monarch, and his kindness to the Jews in confirming their religion, laws, and liberties. (See Dr. Prideaux, under the fourth year of Darius Codomannus.) Conquerors use to ride on white horses in the days of triumph. (See Rev. vi. 2.)

And in the fourth chariot were grisled and bay horses.] Or, Strong horses, as the Vulgar Latin renders the word. These may denote the various forms of the Roman government, the fourth empire. (Compare Dan. ii. 33. 40, 41. and see ver. 6, 7.)

Ver. 5. These are the four spirits of the heavens.] The angels which preside over each of these monarchies. (See the note upon Dan. x. 13.)

Which go forth from standing before the Lord of the whole earth.] Who receive their commission from the supreme Lord of all, to govern the affairs of these empires according to his direction. (See iv. 14. 1 Kings xxii. 19.)

Ver. 6. The black horses which are therein go forth into the north country.] The black horses which thou sawest in the vision belonging to the second chariot, and denoting the Persian empire, go forth to conquer the Babylonians, often expressed by the north in the prophets. (See Jer. i. 14. iv. 6. vi. 1. Ezek. i. 4.) The angel saith nothing of the red horses, belonging to the first chariot, because that empire was at an end.

And the white go forth after them.] Alexander and his armies go forth to conquer the Persians.

And the grisled go forth into the south country.] This probably denotes the Romans conquering Egypt, frequently called the south country in Scripture. (See Dan. xi. 6, &c.) This was the last country the Romans subdued under Augustus, whereby they became masters of the greatest part of the known world.

Ver. 7. And the bay went forth and sought to go, that they might walk through the earth, &c.] These seem to signify another branch of the Roman empire, that extended their conquests in the latter times: and these can be no other than the Goths and Vandals, whose power rose out of the ruins of the first Roman empire, and who set up the kingdom of the ten horns, mentioned Rev. xiii. 1. xvii. 3.

So they walked to and fro through the earth.] They took possession of it. (See Gen. xiii. 17.)

Ver. 8. Then cried he upon [unto] me.] These words are uttered by God, appearing out of the Schechinah. (See the note upon i. 13. 20.)

Behold, these that go forth towards the north country have quieted my spirit [or, my wrath] in the north country.] The black horses, denoting the Persian empire, that have conquered the Babylonians, (see ver. 6.) have appeased my wrath by executing that vengeance upon them which they deserved for their cruelty towards my people. (See ver. 2.) The word ruach, spirit, often signifies anger. (See Judg. viii. 3. Eccles. x. 9.)

Ver. 10, 11. Take them of the captivity—which are come from Babylon—Then [or, even] take silver and gold, &c.] The exiles who remained in Babylon, shewed their regard for the temple that was then in building, by sending their gifts and oblations to Jerusalem for carrying on the work, and adorning the temple after it was built. These offerings they sent by the persons here named, as they did afterward by Ezra and his companions. (See Ezra vii. 16. viii. 25, 26.)

Ver. 11. Then [rather, even] take [the] silver and [the] gold, and make crowns, and set them upon the head of Joshua.] There is no necessity of supposing the silver to be used in making those crowns: that is mentioned to shew the liberality of the offerers, and might be laid up for the ornament or service of the temple. (See Ezra viii. 24. 30. Hag. ii. 8, 9.) The use of the gold is here specified: a plate or crown of gold was an ornament placed upon the mitre of the high-priest. (See Exod. xxviii. 36. xxix. 6. Lev. viii. 9.) Two such crowns of gold are ordered here to be made, and both of them to be placed upon the head of Joshua, to signify that the Messias, the Branch spoken of in the next verse, of whom Joshua was a type, should be both a king and a priest, and so should have a right to wear the two crowns that belong to each of those officers.

Ver. 12. Behold the man whose name is The BRANCH.] See, in the person of Joshua the high-priest, the type or representation of the man whose name is the Christ that shall be revealed, as the Targum paraphrases the text. (See the note upon iii. 8.)

And he shall grow up out of his place.] The Hebrew phrase doth literally signify, Shall grow up from under him; i. e. as a branch or twig grows out of the stock of a tree; so the Messias should spring from the family of David: or the expression may mean, that he shall succeed Joshua in the high-priesthood, which shall be unchangeably fixed in his person.

And he shall build the temple of the Lord.] Zerubbabel was to build the material temple, (see iv. 9.) but the building God's spiritual temple, the church, was a work reserved for the Messias. (See Matt. xvi. 18. Eph. ii. 20—22. Heb. iii. 3.) This text the Chaldee paraphrast understands of the Messias, and so it was understood by the Jews in the time of our Saviour. Herod at that time had a mind to be thought the Messias; his flatterers had put this thought into his head, who from thence were called the Herodians, (Matt. xxii. 16.) as many of the ancient writers suppose. This put him upon rebuilding the temple, a work foretold in this place to be undertook by the Messias.

Ver. 13. He shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and shall be a priest upon his throne.] This is a plain description of Christ, who was foretold to be both a king and priest, (Psal. cx. 4.) who should bear the glory of a king, and withal perform the office of a priest. The ancient Jews expected their Messias should retain both these characters. The author of the first book of Maccabees informs us, xiv. 41. that in gratitude to Simon the brother of Judas Maccabeus, they appointed him their governor and high-priest for ever (i. e. himself and his posterity), until there should arise a faithful Prophet, or, till the faithful Prophet should arise, meaning the Messias. (Compare Heb. iii. 2.)

And the counsel of peace shall be between them both.] The kingdom and priesthood being joined in the same person, there shall be no more clashing of jurisdictions between those two offices, represented by the two olive-trees, iv. 12. 14.

Ver. 14. And the crowns shall be to Helem—for a memorial in the temple of the Lord.] The crowns, when they have been set upon Joshua's head, (ver. 11.) shall be delivered to the persons here mentioned, that they may be laid up for a memorial in the temple, for what use they had been made; as there were several gifts laid up in the temple in aftertimes, which were presents offered there by the kings of Egypt, and other great men, out of respect to the place. Helem, here mentioned, is probably the same person with Heldai, and Hen with Josiah; such variety of names belonging to the same person may be often observed in the books of the Kings and Chronicles.

Ver. 15. And they that are afar off shall come and build in the temple [or, build the temple] of the Lord.] The gentiles shall be added to the church, (compare Isa. lvii. 19.) and shall make a considerable increase of this spiritual building.

And ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you.] See ii. 11.

And this shall come to pass, if you diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God.] And ye of the Jewish nation shall be first sharers in the benefits arising from Christ's kingdom and priesthood (and then those that are afar off), if you diligently hearken to the voice of God, speaking to you both by his prophets and by his Son.

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.

Some Jews were sent from Babylon to inquire of the priests and prophets, whether they were obliged to continue the fasts that had been appointed upon the occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem and the ensuing captivity. The prophet is commanded to take this occasion of enforcing upon them the observance of the weightier matters of the law, viz. judgment and mercy, for fear of their incurring the same calamities their fathers suffered upon their neglect of those duties.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in the fourth year of king Darius.] See the note upon ver. 5.

Ver. 2. When they had sent unto the house of God Sherezer and Regem-melech, and their men, to pray before the Lord.] The verb in the Hebrew is in the singular number, He had sent: but our interpreters understand it plurally, by an enallage of the number, which is frequent in the Hebrew; and the Vulgar Latin interprets it to the same sense. According to this syntax, the words might be as well translated thus, When Sherezer and Regem-melech, and their men, had sent unto the house of God. These, probably, were men of some note among the Jews that still continued at Babylon, who either came of their own accord, or were sent by the exiles there to the temple at Jerusalem, to offer up sacrifices at the altar, and make prayers for themselves and their friends in the temple, where the building was carrying on with good success. The temple was the only place where they could offer sacrifice, to which their solemn prayers were always joined. (See 1 Sam. xiii. 12. Ezra vi. 10.)

Ver. 3. And to speak unto the priests which were in the house of the Lord, and to the prophets.] It was the office of the priests to resolve any doubts that might arise, and the people were commanded to consult them, and to follow their determination, (Deut. xvii. 9—11. Mal. ii. 7.) And since the prophets Haggai and Zechariah were at this time residing at Jerusalem, it was proper to inquire of them, who might probably give them an immediate answer from God himself.

Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself, as I have done these so many years?] The fast of the fifth month was kept, because in the fifth month, answering to our month of July, the city and temple were burnt by the Chaldeans: (2 Kings xxv. 8.) in memory of which grievous judgment, the Jews at Babylon had kept a solemn fast, from that time until now; refraining from all worldly business and pleasure, and employing themselves in the religious exercise of prayer and humiliation. (See xii. 12—14.) The question they now proposed was, Whether it were proper for them still to continue this fast, when the ecclesiastical and civil state was in a great measure restored, and the judgment for which they mourned was removed.

Ver. 5. Speak unto all the people of the land, and to the priests.] What I am going to say equally concerns both priests and people.

When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth and seventh month.] The Jews observed four solemn fasts, in relation to the calamities that attended the captivity: two of them are mentioned in this chapter, and two in the next, ver. 19. Besides the fast in the fifth month, taken notice of ver. 3. they kept another in the seventh month, answering chiefly to our September, in memory of the murder of Gedaliah, which happened in that month; (2 Kings xxv. 25.) whereupon all the remainder of the Jews were dispersed into several lands, and the desolation of Judea completed, (Jer. xli. 17, 18.)

Even those seventy years.] Those many years mentioned ver. 3. which, if we reckon from the destruction of Jerusalem, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, to the fourth year of Darius Hystaspes, are just seventy years; as hath been observed in the note upon i. 12.

Did ye fast at all to me, even to me?] Did you fast upon religious motives, and for your better improvement in the duties of repentance and amendment, the only true end of fasting? (Compare Rom. xiv. 6.)

Ver. 6. And when ye did eat—did ye not eat for yourselves, &c.] Ye sought your own pleasure and convenience, not my glory. The sense of these two sentences is much the same with that of St. Paul, 1 Cor. viii. 8. Meat commends us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse: i. e. eating, or abstaining from meat, is in its own nature indifferent, nor is it acceptable to God, any farther than it is subservient to advance the true ends of religion.

The prophet first reproves the hypocrisy of their fasts, before he gives them a direct answer to the question proposed to him; which he does, viii. 19.

Ver. 7. Should ye not hear the words which the Lord hath cried by the former prophets, when Jerusalem was inhabited, &c.] Or, Are not these the words? as the margin reads. The prophet puts them in mind of those exhortations the prophets before the captivity gave them, that they may lay them to heart, and not be guilty of the same sins, for fear of incurring the same penalties.

When men inhabited the south and the plain.] The south was that tract of land called the wilderness of Judea, Matt. iii. 1. part of which, or near to it, was the hill-country, mentioned Josh. xxi. 11. Luke i. 39. The LXX. here render it Ὀρεινή, the hill-country. The plain is that open country which is called the plains of Jericho, 2 Kings xxv. 5. and the plain of the valley of Jericho, Deut. xxxiv. 3. and reached as far as the Salt Sea, or the lake of Asphaltites, called the sea of the plain, Deut. iii. 17. (Compare Jer. xvii. 26.)

Ver. 9. Execute true judgment, and shew mercy, &c.] I often put your fathers in mind, that judgment and mercy were more acceptable to me than fasting, or any external performances; (see Isa. lviii. 6, 7. Jer. vii. 22—24.) and I repeat the same admonition to you of the present age.

Ver. 10. And let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart.] Do not employ your thoughts in devising mischief against others, in order to put it in execution when opportunity serves. (Compare Psal. xxxvi. 4. Micah ii. 1.)

Ver. 11. But they refused to hearken, and pulled away the shoulder.] But your fathers refused to hearken to the admonitions of the former prophets, (ver. 12.) and are often reproved by them for their refractory temper. The metaphor is taken from oxen, that refuse to put their necks under the yoke. (See Nehem. ix. 29. Jer. vii. 24. and the note there.)

Ver. 12. Yea, they made their hearts as an adamant stone.] So that no arguments could make any impression upon them. (Compare Ezek. xi. 9.) The same thing is expressed by men's hearts being hardened.

Therefore came there great wrath from the Lord of hosts.] See ver. 14.

Ver. 13. So they cried, and I would not hear.] I would not hearken to the prayers they made to me in their distress. (See Jer. xi. 11. xiv. 12. Micah iii. 4.)

Ver. 14. But I scattered them with a whirlwind among all the nations whom they knew not.] My anger dispersed the ten tribes like a tempest, into the distant countries of Assyria, Media, &c. from whence they never returned; and the two remaining tribes into Babylon, where they lived like exiles. God's vengeance is often compared to a whirlwind; see the note upon Jer. xxiii. 19.

Thus the land was desolate after them, that no man passed through nor returned.] There was an entire riddance made of the inhabitants of Judea, in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, (see Jer. lii. 30.) so that the highways were desolate, as was threatened, Lev. xxvi. 22. (compare 2 Chron. xv. 5.) and the land enjoyed her sabbaths, as it is expressed 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21. from that time, till their return from their captivity under Cyrus.

For they laid the pleasant land desolate.] The holy writers often call the land of promise by the name of the pleasant land. (See the note upon Dan. viii. 9.)

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.

God promises the continuance of his favour to those that are returned from captivity; so that upon the removal of his judgments, they need no longer continue the fasts they had observed during the captivity: and withal promises in due time a general restoration of his people, and the enlargement of his church by the coming in of the gentiles.

Ver. 2. I WAS jealous for Zion with great jealousy.] Or, I have been zealous for Zion with great zeal. (See the note upon i. 14.)

And I was [or, have been] zealous for Zion with great fury.] I expressed my concern for her welfare, by the severe punishments I brought upon the Babylonians, their oppressors. (Compare Ezek. xxxvi. 5, 6.)

Ver. 3. I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem.] See ii. 10.

And Jerusalem shall be called the city of truth, &c.] Jerusalem shall be again the seat of truth and justice, her magistrates being restored to execute their authority there: and the temple upon Mount Moriah shall be again dedicated to God's worship, and honoured with his presence. (Compare Isa. i. 26. Jer. xxxi. 23.)

Ver. 4. There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem.] Whereas before the captivity the inhabitants were cut off in the midst of their years, by the sword, the famine, and the pestilence. (See Jer. xiv. 12. xv. 2. Ezek. v. 12.)

Ver. 5. And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing, &c.] As in the time of perfect peace and security.

Ver. 6. If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes?] Because, The things which are impossible with men are possible with God, Luke xviii. 27. Concerning the remnant, see the note upon Micah iv. 7.

Ver. 7. I will save my people from the east country, and from the west country.] The words of the original may be literally translated thus, From the rising to the going down of the sun; which signifies, from all parts of the world. (Compare Psal. l. i. cxiii. 3. Mal. i. 11.) This denotes the general restoration of the Jewish nation from their several dispersions, (compare ver. 13. 20. 23.) an event foretold by most of the prophets of the Old Testament. (See the note upon Isa. xi. 11.) The west country here mentioned hath a particular relation to their present dispersion, great numbers of them being in these latter ages settled in the western parts of the world. (See the note upon Isa. xxiv. 14. and upon Hos. xi. 10.)

Ver. 8. And I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem.] They shall be restored to their own country, and inhabit their capital city of Jerusalem, as in old time. (See the note upon Ezek. xxviii. 25, 26.)

And they shall be my people, and I will be their God.] They shall constantly serve and worship me, and I will bless and protect them. (See xiii. 9.)

In truth and in righteousness.] If we refer these words to God, the word righteousness is equivalent to mercy, as it is often used; and, joined with truth, implies God's faithfulness in performing his gracious promises: or the word may be understood of the people, that as God was faithful to them, so they will live in obedience to him.

Ver. 9. Let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words by the mouth of the prophets.] Take courage to go on with the building of the temple, from these comfortable promises which are recited in this chapter, and which ye have formerly heard from the mouth of the prophets, Haggai (ii. 4.) and Zechariah, (iv. 9.)

Which were in the day that the foundation of the house of the Lord of hosts was laid, &c.] Or, Who spake in the day, &c. Which makes the sense plainer. The prophet speaks of carrying on the building, as if it were laying a new foundation. (See Hag. ii. 18.)

Ver. 10. For before these days there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast.] Or rather, There was no reward for man, nor any reward for beast: so the word sekar often signifies: (see Isa. xl. 10. lxii. 11.) i. e. the fruits of the earth would not pay the labour of those that manured it. (See Hag. i. 9—11. ii. 16, 17.)

For I set all men, every one against his neighbour.] The people of the land that dwelt amongst the Jews were continually molesting them. (See Ezra iv. 3, &c.)

Ver. 11. But now I will not be to the residue of this people as in former days.] Now you carry on the building of the temple. (See ver. 6. 9, 10.)

Ver. 12. The ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew.] Compare 1 Kings xvii. 1. I will take away the curse I formerly sent upon the fruits of the earth. (See Hag. i. 10.)

Ver. 13. As ye were a curse among the heathen.] A standing monument of the Divine vengeance; so that the heathen used this as a common form of imprecation, God do so to me as he did to the Jews. (See Isa. lxv. 15. Jer. xxix. 22.)

O house of Judah, and house of Israel.] This may be understood of the Jews belonging to the ten tribes, of whom several joined themselves to the tribe of Judah before the captivity, and were carried away with them to Babylon, and returned with them from thence. (Compare i. 19. ix. 13. x. 6. with 2 Chron. xi. 16. xxxiv. 33. Ezra vi. 17.) But the mentioning both Judah and Israel, which had been so long separated, shews that both the curse and the blessing here spoken of, in its ultimate sense, belongs to the whole body of the Jews, who, as they are a public instance of God's judgments now, so shall they be hereafter of his blessings; viz. at the general restoration and conversion of that nation: to which several promises in this chapter relate. (See ver. 7, 8. 20. 23. and the note upon Isa. xi. 13.)

So will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing.] See Isa. xix. 24, 25. and the note there.

Ver. 14, 15. As I thought [or, resolved] to punish you, when your fathers provoked me to wrath, and repented not, &c.] As I resolved to punish your fathers for their sins, and put my decrees in execution; (compare Jonah iii. 10.) so now I have determined to be favourable to you, and protect you from all your enemies. (Compare Jer. xxxi. 28.)

Ver. 16, 17. These are the things that ye shall do, &c.] These promises are conditional, and the performance of them will depend upon your observing the rules of justice and righteousness which I commanded your fathers by the prophets, as the weightier matters of the law, and now again enjoin them to you. (See vii. 9, 10.)

Ver. 16. And execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates.] Let those who have the public administration of justice, make it their chief intent to uphold truth and integrity, and maintain the public peace, by giving every man his due. The judges used to execute their office at the gates of the city. (See Deut. xxi. 19.)

Ver. 17. And love no false oath.] See v. 3, 4.

Ver. 19. The fast of the fourth month, and the fast of the tenth, shall be to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and cheerful feasts.] Besides the two fasts mentioned vii. 5. the Jews observed two others, that of the fourth month, answering to our June, wherein Jerusalem was taken, (Jer. lii. 6, 7.) and that of the tenth month, answering our December, when the Babylonian army began the siege of it, (ibid. ver. 4.) The prophet tells them, in answer to the question proposed, (vii. 3.) that they may now disuse these fasts, and lay aside the mournful circumstances with which they were solemnized; the judgments which occasioned them being removed.

Therefore love the truth and peace.] God values an upright conversation before the exactest care of outward performances. (See ver. 16. and the note upon vii. 9.) These instructions prepared men's minds for receiving the gospel, whose laws chiefly recommend purity of heart and life. (See Jer. xxxi. 33.)

Ver. 20, 21. It shall yet come to pass, that there shall come people, and the inhabitants of many cities—saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, &c.] A prophecy of the gentiles coming into the church, the expressions alluding to the Jews going up in companies to Jerusalem at their solemn feasts. (Compare Isa. ii. 2, 3. Micah iv. 1, 2.)

I will go also.] So every single person shall express his willingness to go along with them.

Ver. 22. Yea, many people—shall come to seek the Lord of hosts at Jerusalem.] Compare xiv. 16. Isa. lxvi. 23.

Ver. 23. Ten men—out of the languages of all nations, shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you.] Christians are sometimes called by the name of Jews, as being those to whom the promises made to the fathers of the Jewish nation do chiefly belong. (See Rom. ii. 28, 29. Rev. ii. 9.) In this sense the word is here to be understood. The text imports the heathen applying themselves to the Christians, especially to the pastors and ministers of the church, for instruction, in order to qualify themselves for admittance into the church. Ten men, is a figurative expression, putting a certain number for an uncertain; (see Ecclus. xxv. 9.) so the number seven is used, Isa. iv. 1. Micah v. 5. To take hold of another, is a gesture of entreating his friendly assistance. (See Isa. iii. 6. iv. 1.)

For we have heard that God is with you.] There are manifest tokens of the Divine grace and presence with you. (See 1 Cor. xiv. 25.)

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.

This chapter begins a new prophecy: foretelling the conquests of Alexander the Great over Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine; and God's providence over his temple during this turbulent state of affairs. From thence the prophet takes occasion to describe, as in a parenthesis, the humble and peaceable coming of the Messias; and then, returning to his former subject, declares the conquests of the Jews, particularly the Maccabees, over the princes of the Grecian monarchy.

Ver. 1. THE burden of the word of the Lord in [or, against] the land of Hadrach.] The burden of the word of the Lord, is a burdensome prophecy, threatening ruin and destruction. (See Jer. xxiii. 33. Nahum i. 1.) Hadrach is not elsewhere mentioned as the name of a country: the context shews it must mean some part of Syria, of which Damascus was the capital city. The words may most probably be understood of Alexander the Great's conquering Syria; Damascus being at the same time betrayed to him, and all Darius's treasure, which was laid up there, delivered into his hands: as Dr. Prideaux relates the story, out of Arian and Curtius; par. i. book vii. under the third year of Darius Codomannus.

And Damascus shall be the rest thereof.] The words may signify, that Damascus was the chief stay and support of Syria, whose strength they relied upon for their security: or that the judgment here threatened should particularly afflict Damascus: in which sense the verb nuach is used, Isa. xxx. 32. where the text may be literally translated, The staff or stroke which the Lord shall cause to rest upon him. (See likewise xxv. 10. of the same prophecy.)

When the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be towards the Lord.] The words may be translated, When the eyes of man, even of all the tribes of Israel, &c. When the Jews saw the conqueror approach, it was proper for them to look up to God, and to implore his protection; which Jaddua the high-priest did, when Alexander besieged Tyre; and was directed by a vision to meet the conqueror in his pontifical robes, who received him very graciously; as the story is told with very remarkable circumstances by Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8. Some translate the sentence, For the eyes of the Lord are upon man, as well as upon all the tribes of Israel; i. e. God will punish the heathen nations for their sins, as well as his own people.

Ver. 2. And Hamath also shall border thereby.] The sense would be plainer thus, And against Hamath also, which borders thereby; importing, that Hamath shall not escape the conqueror's forces. There were two Hamaths: here is probably meant that Hamath which was the northern border of Judea, and is spoken of in the text as a bordering city. (See the note upon Amos vi. 2. 14.)

Tyrus, and Zidon, though it be very wise.] Or, Against Tyre and Zidon, &c. They both shall be involved in the same calamity, although the Zidonians value themselves as the first inventors of letters and sciences, and are famous for their skill in navigation.

Ver. 3. And Tyrus did build herself a strong hold.] After the demolishing of Old Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, foretold by Isaiah, xxiii. and Ezekiel, xxvi.—xxviii. New Tyre was built in an island at the distance of half a mile from the shore; so its situation was very strong, and it was fortified with a wall round it a hundred and fifty feet high. (See Dr. Prideaux, in the forecited place.)

And heaped up silver as the dust, &c.] By her merchandise she had gained immense riches. (Ezek. xxviii. 4, 5.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 4. Behold, the Lord will cast her out, and will smite her power in the sea; and she shall be devoured with fire.] The Lord will dispossess her inhabitants, and the Carthaginians shall not be able to assist her with their naval forces; but the conquerors shall subdue her fortifications, though she be surrounded with the sea; and lay her stately buildings in ashes. (See Dr. Prideaux, under the fourth year of Darius.)

Ver. 5. Ashkelon shall see it, and fear, &c.] The cities of the Philistines, Ashkelon, Gaza, and Ekron, shall be very much terrified at the news of Tyre's being destroyed, from whence they hope for succours against the enemy.

For the king shall perish from Gaza.] That city was taken by Alexander after a two months' siege: ten thousand of the inhabitants slain, and the governor Betis dragged round the city till he was dead. King is a general word for any governor, in Hebrew, as hath been before observed. Strabo, speaking of Gaza, (lib. xvi.) saith, "It was formerly a city of note, but was destroyed by Alexander the Great, and remained desert or uninhabited." And so it is called, Acts viii. 26. and is to be distinguished from Gaza the sea-port, otherwise called Majuma; the old Gaza being a mile from the sea. (See St. Jerome de Locis Hebr.)

Ver. 6. And a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod.] By a bastard, the LXX. and most interpreters understand foreigners, such as were not the native inhabitants of the place; and they understood it either of Alexander's conquests in those parts of Palestine where the natives were destroyed, or expelled out of their habitations, and strangers placed in their room; or else of the exploits of Judas Maccabeus against the Philistines, (1 Macc. v. 68.) and of Jonathan, who set fire to Azotus, and burnt and destroyed eight thousand men there, (ibid. x. 84, 85.) To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase understands the text, and renders it, The family of Israel shall dwell in Ashdod, who before were in it as strangers. A collection or succession of persons is sometimes expressed in the singular number. (See the note upon xi. 16.)

Ver. 7. And I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth.] He shall be brought down so low that he shall not be in a condition to oppose his neighbours, as he did formerly; but they shall be delivered from his cruelty, just as the prey is taken out of the mouth of a wild beast, when he is just about to devour it.

But he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God.] Many of the Philistines became proselytes to the Jewish religion, after Alexander Janneus had subdued their principal cities, and made them part of his own dominions. (See Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23.)

And he shall be as a governor in Judah, and Ekron as a Jebusite.] They shall be equally capable of places of honour and trust with the Jews themselves, who shall look upon the Philistines as their fellow-citizens, just as the Israelites treated the Jebusites, the ancient inhabitants of Jerusalem. (See Judg. i. 21.)

Ver. 8. And I will encamp about my house, because of him that passeth by, and because of him that returneth.] Compare vii. 14. During these military commotions the angels, who are God's host, shall be a guard to the temple at Jerusalem, (see ii. 5.) and I will turn the heart of Alexander that he shall shew favours towards the Jews, when he intended to humble them, and shall offer sacrifice to me in my temple. See this remarkable passage related at large out of Josephus by Dr. Prideaux, Script. Connex. under the fourth year of Darius Codomannus.

And no oppressor shall pass through them any more.] Or, Any longer; so the word should be rendered, Isa. li. 22. Nahum i. 12. (See Noldius, p. 682.) None of those that now threaten to invade or oppress them, shall prosper in their attempts against them. (See more in the note upon x. 4.)

For now I have seen it with mine eyes.] I am not regardless of them, but look upon their condition with an eye of pity and compassion. (Compare xii. 4. Exod. ii. 25. 2 Sam. xvi. 12.)

Ver. 9. Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem.] From the promise contained in the foregoing verse, of God's protecting his church and temple, the prophet, in a sudden transport, takes occasion to break forth into a joyful representation of the coming of the Messias.

Behold, thy King cometh unto thee.] He that is so often described in the prophets as the King of Israel, (see Psal. ii. 7. Jer. xxiii. 5.) was known by that name among the Jews in our Saviour's time, (see John i. 49.) and called elsewhere by the name of David their king, (Jer. xxx. 9. Hos. iii. 5.) He will certainly come in God's appointed time. (Compare Isa. lxii. 11.)

He is just, and having salvation.] Or, He is righteous, and the Saviour: He is that righteous Branch, and the Lord our righteousness, who shall execute judgment and justice in the earth; as he is described by Jeremiah, xxiii. 5. and the righteousness and salvation, i. e. the righteous one and Saviour, promised Isa. lxii. 1. The word noshang, having salvation, though it be a participle passive, is rendered a Saviour in all the ancient versions; several instances of the same kind may be seen in Pool's Synopsis.

Lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass.] Or, Even upon a colt, &c. the copulative particle being sometimes used by way of explanation: (see the note upon Isa. li. 19. and Noldius's Concordance, p. 281.) for it appears by the evangelists, that our Lord rode upon a young ass, or a colt, whereon never man sat; (John xii. 14. Luke xix. 30.) wherein he shewed his lowliness, not affecting the pomp of the world, but coming with the same primitive simplicity as the patriarchs and judges used of old. (See Gen. xxii. 3. Judg. v. 10. x. 4.) When horses grew common among the Jews by their traffic with Egypt, (see 2 Kings x. 28. Isa. xxxi. 1, 2.) then riding upon asses was thought below the dignity of great persons. A learned prelate I have often had occasion to mention, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 105. hath fully proved, that the ancient Jews explained this prophecy of the Messias: and it is plain from the Gospels, that the Jews in Christ's time understood it so. For when our Lord applied this prophecy to himself, by entering into Jerusalem upon an ass, it so affected the multitude, that they spread their garments and palm-branches in the way, as at the reception of some great prince; (Matt. xxi. 8, 9.) nay, his disciples took occasion from this sight to rejoice and to praise God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works they had seen, concluding that now the kingdom of David, in the person of the Messias, would immediately appear, Mark xi. 10. Luke xix. 37, 38.

Ver. 10. And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and the battle-bow shall be cut off: and he shall speak peace unto the heathen.] Peace is mentioned as the distinguishing character of Christ's church or kingdom: (see the note upon Isa. ii. 4.) here it is joined with freedom from annoyance both from foreign and domestic enemies, as it is elsewhere, (see Hos. ii. 18. Micah v. 5. 10. Hag. ii. 22.) These prophecies, as they foretell the outward peacefulness of Christ's church or kingdom, relate to the flourishing state of it, in the latter times of the world. (See the notes upon those texts.) Ephraim, or the ten tribes, is mentioned as distinct from Jerusalem, or the tribe of Judah. (Compare ver. 13. and x. 6, 7. and see the note upon viii. 13.)

And his dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river even unto the ends of the earth.] The words are taken from Psal. lxxii. 8. where David describes the extent of Solomon's kingdom, that it should extend from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, and from the river Euphrates to the border of Egypt. (Compare Exod. xxiii. 31. Deut. ix. 24. 1 Kings iv. 21.) This was a figurative description of Christ's kingdom, as may be proved from several expressions in that Psalm; which should be enlarged towards the four quarters of the world.

Ver. 11. As for thee also.] The prophet speaking in the name of God, directs his discourse either to the church of the faithful, which sense best agrees with the present Hebrew copies; where the pronoun and the affixes are in the feminine gender; or, if we suppose an enallage of the gender, it may be understood of Christ. Both the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin read, Thou by the blood of thy covenant hast sent forth thy prisoners.

By the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water.] The words import the deliverance of mankind from the bondage of sin and Satan, by virtue of the covenant sealed with the blood of Christ. (Compare Heb. xiii. 20.) The condition of men enslaved by sin and ignorance, is often compared to that of prisoners confined in chains and darkness, (see Isa. xlii. 7. lxi. 1.) By the pit is meant the lowest part of the prison, called the dungeon: (compare Isa. li. 14.) and so the Hebrew word bôr is translated Jer. xxxvii. 16. xxxviii. 6. Lam. iii. 53. 55. and having no water, is a description of such a dungeon as that into which Jeremiah was thrown.

Ver. 12. Turn ye to the strong hold, ye prisoners of hope.] Ye that are under any bondage or oppression do not despair, (see Isa. xlix. 9.) but rely upon God's promises for deliverance; apply yourselves to him who is a strong tower of defence in time of trouble.

Even to-day do I declare, that I will render double unto thee.] I now declare, as I have formerly done by Isaiah, lxi. 7. that I will make you abundant amends for all the evils ye have suffered. The words allude to God's blessing Job after his affliction, when he gave him double to what he had before, (Job xlii. 10.)

Ver. 13. When I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim.] When I have made Judah my bow, and Ephraim my arrow; used them as my instruments of war. In the Hebrew phrase the bow is said to be filled with the arrow, when the arrow is fitted to it: see 2 Kings ix. 24. where the Hebrew reads, Jehu filled his hand with a bow, i. e. by a usual hypallage, filled a bow with his hand: where the English expresses the sense, He drew a bow with his full strength. Judah and Ephraim, are equivalent to Judah and Israel. (See the note upon viii. 13.) The men of Ephraim were expert archers, (see Psal. lxxviii. 9.) to which the expression here may probably allude.

And raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece.] Enabled the Jews under the conduct of the Maccabees, to destroy the forces of the Syrian kings, Antiochus Epiphanes and others, who were the successors of Alexander, the founder of the Grecian monarchy. (See Dan. viii. 22. 1 Macc. i. 10.)

And made thee as the sword of a mighty man.] Given success to your arms, that none should be able to withstand thee.

Ver. 14. And the Lord shall be seen over them.] He shall give conspicuous tokens of his presence with them, and his presiding over them, and directing them in all their enterprises.

And his arrow shall go forth as the lightning.] Their force shall be irresistible: the lightning is often called God's arrow. (See Psal. xviii. 14. lxxvii. 18. cxliv. 6.)

And the Lord God shall blow the trumpet.] He shall give the signal of war, and shall encourage his soldiers to the battle.

And shall go with whirlwinds of the south.] Shall discomfit his enemies, as a whirlwind tears in pieces every thing that stands in its way. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 1.)

Ver. 15. And the Lord of hosts shall defend them; and they shall devour, and subdue with sling-stones.] The hand of God shall visibly appear in protecting the Maccabees, and enabling them to conquer their enemies with as unequal a force as that of David was in respect of Goliath, when he subdued him with a sling-stone. (1 Sam. xvii. 50.)

And they shall drink, and make a noise as through wine; and they shall be filled like bowls, and as the corners of the altar.] They shall feast and rejoice for their victories; they shall offer sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, sprinkle the blood upon the horns of the altar, (see Lev. iv. 25.) and fill the bowls with the rest of it, to be poured out at the foot of it. (See xiv. 20. Deut. xii. 27.) Or, their courage shall be increased as when men's spirits are raised with wine, (see Psal. lxviii. 65.) and they shall be filled with the blood of their enemies, as the bowls and corners of the altar are with the blood of the sacrifices.

Ver. 16. For they shall be as the stones of a crown, lifted up as an ensign upon his land.] God shall make it known to the world how precious they are in his sight; (compare Isa. lxii. 3. Mal. iii. 17.) and his favour towards them shall be an encouragement to others to become proselytes to the true religion.

Ver. 17. For how great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty! Corn shall make the young men cheerful, and new wine the maids.] Some begin a new chapter here, and suppose the prophet to return to what he had promised, viii. 12. The words magnify God's goodness and favour towards his people, in bestowing all sorts of plenty upon them: so that a fruitful harvest shall rejoice the hearts of the young men that bring it in, and a plentiful vintage shall make the maids cheerful that gather the grapes. (Compare Isa. xvi. 10. Jer. xlviii. 33.) New wine is put here for the grapes which make it: (compare Jer. xl. 12.) as bread signifies bread-corn, Isa. xxviii. 28. xxx. 23. But the words may be understood to denote that plenty which some of the prophets speak of as a concomitant of the reign of the Messias. (Joel iii. 18. Amos ix. 14.)

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet deters the Jews from seeking to idols, by putting them in mind of the calamities idolatry brought upon their forefathers. Afterward he foretells a general restoration of the Jewish nation.

Ver. 1. ASK of the Lord rain in the time of the latter rain.] The fulfilling of the promise of fruitful seasons, (ix. 17.) depends upon the people's asking them from God; who will hear their petitions, and give them both the former rain, and also the latter, in its season. This usually fell in the first month, (Joel ii. 23.) and was very useful for plumping the corn, and therefore very much desired. (See Job xxix. 23. Prov. xvi. 15.)

So the Lord shall make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain.] Or lightnings, as the margin reads, and as the word is rendered, Job xxviii. 25. Great rains usually accompany thunder and lightning. (See Jer. x. 13.)

Ver. 2. For the idols have spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie, &c.] Whenever you or your fathers consulted idols or diviners, when they wanted rain, (see Jer. xiv. 22.) or in any other time of distress; neither the priests who delivered answers from the idols, nor the diviners who pretended to direct men by the help of dreams or visions, have been any way beneficial to them. The word translated idol is teraphim in the original: concerning the sense of it, see the note upon Hos. iii. 4. The idols are said here to speak vanity; i. e. by the answers the priests gave in their name: for elsewhere they are called dumb idols, (Habak. ii. 18.) which have mouths and speak not, (Psal. cxv. 5.)

Therefore they went away as a flock, &c.] They went into captivity, and came into great distress; as sheep are driven away and scattered, that have no shepherd to guide or protect them. (Compare Jer. l. 17. Ezek. xxxiv. 5.)

Ver. 3. Mine anger was kindled against the shepherds, and I punished the goats.] I was justly displeased with the Jewish rulers, both ecclesiastical and civil, (see the notes upon Isa. lvi. 2. Jer. xxiii. 1. Ezek. xxxiv. 2.) as I had severely threatened them by my prophets, before the captivity, which came upon the whole nation as a judgment for their sins, especially upon those wicked Jews who were their instruments in oppressing the people. (See Ezek. xxxiv. 17.)

An eminent divine understands these three verses of the Jews that remained in Babylon, who either consulted the idols of the gentiles, or else such false prophets among the Jews there, as were addicted to divination, and such-like idolatrous practices. (Compare Jer. xxix. 8. 15. 24.) These all prophesied drought, famine, and such-like calamities to those Jews that should return into Judea; and therefore are called vain comforters: such as Job complained of, xvi. 2. By this means some of the people were detained at Babylon without any form of government among themselves, and were as a flock without a shepherd. Shepherds and goats, mentioned ver. 3. he explains of the great men of the Jews who stayed behind at Babylon: these he distinguishes from those that returned home, who are called God's flock, in the following words.

For [or rather, but] the Lord of hosts hath visited his flock, the house of Judah, &c.] But now God hath given his people manifest tokens of his favour and protection, (see ix. 16.) in prospering their arms under the conduct of Judas Maccabeus, and making them victorious over their enemies. The chief use which the Jews made of horses was in war. (See Prov. xxi. 31. Isa. xxxi. 1, 2.)

Ver. 4. Out of him came forth [or, shall come forth] the corner, out of him the nail, &c.] It is owing to God's favour that they have a captain, or ruler, to support their commonwealth; such was in an eminent manner Judas Maccabeus; that they have a settled state and government, whereon private men may rely for the security of their lives and properties: the word pinnah, translated corner, signifies likewise a prince or a leader; and so it is taken, Numb. xxiv. 17. Judg. xx. 2. 1 Sam. xiv. 38. Isa. xix. 13. The word rendered nail signifies any person on whom others have a dependance, (see Isa. xxii. 23. 25.) as also the public settlement of a state, (Ezra ix. 8.)

Out of him every oppressor together.] As the Greek word tyrant was at first equivalent in signification to a king, but afterward degenerated into a worse denomination: so the Hebrew nogesh usually signifies an oppressor, but is sometimes taken in a general sense for a prince or governor: so it probably signifies, Isa. lx. 17. where our English renders it, Make thine exactors righteousness: but the Chaldee paraphrase expresseth it by shultanim, princes: the LXX. translate it Ἐπισκόπους, overseers; which made some of the fathers apply that text to the bishops of the Christian church. This sense of the word agrees best with the scope of this place, and the Chaldee understands it so here. Thus the word may be understood, ix. 8. so as to signify the commander or general of an army.

Ver. 5. And they shall be as mighty men, which tread down their enemies in the mire of the streets: because the Lord is with them.] God shall inspire them with courage to subdue their enemies, and trample upon their carcasses. (Compare Psal. xviii. 42. Isa. xli. 25.) This may be understood either of the Maccabees, or of the victories which the Jews should obtain over their enemies in the latter times, (see xii. 6.) to which the following part of the chapter seems to relate.

And the riders on horses shall be confounded.] Compare xii. 4. We may expound this of the discomfiture of Antiochus's armies by the Maccabees, whose strength lay chiefly in their horse, (see Dan. xi. 40.) as that text is understood by several commentators.

Ver. 6. And I will strengthen the house of Judah, and I will save the house of Joseph, &c.] This promise is probably to be understood of the general restoration of the Jewish nation upon their conversion; a subject often treated of by the prophets in the Old Testament, where Judah and Israel are spoken of as equal sharers in this blessing. (Compare Ezek. xxxvii. 16, &c. and see the note upon Isa. xi. 11.)

And will hear them.] See xiii. 9.

Ver. 7. And they of Ephraim shall be as a mighty man.] Ephraim is equivalent here to the ten tribes, as the house of Joseph is, ver. 6. (See the note upon Hos. v. 3.)

And their heart shall rejoice as through wine.] Which raises men's spirits and courage. (See ix. 15.)

Yea, their children shall see it, and be glad, &c.] Their successes shall end in a lasting peace, for which their posterity shall have occasion to return thanks to God. (See ver. 9.)

Ver. 8. I will hiss for them, and gather them; for I have redeemed them.] I will summon them from distant countries by a certain signal, as a shepherd calls his flock together with his whistle, (compare Isa. v. 26. vii. 18.) which shall assemble them together, in order to bring them back into their own country, (ver. 10.) for I will redeem them out of the hand of their enemies. The prophets often speak of a thing future, as if it were already accomplished. (See the note upon Isa. xxi. 9.)

And they shall increase as they have increased.] In the most flourishing times, such as were the reigns of David and Solomon.

Ver. 9. And I will sow them among the people.] I will multiply them among the nations, where they are dispersed. (Compare Hos. ii. 23.)

And they shall remember me from afar.] From among all the nations where they are scattered, as the prophets elsewhere express it. (See Deut. xxx. 1. 4. Jer. xxx. 10, 11. Ezek. xi. 16. xxviii. 25. xxxiv. 13.) As men are said to forget God when they forget their duty to him, so remembering him denotes their returning to their obedience.

And they shall live with their children, and turn again.] They shall return to their own country, and enjoy it, they and their posterity. (See Isa. lxv. 23. Ezek. xxviii. 25. Amos ix. 14.)

Ver. 10. And I will bring them again also out of Egypt, and gather them out of Assyria.] Egypt and Assyria were two potent kingdoms which bordered upon Judea, so that by turns they were either allies to the Jews, or their conquerors; and the Jews either went thither for refuge, or were carried thither captives; (see Hos. ix. 3.) whereupon the prophets, when they foretell the general restoration of their nation, often express it by their returning from Egypt and Assyria. (See Isa. xi. 15, 16. xix. 23—25. xxviii. 13. Hos. xi. 11.) We may likewise observe, that God's bringing his people again from Egypt, was a proverbial expression, to signify any deliverance, as great or greater than that. (See Psal. lxviii. 22. Micah vii. 15.) So here the words of the following verse allude to the Israelites passing through the Red Sea.

I will bring them into the land of Gilead and Lebanon.] Two countries remarkable for their fruitfulness. (See Jer. xxii. 6. Micah vii. 14.)

And place shall not be found for them.] They shall multiply so fast, that there shall not be room enough in Judea to receive them and their families. (Compare Isa. xlix. 20.)

Ver. 11. And he shall pass through the sea with affliction, and shall smite the waves of the sea, and all the deeps of the rivers shall be dried up.] The sense might be more properly expressed thus, And he (Israel) shall pass through the straits of the sea; so the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin understand it, meaning a branch of the Red Sea; and (God) shall smite the waves of the sea, &c. The expressions allude to the miraculous passage of the Israelites over an arm of the Red Sea, when God dried up the waters of that sea, or river, before them. (See Exod. xiv. 21. Josh. ii. 10.) And this imports, that God would do as great things for them as he did formerly for their fathers: to this sense the Chaldee expounds the words. (See the note upon the foregoing verse, and compare Isa. xi. 15.) If we would distinguish betwixt the sea and the rivers, we may understand the river of Jordan, whose waters were dried up to make a passage for the Israelites into the land of promise. (See Josh. iv. 23.)

And the pride of Assyria shall be brought down, and the sceptre of Egypt shall depart away.] By Assyria and Egypt are meant in general the enemies of God and of his truth, who shall all be subdued, and broken in pieces by the kingdom of Christ, when he shall come in glory to set up his kingdom on the earth. (See Dan. ii. 33, 34. Isa. lx. 12.) The Assyrian is taken in this sense, Isa. xiv. 25. Micah v. 5. and both Egypt and Assyria may probably be so understood, Isa. xix. 23. (See the notes upon those texts.)

Ver. 12. I will strengthen them in the Lord.] God shall be their strength and protection. (See ver. 5.)

And they shall walk up and down in his name.] Or, Walk in his name; i. e. their lives and actions shall be under the conduct of his laws, and he shall give them success answerable to their upright intentions.

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet, representing the person of the Messias, declares the ungrateful requitals the Jews had made him, when he undertook the office of a shepherd, in guiding and governing them; how they rejected him, and valued him and his labours at the mean price of thirty pieces of silver. Hereupon he threatens to destroy their city and temple, and to give them up into the hands of such governors, as should have no regard either for their spiritual or temporal welfare.

Ver. 1. OPEN thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars.] By Lebanon most interpreters understand the temple, whose stately buildings resemble the tall cedars of that forest. Thus the word is commonly understood, Habak. ii. 17. There is a remarkable story mentioned in the Jewish writers to this purpose: "Some time before the destruction of the temple, the doors of it opened of their own accord; a circumstance attested by Josephus, (Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 12.) Then R. Johanan, a disciple of R. Hillel, directing his speech to the temple, said, I know thy destruction is at hand, according to the prophecy of Zechariah; open thy doors, O Lebanon," &c.

The words may likewise denote the destruction of Jerusalem, elsewhere called by the name of a forest; her lofty buildings resembling the stately ranks of trees in a forest. (Compare Jer. xxi. 14. xxii. 7. 23. Ezek. xx. 46.)

Ver. 2. Howl, fir-tree; for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty are spoiled.] By the several sorts of trees are meant the several orders and degrees of men, who shall be sharers in the common destruction. (See Isa. ii. 13. x. 33, 34. and the notes there.)

Howl, ye oaks of Bashan; for the forest of the vintage is cut down.] Or, The defenced forest, as it is in the margin, according to a different reading of the Hebrew text, which gives a proper representation of Jerusalem, with the fortifications about it. If we follow the reading of the English text, the forest of the vintage may probably mean Carmel; (see the note upon Isa. xxxvii. 24.) which being placed in the north-west parts of Judea, and joined here with Bashan that lay south-east, may denote that the calamity shall be general. Bashan was famous for its stately oaks. (See Isa. ii. 13.)

Ver. 3. There is a voice of the howling of the shepherds.] By shepherds are meant the chief rulers of the Jews. (See the note upon x. 3.)

A voice of the roaring of young lions.] So he calls the princes and governors of the Jews, because they devoured the people by their oppressions. (See Zeph. iii. 3.) So Achilles calls Agamemnon Δημόβορος Βασιλεὺς, a blood-sucking king. (Iliad. i.)

For the pride of Jordan is spoiled.] The lion may be called the pride of the forest, as being the stateliest beast that rules there; as beasts that prey upon others are called the children of pride, Job xli. 34. Lions are styled here the pride of Jordan, because they lay in the thickets about the banks of Jordan. The words may be rendered, the swelling of Jordan, as they are translated, Jer. xlix. 19. At the time of the swelling, or overflowing of Jordan, the lions were raised out of their coverts, and infested the country. (See the note upon that text.)

Ver. 4. Thus saith the Lord my God, Feed the flock of the slaughter.] A learned prelate, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, (chap. iii. 1.) observes, that the actions of the prophets are sometimes typical; i. e. they represent in themselves the persons and circumstances of others. (See the note upon iii. 8.) So here Zechariah was commanded by God to act the part of Christ, the good Shepherd, and to feed the flock of the slaughter, that flock which their shepherds destroyed, instead of feeding them.

Ver. 5. Whose possessors slay them, and hold themselves not guilty: and they that sell them say, &c.] Whose rulers deal with their flock as so many butchers; and think they have a right to slay or sell them, and thank God that they have a good market: or believe that they may lawfully make merchandise of their souls for their own lucre and advantage. (Compare 2 Pet. ii. 3. Rev. xviii. 13.)

Ver. 6. For I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land, &c.] Nor shall their condition at all grow better, saith God, for I will shew no more pity for the main body of the people than their rulers do. The inhabitants of the land are to be distinguished from the poor of the flock in the following verse. As to the former, God declares by his prophet, that he will leave some of them to perish by their mutual and intestine divisions, (see ver. 9.) as many of the Jews did when the Roman army invaded Judea. Others of them he would deliver into the hands of Vespasian, whose predecessor the Jews had owned for their king, at the same time when they disclaimed their Messias, and disowned his right to reign over them, (John xix. 15.) and his army shall smite the land with utter destruction. (Compare Mal. iv. 6.)

Ver. 7. And [or, but] I will feed the flock of the slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock.] Or, Even, or especially, the poor of the flock. Zechariah, representing the person of Christ the true Shepherd, saith, he entered upon his office, and undertook the care of the slaughtered flock, chiefly out of a regard to the meek and humble among them; for to such are the benefits of the gospel peculiarly promised. (See Isa. xi. 4. lxi. 1. Zeph. iii. 12. and the notes upon those texts.)

And I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands.] A staff or crook is the proper ensign of a shepherd: the shepherds of old time had two rods or staves; one turned round at top, that it might not hurt the sheep; this was for counting them, and separating the sound from the diseased: (see Lev. xxvii. 32.) the other had an iron hook at the end of it, to pull in the stray sheep, and hold them fast while the shepherd corrected them: the Psalmist mentions both these, Psal. xxiii. 4. Thy rod and thy staff comfort me.

The first staff he called Beauty, or delight, as the word Naom may be rendered, i. e. his favour, gentleness, or kindness, towards his people: so the word signifies, Psal. xc. 17. and this was remarkably verified in our Saviour Christ, whose gracious words and beneficial works were conspicuous through the whole course of his life. The other staff he called Bands, by which is meant that bond of the new covenant, (as the words of Ezekiel may be understood, xx. 37.) whereby he intended to unite both the kingdoms of Israel and Judah under himself as their head and king; (see Ezek. xxxvii. 22.) and then afterward to unite the Jews and gentiles into one church, by breaking down the partition-wall that was between them. (See John x. 16. Ephes. ii. 14.)

Ver. 8. Three shepherds also I cut off in one month.] We may probably explain these three shepherds of the chief priests, scribes, and elders of the Jews. Christ exposed these as blind guides, and thereby lessened their authority among the people; which contributed very much to the spreading of the gospel: (see John xii. 19.) one month seems a proverbial expression for a short time. (See Hos. v. 7.)

And my soul loathed them, and they also abhorred me.] Or, My soul was straitened towards them, as the Hebrew may be literally translated; i. e. I was straitened in my affections to them: so the Greek word στενοχωρεῖσθαι, to be straitened, is used, 2 Cor. vi. 12. which exactly answers the Hebrew katsar. I was less tender towards them, than towards the poor of the flock, because they shewed themselves averse to my person and doctrine. The Hebrew word bachala, abhorred, is never met with but here: Maimonides supposes that it alludes to Chebel, or Chobelim, Bands, ver. 7. the two words differing only by a transposition of letters. (More Nevoch. lib. ii. cap. 43.) Such allusions are frequent in Scripture. (See the notes upon Isa. xxiv. 17. Jer. i. 11, 12.)

Ver. 9. Then said I, I will not feed you: that that dieth, let it die, &c.] I found in a little time that my labour did not meet with a suitable return, a great part of my sheep proving untractable: so I resolved to be their shepherd no longer, but leave them to be consumed by the common calamities of death, famine, &c. or to be cut off by their enemies, the Romans, just as the lesser cattle are pushed and gored by the greater; (see Ezek. xxxiv. 21.) and those that escape those calamities shall destroy one another by their civil discords. (See ver. 6. and compare Isa. ix. 21. xlix. 20.) The word translated cut off, signifies likewise being consumed, or ready to perish. (See ver. 16.)

Ver. 10. So I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break the covenant which I had made with all my people.] Thus the covenant which I had made with the whole nation of the Jews was broken, and I excluded them from having any benefit in the second covenant, that of the gospel: they were to be my people no longer. (See Dan. ix. 26. Hos. i. 9. and the note upon xiii. 9. of this prophecy.)

Ver. 11. And it was broken in that day: so the poor of the flock that waited upon me knew that it was the word of the Lord.] Or, And in that day it was broken: the poor of the flock, &c. The few believing Jews that attended upon my preaching, (ver. 7.) were convinced that this was God's doing, and the fulfilling those judgments which he had threatened by his prophets.

Ver. 12. And I said unto them,] Or, I had said unto them; i. e. before I broke my staff, called Beauty, or delight, ver. 10.

If ye think good, give me my price [or, my hire]; and if not, forbear.] Christ still persists to act the character of a shepherd, and, in an humble manner, demands of the Jews what price they put upon his labour. He was resolved to use no constraint, but leave it to themselves to continue or discharge him. In the same style our Lord himself speaks, (John xii. 47.) If any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not.

So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver.] To shew how little they cared for me or my service, they valued it but at thirty shekels of silver, the price of the meanest slave. (See Exod. xxi. 32.)

Ver. 13. And the Lord said unto me, Cast it unto the potter: a goodly price that I was prized at of them!] God commanded the prophet in a vision, as personating Christ, to cast the money in a contemptuous manner to the potter, as a reward only suitable to his labour, and a price only fit for such wares as he sold, which were of the meanest value. (See Lam. iv. 2.)

And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them to [or, for] the potter in the house of the Lord.] I cast them back into the treasury in the temple, where afterward they were laid out for the use of the potter. This whole transaction performed by Zechariah in a vision, was designed to be an exact representation of the several circumstances that attended the betraying the Messiah by Judas, the price the chief priests put upon him (to whom as the governors of the temple the money was returned), and the use to which the money was applied. (See Matt. xxvii. 6. 10.) This whole prophetic scene is represented in the single person of Zechariah, just as Ezekiel sustains the type or figure both of the Chaldean army that should besiege Jerusalem, and of the Jews themselves that were besieged. (Ezek. iv. 1. 12.)

This is one of those prophecies, whose literal sense is fulfilled in our blessed Saviour, and cannot be applied to any other person, but in a very remote or improper sense. The like instances may be seen in Psal. xxii. 16. 18. lxix. 21. Hos. xi. 1. The Jews themselves have expounded this prophecy of the Messiah. Christoph. Helvicus, in his Elenchus Judæorum, quotes Bereshith Rabbi on Gen. xlix. as bringing in the Messiah speaking the very words of the twelfth verse here, in his own person. And Dr. Alix, against the Unitarians, p. 336. cites Rabbi Menahem, applying the selling the just for silver, mentioned here and Amos ii. 6. of the selling the Schechinah, by which they understood the Messias, whom they often speak of as being the true God. (See the same author, p. 286.)

Ver. 14. Then I cut asunder my other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel.] As they refused to be united under me their head, so in breaking my other staff, I foreshewed the destruction of Jerusalem, the bond and cement of all their tribes, being the seat and centre both of their civil power and of the Divine worship. (See Psal. cxxxii. 3—5.) The consequence of that was the entire dissolution of the nation, and the dispersion and confusion of all their tribes, whose families could no longer be distinguished after the loss of their genealogies.

Ver. 15. And the Lord said unto me, Take thee yet [or, once more] the instruments of a foolish shepherd.] As Zechariah in the foregoing vision had acted the part of the true Shepherd, so here he is commanded to take upon him the character and furniture of a foolish or unprofitable shepherd. (See ver. 17.) Folly in Scripture is equivalent to wickedness; so it may mean not only unskilful, but likewise ill-designing governors, who should only intend their own advantage, and have no regard for the good of the flock, or people, committed to their charge. The instruments of such a shepherd must be suitable to his own indiscretion; viz. a scrip with holes, and a stick or crook made to push and hurt the flock, not to protect or defend them.

Ver. 16. For, lo, I will raise up a shepherd in the land.] A shepherd in the singular number denotes a succession of such governors as are described in the following words: so the succession of priests is represented under the single person of Levi, Mal. ii. 5, 6. Since the Jews had rejected the true Shepherd, God threatens to send, or permit, such shepherds to rule over them, as should be notorious for their negligence and avarice, their cruelty and oppression. This may be understood either of the blind guides, who conducted their consciences with avarice and tyranny, or of the false Christs and false prophets, who often misled them to their ruin [or it may be meant of the miseries which they suffered under Hadrian, and other Roman emperors, as St. Jerome interprets it]; or else it may be expounded of the latter times of the Roman empire, during its administration under the ten horns, (Rev. xvii. 12.) by whom they have been at divers times plundered, persecuted, and destroyed, without mercy; as may be seen particularly in Basnage's History of the Jews, book vii.

Who shall not visit that which is cut off.] The LXX. render it, that which is missing; and it may signify, that which is ready to perish. (See ver. 9.)

Nor seek the young one.] Or, That which is scattered, or wandering. So all the ancient interpreters render it, reading noar in the Hebrew, where the word is now pointed naar.

Nor feed that which standeth still.] Which continues in the flock sound and well, in opposition to those that wander, or are diseased. The words may be translated, Nor number that which standeth still. It is the business of a careful shepherd to number his flock, and see that none be wanting.

But he shall eat the flesh of the fat, and tear [or, break] their claws in pieces.] i. e. He shall enrich himself by oppressing those that are of substance, and deprive them of all ability of defending themselves. (Compare Ezek. xxxiv. 3.)

Ver. 17. Woe to the idol shepherd that leaveth the flock.] Who taketh no care of the flock, and minds nothing but making his own profit out of them. Such a shepherd is no better than an idol, that is profitable for nothing, (Isa. xliv. 10.) and hath only the outward form and appearance of a shepherd. The sentence may be rendered, Woe to the shepherd of no value; so the word elil is translated, Job xiii. 4.

The sword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye; &c.] As he has abused his power and his understanding, signified by his arm and his right eye, God shall in his just judgment deprive him of the use of both those faculties. A sword is put for any instrument of the Divine vengeance: so it is used, xiii. 7. Jer. l. 35—37. Amos ix. 10. and in other places.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.

The former part of this chapter and several passages in the fourteenth, relate to an invasion made upon the inhabitants of Judea and Jerusalem, in the latter times of the world, probably after their return to, and settlement in, their own land, which is often spoken of by the prophets. It is probably the same attempt that is more largely described in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Mr. Mede and several other learned men are inclined to understand that prophecy of the Turks and their confederates. See the Argument to those chapters, and particularly xxxviii. 8. 12. where the expressions seem to point out the time when that and the parallel prophecies are to be fulfilled.

Ver. 1. THE burden of the word of the Lord for Israel.] Or, Towards Israel. The Hebrew word massa is often translated a burden; i. e. a burdensome prophecy: (see ix. 1.) but it likewise signifies a prophecy in general, as it does particularly in this place, also Lam. ii. 14. and Mal. i. 1. and is sometimes interpreted vision, in the Chaldee paraphrase.

Who stretcheth forth the heavens, &c.] These are mentioned as undeniable instances of God's power, and are made use of as arguments to encourage men to rely on his word for fulfilling such promises, which seem to human understanding most unlikely to be brought to pass. (Compare Isa. xlii. 5. xliv. 24. xlv. 18. xlviii. 13.)

And formeth the spirit of man within him.] He that creates the soul, and unites it to the body. (See Numb. xvi. 22. Eccles. xii. 7. Isa. lvii. 16. Heb. xii. 9.)

Ver. 2. Behold, I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling unto all the people round about.] The nations that besiege Jerusalem shall be in the same condition with those that are overcome with poisonous or intoxicating liquors, and thereby bereaved of their strength and understanding. (See ver. 4. and compare Isa. li. 17. 22.)

When [or, even although] they shall be in the siege both against Judah and against Jerusalem.] Even although they be so numerous as to invade Judah and besiege Jerusalem at the same time. By comparing this place with xiv. 14. we may conjecture, that some of the Jews shall return before the rest, and possess themselves of Jerusalem; they shall no sooner be seated there, but all the Mahometan nations shall confederate against them; then the other Jews shall fly home like doves to their windows, or nests, (Isa. lx. 8.) where they shall all be attacked by multitudes of Turkish forces and their confederates.

Ver. 3. And in that day.] The same expression is repeated, ver. 4. 6. 9. 11. and xiii. 1, 2. 4. xiv. 6. 8. 20. The phrase signifies, in the prophets, an extraordinary season, remarkable for some signal events of Providence. (See the note upon Isa. iv. 2.) This prophecy may probably be understood of the invasions which the enemies of God and his truth shall attempt against the Jews after their conversion. (Compare xiv. 1—3. 13, 14. Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. Micah v. 8, &c.)

Will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people.] St. Jerome upon the place thinks that a burdensome stone is an expression taken from an exercise kept up in Judea to his time, where young men used to make trial of their strength by lifting great stones as high as they could. In such an exercise, where men undertook to lift a stone too heavy for their strength, they were in danger of its falling upon them, and bruising or crushing them to pieces. To the same sense Christ saith, On whomsoever this stone shall fall, it will grind him to powder, (Matt. xxi. 44.) The same danger shall they incur, who enter into acts of hostility with the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

All they that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces.] All that undertake to contend with it, shall have their flesh torn and bruised like men that let a heavy stone fall upon them.

Ver. 4. In that day I will smite every horse with astonishment, and his rider with madness, &c.] The Turks are famous for their cavalry, wherein the strength of their armies consists; so, in order to their discomfiture, God will send a distraction among the horses and their riders, who shall be put into such a confusion as to fall foul one upon another, (see xiv. 13.) and not be able to distinguish between their friends and their foes; they shall be as if they were struck with blindness, just as the Syrian army was when they surrounded the door of Elisha, (2 Kings vi. 18.)

And I will open mine eyes upon the house of Judah.] I will have an especial concern for their preservation. (Compare ix. 18.)

Ver. 5. The governors of Judah shall say in their hearts, The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be my strength, &c.] The marginal reading is to be preferred, There is strength to me and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem in the Lord of hosts our God. God doth visibly interpose for our deliverance, and thereby encourage us to rely on his protection.

Ver. 6. In that day will I make the governors of Judah like a hearth of fire among the wood, &c.] They shall devour all their enemies that annoy them. (See ver. 9. Obad. ver. 18. and the note upon that place.)

And they shall devour all the people round about them, to the right hand and to the left.] i. e. Southward and northward. (See the note upon Ezek. xvi. 46. so Isa. ix. 20.) The right hand and the left, is explained in the Targum by the south and the north.

And Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place.] See xiv. 10.

Ver. 7. The Lord also shall save the tents of Judah first.] This shall be the order whereby this victory shall be accomplished; the Lord shall first give success to the body of the Jewish nation that encamp in the open country, that the valour of the house of David, and of the people that defend Jerusalem from within, may not eclipse the courage of the people without the walls, and puff up one party against the other. The inhabitants of Jerusalem used to value themselves above their brethren, because their city was the place of God's residence, and the seat of the royal family; to take away all occasion of such an emulation, God will first appear in behalf of those Jews that live in the open country.

Ver. 8. In that day shall the Lord defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and he that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David.] He shall inspire those within the city with unusual courage, so that the feeblest among them shall do as great exploits as David did of old.

And the house of David shall be as God, as the angel of the Lord before them.] Or, At the head of them. The Messias, who is the principal branch of the house of David, shall lead them on, as he formerly went before the Israelites in the wilderness, and conducted them to the land of Canaan, by the name of the angel of God's presence. (See Exod. xxiii. 20, &c. Isa. lxiii. 9. and the note there.)

Ver. 9. And it shall come to pass, that I will seek to destroy all the nations, &c.] See ver. 3. 6.

Ver. 10. And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications, &c.] I will bestow a plentiful share of grace upon the descendants of David's family, and the rest of the Jews, whereby they shall be brought to a deep humiliation for their own sins, and a true compunction of heart for the great sin of their forefathers in crucifying me their Lord and Saviour. The conversion of the Jews is compared by St. Paul to life from the dead, Rom. xi. 15. and therefore must be effected by an extraordinary and uncommon degree of grace, which shall then be given them (see Isa. liv. 13. Ezek. xxxix. 29. Joel ii. 28. and the notes upon those places): such an efficacious call as may bring them to a due sense of their own and their fathers' sins, and a hearty lamentation for them. (See Jer. xxxi. 9. l. 4. Ezek. xvi. 61. 63. xx. 43. xxxvi. 31. and the notes there.)

And they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn over him as one that mourneth for his only son.] The words point out the outward means whereby their conversion shall be wrought; viz. that the Lord, i. e. the Messias, shall come: (xiv. 5.) i. e. Christ shall appear in the heavens, sitting on a bright cloud, as his coming is described, Rev. xiv. 14. (Compare i. 7. Dan. vii. 13.) This is probably meant by the sign of the Son of man in heaven, mentioned Matt. xxiv. 30. compared with Mark xiii. 26. This sight shall strike them with horror and astonishment for their sin in rejecting me their God, whom their fathers put to an ignominious death, and themselves have by their blasphemies crucified afresh. Then they shall beg pardon for their own and their fathers' sins, with the deepest signs of mourning and humiliation, expressed by a proverbial speech, as equal to the mourning of a father for an only son. (Compare Jer. vi. 26. Amos viii. 10.)

The Jews themselves have applied this text to the Messias, as may be seen in Grotius's notes upon the place, and Bishop Pearson's Exposition of the fourth article of the Creed. David did before describe his sufferings under the figure of piercing his hands and his feet, Psal. xxii. 16. and Isaiah foretold he should be wounded for our transgressions, liii. 5. This text is at large explained and vindicated in the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 107.

Ver. 11. In that day there shall be a great mourning in Jerusalem, like the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.] Josiah was slain at, or near Megiddo; (2 Kings xxiii. 29.) it may be the field where the battle was fought might be called Hadadrimmon. St. Jerome saith, it was a place near Jezreel, called in his time Maximianopolis. The valley or plain of Jezreel was a large plain, (see Josh. xvii. 16.) called the plain of Esdraelon, Judith i. 8. it comprehended the valley of Megiddo in it. There the lamentation for Josiah began, which was continued from thence to Jerusalem, whither his body was brought to be buried, where all Judah mourned for him, and appointed an anniversary commemoration and lamentation for him. (2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25.) So the mourning for Josiah became a proverb for a public and solemn lamentation. Such a national humiliation shall the Jews observe for their crucifying the Messias.

Ver. 12. And the land shall mourn, every family apart.] The whole land shall mourn in a most solemn manner; and every family shall sequester themselves from business and conversation for that purpose. (Compare vii. 3.)

The house of David apart, and their wives apart.] Those of the royal family who have rejected Christ shall lead the way. Even husbands and wives shall abstain from each other's company, as is usual in times of solemn humiliation: (see Joel ii. 16.) or, as a very learned person suggests, in solemn processions it was usual for the several orders of men to go distinctly, and likewise for the women to go in ranks by themselves; this was in all likelihood used in funeral mournings, where each tribe or order of men and women used a distinct form of lamentation. For example, the tribe of Judah lamented, Ah, my brother! the rest of the tribes answered, Ah, Lord! (see Jer. xxii. 18.) This probably was done in the mourning for Josiah, (see 1 Esdras i. 32.) and observed in the times after the return from captivity, (see 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. compared with xxxvi. 22.) to which ceremony the expressions of the text allude.

The family of the house of Nathan.] David had a son named Nathan, (2 Sam. v. 14. Luke iii. 31.) This branch of the royal family seems here meant.

Ver. 13. The family of Shimei apart.] Some suppose that this family was noted for breeding up persons eminent in the knowledge of the law; such was Sameas, a noted rabbi, who lived in our Saviour's time, as St. Jerome informs us in his commentary on Isa. viii. The LXX. read the house of Simeon; which tribe was intermixed with that of Judah. (Josh. xix. 9.)

Ver. 14. All the families that remain apart.] The prophet having mentioned the tribes and families of chiefest note in his time, comprises the rest under this general expression.

CHAP. XIII.

ARGUMENT.

A general promise of pardon proclaimed to the Jews upon their conversion, and particularly of their being cleansed from idolatry, and the false pretences to prophecy, upon their belief in Christ; whose death is foretold, and the saving of a third part of that people, after a severe trial.

Ver. 1. IN that day shall a fountain be opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness.] The house of David, with the other inhabitants of Jerusalem, upon their solemn humiliation, described xii. 13, 14. and believing in him whom they had crucified and rejected, shall obtain a full and free pardon of all their sins, being admitted into the church of Christ by baptism. (See Acts ii. 38, 39. xiii. 38, 39.) The word fountain properly expresses the Christian baptism, which was often administered in fountains and rivers; and likewise alludes to the Jewish washings, which were usually performed in running waters, and were prescribed for the expiation of legal pollutions, expressed here by the word niddah, which properly signifies separation from the company of others; a censure inflicted by the law upon unclean persons. Kimchi understands it of the captivity or destruction of the Jews, inflicted upon them for their sins, which sequestered them from their own land, and made them unfit to attend upon God's worship; as unclean persons were excluded from the precincts of the temple. (Compare Ezek. xxxvi. 17.)

Ver. 2. I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land, and they shall be no more remembered.] The Jews were forbidden to mention the names of the heathen idols, if they could avoid it: (see Exod. xxiii. 13. Josh. xxiii. 7. Psal. xvi. 4.) so when idolatry should be utterly extirpated, the names of idols should be buried in oblivion. In the popish countries many of the Jews comply with the idolatry there practised, as some of their own writers confess. (See the note upon Isa. lxv. 7.) Manasseh ben Israel (de Termino Vitæ, lib. iii. 4.) expounds that threatening, (Deut. xxviii. 64.) that they shall serve other gods, which neither they nor their fathers have known, wood and stone, as if it should be fulfilled in their captivity under the Romans, which they suppose is not yet expired. Here it is foretold, that this sort of idolatry shall be abolished upon their conversion: or else we may understand it of the putting down that idolatry now practised in Judea, both by the Greek and Latin Christians, before the Jews come to be settled in their own country. (Compare this text with Micah v. 12—14.)

And also I will cause the prophets and the unclean spirit to pass out of the land.] By the prophets are here meant the false prophets, as the LXX. translate it, who understand the word nabi in that sense, in several places of Jeremiah. (Compare Micah iii. 11. Zeph. iii. 4.) The unclean spirit is the same with a lying spirit, or a false pretence to prophecy and inspiration. (Compare 1 Kings xxii. 22. Rev. xvi. 13.) The Jews were always very much addicted to sorcery, charms, and other sorts of divination, as is observed in the note upon Mal. iii. 5. and it is probable that several pretenders to prophecy will arise among them, near the time of their future restoration, to discourage their return home.

Ver. 3. When any shall yet prophesy, then his father and mother—shall say unto him, Thou shalt not live; for thou speakest lies in the name of the Lord: and—shall thrust him through when he prophesieth.] These false pretenders to prophecy, who discouraged their brethren's conversion and return, were confuted by experience; things falling out quite otherwise than they had foretold. (See ver. 4.) This shall raise a just zeal against such impostors, so that even their parents shall be forward to put in execution against them the penalties inflicted by the law upon false prophets and seducers. (Deut. xiii. 6. 8, 9. xviii. 20.) They shall treat such a one in the same manner, as their fathers did the true Prophet, the Messias, shall pierce or thrust him through; for the same verb is used in the Hebrew here, and xii. 10.

Ver. 4. The prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision, when he hath prophesied.] The event proving quite otherwise than they had prophesied.

Neither shall they wear a rough garment to deceive.] The prophets used to wear hairy or rough garments; (see Isa. xx. 2.) this they did, partly in imitation of Elijah, that was so clad, (2 Kings i. 8.) and partly because it was a despicable or mournful habit, and suitable to their office, which was to denounce God's judgments against pride and luxury. [John Baptist wore such a garment, as was suitable to the office of a preacher of repentance.] The words import, that these prophets shall disown their former pretences, and no longer wear such a garment, as a badge of their profession.

Ver. 5. But he shall say, I am no prophet, I am a husbandman, &c.] To save themselves from punishment, (ver. 3.) each of them shall profess husbandry, and say that his employment from a child had been to look after cattle or till the ground, as the verb hiknani may be translated.

Ver. 6. And one shall say unto him, What are these wounds in thy hands? &c.] When such a severe inquisition is made against false prophets, every one shall be ready to observe what marks or characters are printed upon the hands of such a pretender, and to ask him, How they came there? And he shall answer in his own justification, This is not the mark or character of any idol, but only a token that I am a servant belonging to such a family. It was an ancient custom for masters to set a mark upon their slaves or goods; and there was sometimes a particular character imprinted upon the worshippers of certain idols: so we read in the third book of Maccabees, that the worshippers of Bacchus had an ivy-leaf imprinted upon their bodies. Such impressions were often made upon the hands, to which that expression alludes, (Rev. xiii. 16.) of receiving the mark of the beast upon the right hand. Several interpreters understand this verse of the wounds of Christ; but I conceive the following words more properly belong to that subject.

Ver. 7. Awake, O sword, against my Shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow.] Here begins a new prophecy, importing that the Messias, the great Shepherd, as he is described in this prophecy, (xi. 4, &c. and in Isa. xl. 11. Ezek. xxxiv. 23.) though with respect to his Divine nature he be equal with God the Father, (Phil. ii. 6.) yet shall be delivered up to death, by God's determinate counsel and appointment: (see Acts ii. 23. iv. 28.) A sword is put for any instrument of the Divine justice, as hath been observed upon xi. 17.

Smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered.] This our Lord applies to his disciples being scattered every man to his own, upon his being apprehended and put to death. (Matt. xxvi. 31. John xvi. 32.)

And I will turn mine hand upon the little ones.] This sentence may be translated in two contrary senses. The Hebrew phrase rendered here turn mine hand, may signify either to punish, or to spare; in the former sense it is taken, Psal. lxxxi. 14. in the latter, Ezek. xx. 22. where our translators render it, I withdrew my hand. In like manner the word tsair signifies great as well as little, as hath been observed upon Micah v. 2. viz. it is translated to this sense in some copies of the LXX. and so Dr. Pocock understands it here. (Not. in portam Mosis, cap. 2.) If we follow our English translation, the sense may be, I will shew mercy to my little flock, dispirited by the death of their Master, and will quickly shew him to them alive again, to their joy and comfort. If we translate the words, I will turn my hand upon the great ones, they denounce a severe judgment against the Jewish rulers, for their sin in crucifying Christ; agreeably to the import of the following words.

Ver. 8. In all the land two parts therein shall be cut off, &c.] Those severe judgments which our Saviour foretold should come upon them, (Matt. xxiv.) shall consume two parts in three of the nation, but a third part shall escape the general destruction, and be left to be dispersed over the world to preserve a posterity to future generations.

Ver. 9. And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, &c.] I will make them pass through the furnace of affliction: (Isa. xlviii. 10.) the wicked among them shall be consumed as dross, and they that repent and believe shall be saved. (See Ezek. xx. 38. and the note there.)

They shall call upon my name, and I will hear them.] When I have poured upon them the spirit of grace and supplication, (xii. 10.) they shall humbly implore pardon for their sins, and I will graciously hear and answer their prayers. (Compare x. 6. Isa. lxv. 24. Hos. ii. 21. Joel ii. 32.)

I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The Lord is my God.] For their disobedience I broke my covenant with them, (xi. 10.) and they were no longer my people; but upon their repentance and conversion, they shall be as though I had not cast them off, (x. 6.) and I will renew my covenant-relation with them. (Compare viii. 8. Lev. xxvi. 12. Jer. xxx. 22. Ezek. xi. 20. xxxvi. 28. xxxvii. 27.)

CHAP. XIV.

ARGUMENT.

The beginning of the chapter is a continuation of the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans; then follows the Jews' final victory over their enemies in the latter times. The prophecy concludes with a description of the glorious state of Jerusalem, which should follow.

Ver. 1. BEHOLD, the day of the Lord cometh, &c.] A day remarkable for the execution of his judgments upon Jerusalem, and her inhabitants: (compare Joel ii. 31.) when their riches shall become a prey to the conquerors.

Ver. 2. And I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle.] The Romans being lords of the known world, had the strength of all nations united in their forces; as Nebuchadnezzar is said to fight against Jerusalem with all the kingdoms of the earth of his dominion, Jer. xxxv. 1.

And the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished.] The Roman army shall exercise those acts of lust and violence which are too frequent among conquerors. (See Isa. xiii. 13. Amos vii. 17.)

And half of the city shall go into captivity.] It is said, xiii. 8. that a third part of the land shall be left therein, which is very well consistent with half the city's going into captivity.

And the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city.] God shall preserve the other half of the citizens from being cut off by the enemy. There were forty thousand of the inhabitants suffered to go whither they would, saith Josephus, de Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 15.

Ver. 3. Then [or, afterward] shall the Lord go forth to fight against those nations, &c.] In aftertimes God shall discomfit the posterity of these nations, viz. the Latin idolaters, who probably will be joined in alliance with the Mahometans, (see xii. 2. 8.) and will go forth against them in as visible a manner, as he appeared in behalf of Israel, when he overthrew the Egyptians in the Red Sea, or when the ark of God's presence led their armies in the land of Canaan, (Josh. vi. 6.) It is no unusual thing for the holy writers to speak of two events together which happen at a great distance from each other: so we read, 1 Cor. xv. 23. Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming.

Ver. 4. And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east.] The glory of the Lord, i. e. the Schechinah, or symbol of God's presence, when it departed from the city and temple, settled itself upon the Mount of Olives: (Ezek. xi. 23.) so, when God shall return to Jerusalem, and make it the seat of his presence again, it shall return by the same way it departed. (See Ezek. xliii. 2.) We may add, that when our Lord ascended from the Mount of Olives, the angels told his disciples he should come again in like manner; i. e. in a visible and glorious appearance at the same place, Acts i. 11, 12.

And the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof towards the east and towards the west, and there shall be a very great valley.] By an earthquake, such as was in the time of king Uzziah, (see Amos i. 1.) the middle of Mount Olivet shall cleave asunder, and sink into a deep valley, so as to leave the two points or tops of the hill, north and south, still standing. Mount Olivet had three tops, or eminences, one on the north point, another on the south, and the third in the middle, from whence Christ ascended, and where Christians in aftertimes erected a cross in memory of his ascension there. (See Maundrell's Travels, p. 103.)

Ver. 5. And ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains, &c.] When ye see the Mount of Olives cleave asunder, ye shall flee towards the valley for fear. The margin reads, The valley of my mountains, which may be understood of Zion and Moriah. But the Chaldee and LXX. reading the text with a small alteration of the points, render the sense thus; The valley of the [or, my] mountains shall be filled up; for the valley of the mountains shall join, or touch, even to Azal; it shall even be filled up, as it was filled by the earthquake in the days of Uzziah. Josephus writes, (Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11.) "That upon the earthquake, the mountain before Jerusalem, i. e. Mount Olivet, cleft on the west side, and then removed for about half a mile towards the east part of the hill, and there stopped." Azal is probably a name by which part of the hill was called.

And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints [or, holy ones] with thee.] Or, with him, as the Chaldee and LXX. read. The words are a description of Christ's coming to judgment, attended with all the holy angels, as the writers of the New Testament express it, Matt. xvi. 27.

xxv. 31. Mark viii. 38. The word kedoshim, translated saints, elsewhere signifies angels: (see Deut. xxxiii. 2.) so the word saint is used in the New Testament, 1 Thess. iii. 13. and St. Jude, ver. 14. quoting the prophecy of Enoch, saith, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, or holy ones; a place exactly parallel with that of the text. The name Jehovah, Lord, is often applied to the Messias by the prophets. (See the note upon Isa. vii. 14. Hosea i. 7. and compare xii. 8. 10. of this prophecy.) The time here specified may probably be the season when the Jews shall look upon, or behold, him whom they have pierced, xii. 10.

Ver. 6. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear and dark.] It shall not be clear in some places, and dark in other parts of the world: i. e. there shall not be that succession of day and night as there is now.

Ver. 7. But it shall be one day, which shall be known to the Lord, not day nor night; but [or, and] it shall come to pass, that at evening-time it shall be light.] At the consummation of all things, a time predetermined by God, but known to no creature, (Matt. xxiv. 36.) there shall not be any vicissitude of day and night, but one uninterrupted day, without any evening or twilight. (Compare Isa. lx. 19, 20. Rev. xxi. 23. xxii. 5.)

These two verses may be expounded with respect to the Jews, that their condition shall be for some time not altogether prosperous nor yet quite desperate. The great crisis of their affairs shall be in a day which God alone knows; unlike to our days; dark at the beginning and clear in the end, when the light is not expected.

Ver. 8. And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out of Jerusalem.] The supplies of grace are often represented in Scripture by rivers and streams of water, which both cleanse and make fruitful the ground through which they pass. (See Ezek. xlvii. 1. Joel iii. 18.) Here they are described as coming out of Jerusalem: in Ezekiel and Joel they are said to come out of the temple; both descriptions intimating, that the church is the spring from whence all the means of grace are communicated to believers.

Half of them towards the former sea, and half of them towards the hinder sea.] The same Hebrew phrase is translated, the east sea and the utmost sea, Joel ii. 20. The first of these denotes the sea or lake of Sodom, being towards the east country, (Ezek. xlvii. 8.) the latter signifies the Mediterranean, or western sea. (See Deut. xi. 24.) The expression imports, that the whole land shall have a plentiful share of these blessings, which are here described under the metaphor of living waters.

In summer and in winter shall it be.] They shall be the same in all seasons of the year; neither failing in summer, nor overflowing in winter.

Ver. 9. And the Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one.] Upon the conversion of the Jews, and the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles, the name of God shall not be given to any idol, idolatry being utterly abolished, (xiii. 2.) and God shall be glorified with one mind and one mouth all the world over. (Compare Micah v. 12. 14. Zeph. iii. 9. Rev. xi. 15.) The stone which represents Christ's kingdom, shall then become a mountain, and fill the whole earth, Dan. ii. 35.

Ver. 10. All the land shall be turned as a plain, from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem.] The mountains about Jerusalem (see Psal. cxxv. 2.) shall be levelled, perhaps by the earthquake beforementioned, from Geba northward to Rimmon southward of Jerusalem. The expressions may signify, that all impediments shall be removed that oppose the advancement of Christ's kingdom. (Compare iv. 7. and Isa. xl. 4.)

And it shall be lifted up, and inhabited in her place.] The mountains that obstructed the prospect of Jerusalem being removed, the city shall be seen by passengers afar off, like the city set on a hill, to which the church is compared, Matt. v. 14. and it shall be inhabited as formerly. (See xii. 6.)

From Benjamin's gate, unto the place of the first gate, [even] unto the corner gate.] Benjamin's gate was on the north side of the city, the tribe of Benjamin lying northward in respect of Jerusalem. The prophet foretells that the city shall be inhabited from Benjamin's gate northward, to the first or old gate southward, mentioned Nehem. iii. 6. xii. 39. and still farther on to the corner gate, situate on the south-west part of the city. (See Dr. Lightfoot's Description of Judea, chap. 26.)

And from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine-press.] The tower of Hananeel was on the south part of Jerusalem, as the same writer observes, and the king's wine-press on the north part. (Compare this verse with Jer. xxxi. 38, 39.)

Ver. 11. And men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction.] The city shall never be utterly destroyed, as it was by the Chaldeans and Romans. (Compare Jer. xxxi. 40.) The latter part of the sentence may be translated, There shall be no more curse. In the new state of things here foretold, the curse which sin brought into the world shall be removed. The same words are repeated by St. John, Rev. xxii. 3. and seem to be taken from this place.

But Jerusalem shall safely be inhabited.] A promise often repeated in the prophets. (See Jer. xxiii. 6. and the note there.)

Ver. 12. And this shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem, &c.] Those that die not in the battle, nor fall by the hand of their brethren, (see ver. 13.) shall be destroyed by famine or consumption.

Ver. 13. And it shall come to pass in that day, that a great tumult from the Lord shall be among them, &c.] Or, A great discomfiture, as the word is translated, 1 Sam. xiv. 20. The LXX. render it an ecstacy: such a terror or confusion shall seize them, as shall take away the use of their reason; (see xii. 4.) or there shall be misunderstandings among them, so that they shall fall foul one upon another, as the army of the Philistines and Moabites did, 1 Sam. xiv. 20. 2 Chron. xx. 23. (Compare Ezek. xxxviii. 21.) The prophet goes back to give an account how God would discomfit those that come against Jerusalem, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 14. And Judah also shall fight at [or, rather for] Jerusalem.] The Lord shall save the tents of Judah first, (xii. 7.) and then they shall join their forces against the common enemy, when he comes against Jerusalem. (See xii. 2.)

And the wealth of the heathen round about shall be gathered together, &c.] As they came with an intent to make a prey of Jerusalem, so the wealth which they brought with them shall become a spoil to the Jews. (Compare Ezek. xxxviii. 12. xxxix. 10.)

Ver. 15. And so shall be the plague of the house, &c.] This is to be joined to the twelfth verse, the thirteenth and fourteenth being read in a parenthesis. Both man and beast in that army shall be consumed in one common destruction.

Ver. 16. And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations that came against Jerusalem.] Those that were not in the army that marched against Jerusalem. The words may be translated, Every one that is left from among all the nations, &c. and then they may be understood of the Jews that remained behind, and did not go to Judea to fight for Jerusalem. The Jewish commentators follow this sense.

Shall even go up year by year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and keep the feast of tabernacles.] i. e. They shall join in the solemn acts of Christian worship. The prophets often describe the state of the gospel by the usages of their own times. (Compare ver. 20, 21. of this chapter, and viii. 21, 22. see likewise Isa. lx. 7. 9. lxvi. 23. with the notes upon those places.) The feast of tabernacles, being observed in remembrance of God's conducting and preserving the Jews in the wilderness for forty years, was observed with extraordinary expressions of rejoicing. (Compare Hos. xii. 9.) The Jews have a tradition, that the defeat of Gog and Magog, which seems to be the same discomfiture which is here described, shall fall out upon the feast of tabernacles; or, as others say, that the seven months' cleansing of the land, (Ezek. xxxix. 12.) shall be finished at that time.

Ver. 17. Even upon them shall be no rain.] For want of which they shall suffer a famine.

Ver. 18. And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, that have no rain, there shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen, &c.] Though the fruitfulness of Egypt, especially the upper part of it, (see Herodotus, lib. iii. cap. 10.) depends not upon rain; (compare Deut. xi. 10, 11.) yet if the Jews that dwell there, or the rest of the inhabitants, do not join in the solemn acts of Christian worship, (see ver. 16.) they shall suffer the same plague of famine with which others are threatened, i. e. the Nile shall not overflow, as the Targum explains it; from whence a famine will ensue. The words may be translated more exactly to the Hebrew thus; If the family of Egypt go not up, shall there not be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen that come not up? The particle velo is often taken interrogatively, as Noldius observes, p. 342. The word family is equivalent to kingdom. (See the note upon Jer. i. 15.)

[That have no rain.] The upper parts of Egypt, beyond Thebes, have no rain: beside the testimony of Herodotus, referred to in the last note, Seneca affirms the same: (Nat. Quæst. lib. iv. cap. 2.) "In ea parte quæ in Æthiopiam vergit, aut nulli imbres sunt, aut rari." Our learned countryman, Mr. Graves, in his Pyramidographia, sect. 2. tells us, "That while he lived at Alexandria, a great deal of rain fell there in the months of December and January; but in the upper part of Egypt, about Syene, and the cataracts of Nile, the inhabitants affirmed that they seldom had any rain."]

Ver. 20. In that day shall there be upon the bells [or, bridles] of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD.] A very learned person supposes, that this and the following verse imply in them the promise of a universal peace, a blessing often spoken of in the prophets, as concomitant of the flourishing state of Christ's kingdom. Taking this to be the general import of the place, the first part of the verse implies, that the bridles, or trappings, of the horses, as the Chaldee explains the word metsilloth, i. e. the necessary furniture of war, shall no more be applied to its proper use, but shall be looked upon as sacred, and laid up in the armoury of God's house for a memorial of the good success he had given his people against their enemies. (See 2 Chron. xxiii. 9.)

And the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar.] In pursuance of this interpretation, by the word siroth, pots, we are to understand helmets, called so because of their shape, being made like a pot. These, saith the text, shall be like the bowls, or vials, before the altar; no more to be profaned in war or bloodshed. In the Hebrew, words made up of letters of the same organ, have often an affinity of sense. So sarah, a word near akin to siroth, signifies a coat of mail; and the words sheriah and sherion are used in the same sense.

Ver. 21. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts.] Even every private helmet in Judah and in Jerusalem, shall be as useless to the purposes they were formerly employed in, as the most sacred things in the temple.

And all they that sacrifice shall come and take them, and seethe therein.] The helmets shall arise to such a number, that if every one that sacrificeth were to seethe separately, they would suffice for pots for every one's use. If this interpretation be not accepted, we may suppose the words set forth the abundant measure of grace and holiness which shall then be bestowed upon all believers, they being all made priests unto God; (see Isa. lxi. 6. Rev. v. 10. xx. 6.) set apart to attend upon God's service, as the priests were under the law, whose office it was to seethe, or boil, the sacrifices. (See 2 Chron. xxxv. 13.)

And in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts.] If we understand the former words of a universal peace, the sense of these will be, that no stranger, or unbelieving enemy, shall give any annoyance to the servants or worship of God. (See Joel iii. 17.) The Christian church is often called the house or temple of God in the New Testament. (See Eph. ii. 20, &c. 1 Tim. iii. 15. Heb. iii. 6. 1 Pet. iv. 19.) If we follow the common interpretation, the words import, that no hypocrite or unclean person shall have any share in the society of the faithful. (See Rev. xxi. 27. xxii. 15.) The Chaldee and Vulgar Latin translate the words, There shall be no more any merchant in the house of the Lord of hosts. There shall be such plenty of all provisions at home, that there will be no need of being supplied by any traffickers from abroad. Taking the words in this sense, they are equivalent to those descriptions of plenty foretold in the days of the Messias, Joel iii. 18. Amos ix. 13.

MALACHI.

PREFACE.

THE Prophet Malachi was, in all likelihood, contemporary with Nehemiah. His prophecy supposes the temple to be built, and the worship of God settled there; but blames the priests and Levites for not attending upon the public worship, (i. 10.) and the people for offering the lame and the blind, (ibid. ver. 7, 8.) and robbing God of his tithes and offerings, (iii. 10.) which agrees very well with the abuses we read of, Nehem. x. 33. 39. xiii. 10—12. as his reproving them for marrying strange wives, (ii. 11.) exactly answers Nehem. x. 30. xiii. 23, &c.

Bishop Lloyd dates this prophecy something later than Nehemiah's time, about three hundred and ninety-seven years before Christ; at which time, according to his computation, the first seven of Daniel's weeks, or forty-nine years, were expired: which time, as his lordship explains the words, was allotted for sealing up the vision and prophecy; (Dan. ix. 24.) i. e. for completing the canon of the Old Testament. The words of Malachi, iv. 4, 5. import, that after him the Jews were not to expect a succession of prophets: whereupon he exhorts them carefully to observe the law of Moses, and to look for no other prophet till Elias, the forerunner of the Messias, should come.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

God reproves the Jews for their ingratitude, and blames both priest and people for their irreverent and careless performance of the public worship.

Ver. 1. THE burden of the Lord to Israel by Malachi.] The word burden is sometimes equivalent to prophecy, and in this sense it is taken here, and is so interpreted in the Syriac version. (See the note upon Zech. xii. 1.) Israel stands here for Judah, as it does ver. 5. ii. 11. Micah i. 14. iii. 1. 8, 9. that being the only remainder of the Jewish nation which enjoyed any of the blessings promised to their fathers.

Ver. 2. I have loved you, saith the Lord.] I have chosen you for my peculiar people, out of pure love and kindness, without any antecedent merits on your side. (See Deut. vii. 8. x. 15.)

Ibid. and Ver. 3. Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord: yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste.] I have all along shewed a particular kindness to Jacob and his family, above that of Esau, though they were both the sons of Isaac: and have lately given a signal proof of it in that I have restored you to your country again, after your captivity; whereas I have scattered the Edomites, and dispossessed them of Mount Seir, their ancient inheritance, (Deut. ii. 5.) by the Nabatheans, to which they shall never be restored again. (Compare Jer. xlix. 18. Ezek. xxxv. 7. 9.) Hating is sometimes used comparatively for a less degree of love. (See Gen. xxix. 31. Luke xiv. 26.) St. Paul alleges this text, Rom. ix. 13. to prove, that God might justly reject the Jews for their rejecting the gospel, notwithstanding his promises made to Abraham's seed; since he had from the beginning freely bestowed particular favours upon one branch of his posterity, from which others were excluded.

For the dragons in the wilderness.] The word tannin, or tannoth, signifies any large creature of the creeping kind, whether by land or sea. (See the note upon Micah i. 8.) Here it is taken for a great serpent, such as are commonly found in deserts and desolate places. (Compare Psal. xliv. 19. Isa. xiii. 22. Jer. ix. 11. li. 37.)

Ver. 4. We are impoverished, [or destroyed, compare Jer. v. 17.] but we will return and build the desolate places.] They hoped to be restored to their own country again, as the Jews had been.

They shall build, but I will throw down.] Or, If they shall build, yet I will throw down. (See Noldius, Concord. p. 90.) They shall never succeed in their attempts to recover their own country, and shall be finally subdued by Hyrcanus, and the name of the Edomite utterly extinguished. (See Dr. Prideaux, ad an. A. C. 129.)

And they shall call them, The border of wickedness, and, The people against whom the Lord hath indignation for ever.] They shall be spoken of as a remarkable example of God's severe judgments upon a sinful people. The word border is equivalent to country here, and in the following verse: so it is used, Jer. xxxi. 17. Ezek. xi. 10. Amos vi. 2.

Ver. 5. And your eyes shall see it, and ye shall say, The Lord will be magnified from the border of Israel.] Though you ungratefully forget God's former mercies, he will give you fresh instances of his favour towards you, so that ye shall be forced to acknowledge that he continues to make his name and power illustrious in your preservation.

Ver. 6. A son honoureth his father, and a servant his master, &c.] Those degrees of respect that are due to human authority, are in a more eminent manner to be paid to the supreme Lord of all: so the priests who are dedicated to my service in a peculiar manner, behave themselves very undutifully, in that disrespect which they shew to my name and worship. (See the following verse.)

And ye say, Wherein have we despised thy name?] Or, Yet ye say: they impudently persist in justifying themselves. (Compare ii. 14. 17. iii. 7, 8. 13.)

Ver. 7. Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar—the table of the Lord.] The words altar and table denote the same thing. (Compare Ezek. xli. 22.) What was consumed upon the altar was God's portion, and is called the bread of God, Lev. xxi. 6. and the food of the Lord, iii. 11. 16. as our translation renders it, but it is in the Hebrew, the bread of the Lord. So by polluted bread is meant maimed and blemished sacrifices, as it is particularly expressed, ver. 8.

In that ye say, The table of the Lord is contemptible.] By your actions you declare how little value you have for the worship of God, since you care not in how slight and contemptuous a manner it is performed.

Ver. 8. And if ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil?] The beasts to be offered in sacrifice were required to be perfect and without blemish, (Lev. xxii. 21, 22.)

Offer it now to thy governor; will he be pleased with thee?] It argues a great contempt of Almighty God, when men are less careful in maintaining the decencies of his worship, than they are in giving proper respects to their superiors.

Ver. 9. And now, I pray you, beseech God, that he will be gracious unto us: this hath been by your means: will he regard your persons?] This irreverent performance of God's worship is a national sin, for which we may expect some public judgment. It is the priests' office to intercede with God, to be merciful to his people: (see Joel ii. 17.) and you are more especially obliged to do this, because this wickedness has been occasioned by your neglect, although it is much to be feared he will not regard your prayers or intercession.

Ver. 10. Who is there even among you that would shut the doors for nought? &c.] You do not attend upon my service in the temple, out of any zeal or affection for it, but purely with a regard to your own profit and advantage, which makes both your persons and your offerings unacceptable unto me: and under the gospel I will put an end both to your priesthood and the sacrifices which you offer. (See the following verse.) The words for nought, at the end of the first sentence, are not in the Hebrew, but are supplied by our interpreters. The LXX. render the sentence to this sense, It is through you (or, through your fault) that the doors will be shut; i. e. you would be content to have the doors of the temple quite shut up, and God's worship wholly intermitted.

Ver. 11. And in every place incense shall be offered to my name, and a pure offering.] The prophet describes the Christian sacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving, by the outward rites of the Jewish worship. (See the note on Zech. xiv. 16.) Incense was looked upon as a figure or emblem of prayer by the Jews themselves. (See Psal. cxli. 2. Luke i. 10.) This spiritual service, the prophet saith, shall be offered up in every place, whereas the Jewish worship was confined to the temple. The words of Christ are a commentary on this text, John iv. 21. 23. The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father: but the true worshippers shall worship him in spirit and in truth. Where spirit is opposed to the carnal ordinances of the Jewish service, such as meats and drinks and bloody sacrifices; and truth is used by way of distinction from the same external rituals, which were only shadows of things to come. The Hebrew word mincha, offering, is commonly translated by our interpreters meat-offering, but should rather be rendered bread-offering; it being that offering of fine flour which always accompanied the other sacrifices. (See Lev. ii. 1. ix. 17.) It seems to signify the daily sacrifice, by a synecdoche, in the thirteenth verse of this chapter, and ii. 12, 13. as it does in 1 Kings xviii. 29. 36. Mr. Mede thinks the word is used here to denote the sacrament of the Lord's supper, which may be properly called a commemorative sacrifice. (See his discourse of the Christian Sacrifice.)

Ver. 12. But ye have profaned it, in that ye say, The table of the Lord is polluted, &c.] But ye have profaned mine altar, and in your careless performance of my service there, you do as good as say, there is no difference between what is offered upon it, and other common meats: thus you render my sacrifices contemptible in the sight of the people. The word nib, fruit, is applied to sacrifice, see Isa. lvii. 19. where the fruit of the lips is explained of the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, Heb. xiii. 15. The oclo, his meat, may be understood either of that part of the sacrifice which was immediately offered upon the altar, and is called the food of the Lord, (see the note upon ver. 7.) or else of the remainder of the sacrifice which God allotted to the priest, and to those that made the offering, but was still esteemed a hallowed thing, as having been consecrated to God. (See Numb. xviii. 9, 10. Lev. xix. 8.)

Ver. 13. Ye have said, What a weariness is it! and ye have snuffed at it.] Ye have complained of the constant attendance upon my altar, as a wearisome employment, as if ye were overburdened with the care of purifying yourselves, and the nice inspection of the sacrifices brought thither; so you have by your outward gestures expressed your contempt of my service.

And you have brought that which was torn, &c.] See ver. 8.

They have brought an offering.] See the note upon ver. 11.

Should I accept this of your hands?] God hath declared in Lev. xxii. 20. that he will not accept a sacrifice any way blemished or imperfect.

Ver. 14. But cursed be the deceiver, which hath in his flock a male, and voweth, and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing.] The former reproofs related only to the priests; here the prophet reproves the people, that would offer to deceive Almighty God by putting him off with the worst they had. Dr. Pocock thinks the words are to be understood of such offerings as of their own accord they vowed to God, which were to be males: (Lev. xxii. 19.) and if they would not perform their vows, in such a manner as God directed, it were better they did not vow at all. (See Deut. xxiii. 21.)

It was in this respect that Abel's sacrifice was preferred before Cain's, that he offered of the best of his substance. Thus much is implied in the words of St. Paul, Heb. xi. 4. where the apostle saith, Abel offered πλείονα θυσίαν, a sacrifice better in its kind than Cain.

For I am a great King, saith the Lord of hosts, and my name is [or, shall be] dreadful among the heathen.] As God is the great King over all the earth, and will be acknowledged as such among the gentiles under the gospel; (ver. 11.) so men's religious services ought to be performed with a reverence suitable to the greatness of his majesty.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The beginning of the chapter is a continuation of God's reproof to the priests for their unfaithfulness in their office. From the tenth verse he proceeds to reprove the people for marrying strange women, and even divorcing their former wives, to shew their fondness of such unlawful marriages.

Ver. 1, 2. THIS commandment is for you—to give glory to my name.] Which you have despised, by your irreverent performance of my service, (i. 6, &c.)

I will send a curse upon you, and curse your blessings.] Turn your blessings into curses, or rather remove your blessings, and send curses and calamities in their stead.

Ver. 3. Behold, I will corrupt your seed.] The seed wherewith you sow your ground, so that there shall not be wherewith to furnish the meat-offerings requisite for the daily sacrifice. (See iii. 11. Joel i. 13.)

And spread dung upon your faces, even the dung of your solemn feasts.] Ye shall become as contemptible, as if one had covered your faces with dung and filth.

And one shall take you away with it.] You shall be esteemed as so many nuisances, only fit to be removed out of sight, as dung is. (Compare 1 Kings xiv. 10.)

Ver. 4. And you shall know that I have sent this commandment unto you.] By the punishments which will follow upon your neglecting to observe the commandment here enjoined you, ver. 1, 2.

That my covenant might be with Levi.] That the covenant that I made with the tribe of Levi, that they should be mine, (Numb. iii. 45. viii. 15. xvi. 9.) may continue firm to your posterity. Some render it, Because my covenant was with Levi; for the breach of which you are accountable. So the particle le sometimes signifies. (See Noldius, p. 457.)

Ver. 5. My covenant was with him of life and peace; and I gave it him.] The prophet speaks of the succession of the ancient priests, such as Aaron, Eleazar, Phinehas, and their successors, as of one single person under the name of Levi, (compare Zech. xi. 16.) and saith, I gave him my covenant of happiness and security, or, I promised him a secure enjoyment of his office of the priesthood. The words allude to Numb. xxv. 12, 13. where God speaks to Phinehas, "I give him my covenant of peace: and he shall have it, and his seed after him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood." Where peace signifies the same with security, as it often does; i. e. a secure possession of the priesthood, without any disturbance or interruption, expressed by an everlasting priesthood in the following words. In which sense the phrase is used, Ezek. xxxiv. 25. xxxvii. 26.

For the fear wherewith he feared me, &c.] As a reward of his fear and reverence towards me, of which the holy writings give us two remarkable instances; the zeal of the Levites against the worshippers of the golden calf, (Exod. xxxii. 26. 29.) and that zealous act of Phinehas, mentioned Numb. xxv. (Compare Deut. xxxiii. 8, 9.)

Ver. 6. He walked with me in peace and equity, &c.] He directed all his actions by the rule of my laws, (compare Gen. v. 22. vi. 9.) and he discharged his duty with fidelity, and without any disturbance or offence, and was a means of converting sinners from the error of their ways.

Ver. 7. For the priest's lips should preserve knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth.] As it is the priests' duty to understand the meaning of the law, so the people ought to resort to them for instruction in any difficulty that arises concerning the sense of it. (See Lev. x. 11. Deut. xxii. 9, 10.) For this reason the Levites had forty-eight cities allotted to them among the several tribes, that the people might more easily consult them upon every occasion. (See Numb. xxxv. 7.)

He is the messenger of the Lord of hosts.] God has appointed the priests his ordinary messengers, to declare his will unto the people, as the prophets are his extraordinary ambassadors. The word messenger in the usual sense of it is equivalent to prophet: (see Isa. xlii. 19. xliv. 26. Hag. i. 13.) it signifies the same with an interpreter of the Divine will, Job xxxiii. 23.

Ver. 8. Ye have caused many to stumble at the law.] You have either perverted the sense of the law, or encouraged others to break it by your ill example. (See ver. 12. and compare Rom. xiv. 21.)

Ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi.] By your evil practices you have broke that covenant whereby I placed you in a near attendance to myself. (See ver. 4. and compare Nehem. xiii. 29.)

Ver. 9. But have been partial in the law.] Or, Accepted persons in the law, as the Hebrew literally signifies; i. e. have wrested the sense of the law, in favour of particular persons, to excuse or alleviate their breaches of it.

Ver. 10. Have we not all one father? hath not one God created us?] Here a new section begins, wherein the prophet severely reproves the people's sin of marrying strange wives, which grew much in practice in Ezra and Nehemiah's time, who express a great detestation of it. (Ezra ix. 1. Nehem. xiii. 23.) The prophet here begins his expostulation with putting them in mind, that they owned one God and Father, in opposition to the idols of the heathen, and therefore should deal with one another as brethren, being nearly allied by spiritual as well as fleshly relation.

Why do we deal treacherously every man against his brother, by profaning the covenant of our fathers?] By these marriages with strangers, we deal falsely and injuriously with our brethren and countrymen, by the ill treatment of their daughters or sisters whom we took to marriage: (see ver. 14.) and we violate that covenant God made with our fathers, whereby he separated us from the rest of the world; and in order to preserve that distinction, forbid us to intermarry with idolaters. (Deut. vii. 3.)

Ver. 11. For Judah hath profaned the holiness of the Lord which he loved.] This sin implies the profanation of God's holy people, which he set apart for his own worship and service; a profanation of the temple, when the priests who officiated there were guilty of the same crime; (see ver. 12.) and, lastly, profanation of that covenant God made with the Jews: (ver. 10.) God hath expressed a tender regard for these three sorts of holiness, and threatened severe punishment to those that break the laws made to preserve them.

And hath married the daughter of a strange god.] God calls himself the Father of his own people, and owns them under the relation of sons and daughters, (see ver. 10. Jer.

xxxi. 1. 2 Cor. vi. 18.) and by consequence idolaters bear the same relation to the gods whom they worship.

Ver. 12. The master and scholar out of the tabernacle of Jacob.] He that persuades or instructs others that these marriages are lawful, and he that follows such advice: the expression seems to comprehend both the priest and the people. The words may relate to one of the priests of Joiada's family, who had contracted such a marriage, and by his example given encouragement to that wicked practice. (Nehem. xiii. 28, 29.) The Hebrew reads, He that wakes, and he that answers: it seems to be a proverbial speech, denoting a master and scholar, as our interpreters render it: an instructor is described as one that wakeneth the ear of his disciple. (Isa. l. 4.)

And him that offereth an offering to the Lord of hosts.] This is a particular threatening to the priests, who were guilty of this crime: such a one was Joiada's son. (Nehem. xiii. 28, 29.)

Ver. 13. And this have ye done again.] The words should be translated, This second thing have ye done: the prophet proceeds to reprove them for another crime added to the former; viz. to shew how much greater affection they had for strangers, they divorced themselves from their Jewish wives. (See the following verse.)

Covering the altar of the Lord with tears, with weeping, and with crying.] This injurious treatment of your wives has made them fill the courts of the temple, even as far as the altar itself, with their lamentations, and importuning heaven for relief against your oppressions: so that God will no more accept the sacrifices there offered by those that shew so little regard for common justice and humanity.

Ver. 14. And yet ye say, Wherefore?] Ye impudently persist in justifying yourselves. (See i. 6.)

Because the Lord hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously.] The wife whom you now divorce, was one whom you made choice of when you were in the prime of your age, and you promised to live with her in true love and affection: but now you cast her off without any regard to that solemn contract and covenant between you, of which you called God to be a witness. (Compare Prov. ii. 17.)

Ver. 15. And did not he make one? Yet had he the residue of the Spirit. And wherefore one? That he might seek a godly seed.] Among various interpretations of the words, this seems most probable, That the prophet puts the Jews in mind of the first institution of marriage in Paradise, (as Christ did afterward upon a like occasion, Matt. xix. 5.) and tells them, God made but one man at first, and made the woman out of him, when he could have created more women, if he had pleased; to instruct men that this was the true pattern of marriage, ordained for true love and undivided affection, and best serving the chief end of matrimony, viz. the religious education of children: whereas in polygamy the children are brought up with more or less care, in proportion to the affection men bear to their wives.

Therefore take heed to your spirit.] Do not give way to an inordinate and irregular passion.

Ver. 16. For the Lord God of Israel saith, that he hateth putting away.] He allowed the Jews the liberty of divorce only for the hardness of their hearts, (Matt. xix. 8.) not that it was a thing pleasing to him. Some render the words, If he hate (her), let him put her away: i. e. rather than use her ill. But the former sense is more agreeable to the scope of the place.

For one covereth violence with his garment.] Or, And when one puts violence upon his garment, or, covers his garment with violence, as Dr. Pocock translates it; who hath given the clearest sense of this phrase, and shewed out of several eastern writers, that they usually call a wife by the name of a garment; the expression of Moses, Deut. xxii. 30. agreeing with this way of speaking. According to this interpretation, the sense of the text will be, that God hates divorcing a former wife to take in one of a strange nation; and he hates that any should bring into his family an illegitimate wife over and above one that he had legally married before.

Ver. 17. Ye have wearied the Lord with your words.] You have tired his patience by your blasphemous speeches, charging his providence with injustice. (Compare Isa. xliii. 24. Amos ii. 13.) The words begin a new discourse, and more properly belong to the next chapter, where an answer is given to the objection proposed, ver. 2, 3. 5. 18.

Yet ye say, Wherein have we wearied him?] See i. 6.

When ye say, Every one that doeth evil is good in the sight of God, &c.] A repetition of the old objection against providence, taken from the prosperity of the wicked, which implied, as they thought, either that their works were pleasing to God, or else that he disregarded human affairs, and would never call men to account for their actions.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

This and the next chapter, which are not divided in some translations, contain a prophecy of the coming of the Messias, and his forerunner John Baptist, under the name of Elias; and the terrible judgments which shall come upon the Jews for their rejecting the gospel.

Ver. 1. BEHOLD, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me.] To silence the cavils of unbelievers, mentioned in the last verse of the foregoing chapter, the prophet here foretells the coming of the Messias, who should set all things right; and of his harbinger, who should prepare men for his reception. Whoever compares this verse with Isa. xl. 2, &c. may easily discern that they both speak of the same event. The messenger, whose office it is to prepare the way before the Lord, who is said here to be coming suddenly after this his forerunner, is described in Isaiah as preparing the way of the Lord, who is spoken of as coming, and his glory just ready to be revealed. (Ver. 5. 9.) This proves that this prophecy is justly applied by all the evangelists to John Baptist, who is described under the person of Elias, in the following chapter, whom all the Jews, both ancient and modern, expected should come as a forerunner of the Messias. (See the note there.) The messenger, or prophet, (see the note upon ii. 7.) here foretold to be the Lord's harbinger, was to be as much inferior to the Lord himself, as servants are to a great person, of whose arrival they give notice. This John Baptist often confessed, (Matt. iii. 11. John i. 26. iii. 28.) and so much appears by the following words.

And the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in.] The person whose coming is so solemnly proclaimed, is first described by the name of the Lord; Adon in the Hebrew, the same whom David called his Lord, (Psal. cx. 1.) and who is Lord of the temple, where he will make his appearance. He is farther described as the messenger, or angel of the covenant: the same who is called the angel of God's presence, Isa. lxiii. 9. the angel that delivered the law upon Mount Sinai, as St. Stephen speaks, expressing the sense of the Jews of his time, (Acts vii. 38.) and is appointed to be the Mediator of the new covenant, which the prophets foretold should take place under the Messias, (Isa. xlii. 6. lv. 3. Jer. xxxi. 31.) Another character given of him is, that he is the person ye delight in, whose coming is so much desired, the time of it being the subject of your search and inquiry, and the expectation of it your comfort and delight. This great person, saith the prophet, shall come to his temple, which ye have despised and profaned, (i. 7, &c.) and make the glory of the latter house greater than that of the former, Hag. ii. 9. (see the note there.) He shall choose this place to publish his doctrine, and do several of his miracles. (See Matt. xxi. 12. 14. Luke xix. 47. xxi. 38. John xviii. 10, 11. 15, 16.)

Ver. 2. But who may abide the day of his coming? who shall stand when he appeareth?] The coming of Christ here, and in several other places, comprehends all the effects and consequents of his coming; and denotes not only a time of mercy to those that embrace the gospel, but likewise a time of judgment upon the disobedient. In the same manner, John Baptist describes the coming of Christ, (Matt. iii. 7. 12.) Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? His fan is in his hand, and he will throughly purge his floor, and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire. To the same purpose are the words of St. Paul, (Rom. i. 18.) The wrath of God is revealed by the gospel against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.

The day of God's judgment, whether general or particular, is here described to be so terrible, that if he should be extreme to mark what is done amiss, not only the wicked, but even the righteous themselves, could not stand or abide so severe a trial. The words do probably point out the destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans, upon their crucifying the Messias, and rejecting his gospel; when those words of Christ were fulfilled, (Luke xix. 27.) Those mine enemies that would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me.

For he is like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap.] The Divine judgments are often called a fiery trial, such as separates the pure metal from the dross, purifies the former, and consumes the latter. (See Isa. i. 25. iv. 2. Zech. xiii. 9.) The word borith is translated soap here, and Jer. ii. 22. St. Jerome informs us, it was an herb the fullers used to take spots out of clothes.

Ver. 3. He shall sit as a refiner—and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer to the Lord an offering in righteousness.] He shall perform the office of a refiner and purifier; and whereas the miscarriages of the sons of Levi have been very great (particularly those which are taken notice of, and reproved, in the foregoing chapters), the Messias, when he comes, will reform these abuses, and purify the worship of God from such corruptions. The sense of the verse, as applied to the Christian church is, that all Christians being made a holy priesthood, shall offer up with pure hearts and minds spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, (1 Pet. ii. 5.) And as all that profess the religion of Christ are commanded to be holy in all manner of conversation, (ibid. i. 15.) so a blameless behaviour is more strictly required in the Christian priesthood.

Ver. 4. Then shall the offerings of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant to the Lord.] The prophet describes the Christian worship by an expression taken from the Jewish service, being what they were acquainted with. (See i. 11.)

As in the days of old, and as in former years.] As in the days of David and Solomon, before idolatry prevailed, and withdrew a great part of the people from God's worship. The reign of David and Solomon, was a proverbial speech for happy days. (See 2 Chron. xxx. 26.)

Ver. 5. And I will come near to judgment.] In answer to their demand, Where is the God of judgment? (ii. 17.) God tells them, he will hasten the time of judgment, and it shall come speedily upon those sins that are epidemical among them; and if they repent not upon the preaching of the gospel, he will proceed to the utter excision of the nation.

And I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, &c.] God will be both the witness and the judge, he will convict them of their guilt, as having been present when they committed these sins, though they were acted never so secretly: and then he will condemn them, and punish them accordingly. (See iv. 1.) The sins here mentioned, seem to have been commonly practised in Malachi's time. Diviners, dreamers, and such as consulted oracles at the idols' temples, are reproved, Zech. x. 2. as are the false pretenders to prophecy, Nehem. vi. 12—14. False swearing and oppression are complained of, Zech. v. 4. Nehem. v. 3, &c. Their marrying strange women, and putting away their former wives to make room for them, was no better than adultery, (see Mal. ii. 11. 14. compared with Nehem. xiii. 23. 29.) and a breach of that solemn oath with which they had bound themselves, Nehem. x. 29, 30. The same sins were as frequently committed from the time of our Saviour's appearance till the destruction of Jerusalem. No nation was more given to charms, divinations, and fortune-telling, than the Jews about that time, as Dr. Lightfoot shews out of their own authors, upon Matt. xxiv. 24. Adulteries were then so common, that the Sanhedrin ordained, that the trial of an adulteress, prescribed Numb. v. should be no longer put in practice, as the same author observes out of the Talmud, vol. ii. of his Works, p. 1080. 1111. Josephus informs us, that magicians swarmed in Judea under the government of Felix, and afterward: (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2. 6, 7. 11.) such was Theudas, the Egyptian sorcerer, the impostor under Festus, and others, foretold by the name of false Christs and false prophets. (Matt. xxiv. 24.)

Ver. 6. For I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.] Or, Because I am the Lord, I change not, &c. Because I am the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, as my name Jehovah imports, and am true to my former promises, (see Exod. vi. 3, 4. 6.) therefore you still continue a people, and are not consumed, as your iniquities deserve. And I will still preserve a remnant of you, to make good to them the promises I made to your fathers. (See Rom. xi. 29.)

Ver. 7. Return to me and I will return to you.] I am ready to be reconciled to you upon your repentance. (See Zech. i. 3.)

But ye said, Wherein shall we return?] You persist in your own justification; and your words, or at least your actions, shew that you have no remorse for your former sins, nor any purpose of forsaking them. (Compare i. 6.)

Ver. 8. Will a man rob God? yet ye have robbed me.] One might reasonably think such a presumption could not enter into any man's thoughts, as to rob God of those things which are dedicated to his service; when he considers that he hath received all things from him, and therefore ought in gratitude to set apart some share of his substance for the maintaining his worship, and the public exercises of religion. Yet ye have been guilty of this sin, which heathens have dreaded to commit, as being apprehensive of the Divine vengeance which commonly follows it. (See the note upon Dan. v. 5.)

But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings.] Because they pleaded ignorance of this sin charged upon them, God instructs them wherein their guilt lay: viz. in detaining their tithes, the first-fruits of their ground and cattle, and other offerings, expressly set apart for God's use in the law of Moses, and which they had lately entered into a solemn engagement to observe. (See Nehem. x. 32, &c.)

Ver. 9. Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation.] The scarcity you complain of, ver. 11. is a just judgment upon you, for detaining the tithes and offerings appropriated to God's service.

Ver. 10. Bring all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in my house.] Make good your solemn engagement, (Nehem. x. 29, &c.) of bringing in all the tithes of your increase into the storehouses appointed for that purpose, (see Nehem. xii. 44. xiii. 5. 12.) that there may be a sufficient provision for the meat-offerings, sacrifices, and other religious services to be performed in my temple, (see Nehem. x. 33.) and for the maintenance of the priests and Levites, who attend there, that they may not be tempted to forsake my service. (See Nehem. xiii. 10.)

And prove me now herewith—if I will not open the windows of heaven, &c.] You complain of dearth and scarcity (see the following verse), but I would have you try the experiment, and see whether your plenty will not be in proportion to the free will, wherewith you bring in your tithes and offerings. (See 2 Chron. xxxi. 10.) To open the windows of heaven, expresses God's showering down plenty; (see 2 Kings vii. 2.) as the shutting up heaven denotes scarcity, (Deut. xi. 17. Hag. i. 10.)

That there shall not be room enough to receive it.] Or, Till there be enough; or, Till you shall say there is enough, as Noldius translates the phrase, in his Concordance, p. 673.

Ver. 11. And I will rebuke the devourer for your sake, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground, &c.] Whereas you complain of great dearth, (see Nehem. v. 3.) which I sent as a punishment of your sacrilege (ver. 9. of this chapter), I will promise upon your amendment no more to destroy the fruits of the earth by locusts, and such-like devouring insects: (compare Amos iv. 9.) neither shall your fruit-trees be blasted with blighting winds, and cast their fruit before the time.

Ver. 12. For ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the Lord of hosts.] Your country shall be again known by the name of the pleasant land, as it was formerly called. (See the note upon Dan. viii. 9.)

Ver. 13. Your words have been stout against me, saith the Lord.] Impudent, or blasphemous; void of all reverence and duty.

Yet ye say, What have we spoken so much against thee?] They impudently denied the charge, (see ver. 8.) therefore the prophet renews it against them in the following words.

Ver. 14. Ye have said, It is vain to serve God, &c.] The prosperity of the wicked made them conclude, that it was to no purpose to govern their lives by the laws of God, or to humble themselves for their offences against him. (See Psal. lxxiii. 13.)

Ver. 15. And now we call the proud happy.] This makes us, say they, think and call those men happiest, who live in open defiance to God and his laws. (Compare iv. 1. Psal. x. 4.)

Yea, they that work wickedness are set up.] The Hebrew reads, are built: which word sometimes signifies the advancing men and their families to riches and honour. (See Prov. xiv. 1. xxiv. 3.)

Yea, they that tempt God, are even delivered.] They that are resolved to try God's patience by their provocations, (see Psal. xcv. 9.) are delivered out of those dangers and calamities wherein better men are involved.

Ver. 16. Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another.] Or, Spake to one another: the word often is not in the Hebrew. By their pious discourses they confirmed each other in goodness, and armed themselves against the impressions such wicked suggestions might make upon their minds.

And the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him, &c.] God took especial notice of what these pious persons did and said: it was as safely laid up in his memory, as if it had been entered into a register, in order to be produced at the day of judgment, to their praise and honour. (Compare Psal. lvi. 8. Isa. lxv. 6. Dan. vii. 10. Rev. xx. 12.)

Ver. 17. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord, in the day that I make up my jewels.] It shall appear how dear they are to me, when the time comes that I separate the precious from the vile, the vessels of honour from those of dishonour. (2 Tim. ii. 20.) But the words may more properly be translated thus, They shall be to me a peculiar treasure, in the day that I shall make or appoint for that purpose. (Compare iv. 3.) At which time I will set a mark of distinction upon those my favourites. The word Segullah, in its primary sense, denotes that privilege and pre-eminence which the Jews had above all other nations, of being God's peculiar people: so it is used, Exod. xix. 5. Deut. vii. 6. Psal. cxxxv. 4. expressed in the Greek by λαὸς περίουσι, from whence it is applied to Christians by St. Peter, 1 Epist. ii. 9. and St. Paul, Titus ii. 14. all the privileges of the Jewish church being, in an eminent manner, transferred upon the Christians.

And I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.] I will preserve them from those calamities which shall fall upon the unbelievers, (iv. 1.) with the same tenderness which a father shews to a dutiful son.

Ver. 18. Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked.] Or, Then shall ye again discern, &c. the verb shub, to return, being often used adverbially. (See the note upon Isa. vi. 13. and Dan. ix. 25.) This will give you a new proof that I put a difference between the good and the bad, and thereby fully answer the objections you have made against Providence. (Ver. 14. and ii. 17.)

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

The prophet foretells the general destruction of the Jewish nation, for rejecting the Messias: he comforts the well-disposed among them, and exhorts them to prepare themselves for his coming, by a strict observance of the law of Moses in the mean time; since no prophet was hereafter to be expected till that great one, who is to be Christ's forerunner.

Ver. 1. FOR, behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven.] That great and terrible day of the Lord, as it is called, Joel ii. 31. (Compare here ver. 5.) God is described as a consuming fire when he comes to execute his judgments, Deut. iv. 24. And this was remarkably verified, when, upon the taking the city and temple of Jerusalem by the Roman army under Titus the emperor, they were both destroyed by such flames as no industry could quench. (See Josephus, Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 10.)

And all the proud.] Those spoken of, iii. 15.

It shall leave them neither root nor branch.] A proverbial expression for utter destruction; as if a tree were plucked up by the roots, and thereupon the branches withered. (Compare Amos ii. 9.)

Ver. 2. But unto you that fear my name.] See iii. 16.

Shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings.] The Messias is elsewhere called the East, or sunrising: (see Isa. lx. 1, 2.) and the Hebrew word Tsemach, translated Branch in our English, is rendered the East by the Chaldee and LXX. (See the note upon Zech. iii. 8.) So the church is described, Rev. xii. 1. as clothed with the sun; i. e. adorned with graces communicated to her by Christ. He is called here the Sun of righteousness, with healing in his wings; to signify, that his light consists in clearing up men's understanding, and chasing away the darkness of their minds; whose rays and kindly warmth will heal all the diseases of their souls.

And ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall.] You shall be warned of God to go forth of Jerusalem, before it be molested by the Roman army; (see Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 5.) by which means you shall be rescued from the common destruction that shall come upon the unbelievers, and shall continue thriving and vigorous (compare Psal. xcii. 14.) when the rest of your nation shall be consumed with divers kinds of death.

Ver. 3. And ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be as ashes under the soles of your feet.] The righteous shall triumph in the destruction of the ungodly, as conquerors trample upon the carcasses of those that are slain in battle. (Compare 2 Sam. xxii. 43. Micah vii. 10. Zech. x. 5.) The wicked are compared to ashes, because the judgment that consumeth them is resembled to fire, ver. 1.

In the day that I shall do this.] Or, In the day that I shall appoint for executing my vengeance: the same phrase is used, iii. 17. Psal. cxviii. 24.

Ver. 4. Remember ye the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb, &c.] You are not to expect any succession of prophets for the time to come, till the forerunner of the Messias appears: so your chief care must be to attend upon the instructions Moses has given to all Israel in his law, the most solemn part of which was delivered to him in an audible manner upon Mount Horeb, (Exod. xix. 9. Deut. iv. 10.) This your lawgiver plainly speaks of the Messias, and instructs you to expect his coming, and to obey his commands, (Deut. xviii. 15.) It was the sense of ancient Jews that the gift of prophecy was sealed up with Malachi: the son of Sirach, having before mentioned Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, speaks of the twelve minor prophets, as completing that part of the Old Testament canon, Ecclus. xlix. 10. and the latter Jews agree with him in this sentiment, as appears by the authorities cited in the Right Reverend the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, p. 83.

Law, statutes, and judgments, are words promiscuously used; as appears from several places of the hundred and nineteenth Psalm.

Ver. 5. Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet.] The same person who is called the messenger or forerunner of the Messias, iii. 1. It was the unanimous sense of the Jews that Elias should first come and restore all things, (Mark ix. 12. John i. 21.) This they understood of the coming of Elias in person, as appears from Ecclus. xlviii. 10. where the author, speaking of the true Elias, saith, Who wast ordained (or, written of) for reproofs in aftertimes, or, for appointed times [εἰς καιροὺς], to pacify the wrath of the Lord, before it break out into fury, and to turn the heart of the father to the son (alluding to this text), and to restore the tribes of Jacob; answering to the words of St. Mark. The LXX. following the received tradition among the Jews, add here the Tishbite, by way of explication. [It is in this sense that John Baptist denies himself to be Elias, John i. 21.] The Jews to this day earnestly pray for the coming of Elias, upon the supposition, that the Messias must immediately follow his appearing. This form of prayer they received from their ancestors, as it is recorded in their liturgies: (see the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, ibid. p. 67.) which shews that the ancient Jews understood the words of Malachi here, and iii. 1. of the coming of the Messias.

Our Saviour hath interpreted this Elias to be John Baptist, Matt. xi. 14. xvii. 12, 13. who is called by the name of Elias, because he came in the spirit and power of Elias; (Luke i. 17.) he resembled him in his office of reproving the Jews, and exhorting them to repentance; just as the Messias is called by the name of David in the prophets, because all the promises made to David were to be fulfilled in him. (See the note upon Hos. iii. 5.)

Before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.] Compare ver. 1. iii. 3. Joel ii. 31. and the notes upon those texts. The words import the utter destruction of the Jewish nation (see the following verse), but they may properly be applied to the general dissolution of all things; a way of speaking usual among the prophets. (See the note upon Isa. xiii. 10.)

Ver. 6. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers.] It will be his office to put an end to those religious differences (such was that of the pharisees and the Sadducees) which divided the nearest relations from each other, and to make them all join in the duties of repentance and reformation, and thereby prepare themselves for the reception of the Messias. (See Matt. iii. 7.) This was the design of his mission, though his preaching did not always meet with success, no more than the true Elias had in the time of Ahab.

This seems the most probable explication of the words, taking them in that sense wherein our translation and the LXX. understand them, which is followed by St. Luke, i. 17. But a more easy sense may be given of them, if we translate the Hebrew preposition al, not to, but with; in which sense it is often used. (See Noldius, p. 695.) Then the sentence will run thus, He shall turn the heart of the fathers with the children, and the heart of the children with their fathers: i. e. his preaching shall produce a general reformation in the minds and manners of all sorts of persons. (See Matt. iii. 5. xxi. 32.) Dr. Hammond and Lud. de Dieu are of opinion, that the preposition ἐπὶ in St. Luke, may be understood in the same sense.

Lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.] The words might be better translated, Lest I come and smite the land (of Judea) with utter destruction. So the word cherem is translated by our interpreters, Numb. xxi. 2. Deut. vii. 2. xiii. 15. Josh. vi. 21. Zech. xiv. 11. The utter destruction of the Jewish nation and country is here threatened, upon their rejecting the preaching of John Baptist, and refusing to hearken to his testimony concerning the Messias, that should come after him.

A

UPON

THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

THOMAS,

BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE, LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK;

PRIMATE OF ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN;

AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY-COUNCIL.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE

TO accept the following sheets, which are formed upon the plan of Bishop Patrick and Mr. Lowth, as an Appendix to, and continuation of, their useful design. I am far from thinking that I am engaged in a work equal to the nature of their subject, nor can I flatter myself with any hopes that this performance, with its many defects, will meet with the like favourable acceptance.

I was encouraged to pursue this design, from the many excellent things which are spoken of the Book of Wisdom by the fathers, and most early writers; and as our church has given a sort of sanction to its usefulness by allowing it, in conformity to ancient custom, to be read in her public service, I hope this consideration will justify the present attempt, and apologize in some measure for my presumption in offering to your Grace an Apocryphal Book, and placing it under the protection of your great name; especially as I consider the uncanonical books upon the footing only of such primitive ecclesiastical writings, as many prelates, of the first eminence in the republic of letters, have not thought it beneath them to employ their learned labours about.

Was I permitted to observe the common practice in addresses of this kind, and to speak in the language of modern complaisance, the world might expect that I should dwell upon all those great qualities in which your Grace excels; but I shall only beg leave to observe, that your rising merit early drew the eyes of a very discerning and learned prelate* upon you, and when, through age and infirmities, he was at length hindered from labouring in the word and doctrine, like David stricken in years, he transferred his charge upon no less able a successor, and the same great accomplishments reviving in your Grace, made the loss less sensible and regretted; and equally endeared you to the same learned society, and to that illustrious name in particular, which now fills the highest station in the law with the most consummate abilities. And, as if a double portion of the spirit of that Elijah rested upon you, in you we admire the same justness of sentiments, clearness of expression, beauty of language, and well-conducted zeal: in you we trace his affectionate manner, sweet elocution, just action, and those other moving graces of the preacher, which command the passions, and charm the attention, so that being dead he yet speaketh.

Nor are you, my Lord, less distinguished by an affable and obliging temper, which shines forth, and is displayed, in that easiness of access, and condescending goodness, which endear you to the love and esteem of all, and must render you particularly amiable to that province, over which, by the designation of Providence, you preside with so general an applause.

As these great qualities at length conducted you so deservedly to the episcopate, so your speedy advancement, as it were from glory to glory, to the present high station which you fill, is an instance of your superior merit, and consummate modesty: both of which illustriously stand confessed, as you neither asked nor solicited this eminence; it rather sought you out, and seemed to court you, so that I might justly draw the parallel between you and some celebrated names of antiquity, whose ambition was retirement, and their preferment a sort of violence. What the historian says of that great general, Epaminondas, is truly applicable to your Grace, "That he never made any interest for preferment, but was courted to accept it, and often forced into it; and he always discharged his trust in such a manner, as to do greater honour to his station than he received from it."*

* Bishop Fleetwood.

I could enlarge, with equal pleasure and truth, upon so copious and inviting an occasion, but to say more would, I fear, give offence to your Grace, and to say less, would have been the highest injustice in me; nor should an eloquence less than your own attempt to display your character.

That your Grace may long preside over the church, under the happy conduct and blessing of that Wisdom, in whose right hand is length of days, is the sincere prayer of,

My Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient and dutiful servant,

RICHARD ARNALD.

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THERE have been so many excellent commentaries published upon the Holy Scriptures, and every one of the sacred books have been illustrated by the labours of so many learned and judicious persons, that it may be presumed nothing has escaped their inquiry, or seems necessary now to be added to their discoveries: but the Apocryphal Books, though they are placed next to the canonical ones in the same common volume, and have some of them been esteemed, even by many protestant writers, as second only to them for the usefulness of the matter and variety of instructions contained in them,* have hitherto received, though they confessedly stand in great need of light and illustration, very little help and advantage of this nature. The following Commentary, therefore, upon the BOOK OF WISDOM, which the ancients had in so great esteem, and our church has thought not unworthy to be read in her public service, will, I flatter myself, be the more favourably received, and appear the more necessary, as there is no comment upon this, or, indeed, any of the Apocryphal writings extant, that I know of, in our language; and such as have wrote upon it in other languages, being generally popish expositors, have perverted many passages to countenance their favourite opinions, which I have occasionally taken notice of in the course of this work, to prevent any mischief from such an abuse.

That there are some exceptionable places in the book itself, I do not deny, and what book merely human is entirely without them? nor, because I have undertaken the illustration of it, shall I be so disingenuous as to patronize, or even palliate, its errors, much less cry it up as all perfection; and, therefore, as I shall neither with the Romanists pretend that it is canonical, and to be put upon the same level with the inspired writings, against which opinion there are insurmountable difficulties, both internal and external, so neither can I persuade myself, with too many protestants, to decry it as useless and of no authority, for no other reason, probably, but because the church of Rome has paid too great a deference to this, and other writings confessedly Apocryphal, which I cannot think are all of them of equal value, but that the didactical books, as they are called, viz. Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, claim abundantly the preference, as in fact they are universally well spoken of and esteemed, and I believe have as many admirers as they have readers, and may therefore, I hope, without any imputation or reflection, be as laudably commented upon as any of the primitive ecclesiastical writings.

The Book of Wisdom in particular, to which the following sheets only relate, especially that part of it which refers to God's dealing with the Egyptians, is an epitome of the history of Exodus; it abounds with useful sentiments and instructive morals; we see in it repeated proofs of God's patience and long-suffering towards sinners, of his mercy and loving-kindness to his faithful servants, especially in their distress, and many lively instances of his justice and severity upon obstinate and irreclaimable transgressors: such are the following memorable events recorded in it—"The establishment of the kingdom of death upon the earth through the sin of our first parents; the destruction of the old world by the deluge for its wickedness, after the repeated menaces of at least an age; the miraculous manner in which Noah's family were alone preserved from perishing by the waters; the fire which came down from heaven upon the unrighteous cities, and the whole kingdom of Egypt, punished at different times by ten terrible plagues. In what manner wisdom conducted the patriarchs, and other holy souls, the friends and favourites of God in their several ages, inciting them to the most laudable actions, and, as a reward of their labours, reaching forth to them a glorious kingdom, and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand; how by it Moses obtained a good report, became the servant of God, and commissioned by him to dispense his mercies and judgments; the sea opening a passage for the Israelites, and closing again to overwhelm Pharaoh and his army; the former sustained miraculously with manna for forty years, and drinking of the brook which flowed from the hard rock, and the Egyptians perishing through the calamity of their river stained with foul blood; the former covered with a cloud from the scorching of the midday sun, and conducted by night with a light of fire, and the latter perishing by a continued darkness, whose horror was increased by the glare of spectres and apparitions; an army of hornets marching before the people of God, to drive the Canaanites from their possessions, and the Egyptians destroyed by as dreadful a persecution of locusts; the clouds, at several times, converted into a shower of hailstones to overthrow the wicked, and, at other times, the elements suspending their known qualities in favour of God's chosen." Such important facts recorded in this book, manifesting God's displeasure against sin, and his acceptance and reward of obedience, shew the great usefulness of it, and that it was not without reason approved of by the church, and appointed to be read in it, for instruction and edification. And hence we may presume Dr. Raynolds, who wrote so learnedly against the authority of the Apocryphal Books, was induced to speak so favourably of this and Ecclesiasticus, calling them, "Valde bonos et utiles, et omnibus tractationibus præferendos (which is the language also of St. Austin, de Prædest. Sanct. lib. i.) proximumque illis locum deberi post scripturam sacram." (Præl. 7. 74.)

The original text of this book is in Greek, nor are there reasons sufficient to induce us to conclude, that it was ever extant in Hebrew: but though the author wrote Greek well, and was acquainted with approved writings, both of philosophers and poets, in that language, yet, in all the editions which I have carefully consulted and compared, there seem to be many faulty and suspicious passages. Junius has the like observation upon all the Apocryphal Books: "Permulti ubique inveniuntur loci varii, distorti, depravati. Depravati autem? imò profligati, æque in contextu Græco atque in translationibus, quos quidem locos partim ex canonicorum scriptorum auctoritate, partim ex ipsorum auctorum secum, aut aliorum cum ipsis comparatione, partimque ex judicio necesse fuit emendare." (Præf. ad Lib. Apoc.) From him therefore I promised myself no little assistance; but neither Junius, nor the many commentators I have occasionally consulted, give that light which one might have expected in the most difficult passages. And though they could not but perceive, and often do acknowledge, the Greek text to be corrupt, yet they content themselves with giving a general guess at the author's meaning, without strictly and minutely examining the original, whether it would warrant and justify such a sense, or might be, by some happy conjecture, altered to afford a better. There is, indeed, thus much to be said in the behalf of some of them, that being catholic commentators, the very text itself was sacred to them; but why the few protestant expositors, whom we find among the sacred critics, should be generally so sparing of their learned labours, as to attempt scarce a single emendation, when the badness of the original text in so many places called for their assistance, can be resolved into no truer cause than what is mentioned before, viz. that the Apocryphal Books having been too much extolled by the Romanists, and even made a part of the canon, and many of their erroneous tenets pretended to be warranted from thence, these have been as remarkably regardless of them, and through an over cautious delicacy have gone into the other extreme; which probably may be the reason, joined to the scarcity of useful notes and observations upon the Apocryphal Books, that the learned Poole has taken no notice of these in his Synopsis. But as this way of reasoning against the general usefulness of a thing, from a particular abuse of it, is allowed on all hands to be illogical and inconclusive, there is the less occasion to enlarge on this head.

As there are many passages which to me seem faulty in the original, and have hitherto passed unaltered, and even unattempted, I have endeavoured to restore these by the most easy and natural helps; sometimes by a different point only, sometimes by the change of a few letters; mistakes, which might arise probably at first from the carelessness of transcribers, or the likeness and affinity of sound: but have been cautious of indulging too much liberty and wantonness this way, and when any criticism is attempted, and an emendation of the original text offered, which I was induced to, either by the sense of the context, or the badness of the present construction, or the authority of the ancient versions, which I have constantly consulted, I have always supported such an alteration with reasons at least probable, and have not obtruded any favourite criticism dogmatically, but submitted it, with great deference, to superior judgment, being ready to retract any mistake, and to acknowledge my obligation for any friendly information. Nor have I boldly attempted any transposition, however inclined or induced to it, by the confusion and perplexity of some passages in their present state, such as chap. i. 16. xii. 27. not having authority from manuscripts, or the ancient versions: for though a conjecture of a transposition may be sometimes admitted in books which are confessedly wrote in prose, yet, as some learned men have been of opinion (see Grabe's Prolegom. tom. ult. cap. 1, 2. Calmet's Diction. in voce Wisdom), that this book, and that of Ecclesiasticus, were originally wrote in metre, and there may, perhaps, seem some countenance for it from the many poetical terms here used, and from their being wrote stichewise in the Alexandrian manuscript, in the same manner as the book of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles are, to which some of the old Latin translations, and Dr. Grabe, in his late edition, probably for the same reason, have joined them; I was, on this account, less disposed to indulge any conjectural transposition, as, in metrical books, mistakes of that nature could not so easily happen; though nothing certain can be built upon this, even though we should suppose, with some others, that this book was originally wrote in Hebrew. Thus much I can assert, with great truth and sincerity, that as it was my design to make the work useful in all possible particulars, I have purposely confined myself to explain, as indeed all expositors should, the most difficult passages, nor have I designedly left any one difficulty which respects either the sense, or the reading of the original text itself, unattempted at least. And this I have done by minutely examining the Greek text, collating the several editions and their various readings, consulting the oriental versions, and the several ancient English translations, comparing the author's account with the Scripture history, and collecting what was parallel, or would give an additional light, from Josephus, Philo, Spencer, Selden, &c. and to these helps I have occasionally added some material notes and observations of those celebrated commentators, Messieurs of Port-Royal and Calmet; the former give us the sentiments of the fathers, and their exposition and reflections upon particular important points; and the latter, in the explanatory way, exceeds all the commentators that went before, and almost supersedes the use of any other. Such as would see a short marginal paraphrase upon this book, will probably find satisfaction from a small one in 12mo. published in 1706. And that the following sheets may be useful to every class of readers, I have likewise studied plainness and clearness, and inserted in their proper places many moral reflections, such as arose naturally from the subject, which, as they tend to discourage vice, and shew the fallacy of libertine or epicurean principles, so they serve likewise to enliven the work, and are a sort of relief and entertainment after a dry criticism.

The English translation of the Apocryphal Books, which the church now uses, is that which was made by the command of king James I.; but though seven very considerable persons were employed in the work, yet it is surprising to observe in how many places it is faulty and imperfect. In that of the Book of Wisdom, the language is not only bad, but the sense often obscure and intricate; and though some allowance may be made upon account of the faultiness of the original text, which might in particular passages occasion the obscurity of our version, yet often, where the original is pure, clear, and intelligible, the translators have not only fallen short of the force and beauty of it, but have unaccountably mistaken the sense; and where the Greek happens to be equivocal, and will admit of different meanings, have frequently taken the worst, and most foreign to the context. The translation of the first part is much the best executed, but the three last chapters betray great negligence, and seem to come from a hasty, I had almost said an unskilful, hand. In all such faulty instances I have helped our version, and given the true rendering; nor is the number of emendations attempted in the Greek text less considerable: how far I have succeeded in the critical part is submitted to the judgment of the learned, but hope it will meet with more candour, being the first essay. If what I now offer to the public shall be favourably received, I shall be induced to publish, in due time, the like commentary upon the Book of Ecclesiasticus, which is already in some forwardness.

That nothing might be wanting that could give any insight into the book itself, or contribute to the discovery of its author, I have prefixed two Dissertations of Calmet's, which I purposely translated from the French, as they are drawn up with great judgment, and will be found very useful for the better understanding this writer; one upon the book itself, the other containing the opinions and conjectures of learned men about the author. In the former, the style, sentiments, method, and subject-matter of the Book of Wisdom are so judiciously treated of, that it is needless to attempt to add to it; but, as the conclusion contains some bold assertions of the canonicalness and inspiration of the Apocryphal Books, which are not warrantable, and which, unanswered, through the authority of so great a name, might have done harm,—I mean his appeal to those pretended councils, in whose decrees the Romanists take shelter, and this learned commentator so much triumphs in,—I thought it incumbent upon me, however unequal to the challenge, to examine and confute this pretence, which I have done in the clearest manner that the nature of such a controversy will admit of, and by authorities and reasons so full and cogent, that I trust an antidote is provided against any possible poison that can be conveyed. In the latter, he recounts the several supposed authors of this book mentioned by antiquity, and the arguments urged in their behalf, but at length he leaves the point undetermined; so that from him we rather learn who is not, than who is, the real author of it. But the reasons which he produces in favour of Philo the Jew, it must be confessed, are very strong; so strong, that it seems not improbable he would have adjudged this book to him, if the canonicalness of it would not have been endangered thereby. The two principal arguments urged against Philo by him are, his not being inspired, and the difference of style. The former he himself acknowledges is of no force to such as do not own the canonicalness of this book; and the latter he has answered, when he observes, that this may be occasioned by the difference of the subject-matter, according to which, the same writer often varies his style, and seemingly differs from himself; which is particularly true of Philo, for sometimes his pieces are allegorical, sometimes literal, sometimes between both extremes, and yet, from some resemblance in the features, one may easily know that they belong to the same parent:

"Facies non omnibus una,
Nec diversa tamen; qualis decet esse sororum."

Such a variation of style, therefore, if there were no other arguments against him of more weight, no more concludes against Philo, than a change of dress, according to the exigency of a man's business and occasions, infers a real change of his person.

St. Jerome acquaints us that many of the ancients supposed this book to be wrote by Philo, (Prol. in lib. Sap.) and some very considerable moderns are of the same opinion. Dr. Raynolds contends, that it was wrote by Philo in the time of the emperor Caius, who would have his statue set up and adored in the temple of Jerusalem, (Sueton. in vit. Calig. 22.) and that the Jews sent this very Philo, as their ambassador, to intercede with him not to profane their temple, but the emperor ordered Petronius to see the orders about his statue complied with. This, he says, is perfectly agreeable to the argument and drift of the Book of Wisdom; and from hence he accounts for those precepts in the first and sixth chapters, which contain the duty of princes, that they were inserted with a view to Caius, to admonish him how he ought to act, or to instruct his successors. Hence, likewise, those fine observations upon the reward of virtue, the happy exit of good men, and the torment which awaits the wicked, especially those in power, in the second, third, fourth, and fifth chapters, designed, as he supposes, for the comfort of the distressed Jews, and as a warning and terror to evil and tyrannical princes. Hence, lastly, those severe remarks upon the original, progress, mischief, and downfal of images and idols, and those threatenings against them, their makers, and worshippers, which are to be found at large in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters. (Cens. Lib. Apoc. tom. i. Præl. 22.)

Junius thinks the Book of Wisdom was composed from some fragments of Solomon, and that it is an extract from his writings, which the seventh, eighth, and ninth chapters may seem to favour, and that Philo was the compiler; and so takes the middle way, between those who assign it to Solomon, and those who ascribe it to Philo. Bishop Cosin concurs in giving this book to Philo, (Schol. Hist. sect. 36.) and refers in the margin to the following authorities, as confirming this opinion, S. Basil, Ep. ad Amphiloch. S. Hier. Præf. in lib. Sol. Beleth de Div. Offic. cap. 60. Jo. Sarisbur. Epist. 172. Aquin. in Dionys. de Divin. Nom. cap. 4. Lect. 9. Bonavent. in lib. Sap. Lyran. in eundem. These farther authorities in favour of Philo, joined to Calmet's arguments, though stronger than any hitherto alleged for any other person, must yet be allowed to amount only to a bare probability.

As there is not sufficient light for determining with any certainty the real author of the Book of Wisdom, or the precise time in which he wrote, I shall set down only what is most generally agreed on with relation to this book, viz. that it was not wrote by Solomon, though the title carries his name, nor originally in Hebrew; that it was wrote by a Hellenist Jew, for the style shews that it was a Greek that composed it, as St. Jerome observes, "Stylus ipse Græcam eloquentiam redolet," (Prol. in lib. Sap.) and from some circumstances in the book itself, it seems most probable to be wrote by a Hellenist Jew of Alexandria in particular. That it was wrote long after Malachi, and the ceasing of propheey, even a considerable time after the LXX. interpreters, and therefore not by one of them. We may, I think, come still nearer its true date, if we place it after the times of the Maccabees, and consequently that it is much later than the Book of Ecclesiasticus: for what Grotius urges from its being placed in all the copies before that of Ecclesiasticus, is of little weight to determine its era, nor is the order of books, as it occurs in our Bibles, any rule for settling the precedence in point of time. For does not the book of Job follow after the Pentateuch, and other books confessedly later? and yet the learned suppose it to be wrote before any of the books of Moses, and probably the oldest book we have now remaining. (See Origen. cont. Cels. lib. i. Euseb. Demonst. Evang. lib. i. cap. 6. Selden, de Jure Nat. &c. cap. 11. Bishop Sherlock. Dissert. ii.) In a word, allowing the uncertainty of the author, and of the exact time when this book was wrote, yet, as it certainly precedes the most primitive ecclesiastical writings in point of time, and cannot, without manifest injury, be supposed inferior to them in point of worth, it ought at least to be put upon the same level with them, and challenge as high a regard.

What a late learned metropolitan says of the authority of the writings of the apostolical fathers, belongs in an equal, if not a higher, degree to the Apocryphal Books, especially the didactical ones: "We cannot doubt but that what was universally approved of, and allowed, not by a few learned men, but the whole church in those days, what was permitted to be publicly read to the faithful for their comfort and instruction, must by this means have received the highest human approbation, and ought to be looked upon by us, though not of equal authority with those books, which the same church has delivered to us as strictly canonical, yet as standing in the first rank of ecclesiastical writings." (Archbishop Wake's Prelim. Disc. to the Transl. of Apost. Epist. p. 119.)

CALMET'S PREFACE

TO

THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

CUSTOM and the language of the church have always given to the books attributed to Solomon, the title of Sapiential books. The fathers often cite them under the general name of The Wisdom of Solomon, and in ecclesiastical language, The Book of Wisdom comprehends not only all the undoubted works of that prince, but likewise Ecclesiasticus, and that which we are now going to explain, which by a peculiar privilege hath been called, by way of eminence, The Book of Wisdom; or, as the Greek expresses it, The Wisdom of Solomon. Not that Solomon was the author of this book, scarce any learned men are of that opinion; but it has been looked upon as a summary of his sentiments, and as containing some of his most weighty and important maxims. Some of the ancients quote it also by the Greek name Panaretos, i. e. a treasury of all virtue, or a collection of useful instructions to bring us to it. And in this sense we must understand wisdom in this author, as synonymous to religion, piety, justice, and the fear of God; a sense widely different from that in which wisdom is understood in the writings of the heathen philosophers, where it has but little concern or connexion with religion, and the practice of real virtue, aiming only to enlighten and improve the understanding, and to give it a sort of fruitless knowledge of general truths of a very imperfect morality founded wholly upon nature.

The principal end proposed by the author of this book is, the instruction of kings, nobles, and judges of the earth; he addresses his discourse to them, accommodates his rules to their circumstances and occasions, and exhorts them to a serious and diligent study of wisdom. And to incline them the more effectually to it, he assumes the name of Solomon, and speaks to them as in his person with an air of authority, but without haughtiness or affectation. He proposes this great prince to them as a pattern, and recounts by what means he arrived to that height of glory, riches, knowledge, and eloquence; he declares, that it is to wisdom alone he is indebted for all these blessings, and that whoever will imitate him, may arrive to the same happiness and perfection. And to engage them the more effectually to the pursuit, he assures them, that the means of attaining wisdom are not difficult, that to gain her is only asking her of God, that she even prevents those that seek her, and hastens to meet those who sincerely desire her.

He discovers to them, at the same time, the obstacles that they may meet with in the study and pursuit of wisdom, which he shews are chargeable on men themselves, rather than on God; that therefore they wrongfully accuse nature, and to no purpose urge their own weakness and infirmities. For death and sin made not their first entry into the world through the will of God, but by the fraud of the devil, and through the fault of men themselves. At first man was created pure, innocent, and immortal, and was himself the cause of forfeiting these great blessings and prerogatives. But notwithstanding his fall, wisdom is still possible to be attained by him, and, through the assistance of God, he may acquire it. But to engage God to be his friend, he must avoid, above all things, sin, debauchery, and deceit, for God will be served faithfully, and with an upright heart, nor will wisdom ever enter into or dwell in a deceitful and corrupt soul.

He expressly confutes those who believe the soul to be mortal, and who place their sovereign happiness in the pleasures of sense, and says, they deservedly brought death upon themselves, by siding with the devil, and ranging themselves in his party, who, through envy, brought men into this degenerate and unhappy state. He represents the righteous man as reviled, hated, persecuted, condemned unjustly, and at length put to death, and in such terms as suit admirably with the sufferings and passion of Jesus Christ. He threatens the wicked with the judgments of God, and extreme punishment in another life, and represents them in a state of despair at seeing the happiness of the just, which they shall be witnesses of. On the other side, he describes the blessed condition of the saints in a future state, as a condition of joy, peace, and glory, and represents them as kings and judges, who shall shine in heaven, and exercise there a jurisdiction as glorious, as their humiliation was on earth contemptible. He commends virginity, and opposes it to the many disorders of lust and incontinence, and in particular inveighs against the sin of adulterers, whose posterity he shews to be unfortunate, and of short continuance.

He speaks of wisdom in the most magnificent and pompous terms, in such a manner, that he often attributes to her what in strictness belongs only to the Divinity itself, of whom she is a ray and emanation. He gives her the name of the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, Creator, which fills and knows all things, and is almighty; one in essence, but manifold and diversified in her operations. He says, that wisdom is a sort of efflux or vapour, which issues and proceeds from the sovereign virtue of God, an emanation of his splendour, the brightness of the everlasting light, the spotless mirror of the majesty of God, and the express image of his goodness; that being but one, she can do all things, and continuing the same, renovates, or makes all things new. That none are beloved of God who are not filled with wisdom; that she is always about his throne, and was present at, and assisted in, the first creation of man. He prays to the Lord to send her down from heaven, that she may instruct him, and be his guide and assistant.

He shews the advantages which wisdom procures to men by his own happy experience; that Adam, who fell at the beginning, recovered himself by wisdom; that through her Noah had the happiness to please God, and to preserve himself pure and unspotted in the midst of a wicked and perverse generation; that it was wisdom which preserved Abraham from the general corruption of the world, and Lot in the destruction of Sodom. He relates the history of Jacob and Joseph; that of Moses and the Hebrews in Egypt and in the desert; and the principal miracles that God wrought in their favour, and always ascribes to wisdom the glory of them. He draws an elaborate and judicious parallel of the different manner in which God treated the Egyptians and the Hebrews, and compares the just severity of God towards the former, with the many signal instances of favour shewn to the latter. He enlarges upon the original of idolatry, and shews its folly, progress, fatal consequences and effects, and foretells its ruin and downfal. That idolaters are the most senseless of all men, and their blindness absolutely inexcusable, in not discovering and finding out the true God by the help and scale of the creatures. And in general it may be said, that in no other book of Scripture, nobler and more grand conceptions of the Deity are to be met with than in this.

There are some particular sentiments in this book, which have made some doubt of the inspiration of the author, and of the canonicalness of the book itself. We shall examine in a particular Dissertation, what he says about the original of idolatry. There is some difficulty in what he asserts with respect to his own soul, that it, being naturally good, had the happiness to light into a body likewise pure and undefiled, (viii. 20.) We have examined the passage in the course of this work, and shewn that he speaks there only of natural parts, and not of any moral qualities or endowments.

He says, in another place, that Joseph had the sceptre of Egypt, which is not mentioned in the books of Moses, and that the Hebrews, whilst they remained there, under the bondage of Pharaoh, were a just and irreproachable people, which is contrary to what Ezekiel and other prophets say of them, who accuse them of idolatry in that very country. He approves of the Hebrews spoiling the Egyptians of their goods, as being only the just recompence of their labour, which before was so badly requited. He adds likewise many particulars to Moses's account: he seems to believe that Abraham lived at the time of the building the tower of Babel, and that wisdom prevented him from consenting to that bold and presumptuous design, and kept him free from idolatry, which, like an inundation, overspread the earth. He accuses the Canaanites of magic, eating human flesh, worshipping flies and insects, which the Scripture does not charge them with. It is true indeed, that the Philistines adored Beelzebub, the god of flies; but these people were not of the race of Canaan, nor of his extraction.

He says, that the fire which fell with hail and rain upon Egypt, spared those animals which plagued the Egyptians, supposing that the frogs, flies, and locusts were still subsisting at that time, which is contrary to the account of Moses. He speaks of manna, as a food prepared in heaven, as the nourishment of angels, and in which the Hebrews found every thing agreeable to their palate that they could wish for; whereas Moses tells us, that the taste of manna was like that of wafers, or bread prepared with oil; that the Israelites were so surfeited with it, that they disliked the very sight of it. He makes apparitions and spectres to haunt the Egyptians during the three days' darkness in Egypt, supposing them to be visible by the light of some sudden and occasional flashes; and adds some circumstances about the Israelites' passage through the Red Sea which seem fabulous, as what he says of grass and flowers appearing at the bottom of it, to make their journey more easy and delightsome; and, in fine, seems to believe, that the quails which fell in the wilderness round about the camp of the Hebrews, was a miraculous production, like that of the flies and frogs which Moses brought upon the land of Egypt.

But to all this we may answer in general, 1. That it is a piece of natural justice due to an author, that is not living nor capable of explaining his own sentiments, to understand his expressions in the most favourable sense, and not to impute a bad meaning to him, as long as one is not forced to it by the plain evidence of his own words: now we have shewn in the comment, that there are none of these passages which have been excepted against, but what may be understood in a good and consistent sense. 2. With respect to the additions which are complained of, it is common, we know, both in sacred and profane history, for one writer to supply what hath been omitted by another.

"This answer will hold (it may be replied) when two authors contemporary, or nearly so, record the same fact; but the case is quite otherwise here, as the author of this book lived many ages after Moses." To this we rejoin, that there are two ways by which the memory of events may be transmitted to posterity, viz. by Scripture, or by tradition. If the author could not come to the knowledge of these particulars by the first of these ways, he might learn them by the second.—But if this author was inspired, as we assert, and shall hereafter shew, there is no withstanding the force of his evidence, unless there could be found in his account of things some manifest contradiction to the sacred history, or sentiments contrary to truth and religion, which can never be shewn.

For, with regard to Joseph's having the sceptre of Egypt, it is not to be understood of a kingdom or sovereignty properly so called; it means only that he was the second person in the kingdom, and had a very extensive rule over all that country. And do not Joseph's own brethren say as much? Joseph is yet alive, and is ruler over all the land of Egypt. As to the Hebrews, who lived under the cruel bondage of Pharaoh, loaded and overwhelmed with hardships, they were just and irreproachable with respect to that king and his subjects, who had cruelly enslaved them, though not so indeed in regard to God, who permitted their slavery to punish their idolatry.—The spoil of the goods of the Egyptians by the Hebrews is not condemned any where in Scripture, and such as have wrote on that subject, justify the action by many substantial reasons.—What this author says of the Canaanites is but too true. The description which the Scripture gives of their abominations, is much more shocking than any thing said of them in this book. We have already answered in general to the objection drawn from the addition to the sacred account, the rest will be discussed in the Commentary itself. Some have raised an argument from the author himself,—"If he is not the real Solomon, why does he endeavour to pass for that prince? Can the Holy Spirit inspire a writer to personate what he is not?" We answer, that such an artifice in this writer, whoever he be, is neither fraudulent nor false. It is no more than a sort of prosopopœia, an ingenious fiction, whereby a writer, to give more weight and authority to the instructions delivered, assumes the name and person of another more ancient. The woman of Tekoah speaks in such a disguised manner when she pretends before the king to have lost one of her sons, 2 Sam. xiv. 4. By the same artifice, one of the sons of the prophets feigns himself wounded for having let a prisoner escape, 1 Kings xx. 35. Thus Nathan reproved David for his sin with Bath-sheba, under the significant parable of the ewe-lamb. And thus the prophets introduce God, Moses, Abraham, as occasionally talking, to render their discourses, by such a fiction, the more lively and affecting.

The author of this book designed to give the heathens a just idea of the original and end of true wisdom.—The Greeks were passionately fond of philosophy; but they knew not its true origin, ascribing it to their own industry and pains, which the wise man, in this treatise, shews to be the gift of God. They make it to consist in fruitless speculations, or in rules of a morality merely chimerical (as was that of the Stoics, which exceeded the power of human nature), or one purely natural, which went no farther than common honesty, and the doing such actions as were agreeable to right reason. But this writer proposes to them supernatural wisdom, having God for its end, and holiness for its object. He overthrows idolatry by shewing its ridiculous rise, sad consequences, and the horrors and abominations which accompanied it; that therefore men, and above all, philosophers, are inexcusable, in not knowing and acknowledging God, and transferring to creatures that honour which is due to the Creator only. In a word, he destroys the opinions of the Epicureans and Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, a future judgment, the reality of hell, and the punishments and rewards of another life. After this manner he opposes the principal mistakes of the philosophers, and gives here the plan of a true and sound philosophy. Original sin, the fall, repentance, and recovery of the first man, the rewards and punishments in a future state, are as well, or perhaps more clearly, described in this book than in any of the Old Testament, which is of great consequence, to establish the truth of these opinions, and to shew the antiquity of such a belief among the Jews.

The six first chapters of this book are as a preface to the rest of the work; they are a sort of an abridgment of the nine first chapters of the book of Proverbs. In them kings and nobles are exhorted earnestly to the study of wisdom. In the seventh and eighth chapters, the author, assuming the name of Solomon, proposes himself as a pattern, and shews what means he employed to attain true wisdom. One sees there the description of his happy reign, and of his consummate knowledge, agreeably to what is said of it in the first book of Kings. The ninth chapter is a paraphrase on the prayer which Solomon made to God in the beginning of his reign, which is mentioned 1 Kings iii. 6—9. The tenth chapter, to the end of the book, is a continuation of the same prayer, where he enlarges upon the power of wisdom, and its effects, the evils which accompany the wicked and inconsiderate, and the rewards of the truly wise and righteous, which he confirms by various instances and examples. The work seems not to have been finished, or at least the conclusion of it has not reached us, for the author does not finish his prayer, as it is natural to suppose he should, according to his first design.

We shall not enlarge here upon the writer of this book, nor the time in which it was wrote; we shall do that in a particular Dissertation. The original text is in Greek, which is yet preserved, and it does not appear that it was ever extant in Hebrew, notwithstanding what some authors have thought to the contrary. We find none of those Hebraisms, which are hardly to be avoided by those who translate from the Hebrew, nor any turns but what are usual in the Greek tongue. The author manifestly had read the heathen writers, and wrote Greek well; he even borrows some expressions which are peculiar to them—as, the giants being drowned in the waters of the deluge, the river of Forgetfulness, or Lethe, the kingdom of Pluto or Hades, ambrosia, &c. there are some passages in which he plainly appears to have imitated Plato, and one clearly perceives that he had studied that philosopher. His style is swelling, abounds with epithets, often obscure, and almost throughout poetical and figurative. The Jewish writers had some knowledge of him, and have quoted him sometimes; Rabbi Moses ben Nachman cites particularly vii. 7. which he gives in Syriac, or such Hebrew as was spoken at Jerusalem in the time of our Saviour.

The author often quotes Scripture, and always according to the Septuagint. Thus v. 10—13. he compares the life of man to a shadow, to a vessel cutting the waves, to a bird which parts the air, and to an arrow shot at a mark, which is taken from Prov. xxx. 19. where the wise man says, according to the LXX. that there are four things which are hard to be known; the way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent upon a rock, the way of a ship in the midst of the sea, and the way of a young man in his youth; but in the Hebrew the last clause is, and the way of a young man with a virgin. So that passage in ii. 12. Let us lie in wait for the righteous, because he is not for our turn, is taken from Isa. iii. 10. where the Septuagint read, Let us bind the righteous, because he is disagreeable to us; but in the Hebrew it is, Say ye to the righteous that all shall be well with him. In his account of the plagues of Egypt, he follows the LXX. particularly in what he says of the flies and locusts. And when he speaks of idols in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters, he almost word for word copies what we have in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, and the Psalms on that subject.

The Latin translation which we have of this book is not St. Jerome's; it is the ancient Vulgate, used in the church before the time of that father, and made from the Greek, in the first ages of the church, by an author unknown. The translator does not seem well acquainted with the purity of the Latin tongue, often making use of words that are not used by approved authors in that sense; as honestas for riches; honestus for a rich man; respectus or visitatio for the punishment which God inflicts upon the wicked; supervacuitas for vanity or vain-glory; animalia supervacua for dangerous and noxious animals. The translation keeps very close to the text, and is strictly exact in rendering every single word faithfully, neglecting all ornaments of speech, and the beauties of the Latin idiom. St. Jerome, in his preface to the books of Solomon, says, that he corrected Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, from the ancient version of the LXX. but did not meddle with the translation of this book, or Ecclesiasticus. There are not many various readings in the Greek copies, but a much greater number in the Latin ones. The Complut. edition, that of Antwerp, and of Sixtus V. in 1590, afford a great variety, which are corrected in the Bibles of Clement VIII. and in the Vulgate. We have marked them at the bottom of each page in the Commentary.

The Book of Wisdom was not always received by the church as canonical, as not being admitted into the Jewish canon of Scripture among those books, which were wrote in their language, and passed through their hands to the Christian church without any doubt or exception. But such as were written in Greek, as Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, have been disputed and contested, and the church, always cautious and wary in her decisions, did not decree to admit them for canonical, till after mature judgment and long deliberation; which slowness in her proceedings and determination shews, that she did not admit them hastily, or by chance. The scarcity of books in the beginning of Christianity, the great distance of churches from one another, the difficulty of assembling general councils, made each church keep to its own tradition, to admit, or not to admit books, till the truth was at length discovered.

The principal reasons brought against the canonicalness of this book are, 1. That there is no appearance that Philo the Jew, to whom very many authors ascribe it, was inspired; he lived and died a Jew without any knowledge of Jesus Christ, or receiving his gospel. 2. The doubts of some ancient fathers, who have ranked it in the number of disputed writings: that several particular churches left it out of their canon, and even some late interpreters, as Lyranus and Cajetan, did not admit it as indisputably canonical. 3. The Jews not admitting it into their canon, for it does not appear to have been known among them before the time of Jesus Christ. 4. Internal evidence in the book itself to reject it, as plain imitations of the gospel, and writings of the apostles; the opposition of some passages to the undoubted Scriptures; and the addition of others, which appears to have been made on purpose. All that can be objected on this head, we have mentioned before in the body of this preface; and will examine, in the Dissertation upon the author of this book, the objections with respect to Philo, and those passages in the gospel and writings of the apostles, which resemble some in this book. We have also answered, both in the Commentary and in this preface, the accusation of untruth, which has been urged against this writer. There remains only the difficulty which arises from the Jews not acknowledging it to be canonical, and some of the ancients not receiving it.

The authority of the Jews hath never been of any great weight in the church, particularly of the modern Jews, whose malice and unfair dealing, in every thing relating to our faith and holy religion, is open and notorious. The apostles, whose authority is of infinitely more weight than theirs, have taken quotations and proofs from this book.* And it is begging the question to say, that this writer copied from them. They recommended it to the faithful, who have ever since preserved, read, and cited it as inspired Scripture, so that we cannot now form any reasonable doubt about its canonicalness. To the testimony of those few among the ancients, who have disputed its authority, we oppose a crowd of witnesses in all ages of the church, who have acknowledged and quoted it as Divine

Scripture. In short, to the scruples of those who, seeing antiquity wavering upon this point, have found some difficulty to persuade themselves to admit this book into the canon, we oppose the third council of Carthage, in 397; that of Sardica, in 347; that of Constantinople, in Trullo, in 692; the eleventh of Toledo, in 675; that of Florence, in 1438; and, lastly, the fourth session of the council of Trent; all which expressly admitted this book into the class of Holy Scripture. And there is scarce any ancient father who has not quoted and commended it. Many of them attribute it to Solomon, others to some prophet, and all to an inspired writer.* We may therefore reasonably urge upon this occasion, the argument of prescription against our adversaries, and let them produce their title against our quiet possession. Let them attack and confute, if they can, so many councils,† and those learned ecclesiastical writers* which are the bulwarks of our cause: they must overthrow all these, before they will be able to reach us.

The prophecies which are to be met with in this book, and which have been acknowledged as such by the fathers, are still farther proofs of its canonicalness. All that is

* Some of the later fathers, as St. Jerome, St. Austin, &c. give indeed very honourable titles to the Book of Wisdom, and the other Apocryphal Books, calling them canonical, sacred, divine; but then they mean not by canonical, as the church of Rome does, canones fidei, a perfect rule of faith; but canones morum et historiæ, such as are profitable only for instruction, and to inform men in the history of the Jewish church. (See Dupin's Biblioth. Pat. tom. i. p. 1.) Nor, when they call them sacred or divine, do they mean to equal them to Divine Scripture, strictly so called, or to make them of the same sovereign authority with the undoubted canonical books themselves, for the establishing matters of faith, or determining controversies in religion. (See St. Jer. epist. 7. ad Læt. Epist. ad Paul. Præf. in lib. Sol. Aust. de Doctr. Christ. lib. ii. cap. 8. Retract. lib. ii. cap. 10. De Civit. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 23. Cyril. Hieros. in Catech. sect. 4. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. vi. cap. 25. Ruffin. in Expos. Symb.)

† As the catholics lay the stress of their cause upon these councils, and this learned commentator triumphs in them as their bulwark, it seems proper, and even necessary, to examine into the authority of these councils, and consider how far they prove the point they are brought for. I shall take them in the order as they stand in this preface. With respect to the third council of Carthage, whereat St. Austin himself, they say, was present, we reply, 1. This council was not ecumenical, but only a provincial one. 2. The forty-seventh canon (according to Binius), which they urge against us, was not originally in the acts of this council, but added in the time of Pope Boniface. For if this council was held under the consulate of Cæsarius and Atticus in the year 397, as the inscription or title of this council in all copies has it, there can be no such canon in it; for Boniface, to whom this canon refers, was not at that time pope of Rome, nor above twenty years after, not till 418. 3. The great and general council of Chalcedon, consisting of six hundred and thirty bishops, confirmed the code of the universal church; in that code were contained the canons of the council of Laodicea, wherein we have the catalogue of the canonical books of Scripture; but the canons of the council of Carthage were not confirmed by it, as not having yet any place in it. And therefore we may safely conclude, that neither Pope Leo the First (whose legate subscribed the council for him), nor any of the bishops there gathered together, acknowledged any other books of canonical Scripture, than what the council of Laodicea (which left out all these books) had declared to be received, and read for such in the church, before their time. 4. The Romanists themselves do not generally allow the authority of this council, to determine what books are canonical: for Wisdom, and the rest of the Apocryphal Books, have been since rejected by many great and considerable persons among them, as Isidore, Nicephorus, Rabanus Maurus, Hugo, Lyran, Cajetan. (See Limborch's Theol. Christ. lib. i. cap. 3. Melch. Canus. Loc. Theol. lib. v. cap. ult. Baron. Ann. tom. viii. ad ann. 692.)

The next is that of Sardica, or Sardis, in 347, which was so far from a general council, that it was only a western synod. The canons of this council were never received by the catholic church as general laws, they were never put into the code of the canons of the universal church, which was approved by the great council of Chalcedon, but were first added to the code by Dionysius Exiguus, as those of the council of Carthage likewise were. The east never received these canons, nor would the bishops of Africa own them. The popes only used them, and cited them under the name of the council of Nice, to give them the greater weight and authority. (See Dupin's Eccl. Hist. vol. ii. p. 261.)

As to that at Constantinople in Trullo, this is only cited by them as confirming the council of Carthage; for in other respects, the canons of this council are not so agreeable to the Roman writers, who represent them as falsified and corrupt. They do not relish the thirty-sixth canon, which makes the bishop of Constantinople equal to the bishop of Rome; nor the fifty-fifth, which lays some restraints upon the church of Rome. But it is to be well observed, that the two hundred and twenty-seven bishops here assembled, in the second canon, confirmed also the council of Laodicea (which was thirty-seven years before that of Carthage, which they urge), which reckons the canonical books of Scripture as we do, and excludes the rest, in canon fifty-nine, as not properly belonging to them. When therefore in the same second canon they allow also the council of Carthage, they cannot be supposed immediately to contradict themselves, but that they understood the Laodicean council to be taken in one sense, and the council of Carthage in another; the latter extended, in a large and improper acceptation of Scripture, to the ecclesiastical books, and the former, in a more strict and proper sense, took in only these books that were really authentic and Divine. For in one and the same sense they cannot both be taken, nor otherwise be confirmed and stand together. (See Cosin's Schol. Hist. sect. 104. Episcop. Instit. Theol. lib. vii. cap. 7.)

There is still less to be said in favour of the eleventh council of Toledo, which was subscribed only by the archbishop of Toledo, sixteen bishops, two deacons, two bishops, deputies, and seven abbots. A number too small and contemptible to make a council!

That of Florence in 1438, is of so modern a date, that it can be of no great weight. It was assembled by the authority of the pope, and under his influence and management. In the large tomes and editions of the councils, no such canon, as is pretended, is to be found; it is a decree added by some impostor, probably the epitomizer or abridger of the councils, and is supposed with reason to be a forgery, for nothing was mentioned at this council concerning the canon of Scripture. Nor can it be called a general or ecumenical council, even in respect of the Latin churches only; many of which neither acknowledged Eugenius, or his council, and the council of Bazil then sitting, condemned this of Florence as a schismatical assembly. And the Greeks, as soon as they were returned, and got to Constantinople, would stand to nothing that their own fears and the pope's persuasion had before led them into. (See Cosin's Schol. Hist. sect. 160.)

The last is the famous decree of the council of Trent, wherein forty-three, or some few persons more, were only assembled, and cursed all other persons in the world, that did not receive their new canon of Scripture in such manner and form, as they were then first pleased to appoint it. To establish this ecumenical decree, as they most unwarrantably called it, of the Greek church they had not one; of the English as few; of the Helvetian, German, and northern churches none; of the French scarce two; of the Spanish not many. All the rest were Italians, and they in no great number; among whom some were the pope's pensioners, and sent thither to overbalance the votes of others, many of them titular, and some unlearned. And was it ever heard in the world before, that forty bishops of Italy, assisted, perhaps, with half-a-score others, should make up a general council for all Christendom? (See Cosin's Schol. Hist. sect. 194.) Wherein, as there was not any one greatly remarkable for learning, that voted the canonical authority of the Apocryphal Books, which the eastern and western churches ever held as suspected and uncertain; so some of them (as Father Paul observes, whose testimony upon this occasion must be allowed of great weight, and less exceptionable) were lawyers, eminent, perhaps, in their own profession, but of little skill and understanding in controverted points of religion; and such divines as were among them, were of low parts, and less than ordinary sufficiency: the greater number were courtiers, and bishops of such small places, or dignities only titular, that supposing every one to represent the clergy and people from whence he came, it could not be said that one in a thousand in Christendom was represented in this pretended council. (See Brent's Transl. of the Hist. of the Council of Trent, b. ii. p. 153.) I mentioned just above, that the eastern and western churches looked upon the Apocryphal Books as suspected and uncertain. Those that are curious may see this matter very minutely discussed by a particular detail of the sentiments of the several churches, extracted chiefly from the writings of the bishops, that presided over the respective sees, which Episcopius has happily executed, Instit. Theol. lib. iii. cap. 7. in such a clear manner, and so exact a method, as to time, place, and persons, that we see the judgment of these two great ecclesiastical bodies, as it were, in one view, and without any confusion or perplexity.

* This may be disproved by almost an infinity of testimonies in Bp. Cosin's Scholastical History, wherein by an historical disquisition of the universal tradition of the church of God, unanimously delivered in all ages from the apostles' times (and before) to ours, and by a very particular enumeration of the testimonies of the ancient ecclesiastical writers through the several centuries, it appears, that neither the ancient fathers, bishops, nor ecclesiastical writers, taught or believed otherwise than we now hold. So that it seems strange, that so learned a writer as Calmet, should either be so greatly deceived in a point of such consequence, or one in other respects so fair and candid, should knowingly triumph in false evidence and unsupported authorities: nor is it less strange, that he should not give the incomparable book of this prelate a place in his Bibliotheca Sacra, as the nature of that work required: but we may suppose that he either did not know it, being wrote in English, or did not care to have it known and read, the answers of it being so cogent against the Romanists, and the book itself the strongest bulwark of the protestant cause in this controverted point betwixt us.

mentioned here of the future downfal of idolatry, and of the terrible judgments which God will inflict upon the wicked, may be considered as a true prophecy. But the place upon which the ancients have fixed with most attention, is, where the author describes the punishments of the just man, in terms so resembling the sufferings of Jesus Christ, that Grotius imagines these passages to have been added to the book by some Christian interpolator, after the death of our Saviour; which is not at all probable, as they are so linked and interwoven with the context, that they are not to be separated without manifest violence. The fathers had quite a different opinion of them, and have made use of them against Jews and heathens, and shewn the complete accomplishment of them in the person of Jesus Christ.

The Jews themselves do not absolutely reject this book; I have before observed, that a learned rabbi quotes a passage from it in his preface to the Pentateuch. John Picus of Mirandola asserts, that the Jews read a Book of Wisdom in Hebrew, composed, as they thought, by Solomon, as the marrow and quintessence of the law of Moses. But it is very different from this book. Isidore, Sixtus of Sienna, Christopher a Castro, Gonsalve a Cervantes, Lorin, in their prefaces to this book, maintain that it was wrote at first in Hebrew, and afterward translated into Greek: many affirm, that it was wrote by Solomon, and translated after into Greek by the LXX. But these last opinions go too far. If the Jews were acquainted with and read this book, it must have been translated into their language from the Greek, and we must indeed agree that they never received it as canonical.

CALMET'S DISSERTATION

UPON THE

AUTHOR OF THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

IF the dispute which hath been raised about the author of the Book of Wisdom, was only among catholic writers and all parties were agreed upon its canonicalness, and the inspiration of the author, we should have given ourselves no more trouble about this, than some others of the sacred books, whose canonicalness is acknowledged by all the churches, even those which are separated from our communion, though the writers of them are doubtful and unknown. When once it is agreed that the Holy Spirit is the original author of a book, one need not be so solicitous who the person employed as the instrument is. But in the question before us, many of those who dispute about the writer of this work, attempt to destroy its authority, and, by diminishing the credit of its author, would take the liberty to reject it as apocryphal. To oppose this is the design of the present Dissertation, wherein we shall endeavour to shew, that though the author of the Book of Wisdom be not certainly known, the book itself does not cease on that account to be authentic, inspired, canonical.

Many catholic writers suppose the author of this book to be Solomon himself. "He wrote it (say they) in Hebrew, from whence it was translated into Greek by the LXX. interpreters, together with the other works of that prince: the ancient fathers quote it often under his name, and it has generally that title in the Greek copies. The author plainly assumes this character throughout, and the true Solomon stands confessed in as clear a manner, as in any other of his books. Every body agrees that it is not unworthy of his consummate wisdom, and high reputation, and that his sentiments and maxims are comprised in it: that though this piece is not now to be met with in the Hebrew, it cannot be concluded from thence, that it was never wrote in that language: for how many works have we in the versions and translations only, the originals of which are not now to be found? and how many are ascribed to particular authors, as indisputably theirs, which have less marks to ascertain them to belong to such writers, than this has of being the genuine work of Solomon?" This is what they plausibly urge in behalf of this opinion.

But to these reasons it may be replied, that if this work was really Solomon's, and was in Hebrew in the time of the LXX. interpreters, the Jews would not have forgot or neglected it as they have done, nor excluded it their canon. It is entirely unknown in that language to Josephus, Philo, St. Jerome, and Origen; so that in all appearance it never was in that language. Add to this, that the turn of the phrase and expressions are in the manner of the Greeks, and very different from the genius of the Hebrew tongue. The author quotes the Scripture in it according to the LXX. and borrows passages from books, which were not wrote till a long time after Solomon. To pretend that the Jews have suppressed the original, out of hatred to the Christians, who make use of its authority to convince them, that they have accomplished, in the murder of our Saviour, what was foretold of him in this book, is to advance what is incredible, and raising an objection which has been a hundred times confuted, and more difficult to maintain, than what they would avoid by this plea. For, could the Jews have suppressed it, if they would? and if they could, what service would that have done them, since they have left it us in Greek, with so many other books, as strong at least as this, to establish the truth of our religion?

The authority of the fathers is decisive, to prove a point of faith, and the authenticalness of any text; but then their testimony must be constant and uniform; but in a matter of criticism, and where their judgments are divided, their opinion does not always determine the case. Now here the ancients do not speak in a uniform manner; some absolutely deny Solomon to be the author, others speak doubtfully, and none affirm it in express words. They cite indeed this work according to the usage of the church, which comprehends under the name of the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon, not only Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, but also this book and that of Ecclesiasticus. The title of the book in the Greek copies is no stronger an argument than the name of king, which this author assumes in the body of the work, or the port and appearance of Solomon, with which he would set himself off. The ancients often call their books by the names of persons whom they introduce speaking, as Plato gives to his Dialogues the names of Socrates, Timæus, Protagoras; and Cicero, to his book of Famous Orators, that of Brutus, and to another that of Hortensius. Xenophon too calls the history, in which he gives the model of a complete prince, by the name of Cyrus, who is the principal character drawn in it. But nobody will say, that these pieces were wrote by those whose names they bear, for it is known and confessed on all hands, that it was Plato, Cicero, Xenophon, who wrote them under such fictitious names. St. Jerome says expressly, that the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon carries a false and borrowed title.

The resemblance that is to be found in the thoughts and expressions of this book with those of Solomon, is so far from proving him to be the writer of it, that it furnishes a strong argument to the contrary. This prince would never have copied from himself, nor have repeated here, what he had already said in some other work; nor would he have cited passages from Isaiah and Jeremiah, who lived so long after him. We do not design or endeavour to decry the book, or to diminish its real worth and value; we readily own, that it is not unworthy of the wisdom of Solomon himself, and we have given it an author more great and noble than that prince—it is the Holy Spirit, which inspired this writer, as he did Solomon. I shall not repeat here, what I have said elsewhere, with respect to some terms used in this book, which are borrowed from the heathens, such as ambrosia, the river of Forgetfulness, or Lethe, the kingdom of Pluto or Hades, &c. These fables are apparently of later date than Solomon, as well as the chaplets and crowns of roses, mentioned ii. 8.

St. Austin was once of opinion, that Jesus the son of Sirach was the author of the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus; but he did not long continue under that mistake; he recants as to the book of Wisdom, Retract. lib. ii. cap. 4. and without explicitly saying who is the author, owns that it is more probable that Jesus the son of Sirach did not write it: he says in another place, that it was by no means likely to be wrote by Solomon; but he does not doubt, but that it, and Ecclesiasticus, were both written by inspiration.* And he elsewhere observes, that the primitive writers of the church, nearest the times of the apostles, fetched proofs from this book, as being of Divine authority; that there can be no pretence for not receiving it, and placing it in the rank with the other Scriptures.

St. Jerome informs us, that some ancient writers ascribed the Book of Wisdom to Philo the Jew; which words have afforded much matter of dispute to authors that came after. Some have looked upon it as a dangerous opinion, which tends to destroy the whole authority of the book, by ascribing it to a Jewish writer, and one who was never reckoned inspired. Others have adopted him without any limitation, but the greater part add this restriction, that the Philo, whom St. Jerome mentions, is not that Philo whose writings we have, who is commonly known by the name of Philo the Jew, but some other more ancient. For they pretend that there were several authors of this name: the first, as they say, lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and was one of the LXX. interpreters; the second is Philo of Biblos, who is cited by Eusebius and Josephus; the third is Philo the Jew; the fourth is one who lived under the second temple, and wrote a book about the soul.

The first Philo is unknown to antiquity, nor is there any reason to place him in the time of Ptolemy and the Seventy interpreters. In all appearance there never was such an author, since he is not mentioned by any ancient writer. The second was a pagan, a native of Biblos, who translated the history of Phœnicia into Greek. Josephus places him in the same rank with Demetrius and Eupolemus, who, not being of the Jewish religion, could not have acquired a sufficient knowledge of their books to give any true and just idea of their history, and can with less reason be supposed to be the author of sacred and prophetic books. The next then is the famous Philo, the Jew of Alexandria, who lived in the first age of the church, and was deputed by the Jews of that place to the emperor Caius, about the year 40 of the common era. He wrote many books in his youth, but in the latter part of his time was employed in public and national affairs, and was of great service to his countrymen. Eusebius and St. Jerome write, that in a second embassy which he was sent upon to the emperor Claudius, he contracted an acquaintance and friendship with St. Peter. Photius says, that he even embraced Christianity, but quitted it again out of discontent or disgust. Josephus mentions him as a very considerable person. His works are in a style admirable for its beauty and plainness, but his method of expounding Scripture is allegorical. Photius thinks, that it was from him the custom was first introduced into the church of explaining the Scriptures allegorically, and it is certain that some of the fathers have followed his method. As to Philo's being a Christian, that opinion is now exploded by all learned men, as well as his pretended intimacy with St. Peter.

There are four ways to judge whether Philo, to whom many of the ancients have ascribed this book, be really the author of it. 1. A conformity of sentiments and method. 2. A resemblance of style. 3. An agreement with the person and character of Philo, and the times wherein he lived. 4. The authority of those writers who have ascribed this book to him. We shall examine these particulars in their order.

The author of the Book of Wisdom represents God as the creator and preserver of all things, of infinite wisdom and justice, and whose providence watches over and extends unto all his works. A God who aims only at the good of his creatures, who created them originally pure and innocent, and does not proceed to punish them till their wickedness is incorrigible, and at its full height; who is the author of true wisdom, and all other blessings, and communicates them freely to such as sincerely ask for them. Philo agrees in all these sentiments; but as this is nothing extraordinary in a Jewish writer, I shall not stop to draw the parallel, which would be of no service here.

The soul of man, according to the Book of Wisdom, is immortal, and linked to a corruptible body, the weight of which draws it to the earth, and presses it downwards; it is capable of eternal happiness, but when it gives itself up to the pursuit of sin and wickedness, it brings upon itself punishments and misery without end; it is inexcusable, when it continues ignorant of its Creator, who is so loudly proclaimed by his works. Philo says much the same, "That the soul of man is clothed with the body as with a garment, but that of a wise man with his virtues;" and in another place, "That while we continue in this world, we are in a state of pilgrimage; but a wise man looks upon himself, when in the body and upon the earth, as in some strange place, considering heaven as his only true country, and his proper native place."

Philo supposes two sorts of souls, some of which descend into and inhabit bodies, and others are at a great distance and very remote; of those that enter into bodies, and continue there, some apply themselves to, and are trained up in, a philosophy wholly sublime, which, after the death of the body, they continue to pursue, to purchase a life eternal and incorruptible: the other sort, overwhelmed with the weight of the flesh, neglect the study of wisdom, and giving themselves up to the caprice of fortune, are attached to things sensible and corporeal, to the pursuit of vanity, glory, riches, &c. which very much resembles what the author of the Book of Wisdom, speaking in the person of Solomon, says, viii. 19. 20. that he had a good spirit, or rather, that, being good, he came into a body undefiled; wherein he supposes a pre-existence of souls, some good, others wicked, not by nature, or through any fate or necessity, but voluntarily and by inclination, which is certainly the opinion of Philo in many places.

The high encomiums this author gives of wisdom are likewise to be met with in Philo, who says, "That she is a pure gift from the bounty of God, who communicates her to souls well disposed, which love contemplation; that she existed before all ages, and by her the world itself was created; that she is as the mother and God the father of it; that the wise alone are truly worthy to reign, to have command and sovereignty, and only these are truly rich; that wisdom is all Divine, and nothing more easily to be acquired, being always ready to communicate herself; that she never shuts her school, but is willing and disposed to receive those who desire instruction. These she enchants, and as it were inebriates, with sweet and agreeable draughts of her doctrines; she invites them to come and improve themselves by her lessons, and promises them infinite advantages and blessings." According to Philo, kings should distinguish themselves by their wisdom, and their ambition, happiness, and glory, should centre in this; that a prince should be well versed and instructed not only in human and secular affairs, but likewise in spiritual and Divine, and should appear to his subjects as an animated oracle, and a living law; which agrees admirably with the idea which the wise man here gives of a perfect and consummate prince.

The author of this book speaks of the Word, or the Word of the Lord, as a distinct person from him that generated and sent him. He ascribes to him Divine attributes, particularly omnipotence. It was this Word which fed the Israelites in the wilderness, cured the bitings of the serpents, slew the first-born of the Egyptians, and, in fine, created the world. Philo resembles our author more on this head, than in any other particular; and some have pretended, that he had even knowledge of that Divine Word, of which St. John speaks in the beginning of his Gospel; and others have advanced, but against all reason, that this holy evangelist took his doctrine and expressions from him. He says, that the invisible Word which created all things is the express image of God, above all the world, more ancient than it, and superior to all creatures. That this Word was employed to separate and divide the elements, and to range all the parts and matter of the universe into form and order according to his own will. That this Word was begotten of God, was the Creator of the universe, and has a dominion and sovereignty over all the kingdoms of the world. In speaking of Isaac, he says, that this patriarch never departed from his duty to God, but that he attached himself to the Word, that Divine Mediator, which instructs us in those things which are best for us, and came down to, and condescended to, converse with us, to teach us what is most convenient and proper for us in all circumstances: for, continues he, God disdains not to be known to, and intimate with, such as love virtue, and sends his Word to support and succour them.

The punishment and sufferings of the wicked in another life, and the rewards and glory of the righteous, are admirably described in the Book of Wisdom; Philo speaks of them in as plain and distinct a manner. He says, that the elements, the air, fire, and water, all conspire to the punishment of the wicked; God, by his almighty power, employing those very things, which he designed for the benefit and use of man, as his instruments and scourges to punish the ingratitude and wickedness of his creatures. He observes, speaking of Cain, that men imagine temporal death to be the greatest of all misfortunes, not reflecting upon the terrible tribunal of the sovereign Judge which will succeed, with respect to which, in the judgment of God himself, death may be considered only as the commencement of their misery. And what is their misery? It is to live, as continually dying, or rather to be dying always, without ceasing to live: a death always renewing, and in some sense immortal. For there are two sorts of death, the first is that of the body, which is an indifferent thing, it may be either good or bad; but the second is, to die without ceasing, the greatest and most terrible of all calamities and misfortunes.

He says, in another place, that the wicked are always dead, though they should chance to live even to extreme old age, and that the righteous, on the contrary, though dead and departed this life, through bodily sufferings, are really living, and enjoy a life permanent, and without end; and he instances in Nadab and Abihu, who being dead betimes, enjoy immortality, and a life incorruptible before God.* He elsewhere observes, that long life does not consist in a number of years, but in a course of goodness, expressions exactly agreeing with these of the Book of Wisdom: "Though the righteous be prevented with death, yet shall he be in rest; for honourable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor is measured by the number of years; but wisdom is gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age. That God took his beloved [Enoch] from the world in the flower of his age, lest wickedness should alter his understanding, or deceit beguile his soul; and that being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time, or had all the real advantages of old age." Chap. iv. 7—9. 11. 13.

What the writer of the Book of Wisdom says of idolatry and idolaters in the thirteenth chapter, is so like what we find in Philo in the beginning of his treatise, De Monarch. that one perceives plainly that they had both the same sentiments, and did not copy the one from the other. They both shew the folly and mistake of those who deified the stars, instead of exalting their hearts, and paying their devotions to Him, who is the great creator and ruler over them. In his piece upon the Decalogue, there is a passage entirely agreeable to that of Wisdom, xv. 15. where the ridiculousness of those pretended deities is exposed, which neither have the use of eyes to see, nor noses to draw breath, nor ears to hear, nor fingers of hands to handle; and as for their feet they are slow to go. There is no end of multiplying instances of the agreement between Philo and the Book of Wisdom; but these that we have produced, may be sufficient to shew the conformity of their sentiments.

Let us now examine the facts mentioned by the author of the Book of Wisdom, which seem to differ from the account of Moses. Philo, speaking of Joseph, says, that he was made viceroy, or, to speak more properly, king, of Egypt. And in the description of the plagues of that country, he says, that in the parts beyond Memphis there is no rain, nor do they know what winter is. But at the command of Moses, nature changed her appearance, and the air assumed new qualities, and thunder, lightnings, hail, and rain, were as dreadfully and sensibly felt there, as in other regions. And what was very particular, the water did not extinguish the fire in the lightning, nor the fire melt and dissolve the hail: a reflection, which the author of the Book of Wisdom likewise makes in several parts of that work.

Philo remarks, that, during the darkness in Egypt, which lasted three days, no fire could be kindled there, the thickness of the fog extinguishing it immediately; which is agreeable to our author's account. With respect to manna, the expressions of both are very much alike. According to Philo, it is a nourishment produced without the labour of man, sent purposely from heaven, and, in a figurative sense, is the wisdom of God, his word, or commandment; which is very like what Moses says, on this occasion, That man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord, (Deut. viii. 3.) He explains in an allegorical manner the vestments of the high-priest, and, like our author, supposes them to be symbolical of the universe; that the habit in general represents the whole world, and each particular answers to, and expresses, the several principal parts of it. The long robe of an azure colour, is an emblem of the air; the pomegranates at the bottom represent the water; the ornaments, or flowers, denote the earth; and the bells, the harmony which is in the several parts of it, from whence the union of the system proceeds. The Hebrew text speaks only of the pomegranates and bells, but Philo follows the LXX. who seem Exod. xxviii. 33. to mention flowers. All this is agreeable to, and an explanation of, what our author says in fewer words, That in the long garment was the whole world, (xviii. 24.)

One thing is very observable, that Philo doth not copy the very words of the Book of Wisdom, as he would have done, if he had designed to quote or use it, as the work of another writer. He follows in general the same method, the same sentiments, the same thoughts, but in different terms; as when one and the same author expresses himself upon particular points in different works. From this very great likeness and conformity of opinions, many of the ancients have concluded Philo to be the author of the Book of Wisdom.

The difference of the style of Philo, and that of the Book of Wisdom, is one of the strongest arguments against his being the real author; but the ancients, who were as good judges as the moderns upon this head, it is manifest, laid no great stress upon the difference of style, since it did not hinder them from ascribing this book notwithstanding to Philo. And in spite of the diversity of style, one may observe in several parts of this book the pompous turns of Philo, his exuberance in epithets, and his rich vein displayed by many lively and pathetic descriptions. But as he wrote it under the borrowed name of Solomon, he might disguise his style a little, and appear more sententious in this book, than in his other works: this probably is the true reason of the difference of style, it proceeds from the matter and subject itself. For let the same person write an oration, lessons of morality, an epistle, or a poem, will not a great variety of style necessarily arise from these different characters, though they are all penned, and proceed from one and the same author?

Though the book we are speaking of affords but few hints whereby to form a judgment of the time and place in which it was wrote; yet, as glimmering as the light is, it may be sufficient to give us some idea of both. The author lived in an idolatrous country, and most probably in Egypt, since upon all occasions he inveighs against the ridiculous idolatry of the Egyptians, which consisted in paying adoration to water, fire-serpents, and other beasts the most frightful and mischievous. He lived at a time when the Jews had a great aversion to idolatry; he speaks of its origin, and that one cause of it was the grief of a tender parent for a deceased child, which at length terminated in paying Divine honours to him. This remark is more applicable to Egypt than any other country, upon account of that great respect which the Egyptians are remarkable for paying to their dead; and because it is certain that Isis and Osiris, the first deities of this country, had the sovereignty of Egypt, and the former appointed Divine honours to the body of her deceased husband. He speaks likewise of the Jews being held in subjection, and persecuted under some idolatrous princes; which agrees very well with the times of Philo, when the Jews suffered greatly, both in Judea and in Egypt, from the Roman emperors, their deputies, and even the people themselves.

* Calmet here translates Philo literally; the passage referred to is in his treatise, de Profugis. Οἱ μὲν ἱερεῖς Ναδὰβ καὶ Ἀβιοὺδ, ἵνα ζήσωσιν ἀποθνήσκουσι, θνητῆς ζωῆς ἄφθαρτον ἀντικαταλλαττόμενοι ζῆον, καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ γενομένου πρὸς τάχιστον μετανιστάμενοι· ἐφ' οἷς τὰ σύμβολα τῆς ἀφθαρσίας ἄδεται, τό, τι ἐπιλύτησαν ἐνώπιον Κυρίου, τουτέστιν ἔζησαν. It is surprising, that Philo should produce these two persons as an instance of rewarded piety, who died by the immediate judgment of God, by an extraordinary visitation from heaven, for offering strange fire before the Lord, (Lev. x. 1.) Had they died instantly, when they had the honour to be called up to God, and to have a sight of him, and to eat and drink in his presence, when he appeared on Mount Sinai, (Exod. xxiv. 9—11.) they might have been thought to have died in God's embraces, as some of the rabbins have asserted of Moses. This mistake seems to arise from his allegorical manner of interpretation. When the text says, they died before the Lord, he renders, ἔζησαν, though the phrase has a quite different meaning in that place. (See Patr. in Lev. x.) Philo has the same thought in lib. Quis Rerum Divin. Hæres.

If he wrote it after the death of Jesus Christ, who could not be unknown to him, it is not improbable that he had him in view, when he describes the just man, as reviled, persecuted, and at length put to death; and that seeing the beginning and first essays of Christianity, and the miracles which accompanied the first preaching of the gospel, he foretold the approaching ruin of idolatry. In fine, living under idolatrous and cruel emperors, it is probable he might direct his instructions to them under the person of Solomon, and the more effectually to execute his design, purposely disguised his style to give his work a greater air of antiquity, and to add the more weight to it. And it may be questioned, whether it would have been even safe for him at that time, in the very heart of Alexandria, to have addressed a book in Greek to princes, wherein idolatry is condemned in such a bold and open manner; but by concealing himself and writings, under the fictitious name of Solomon, he avoided all danger.

When St. Jerome tells us that some of the ancients ascribed this book to Philo the Jew, he meant, no doubt, Philo of Alexandria, for at that time no other of the name was known. And as the ancients, whom he cites, are the first that acquaint us whom the church attributed this work to, their judgment ought to be of great weight; and so much the more, as, since that time, no one has been assigned in particular as the undoubted author of it. Truths of this nature are generally the more certain, the nearer they approach to the fountain head; now in the time of those ancients whom St. Jerome mentions, this tradition must have been very fresh, and it might have been a received notion in the church, even from the times of the apostles: the great commendations which the ancients give of Philo, shew the high idea they had of his merit. We have before mentioned, that Eusebius, St. Jerome, and others, believed him to have been a Christian; the former asserts that he was perfectly acquainted with all that related to the doctrine and the laws of his ancestors; he extols his eloquence, the loftiness of his thoughts and sentiments, his exact understanding of the Scripture, and his explications of the sacred books. And if St. Jerome, Eusebius, and others, who have drawn up the catalogue of Philo's works, have not inserted the Book of Wisdom in he number, the reason was, either that since their time it has been questioned, or, that being received by the generality of churches as an inspired book, it was not proper to range it among the works of a Jewish author.

This is what may be plausibly urged in favour of Philo, but this alone will not be sufficient to induce us to ascribe this work to him, there will always be an invincible argument to the contrary, viz. his religion. Philo died in Judaism many years after the death of Christ; and if he was acquainted with the truths of the gospel, he has not done that justice, or given that honour to it, which he ought. It is not therefore probable that the Holy Spirit should speak by the mouth of such a person, nor that the church should adopt, or receive, as an inspired book, the work of an unconverted Jew. This reason, it must be confessed, is of no force against those who do not look upon the Book of Wisdom as canonical. But there are other reasons which hinder us from ascribing this book to Philo: 1. The difference of style. 2. The silence of the ancients, as Eusebius, St. Jerome himself, Photius, Suidas, and others, who have not placed this book among those of Philo. 3. The passages of this book quoted in the gospels, and the epistles written either before Philo could write this work, or a very little time after. There remains then only in his favour tradition, and that but indifferently supported, and a conformity of sentiments, which is not so peculiar to Philo, but the like may be found in Job, Proverbs, Plato, Ecclesiasticus, and in the books of Maccabees. In these we meet with, likewise, the punishments of the wicked after this life, and the future rewards and happiness of the righteous; one finds wisdom represented there as co-eternal with God, and the Word, as Almighty, Omniscient, Creator, Preserver; as instructing, punishing, rewarding. These notions were common at that time among the Jews, and who can be certain that Philo himself did not take these from the books we have just quoted?

Origen has nothing certain about the author of this book, no more than the other fathers which follow him. All then that can be concluded from what we have said is, that Philo was manifestly of the same principles with the author of this book, had the same method, and most of his sentiments; that he wrote in Egypt, and is not very ancient, since it is indisputable that he lived after the version of the Seventy. If we should attempt to reckon up the differences between the Book of Wisdom and Philo, a very considerable number, perhaps, might be produced; the former sets down ten months as the ordinary time for the birth of children, the latter only seven, asserting, that children born after that time, suppose in the eighth month, are not commonly long-lived, or born to be happy. Philo also differs from the author of the Book of Wisdom in what he says of the creation of man, and his likeness and resemblance of God. According to the latter, man was created in the similitude and image of God, immortal and innocent, his body formed out of the earth, and will return to earth again, as his soul will likewise to God after death, from whom it originally proceeded: Philo makes the resemblance between God and man to consist in the soul, which God himself created in the beginning, and filled with inclinations for its welfare and happiness, but adds, at the same time, that he called evil angels to assist at the formation of man, who were the authors of those bad dispositions observable in him; which includes that dangerous opinion of two different independent principles, which the Manichees afterward abused in so strange a manner.

Grotius is of opinion, that the Book of Wisdom is the work of a Jew, who wrote it in Hebrew after the time of Esdras, and before the pontificate of the high-priest Simon, and that for this reason it is placed before the book of Ecclesiasticus. It was translated, as he says, into Greek by some Christian author, who understood that language well enough, but took great liberties in his translation, without confining himself to the words of his original, and even added some strokes and sentiments taken from Christianity. Hence, he says, it proceeds, that the universal judgment is taken notice of there, the happiness of the righteous, and the punishment of the wicked, in a manner more distinct and clear than we observe generally in the books of the ancient Hebrews.

These are the sentiments of Grotius, but there is scarce any part of this hypothesis but wants proof. It is mere guess-work to pretend that this book was originally wrote in Hebrew, neither Jews, nor ancient Christian writers, have either seen or known it in that language. If it was really wrote in it, would the Jews ever have suffered it to be lost? or are there any footsteps of Hebraisms, and a foreign construction, discoverable in the Greek translation? Those Christian sentiments which Grotius thought to be foisted into it by the translator, are to be found in the books of Maccabees, and in Philo, and some of them even in Plato. The two former, as likewise Ecclesiasticus, speak very clearly of the everlasting happiness of the just, and the eternal punishments appointed for the wicked. Are we therefore permitted to say, that these books likewise have been corrupted by Christians, who have artfully conveyed their maxims and sentiments into them? That admirable description of the just man, chap. ii. afflicted and tortured with a variety of wretchedness, do we not meet with it in the writings of Plato, lib. ii. de Rep.? from whence Cicero and Seneca both manifestly took it. It is well known how the ancient Greeks, and even the Jewish writers, were attached to the doctrine of that philosopher, and why might not this writer think it proper to preserve, and even consecrate, such a fine thought, and put it in its full light and beauty in this Divine work, and hereby set truth at liberty, and give it a freer circulation, which before was, as it were, a prisoner, and confined to the heathen writings? Does not St. Paul himself sometimes borrow the thoughts, and even the words, of profane authors?

Cornelius a Lapide believes, that the Book of Wisdom was wrote in Greek by a Jewish author, after the return from the Babylonish captivity, and about the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He even suspects that it might be one of the Seventy interpreters that wrote it for the use of that king, the book being calculated, as has been before observed, for the instruction of princes; for Aristeus relates, that Philadelphus proposed to every one of these interpreters some question concerning the good government of his dominions. He adds, that the opinion which ascribes this book to Philo, might easily have obtained by the following equivocal terms: Solomon had two names, Solomon and Jedidiah, the last of which signifies the friend of God, and in Greek Philo or Philos signifies a friend; and the rabbins, when they quote Philo, give him the name of Jedidiah; and so people have been led into a mistake to imagine Philo the Jew was meant, when Solomon only was intended under his other name.

But these are conjectures without any certain proof. We will ingenuously acknowledge that this matter is dubious, and that the author of the Book of Wisdom is uncertain and unknown, but it is nevertheless canonical and Divine, since it contains in it all that is necessary to deserve that title; it abounds with useful and solid instructions, and paints Jesus Christ and his sufferings in a heavenly manner; and the truths recorded in it are as comfortable to the good and righteous, as they are dreadful to the wicked and the sinner; and besides, the church has received and acknowledged it, as sacred and canonical.

It is certain that the author lived after the Seventy, since he cites their text even when they depart from the Hebrew. He wrote at a time when allegories were much in vogue, and appears to have read the writings of the philosophers and Greek poets. From these circumstances we are of opinion, that this author cannot be very ancient. He seems to be later than the writer of Ecclesiasticus, whom we have fixed to the times of Ptolemy Epiphanes in Egypt, and Antiochus Epiphanes in Syria; and, if this be so, our author should have lived under the government of the Maccabees.

THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.

As the title of this book is Wisdom, the author very properly opens it with the recommendation of righteousness, which is a principal part of it; a virtue necessary to be observed by all, but more particularly by the rulers and judges of the earth, this being the chief end of their appointment, the pursuit of this end their great duty, and the attainment of it their true glory. He then proceeds to shew in general the necessity of right sentiments of God, and the folly of mistrusting, and murmuring against, his providence; that as he is the searcher of all hearts, no disguise or hypocrisy can impose upon him, nor be concealed from him; that wickedness first brought death into the world, which God unwillingly inflicts upon men, who were originally designed for a blessed state of immortality.

Ver. 1. LOVE righteousness, ye that be judges of the earth.] We find the like command given to Joshua, when God appointed him to succeed Moses in the government of his people: The book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success; (Josh. i. 8.) where the marginal reading, thou shalt do wisely, taken from the Hebrew, and confirmed by the LXX. seems far preferable. The same direction is given, Psal. ii. 10, 11. Be wise now, O ye kings; be instructed, ye that are judges of the earth: serve the Lord with fear, &c. The philosopher assigns two reasons why magistrates should be particularly careful to give public testimony of their goodness—"because the people will be less jealous of suffering an injury from such whom they believe to be righteous, and will be less disposed to attempt an injury against such of whom they entertain the highest opinion." (Politic. lib. v. cap. 11.) And it is no improbable conjecture, that one reason why rulers are called gods in Scripture (Psal. lxxxii. 6.) is, that they ought to imitate the Deity in the perfection of goodness. But besides this common acceptation of judges of the earth, which indeed is most natural, there is another sense suggested by Messieurs du Port-Royal, Les saints expliquent ces paroles comme estant dites a tous les fidelles, who, according to some of the fathers, will be appointed judges of the earth: and indeed St. Austin thus interprets the very words of this author, οἱ κρίνοντες τὴν γῆν, (see Comment. on Psal. ii.) from the Christian doctrine, probably, 1 Cor. vi. 2. Know ye not that the saints shall judge the world? τὸν κόσμον κρινοῦσι; hence, ὁ κριτὴς τῆς οἰκουμένης, became the style of a great saint, and is yet used as the standing title of the patriarch of Alexandria, and perhaps of other eastern patriarchs. That this construction might be intended here seems probable, because the author of this book uses the same expression in the same sense, iii. 8. where, speaking professedly of the saints, or the best of men, he says, κρινοῦσιν ἔθνη καὶ κρατήσουσι λαῶν. Upon which words Grotius and other commentators scruple not to refer to Matt. xix. 28. and Apoc. ii. 26. and other places where the judgment of the world by the saints is mentioned. Both these passages in this writer may easily be accounted for, if there was any foundation for Grotius's observation in the introduction to his notes, viz. that the translator of this book was a Christian, "qui Christiana quædam commodis locis addidit." If that great man had given any proof of his remark, then indeed these passages might be more justly suspected, and esteemed instances of the truth of his observation.

Think of the Lord with a good heart.] Φρονήσατε περὶ τοῦ Κυρίου ἐν ἀγαθότητι. Our translators, because it follows immediately, καὶ ἐν ἁπλότητι καρδίας ζητήσατε αὐτὸν, have considered ἀγαθότης, as well as ἁπλότης, as relating to the heart. But, according to Grotius, sentite de Domino in bonitate, is a Hebraism for bene sentite (which is the sense of Calmet and the rest of the commentators of Coverdale's and the Geneva Bibles), think of God justly and worthily, i. e. have right sentiments of his goodness, power (which the Arabic version understands in particular), and his other attributes: consider what God is, and what ye yourselves are; what great things he hath done for you, and what unworthy returns ye have made him. This certainly is the better construction (if the Hebraism may be depended upon), and comprehends more than our translation of the place. This instruction is very properly inserted in the entrance of this work, because a right opinion concerning God is the basis and foundation of all virtue and goodness. Thus Origen, βάσιν γὰρ οἶμαι καὶ ἑδραίωμα πασῶν τῶν ἀρετῶν εἶναι τὴν ἁρμόζουσαν Θεῷ δόξαν τε καὶ πίστιν· (Cont. Marcion. p. 2.) For the better God is understood, with the more rational religion will he be worshipped, and with a homage more agreeable to his nature, free from any mixture of superstition or idolatry.

And in simplicity of heart, seek him.] i. e. With sincerity and singleness of heart, as Coverdale renders, in opposition to double-mindedness, which the Scripture so frequently condemns, and the Hebrew well expresses by a heart and a heart, divided as it were betwixt God and the world; and thus St. Bernard seems to understand it. "Seek not any thing (says he) more than God, or so much as God, because he is above every thing; seek not any thing with God, or next unto him, because he alone is sufficient for every thing." (De Div. Serm. 37.) A person of such a temper is elegantly called by the son of Siraeh, A sinner that goeth two ways, Ecclus. ii. 12.

Ver. 2. He will be found of them that tempt him not.] Though it is certain that tempting God, is used in Scripture not only for presumption and too much confidence, but also for too little confidence, or diffidence and distrust, which latter is the sense that Grotius and Calmet take it in; yet for what reason it should be so taken here (especially as the following words express this very thing, viz. that he sheweth himself to those that do not distrust him), is not easy to conceive: unless we will make a difference in the degrees of distrust expressed by πειράζουσιν and ἀπιστοῦσιν, as there seems to be in the degrees of discovery God makes of himself, expressed by εὑρίσκεται and ἐμφανίζεται· or else interpret ἀπιστοῦσιν of incredulity or slowness of belief, which is the proper meaning of the word. But the most natural construction of the whole verse is given by Messieurs du Port-Royal, who interpret tempting God, of every instance of hypocrisy and disguise, On ne cherche point Dieu avec un cœur simple: this is so agreeable to the ἁπλότης καρδίας beforementioned, as well as to all the following verses, that it claims the preference. And then, as it is another proper effect of the simplicity of the heart, to be as free from suspicions and distrust, as it is from craft or pretence, μὴ ἀπιστοῦσι, rendered and understood as in our translation, follows most aptly and naturally.

Ver. 3. For froward thoughts.] Σκολιοὶ λογισμοί. Σκολιὸς properly is tortuosus, flexuosus, and when applied to thoughts, must denote crafty, captious, intriguing, subtle, prevaricating, and every thing which is the reverse of ἁπλοῦς. I doubt therefore of the propriety of rendering it by froward, which denotes rather perverseness or obstinacy, as our translators render the word, Prov. xvii. 20. from another sense of σκολιὸς, viz. crooked, hard to be reduced to a right line. But this sense of wiliness or dissimulation perfectly agrees with the context, for it is said, to separate from God; i. e. God is not to be found by a hypocrite; and the reason follows in the fifth verse.

And his power when it is tried, reproveth the unwise.] This is variously apprehended by the commentators. Clarius would have it, That the approved virtue of good men renders them the fittest to reprove the ungodly. Badwell says, Pronomen ejus adjunxi ut ad Deum referatur. So have our translators inserted it; though his should have been in italic letters, because not in the original. Castalio, the same in sense: so also Grotius understands it, and expounds it, That there is sufficient experience of the power of God to confute all those who deny his providence. But how does this suit with the context? I think Messieurs du Port-Royal preserve the connexion much better, Et lors que les hommes veulent tenter sa puissance (tempt him by their hypocrisy, as above, or, as they explain it here in their notes, en feignant le chercher au meme tems qu'on le deshonore) elle les convainc de folie; i. e. as they explain it, God punishes their folly by giving them up to their own unruly affections. The sense of the whole third verse seems to be to this effect: Guileful thoughts set us at a distance from God and his truth; he is too great and powerful a being to be treated with art or craft; and when men presume to treat him so, "recalcitrat undique tutus" (as Horace said of Augustus), they are sure to suffer for their folly. This sense is confirmed by the words immediately following.

Ver. 4. For into a malicious soul wisdom shall not enter.] Εἰς κακότεχνον ψυχήν. Here again is meant the crafty, designing, evil-plotting soul, and not merely the malicious soul, as our translators have rendered. And thus Badwell understands κακότεχνος, Anima quæ malum molitur et machinatur. St. Gregory has a just and apposite observation, "Deus de supernis mysteriis illorum mentes radio suæ visitationis illuminat, quos nulla umbra duplicitatis obscurat." (De Cur. Pastor. p. 3.) The Syriac and Arabic versions understand it, of a soul polluted with many sins. And indeed it must be confessed, in favour of this interpretation, that all sin, especially long continued in, indisposes the soul for the reception of Divine wisdom, and renders it an incapable subject of Divine grace; whereas holiness composes our natures into such a regular temper, as is of all others the most fit to receive religious impressions, and to procure us the presence and aid of God's grace. This sense has some countenance from what follows.

Nor dwell in the body that is subject unto sin.] Not barely subject, or liable unto sin; that cannot be the meaning, for this all persons who live in the midst of temptations must be in danger of committing; but the sense is, Divine wisdom will not dwell in such who are bound, or subjected, under the dominion of sin: and so the Vulgate renders, Nec habitabit in corpore subdito peccatis; and Coverdale's version has it, Nor dwell in the body that is subdued unto sin, or rather in bondage, as a debtor, unto sin; for so κατάχρεος, which is a forensic term, properly signifies. What the Jews observe of the spirit of prophecy, that it dwells not with sadness, is true of Divine wisdom, that it dwells not with wickedness, i. e. in a soul subject or enslaved to vicious and irregular passions. And so long as men allow themselves in any known sin, suffer any vice wilfully to remain in them unsubdued, so long they deprive themselves of the presence or inhabitation of this heavenly guest.

Ver. 5. For the holy spirit of discipline will flee deceit.] The Jews apply the name of spirit to several habits of the soul; thus we meet with the spirit of meekness, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, &c. (Isa. ii. 2.) and here the spirit of discipline. But I think, with Calmet, it would be better rendered, The holy spirit of instruction will flee deceit, that being a more proper word than discipline, which our translators use; for the context requires that precise sense, and discipline has a general and more lax sense in our language; some manuscripts accordingly read, ἅγιον πνεῦμα σοφίας, which confirms this. Seneca has a very remarkable passage among his Epistles to this purpose: "Sacer inest in nobis spiritus, bonorum malorumque custos et observator; et quemadmodum nos illum tractamus, ita et ille nos." There is a holy spirit residing in us, who watches and observes both good and bad men, and will treat us after the same manner that we treat him. Nor is the reason which is assigned for the residence and abode of a demon, or good genius, with Socrates, after a very extraordinary manner, less worthy of notice: "Do not wonder (says Maximus Tyrius) that such a spirit should dwell with Socrates, whose purity of body, goodness of soul, devotion towards God, and integrity to man, rendered him worthy of such a friend." (Dissert. 26.)

And remove from thoughts that are without understanding, and will not abide when unrighteousness cometh in.] Probably the true reading here of the original is ἀπὸ λογισμῶν ἀσυνζέτων, and not ἀσυνέτων, as all the printed copies have it. For the context plainly shews, and even the sentence immediately foregoing, that not silly or weak thoughts, but guileful intentions, and deceitful practices, are to be understood. What is here said of the spirit of instruction, with respect to artifice and dissimulation, is no less true of those holy spirits who are the appointed guardians of mankind, with respect to unrighteousness in general; for those who, with much tender concern and affectionate hopes, minister to man's salvation, are forced with regret to leave the care and habitation of the profligate and irreclaimable, and with sorrow cry out to one another, as the angels did in the Jewish temple, when through many profanations it was no longer fit for their charge, μεταβαίνωμεν ἐντεῦθεν, Let us depart hence. (Joseph. de Bell. Judaic. lib. vii.) And it is very observable, that when the wickedness of the old world was arrived to its height, God pronounces, οὐ μὴ καταμείνῃ τὸ πνεῦμά μου ἐν τοῖς ἀνζρώποις, (Gen. vi. 3.) My Spirit shall not always continue in such men; the sense of which passage our version expresses imperfectly by striving with men. (See John xiv. 23.)

Ver. 6. For wisdom is a loving spirit.] i. e. A hearty well-wisher to, and promoter of, the good of mankind, and in particular a lover of their souls. But how is the punishing a blasphemer, an instance of the great love and philanthropy of this spirit? It seems rather a proof of its severity, than kindness and good-nature. The answer and true sense is, that though wisdom be such a kind and merciful spirit, yet her regard to justice is such, that she will not acquit the blasphemer; and so St. Austin (De Mendacio, cap. 16.) explains it. These may be supposed the words, and as it were soliloquy, of a wicked man, comforting himself in the midst of his evil courses against danger, because Divine wisdom is a loving and compassionate spirit. And then the words immediately following will contain the answer to this vain subterfuge and weak pretence, viz. that notwithstanding the affectionate tenderness of this spirit, which is confessed on all hands, and displayed every where, yet cannot she act so inconsistently and unsuitably to her holy nature, as to excuse the blasphemer. And thus the Syriac version understands it, Amicus est quidem hominum spiritus sapientiæ, at non justificat impium. And Junius, after having stated the objection, answers it in like manner, Humanus quidem est, fateor; sed tamen non propterea injustus est, qui hominis blasphemi maledicta impune abire sinat. (See Comment. in loc.)

And will not acquit a blasphemer of his words.] Or, as the literal rendering of the Greek is, Hold him guiltless with respect to his lips. Such whose mouths are full of cursing, deceit, and fraud, and under whose tongue is ungodliness and vanity, who dare be outrageous against God, or deceitful and injurious to their neighbour, shall be answerable for what is not conformable to truth and sincerity. All falsehood and deceit in general, either open or concealed, and whatsoever proceeds from the heart or the lips that may do hurt, is not only detestable to this Divine Spirit, but will be punished severely by it. This in the book of Proverbs is called a froward mouth, which the Vulgar Latin translates sometimes a mouth with two tongues.

For God is witness of his reins, and a true beholder of his heart, and a hearer of his tongue.] The sentiment here is like that in king David's fine charge to Solomon: And thou, Solomon my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart, and with a willing mind, for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts, (1 Chron. xxviii. 9.) God's judgment alone therefore is infallible as to men's real goodness and inward dispositions; for whereas men judge of their neighbour's heart by his words or actions, which are often deceitful, God, on the contrary, judges of men's words and actions as he sees their heart, and knows their reins. But the observation in this place relates not so much to God's infinite knowledge in general, as to his discovery of guile and deceit in particular.

Ver. 7. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth the world.] i. e. Is infinite and immense, is not bounded by any place or space, but spreads himself to all places that we can either see or imagine, and infinitely beyond; so that we cannot say, He is here, and not there; Thus far he reaches, and no farther. St. Gregory describes God, "intra omnia non inclusus, extra omnia non exclusus, supra omnia non elatus, infra omnia non depressus:" (lib. ii. Moral.) Or, to speak in the language of the old philosopher, he is a being, whose centre is every where, and his circumference no where. But nothing can equal what God says of himself, Am I a God at hand, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord. (Jer. xxiii. 23, 24. see also Psal. cxxxix. 7.)

And that which containeth all things, hath knowledge of the voice.] Some manuscripts read ὁ συνέχων, which probably is the true reading. (See Calmet and St. Austin in Speculo, and Orig. in Epist. ad Rom. cap. 9. lib. vii.) Thus the Syriac and Arabic versions expound it, the former rendering, Ille qui tenet omnia, scienter habet vocem ipsius; and the latter, Et qui creaturas omnes amplectitur, possidet notitiam vocis. Coverdale's version is to the same purpose, And the same that upholdeth all things, hath knowledge also of the voice. But the rendering of the Vulgate here is very faulty, and even ungrammatical: as the former sentence respected God's omnipresence, this takes in his infinite knowledge, which extends itself to, and takes cognizance of, what passes every where. With respect to our words, that of the Psalmist is most full, Lo, there is not a word in my tongue, but thou, O Lord, knowest it altogether: (Psal. cxxxix. 3.) with respect to our actions, that of the prophet Samuel, The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed; 1 Sam. ii. 3. where the reading of the LXX. is very observable, Θεὸς γνώστος Κύριος, i. e. the Lord is a God of knowledges, which as Bishop Pearson expresses it, are so plural, or rather infinite, that of his understanding there is no number, τῆς συνέσεως αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν ἀριθμός. (See the LXX. in Psal. cxlvii. 5.)

Ver. 9. And the sound of his words shall come unto the Lord, for the manifestation of his wicked deeds.] The marginal reading here seems preferable, For the reproving of his wicked deeds. Coverdale's version is to the same effect, The report of his words shall come unto God, so that his wickedness shall be punished; to which agrees the rendering in the Geneva Bible, The sound of his words shall come unto God for the correction of his iniquities. And the Syriac and Arabic versions are to the same purpose. And in this sense even our translators themselves have used ἐλέγχω, the very verse before, which they seem here to have forgot.

Ver. 10. For the ear of jealousy heareth all things.] i. e. God's jealous ear overhears every thing; especially complaints against the dispensations of his providence cannot be kept secret from him, who is jealous of his own honour. The Arabic version therefore of this passage is very just, Ob zeli causam res omnes audit: hence his name Deus Zelotes. There is no metaphor more frequent in the prophets, than to represent sin as spiritual adultery; jealousy, therefore, in a religious sense, means God's quick sense and keen resentment of his injured honour, that, like a suspicious and abused husband, he is ever inquisitive and watchful, always listening to, and actuated by, every report and whisper, so that nothing can be concealed from, or pass unobserved by, him, that reflects the least dishonour upon his judgments or proceedings.

And the noise of murmurings is not hid.] Murmurings here may either respect God, or man; with respect to God, the sense is, that he will listen to, and remember, all hard and ungodly speeches against him, that he will punish the secret complaints or open insults of such who dare to find fault with the wise methods of his providence, or, from any seemingly unequal dispensations of it, call his justice or goodness in question. By murmurings with regard to men, we may understand, that detraction, though a covert method of evil speaking, and generally conveyed by way of whisper, and under the seal of secrecy, yet shall neither be undiscovered or unpunished. And in this latter sense St. Austin understands this passage, (De Mendacio, cap. 16.) and is pleased with the contrast of the expression, viz. "The noise of murmurings; which, though imagined to be secret, and the slander of them conveyed privately, and as it were instilled into the ear, yet are as well-known (says he) to God, as if they were spoken aloud, or proclaimed with the voice of a trumpet."

Ver. 11. Therefore beware of murmuring, which is unprofitable.] i. e. Is very mischievous and hurtful. This figure of speech, called litotes or meiosis, when less is said than is meant, is frequent both in sacred and profane writings. Thus Prov. xx. 23. the wise man saith, A false balance is not good; i. e. very bad, and hateful to God. Thus idols are called vain things, which cannot profit; i. e. things which occasion much mischief. And the most shameful vices are called things which are not convenient, Rom. ii. 28. (See also Gen. xxxiv. 7.) Nor are examples of this kind of speaking wanting in Cicero, Livy, Longinus, and the best writers. Thus Virgil calls the great tyrant Busiris, illaudatus; and the Stygian lake, inamabilis; though by this negative of praise, he intended to express a great abhorrence of them. (See more instances in Martyn's Notes on the Georgics, lib. iii. p. 210.)

And refrain your tongue from backbiting, for there is no word so secret that shall go for nought; and the mouth that belieth slayeth the soul.] We cannot better or more truly interpret this verse, than of those reasonings which are contained in the five first verses of the next chapter; nor can it be so consistently understood any other way; for in the verses referred to, we have all the particulars inserted in this, viz. the γογγυσμὸς ἀνωφελὴς, the καταλαλιὰ γλώσσης, not backbiting, as our version hath it, but such representations of our mortal state, as are false and injurious to God the Creator—the φθέγμα λαθραῖον, in the strictest sense, explained by εἶπον ἐν ἑαυτοῖς λογισάμενοι—and οὐ κενὸν, on account of its pernicious consequences—and, lastly, the στόμα καταψευδόμενον, which literally slayeth the soul, by filling it with such vile principles as bring it to destruction. From hence the connexion, between this and the next chapter, is both visible and necessary; nor can we account for this verse so well in any other light. None of the commentators have attended to this, and therefore they expound this verse, either of lying strictly so called, or of slander in general; but if we understand it of slandering, with the marginal reading and the Geneva Bible, we must confine it rather to a particular branch of it, viz. the speaking evil of God, good men, or sacred things. St. Bernard's observation, that slander is like a serpent, that at the same time kills several persons, is very just and applicable here; for a slanderer, that takes a wicked pleasure in ridiculing or discrediting things sacred, ruins himself at length by his libertine notions and false principles; he shoots his arrows against heaven, which are sure to fall on his own head; he poisons the persons that listen to him with consent and pleasure, and so draws them after him into the same ruin; and he wounds religion, and consequently God through its sides, by the scandal and groundless suspicions which he impotently endeavours to fasten upon it.

Ver. 12. Seek not death in the error of your life: and pull not upon yourselves destruction with the works of your hands.] The original words ζηλοῦτε, and ἐπισπᾶσθε, intimate, that wicked men labour to be miserable; that they offer a sort of violence to themselves when they commit sin; and thereby oblige God, unwillingly, and, as it were, with reluctance, to inflict death on them. Salvian expresses this in most remarkably strong terms; "God (saith he) is loath to punish men, but they themselves, exigunt et extorquent ut perirent, vim etiam faciunt—manus inferunt pietati divinæ, et omni peccatorum scelere, quasi omni telorum genere, misericordiam Dei expugnant." (De Gubern. Dei, lib. i.) As death and destruction proceed thus from the corrupt abuse of men's own natural power and liberty of will, we hence see the origin of evil.—I observed of the former verse, that it was best explained by a reference to the beginning of the next chapter; so the like reference to it is equally proper and necessary in this, for much the same order of sentiments will be found in the cautions here given: Seek not death; i. e. court it not; ἐν πλάνῃ ζωῆς, which error of life is explained in ver. 6—9. of the next chapter: and the following verses there, viz. 10—12. that express a degree of wickedness which amounts to a covenant or compact with death, are here cautioned against, by pull not upon yourselves destruction; for ἐπισπᾶν ὄλεθρον is as much above ζηλοῦν θάνατον, as acts of violence, cruelty, and injustice, are above voluptuousness in the climax of a bad life.

Ver. 13. For God made not death.] i. e. He designed not originally the entrance of death into the world. Man, whom God at first made an image of his own eternity, in his state of innocence had the pleasing prospect of immortality; and if he had continued upright, his obedience would have been crowned with it. Bishop Bull hath a most excellent discourse upon the state of man before the fall; it is his opinion there, that "this never-ending life of happiness, promised to our first parents if they had continued obedient, and grown up to perfection under that economy wherein they were placed, would not have been continued in the earthly Paradise, but only have commenced there, and been perpetuated in a higher state; and after such a trial of their obedience, as should seem sufficient to the Divine wisdom, they should have been translated from earth to heaven." (Bull's Opera Posth. vol. iv. disc. 5.)

Neither hath he pleasure in the destruction of the living.] God does not sport himself, like a merciless tyrant, with the lives of his creatures, but is tender of their welfare, ever disposed to do them good, and ready to communicate happiness to them, if their own obstinacy and evil behaviour do not obstruct it. And therefore if, notwithstanding these gracious intentions of God in their favour, men do finally perish, their miscarriage must be ascribed to their own perverse wills, and sinful abuse of their liberty. And thus God declares expressly in Hosea xiii. 9. O Israel, thy destruction is from thyself; i. e. God is not the cause of any evil, either of sin or punishment; but thy sin, whereby thou destroyest thyself, and thy misery, which is the consequence of it, are both of thy own procuring. (See Lowth in loc. and Ezek. xxxiii. 11.) Some of the fathers, viz. Origen, Chrysostom, Theophylact, &c. have a pretty observation, and which is very pertinent to the passage before us, upon Matt. xxv. 41. Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. They observe, 1. That the punishment of the wicked is not said here to be prepared from the beginning of the world, as the blessing is, lest it should be thought that God designed man's punishment before he sinned. 2. That Christ saith, Come, ye blessed of my Father, but not, Go, ye cursed of my Father; because God is the author and procurer of men's happiness, but man is the only author of his own misery. 3. That punishment is mentioned as designed originally not for man, but for the devil and his angels. (See Dr. Whitby in loc.)

Ver. 14. For he created all things that they might have their being.] i. e. God created the world and all things in it for perpetual duration; and that, under the direction of his overruling providence, they might always continue in being; and particularly he designed this favour for mankind, whom at first he created to be immortal, (ii. 23.) This is the sense of the Syriac version, which renders, Et in ipsa mundi origine vitam expertem mortis veneno.

And the generations of the world were healthful.] All things which God made in their several kinds were very good, and designed for the use and benefit of man, and were originally appointed to be serviceable to him; there were naturally no hurtful or noxious qualities in the elements, till sin altered the constitution of things; but sin having made a breach in the world, a sad train of evils entered with it; for the world being made for man, and the place of his residence, it hath felt the effect of God's displeasure to increase his punishment. And since the curse consequent upon the fall, famine, pestilence, deluges, wild beasts, diseases, pains, sicknesses, have been in their turns his scourges and destroyers, as if universal nature was armed against him. Or the meaning may be in particular, that all men (Nationes orbis terrarum, as the Vulgate reads, and Coverdale's translation follows) were created originally pure and healthful, both as to soul and body, in the person of Adam, the common root from whence they sprung; and that there was no natural contagion, or hereditary taint, to draw him to disobedience, and, in consequence of that, to destruction; exterminium, as the Vulgate expresses it, alluding probably to Adam's banishment out of Paradise. Had Adam indeed continued innocent, he then, among many other great privileges, had transmitted downwards, by way of natural generation or descent, a healthful and blessed temper of body: but our great protoplast and representative falling, besides the rectitude of his mind, he lost also that blessed constitution of body, which would have been so great a privilege to his offspring.

And there is no poison of destruction in them.] Φάρμακον ὀλέθρου. The Greeks often use Φάρμακον in a good sense; thus we read in Homer, Φάρμακα πολλὰ μὲν ἐσθλὰ μεμιγμένα, πολλὰ δὲ λυγρά.

And therefore ὀλέθρου is very properly here added; as in Virgil's Georgics we meet with malum virus, where malum is not to be looked upon as a superfluous epithet, because virus is used in a good as well as a bad sense; as in Statius particularly. And that venenum itself does not always signify something destructive to life, see Virgil's eighth Eclogue, and Martyn on lib. i. Georg. p. 29. St. Austin observes, that briers and thorns were not of the original product of the earth, much less poisonous plants and herbs; and that none of these had grown upon the face of it but for man's disobedience. (De genes. cont. Manich. lib. i. cap. 13. and St. Basil, Hexaëm. hom. 5.) Accordingly the LXX. render, Cursed be the ground for thy sake, by ἐπικατάρατος ἡ γῆ ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις σου, i. e. in or by thy works of sin. And Aquila and Theodotion render in like manner. But here it may be asked, How can this observation of our author be true, if in the natural world there are confessedly poisonous plants and drugs; and if what some good writers maintain be just, with respect to the moral world, viz. that the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil was for its specifical quality of a poisonous nature both to the soul and body; and that the first man's nature was tainted by tasting or eating of it? Or how can it be justly said, that God did not create death, since he did create that poisonous fruit, by which the human nature was so deadly poisoned? For the solution of this difficulty, see the learned Dr. Jackson's Works, tom. iii. p. 29.

Nor the kingdom of death upon the earth.] Nor would death have had any power, much less sovereignty over the earth, who now reigns absolute in it, hath made it her place of residence, and even fixed her palace in it. For in the original it is not βασιλεία, but βασίλειον, which means not kingdom or dominion, but rather court or palace. Coverdale renders ᾅδου βασίλειον, the kingdom of hell, intimating, that the devil's power was usurped, and his sovereignty of man's own erection. Calmet renders, Le roi des enfers n' avoit pas son palais sur la terre.

Ver. 15. For righteousness is immortal.] If this verse was included in a parenthesis, the sense of the context would be better connected and more perfect; and I have the pleasure to observe, that Coverdale's translation doth so include it: the meaning seems to be, that obedience would not only have made man immortal, and translated him from an earthly to a heavenly paradise, but, as the verb is in the present tense, it may intimate farther, that righteousness continued in, would have raised man to an unchangeable state of goodness, and his innocence have been crowned with everlasting perseverance: as the angels, who continued in their duty when the rest revolted, are finally established in their integrity and felicity.

Ver. 16. But ungodly men with their works and words called it to them: for when they thought to have it their friend, they consumed to nought, and made a covenant with it, because they are worthy to take part with it.] We meet with the like phrase, of making a covenant with death, Isa. xxviii. 14, 15. and upon the like occasion. I shall transcribe it at large, because it will give great light to this passage: Because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us: for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves; therefore thus saith the Lord, Your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it. This passage of Isaiah is certainly alluded to and imitated by our author in this verse. But the words in the original, and in our version, are so perplexed and obscure, that it will be very difficult, I had almost said impossible, to give any translation of this verse, and many others in this book, that shall answer truly to the letter, and yet be free from obscurity. The words, as they now stand, are certainly intricate and confused, and seem by some accident to have suffered a transposition. Was I at liberty to attempt mending the obscurity of this verse, it should be by a transposition too of the Greek words, by altering the place only of ἐτάκησαν καὶ, thus: Φίλον ἡγησάμενοι αὐτὸν συνθήκην ἔθεντο πρὸς αὐτὸν, καὶ ἐτάκησαν, ὅτι ἄξιοι, &c. i. e. They called (death) to them, and looking upon it as their friend, they made a covenant with it; and consumed away, because they deserved to share in it. But though this easy transposition would make the construction very clear, yet I dare not warrant it without plainer authority from manuscripts or ancient versions. Let us then see what construction may be put upon this verse, as the present reading is, by attending closely to the context; and from what goes before in the eleventh and twelfth verses, and what follows after in the whole second chapter, we may in general make this observation, that there seems here to be an intended climax, to shew the progress of wicked men's attachment to death, like that in Psal. i. 1. to shew their progress in iniquity; they first call or invite death to them; next they hold it, or treat it as a friend; and lastly, they enter into covenant or strict union with it. And this progress seems to be represented and explained at large in the next chapter: the first step is in their reasonings about death, contained in the first five verses, wherein they put it in a false but the most favourable light to themselves that it is capable of: the next step is a debauched life, founded on the foregoing false principles, and recommended in the next four verses; this is, entering into society or friendship with death; and the consequence of it is, they consume and waste away, and shorten their lives, which is represented by ἐτάκησαν. The last step is marked out, ver. 10. by their resolving upon acts of flagrant injustice and malicious wickedness; which is as it were entering into covenant with death, and makes their attachment to it inseparable, viz. they die for ever. But this will appear more fully, when we explain the particulars of the next chapter. I shall observe here, once for all, that we are not to imagine this book to be only a collection of confused discourses or independent sentences; for, from the little sketch here given, and the argument of the several chapters, to every attentive reader a regular method will appear plain and observable.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.

The author having represented in the former chapter the original of sin and death, as too sadly exemplified in our first parents, proceeds to shew the contagious effects and terrible consequences of sin upon their posterity. For this purpose he introduces some libertines reasoning (if it may be so called) in their loose way, in favour of their darling opinions, "That life is short and uncertain, and therefore its sensual gratifications to be pursued with eagerness, and without delay; that there is no real distinction between good and evil, and therefore all acts of oppression and injustice, such as may best suit men's convenience and interest, are allowable and commendable; that the soul is naturally mortal, and is annihilated with the body; that there is no future state, nor any account to be given hereafter of men's wicked and evil courses in this life:" these poisonous principles are represented from the beginning to ver. 21. of this chapter; and though set out to the best advantage, are not intended to countenance men in bad notions of religion, in false opinions of God, and wrong sentiments of the soul; but are only opinions introduced with an intention to confute them: and therefore, in the very entrance of this chapter, the author, to prevent any possible mistake as to his intention and meaning, pronounces such notions and conclusions to be not right, ver. 1. and at the end of this, and in the three following chapters, confutes them at large, determines in favour of virtue and goodness, and shews the certainty of their reward.

Ver. 1. OUR life is short and tedious.] I think the word tedious, which is used by the old English translations, improper here; it occurs very rarely in the sense of our version, refers more generally to time, and rather implies a long duration of it: so that short and tedious seem wrong coupled together; it would have been better rendered, and with less ambiguity, short and painful, and so the original indeed reads, ὀλίγος καὶ λυπηρὸς ὁ βίος ἡμῶν, and is confirmed by the Syriac and Arabic versions. The expression here is like that of Jacob's, Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, (Gen. xlvii. 9.) and that of Job, Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble, (xiv. 1.) allowing only for the difference of the speakers.

In the death of man there is no remedy.] There is no prevention of, or remedy against, mortality. Death is the portion of every man, though the particular time is uncertain, according to that of Job, His days are determined; the number of his months are with thee; thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass; (xiv. 5.) But neither does our author, nor this passage of Job, countenance that notion of the predestinarians, That every particular man's time of life is so absolutely circumscribed, and so strictly and peremptorily assigned him by God, that nothing can shorten or lengthen it beyond such predetermined bounds: for though all things, even the number of our months, are allowed to be foreknown by God, yet does it not from hence, nor from any passage of Scripture, appear, that he has predetermined the precise and particular time of any person's death by any absolute decree: for if every man's time of life is unconditionally fixed, to what purposes serve the promises of long life to good and pious persons, where God sees it best for them; or the many threats of a short one to the ungodly and the wicked? Or why does the wise son of Sirach say, that there is a time when there is success in the hands of the physician, or that they should pray unto the Lord, that he would prosper that which they give for ease and remedy to prolong life? (Ecclus. xxxviii. 13, 14.) For vain is the help of art, and even prayer itself must be supposed fruitless, where the case is unalterable, and the doom irrevocable. The Vulgate renders, In fine hominis non est refrigerium, from a corrupted copy probably, which read ἴανθις, from ἰαίνομαι, refrigeror, lætitia perfundor, instead of ἴασις, the true reading. Coverdale's translation follows this mistake.

Neither was there any man known to have returned from the grave.] Both the observation and inference of these vain reasoners are false; for that persons have returned from the grave, appears from several instances under the Old Testament; 1 Kings xvii. 22. 2 Kings iv. 35. xiii. 21. Nor does it follow, if there were no instances of persons returning from thence, that the dead altogether cease to be, or that there is no future life after this, as such libertines would gladly infer. (See Anacreon, Ode 59. who has many thoughts and expressions like the loose and jovial ones in this chapter.)

Ver. 2. We were born at all adventure.] i. e. We came into the world by chance, without any appointment or direction of Providence: and as we came from nothing (Vulgate reads, Ex nihilo nati sumus, which Coverdale follows), so upon our deaths shall we return to nothing again. This language is very natural and agreeable to the persons here introduced speaking, viz. materialists and infidels.

And a little spark in the moving of our heart.] According to the notions of these false reasoners, the soul was nothing else but a little fire about the heart, the smoke of which was perceivable by our respiration, and the sparks of it by our words: that when this fire was extinguished, as they imagined it was by death, the body was reduced to embers or ashes, and the soul vanished into air. In like manner the atheistical philosophers, who made atoms the principles of all things, thought the soul to consist of some little brisk fiery spirits, which kept in for awhile, but were afterward extinguished by death. Hence we find them using the similes of air, fire, or smoke, with respect to the soul. The Latin also and the Hebrew, it is well known, express both spirit and wind by the same word: and from this agreement only in name, some, for want of better arguments, have been so weak as to infer, that they agree likewise in nature, and at last mix together. The true reading of the original, and which occurs in all the copies, and is followed by the oriental and most ancient English translations, is ὁ λόγος σπινθὴρ; the Vulgate also, with Junius, render it in like manner by sermo. Our translators, it is certain, made use of a corrupted copy, which read ὀλίγος σπινθὴρ, and have given the sense accordingly. If there was any authority for this reading, or just reason for its preference (see Flamin. Nobil. in loc. ap. Polygl. though it seems to be owing only to affinity of sound), I should choose to read the whole thus, καὶ ὀλίγος σπινθὴρ ἐκίνησε καρδίας ἡμῶν; i. e. a little spark of fire moves, or hath put our hearts in motion.

Ver. 4. Our name shall be forgotten in time.] When we are dead, our names will not live long after us, but our memorial shall perish with us; our actions will not be remembered in the next generation, much less in future ages: so that as to the shame or infamy arising from them, we are quite unconcerned and indifferent as to what posterity may think or say of them. As there is a commendable ambition in good men to be remembered with honour hereafter, which is a spur to virtuous and laudable actions; so a carelessness as to the present or future opinion of mankind is an encouragement to wickedness, and a certain sign of a profligate and abandoned mind.

Our life shall be dispersed as a mist, that is driven away with the beams of the sun, and overcome with the heat thereof.] Βαρυνθεῖσα ὑπὸ θερμότητος αὐτοῦ, Made heavy with heat; and so Vulg. à calore illius aggravata—both very improper. Overcome with heat, according to our version, is not agreeable to the Greek; and oppressed with heat, as in the margin, is no better. Big with heat has no better pretence to be allowed, because in the sentence immediately foregoing mention is made of dispersion by the rays of the sun. If I might indulge conjecture, I would, to avoid these difficulties, read here μαρανθεῖσα ὑπὸ θερμότητος, i. e. wasted away with the heat thereof. Sophocles applies the same word to time, πάνθ' ὁ μέγας χρόνος μαραίνει τε καὶ φλέγει. (See Ajax Flagell.)

Ver. 5. For our time is a very shadow that passeth away.] The comparison of life to a cloud, and a shadow, is almost every where to be met with; but Mr. Norris has set this latter resemblance in the best, and as it were a new light; as that "our state here is partly life and partly death, as the other is partly light and partly darkness—that, like a shadow, wherever it passes, it leaves no track behind it—that it seems to be something, when indeed it is nothing—that it is always altering, and ends on a sudden; and when at its full height and prime, is often nearest to its declension, as a shadow is to disappear when at full length." (Miscellanies, p. 178.) Hence Pindar calls men ἐφήμεροι, people for a day; and upon account of the shortness and uncertainty of life, the ancient patriarchs, though their span was much longer than ours, thought it hardly worth while to build houses, but contented themselves to sojourn and grow gray in tents.

For it is fast sealed, so that no man cometh again.] The Arabic version runs; Est enim res obsignata (scil. mors nostra) quam nemo revocaverit. The comparison here is taken from the ancient custom of sealing the grave or sepulchre, and rolling a great stone to the mouth of it, to make it the more secure and undisturbed. (See Dan. vi. 17. Matt. xxvii. 66.) Pausanias has a thought which very much resembles this, ἔχει ὁ Πλούτων κλεῖν, καὶ λέγουσιν ἐπ' αὐτῇ τον καλούμενον Ἀιδην κεκλεῖσθαι ὑπὸ τοῦ Πλούτωνος, καὶ ὡς ἐπάνεισεν οὐδεὶς αὖθις ἐξ αὐτοῦ, i. e. Pluto has a key, and with it, as they say, he locks up the place commonly called Hades, and from thence no man returns; lib. v. cap. 20. (See Apoc. i. 18.) Holy Job has the like sentiment upon death, (vii. 9, 10.) As the cloud is consumed and vanishes away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more; he shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more. Where it is very observable, that the LXX. express this impossibility of returning by three strong negatives following one another, οὐδ' οὐ μὴ ἐπιστρέψῃ, repeated twice in the same verse.

Ver. 6. Let us speedily use the creatures like as in youth.] i. e. Whilst the good things or creatures are in their prime; or, rather, Whilst we ourselves are vigorous and young, which is the sense of the Syriac and Arabic versions; youth being the season for the high relish of pleasure, for cheering the heart and gratifying the senses: for every aged person may say with Barzillai, Can I discern between good and evil? Can I taste what I eat, or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing-men and singing-women? (2 Sam. xix. 35.) There is also a third sense of these words, viz. Let us live as if we were young again; which Grotius prefers, and seems countenanced by the reading of the Alexandrian manuscript.

Ver. 7. Let no flower of the spring pass by us.] Flowers have always been esteemed symbols or emblems of joy, and in the revellings of debauchees they were usually crowned with them; and so peculiar are they to times of public festivity and rejoicing, that they are looked upon as incompatible with mourning. The spring seems more particularly to be mentioned, because it is the chief season of flowers. But some copies, instead of ἔαρος, read ἄνθος ἀέρος, which Junius prefers: but if this reason be admitted, I would not with him understand it barely of fine weather, jucundus aer, but rather, Let no fragrant breath of air, arising from the wine or ointments, just before mentioned, pass by or escape us. Οἶνος ἀνθοσμίας, vinum odoratum et fragrans (see Hesychius, in voce), was not unusual in such meetings.

Ver. 8. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they be withered.] It is certain, that not only the guests at the feasts of the ancients, but the rooms, were strewed with flowers, and the waiters, and even the drinking-bowls, crowned with them. Roses are mentioned here in particular, because the rose is reckoned to be ἔρωτος φυτὸν, the plant of love, and was accordingly consecrated to Venus; and rose-buds are symbols of youth, and of the spring, and from their soon withering, the properest emblems of the shortness of life, and the fleeting nature of its pleasures. (See Anacreon, Od. 5. de Rosa, and Od. 53.)

Ver. 9. This is our portion, and our lot is this.] Coverdale's version is more explicit, For that is our porcion, else get we nothing. This is the language of Epicurus's scholars, the sum of whose ethics was, "Dux vitæ dia voluptas." Life, in the opinion of such libertines, is bare existence without their sinful pleasures: and it is observable, that in Plautus, Catullus, and Martial, and such writers, vivere is generally taken for a merry life, as ζῆν is sometimes among the Greeks; and in this sense we are to understand that old inscription, "Amici, dum vivimus, vivamus." Those that are persuaded that the soul is absolutely mortal, their conclusion must be that of these sensualists: such persons act agreeably to their own principles, if they pursue every thing that their appetites are inclined to, be it pleasure or profit. Such maxims, and a conduct suitable to them, may be expected from persons who had no views beyond the grave. And therefore the Epicureans endeavoured to efface the belief of another life out of men's minds, as well knowing that men could never arrive to an undisturbed sensuality, whilst any notions of futurity checked them in the commission of their crimes. Accordingly, "Metus ille foras præceps Acherontis agendus." (Lucret. lib. iii.)

Ver. 11. Let our strength be the law of justice.] The assertion here, that right is founded in might, is a very old opinion, as old probably as Nimrod, but long since confuted by the wisest men and soberest philosophers: "Falsum est (says St. Austin) quod a quibusdam non recte sentientibus dici solet, id esse jus, quod ei, qui plus potest, utile est." (De Civit. Dei, lib. xix.) Upon which, Ludov. Vives remarks, that this false and dangerous opinion is confuted by Plato, lib. i. de Repub. Hobbes in vain endeavoured to revive this notion, so injurious in its consequences to the property, and destructive of the peace and comfort, of mankind.

Ver. 12. Let us lie in wait for the righteous, because he is not for our turn.] i. e. Let us lurk privily for the innocent without a cause, as it is expressed, Prov. i. 11. where there is the like consultation of the wicked. It is no wonder that atheists and unbelievers, and persons of such vile and libertine principles, should encourage one another in wickedness, and in attempting the most outrageous acts of violence and injustice, in the manner here represented, especially against such as are most likely to cross or contradict their pleasures, and to reprove them in the sinful use of them. Such a kind monitor is not for the turn of the wicked, he is rather δύσχρηστος, as the original has it, i. e. officious, troublesome, and disagreeable to them. St. Cyprian, who quotes this passage of our author's, reads accordingly insuavis, lib. ii. cont. Judæos; and so does St. Austin, lib. xvii. cap. 20. de Civit. Dei. There is exactly the same expression, and upon the same occasion, in Isaiah iii. 10. according to the version of the LXX. δήσωμεν τὸν δίκαιον, ὅτι δύσχρηστος ἡμῖν ἐστι, from which this seems to be taken; and it is the more probable, because, in the Greek text of Barnabas, where this passage of the Book of Wisdom is cited, the reading is, δήσωμεν τὸν δίκαιον, and not ἐνεδρεύσωμεν, as in the common editions.

Ver. 14. He was made to reprove our thoughts.] Ἐγένετο ἡμῖν εἰς ἔλεγχον ἐννοιῶν ἡμῶν. Our version seems here neither just nor proper; the meaning is, He is a reprover of our schemes and designs. The Arabic renders it, Consilia nostra; and the Syriac, Est nobis objurgator cogitationum nostrarum. Thus I would understand ἐγένετο, and not in the sense of our translation.

Ver. 15. He is grievous unto us even to behold, for his life is not like other men's.] The very sight of him is uneasy and disagreeable to us: for the presence of a good man is a check to the proceedings of the wicked; and his virtuous example, and singular goodness, is a living reproof which they do not relish in their sight. Hence the many attempts and combinations of ungodly men against the life of the righteous, so frequent to be met with in sacred and profane history. Thus Joseph's virtue was an eye-sore to his brethren, and therefore they conspired his destruction. Thus David, for his superior excellence and uncommon merit, was persecuted by Saul. Hence St. Peter observes of the wicked, that it is their custom to speak evil of, and abuse, such as run not with them to the same excess of riot, (1 Pet. iv. 4.) And St. John asks this question, Wherefore did Cain, who was of that wicked one, slay his brother? and returns for answer, Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous, (1 John iv. 12.) The like may be observed of the primitive martyrs and confessors, who were persecuted, afflicted, tormented, because, instead of countenancing fashionable and popular vices, they chose rather to reprove and rebuke them. Tacitus assigns this as the cause of the death of Thraseas Pætus, "That Nero could not bear even the sight of that senator, who was of so unblemished a character, that his life was as it were animated virtue itself." (Annal. lib. xvi.)

Ver. 16. We are esteemed of him as counterfeits.] Our version seems here faulty, for such abandoned persons as are here described would not be at the pains to act under the disguise of piety, or assume the mask of religion: the meaning is, that he esteems us like dross, or as an impure and filthy mixture; which sense is confirmed by the very next sentence, and so the original word means, and the Syriac and Arabic versions understand it. The Vulgate reads nugaces, i. e. we are looked upon by him as persons that pursue trifles (for such do all the pleasures of the world appear to a truly humble and good spirit); but this term seems too soft and favourable for persons of such bad morals and wicked principles.

Ver. 18. For if the just man be the Son of God, he will help him, and deliver him from the hand of his enemies.] Thus the primitive martyrs were insulted, and treated in the like opprobrious manner, ποῦ ὁ Θεὸς αὐτῶν, καὶ τί αὐτοὺς ὤνησεν ἡ θρησκεία, ἣν καὶ πρὸ τῆς ἑαυτῶν εἵλοντο ψυχῆς. (Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1.) The expressions from ver. 16. to 21. of this chapter, very much resemble those of the Psalmist, Psal. xxii. 8. He trusted in God that he would deliver him, let him deliver him now, εἰ θέλει αὐτὸν, if he loveth him. Compare likewise Matt. xxvii. 43. where the taunt and irony used by the Jews, by way of insult, to our Saviour, then expiring on the cross, very much resemble the manner of expression here. And, indeed, St. Austin thus understands and expounds our author, and says, that in this and the following verses, there is a plain prophecy of Christ's passion, and that the unrighteous here mentioned are his wicked murderers. (De Civit. Dei, lib. xvii. cap. 20.) St. Ambrose, St. Cyprian, and many others of the fathers, assert the like; but Lactantius is most express, and presses the Jews home with this testimony, which he says is so full and particular in describing the wicked counsels against him, that this author may seem almost to have been present, (lib. iv.) But I am not so sanguine as to imagine or assert, that there is any direct prophecy of our blessed Saviour's sufferings in these verses, which would be doing too much honour to this author, and the times in which he wrote; yet I think, by way of accommodation, they are applicable to our Saviour, who in Scripture is called the just one, by way of eminence, and in a very particular and appropriate manner calls God his Father.

Ver. 20. Let us condemn him with a shameful death, for by his own saying he shall be respected.] i. e. If his own word may be depended upon, God will have respect unto him, ἔσται αὐτοῦ ἐπισκοπὴ ἐκ λόγων αὐτοῦ, there shall be a visitation or interposition of God in his favour, probably by bringing him from the dust of death again. The expression here very much resembles that of Joseph's brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 20. Come now, and let us slay him, and we shall see what will become of his dreams. (See also Jer. xviii. 18.) It is a severe irony, and a sneering sarcasm upon the hopes of the just man, not unlike that of the heathens upon the ashes of the primitive Christians, who gloried in the hopes of a resurrection: their persecutors pleased themselves with reducing the dead bodies of the several martyrs into atoms, with scattering them in the air, or throwing them into rivers, and then scoffingly said, Let us now see whether they can rise again, or whether their God can help them, and deliver them out of our hands. (Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1.)

Ver. 21. For their own wickedness hath blinded them.] See the like sentiment, iv. 12. St. Chrysostom observes, "That sin doth so blind the senses of sinners, that seeing not the ways of falsehood and error, they run headlong into them: nor could any errors ever have prevailed over man, if sin had not made the way; for first a man is blinded by his sins, and then drawn away and seduced; for error (saith he) begetteth not sin, but sins beget and bring forth error." (Homil. 19. in Matt. vii.) But still it is no less true, on the other hand, that error, especially in fundamental principles, produces generally wicked practices. St. Austin accordingly observes, that the different degrees, and as it were gradations of licentiousness, are very justly described in this chapter: "That men first efface all impressions of a Deity, then deny the immortality of the soul, and a future state; that immorality is the certain consequence of such infidelity; that debauchery and intemperance is their resort in particular, as being the most effectual remedy to drown thought; and that when men are once heated, they easily proceed, through excess, to oppression, cruelty, and murder." (In Psal. lii.)

Ver. 23. For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of his own eternity.] God not only created man ἐπ' ἀφθαρσίᾳ, free from corruption, but made him εἰκόνα τῆς ἰδίας ἰδιότητος, which is a very strong expression, to denote a peculiar resemblance of the Deity; and accordingly the Arabic interpreters render, Fecitque illum imaginem peculiarem; and the Syriac, Ad imaginem ideæ suæ. Our translators undoubtedly read, ἀϊδιότητος, which properly signifies eternity; and this Dr. Grabe has inserted in the text, esteeming it probably the best reading.

Ver. 24. Through envy of the devil came death into the world.] The devil, jealous at the future happiness designed for man, resolved to tempt him to disobedience, that he might deprive him of the blessing of immortality, and reduce him to the same forlorn condition with himself and his apostate brethren. St. Chrysostom makes the same observation upon the devil, ὅτι οὐδὲν παρ' ἡμῶν ἠδικημένος, ἰδὼν τιμηθέντα τὸν ἄνθρωπον, εὐθέως ἐβάσκανεν αὐτοῦ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς. (Homil. 25. de Diabolo Tentat.) That though man had given the devil no occasion of offence, yet when he saw the honour designed him, he immediately envied him the favour. (See also Euseb. Præp. Evangel. lib. vii.) St. Austin observes, "That death began at the same time with the transgression; and that neither age nor pain could have touched our first parents, so long as they held the privilege of eating of the tree of life; but afterward their bodies, even in a natural way, contracted the seeds of diseases and death." (De Genes. lib. ii.) And thus the Apostolical Constitutions, δύο ὁδοί εἰσι, &c. "Duæ sunt viæ, vitæ una, mortis altera, illæ autem nullam habent inter se convenientiam. Naturale quidem est vitæ iter, adscitum autem iter mortis, quod non ex voluntate Dei extitit, verum ex insidiis adversarii." (Constit. lib. vii. cap. 1.)

And they that do hold of his side do find it.] The Vulgate reads, Imitantur autem illum qui sunt ex parte illius; and Coverdale's translation renders in like manner, And they that hold of his side do as he doth; and so does Fulgentius, de Prædestin. ad Monimum, lib. i. but the construction before given would be more consistent and agreeable, and the relation between the two chapters more apparent, if the rendering here was, they tempt it (i. e. they solicit, they court, they draw death upon themselves), as many as are partakers of it; for the οἱ τῆς ἐκείνου μερίδος ὄντες, and the οἱ ἄξιοι τῆς ἐκείνου μερίδος εἶναι, (i. 16.) are the same sons of perdition, those over whom is ᾅδου βασίλειον, (i. 14.) which is not of God's appointing, but their own seeking and procuring. The present rendering of this place is little less than tautology, for to be partakers of death, is certainly to find it. I shall only observe, that it appears, from the whole drift of these chapters, that the death, which wicked men call, correspond, covenant with, and at last partake of, is all along to be understood of death eternal.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.

In order to confute the false and dangerous principles maintained by the irreligious and profane scoffers in the foregoing chapter; in this is displayed the great happiness of the righteous, and the impotent malice of the wicked against them. For though God, for wise ends of his providence, permits the righteous sometimes to be afflicted, and even to die under the severity of their persecutions, yet do they not totally cease to be; but as they die in the Lord, so they still live unto, and with, God, in whose hands their souls are. But the wicked, on the contrary, though they promise themselves great happiness in their sinful courses, are miserable both here and hereafter. The chapter concludes with the praise of chastity, and the sad state and condition of adulterers and their children.

Ver. 1. THE souls of the righteous are in the hand of God.] i. e. In the state of separation, the souls of the righteous that are departed, shall after death find great refreshment and comfort of their labours; and being in God's keeping, enjoy a state of the greatest happiness and security. This state of the piously-deceased, the ancient Jews, according to Grotius, called Paradise, or the Garden of Pleasure; where, though they enjoyed not the consummate happiness which they were in expectation of hereafter, yet even at present, and in their intermediate state, they had some foretaste and anticipation of their future happiness; but they held none to have this pleasing sense, but the πνεύματα δικαίων τετελειωμένων, such as had their souls well purified before they departed from their bodies. From this expression, that the soul is in God's hand, we may infer, that the human soul is not only a substance distinct from the body, but that it lives after it in a state separate from it, and such a state as is susceptible of happiness or misery: for why are the souls of the righteous here said to be deposited in the hand of God, but because it denotes a place of rest and safety? where the departed souls shall not only live and survive, but live too in a manner far different from that in which they lived here, where no temptation shall be able to assault, no sin to pollute, no affliction to discompose them.

And there shall no torment touch them.] Nor are such as die in the Lord only freed from temptations and dangers, from injuries and persecutions, from diseases and death, and all other burdens of the flesh, but we may piously believe, that more is here implied than a bare freedom from evils, that they are possessed of some positive degree of happiness; that in particular, they have pleasing anticipations of their reward, and wait for it with a holy impatience; and in the mean time are in Paradise, or in Abraham's bosom, or some place of rest and refreshment appointed for them by God: but with respect to the martyrs in particular, who had suffered gloriously in God's cause, it was a notion very early entertained in the primitive church, that these entered immediately upon a perfect state of happiness and glory. Or we may understand this passage, of the afflictions which the righteous may undergo in this life, that, though their torments be the most exquisite that heathen malice can invent, yet by the strength of their faith, and a sure dependance upon God, they shall overcome the reluctance of nature, and not only suffer with patience, but with joy and thanksgiving. Not that this resolution of the righteous is the effect of any stoical apathy, or that they have not flesh and blood, like other folks, to feel the force of sufferings; but it is the power of a strong faith that makes them more than conquerors. "If the souls of the martyrs were indeed in their bodies when they had trial of such a variety of sufferings, they could never (says St. Bernard) have been able to have gone through them; but while their bodies were in the hands of their persecutors, and mangled by them, their souls were in the hand of God; and the Holy Spirit, with which they were filled, kept them above all sense of pain, and rendered them quite invulnerable." And whoever reads the letter from the churches of Lyons and Vienna to those of Asia and Phrygia, wherein the exquisite sufferings of the martyrs, and their invincible constancy in the most severe trials, are described, (see Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. i. cap. 1.) will acknowledge the truth of this observation, and at the same time be convinced, that the history of their sufferings is the most complete comment upon the beginning of this chapter.

Ver. 2. In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die.] This is a very happy expression, for good men rather sleep than die, their hope and well-grounded assurance changes the nature of death, and turns it into a sleep. St. Chrysostom expresses himself to the same purpose, "Death is no longer to be counted death, it is only a name; nay, the very name also is gone, for Christians call it not death, but rest and sleep," (Homil. 29. in Genes.) Accordingly, in many places both of the Old and New Testament, where the death of good men is mentioned, it is expressed by sleeping. (John xi. 11. Acts vii. 60. 1 Thess. iv. 14.) Hence the day, on which the blessed Virgin died, is in the Greek church called κοίμησις, her rest; and the places where the first martyrs were buried, κοιμητήρια, or resting-places.

Ver. 3. And their going from us to be utter destruction, but they are in peace.] The wicked, who are also in the former verse called the unwise (for in the book of Proverbs, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus, wickedness and folly are synonymous terms), imagine the righteous to be miserable, because, when alive, they were mortified, as to all pleasures, and when dead, extinct and annihilated, according to their opinion. To such vain reasoners, who had no notion of a life beyond this, it is here very justly replied, that the righteous are so far from being sufferers by death, that when dead they are in peace, and their happiness the greatest. (See Job iii. 17, 18.) And this the voice from heaven confirms, Rev. xiv. 13. Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, for they rest from their labours. Instead of being objects of ridicule and contempt, the character of the righteous is rather that beautiful contrast of St. Paul's, as deceivers and yet true, as dying and behold they live, as chastened and not killed, as sorrowful yet always rejoicing, (2 Cor. vi. 8—10.)

Ver. 4. Yet is their hope full of immortality.] In the midst of their misery and afflictions, they comforted themselves with the pleasing hopes of a happy resurrection to a blessed state of immortality, as the seven brethren did, 2 Macc. vii. and when, as a reward of their constancy and virtue, the saints shall be finally in possession of their happiness, and receive their μισθὸν πλήρη, (2 John viii.) then in another and no less proper sense of these words may it be said, ἡ ἐλπὶς αὐτῶν ἀθανασίας πλήρης, their hope of immortality is full, i. e. fulfilled and completed.

Ver. 5. And having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded.] This cannot relate to the smallness or lightness of the sufferings, which are above described so violent, as to affect even the life of the righteous; but the meaning seems to be, that having suffered through the malice of their persecutors for a small space of time, with respect to eternity, those afflictions which were comparatively but for a moment, will work for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Thus the writer to the Hebrews having described at large, chap. xi. the sufferings of the worthies mentioned there, says, that such chastening (παιδεία, the word here used), though for the present it seemeth grievous, yet afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them which are exercised thereby, (xii. 11.) St. Gregory observes, that God permits the afflictions of good men, that he may draw much benefit from them: for this reason he permitted Jacob to be persecuted by Esau, and David by Saul, that the persecutions they suffered, might be at once the exercise and crown of their virtue. And the reward of such suffering virtue follows in the next sentence, that God having tried their faith and constancy, and found them worthy, is pleased finally to translate them to himself, to live with him, and with the blessed society of just men made perfect, of whom the world in their several ages was not worthy, to enjoy his beatific presence.

Ver. 7. And in the time of their visitation they shall shine.] The Vulgate, which Coverdale follows, joins this to the former verse, and reads, Et in tempore erit respectus illorum, i. e. that God will in due time have a respect to, and reward, such saints and martyrs who fell a sacrifice in his service, who, like the victim in the burnt-offering, were consumed in the flames, and whose souls are purified by their afflictions, and prepared for heaven, and made fit offerings for God to receive. This sense the Syriac interpreters prefer. Our version, with the Arabic, follows the Greek, καὶ ἐν καιρῷ ἐπισκοπῆς αὐτῶν ἀναλάμψουσι; which expression may be taken in two senses, either it may be understood of the afflictions and sufferings of the righteous in this life, for so ἐπισκοπὴ and ἡμέρα ἐπισκοπῆς often signify in the LXX. particularly, Isa. x. 3. According to this acceptation, the meaning of this place is, that the righteous shall shine the brighter for their afflictions, and that God will glorify his saints in and by them. Thus God promises to such as set their love upon him, not only that he will be with them in trouble, but that he will deliver them from it, and bring them to honour by it, Psal. xci. 15. We cannot have a more remarkable instance of the presence of God with his servants in afflictions, than in the history of the three children cast into the furnace, where the text acquaints us, that one in the form of the Son of God, probably an angel, conspicuous and distinguishable by his brightness, walked with them, and accompanied them in the very flames; and that this accident, and their miraculous deliverance from it, was the occasion of their being promoted in the province of Babylon, (Dan. iii.) The sentiments of the primitive writers, upon occasion of the martyrs' sufferings, are most noble and magnificent: "A Christian (says Tertullian) never thinks himself so fine, never so illustrious, as at the stake; he is then in his triumphal chariot, going to heaven in state." (Apol. pro Christianis.) Nor is what Eusebius writes less observable: "That it was a most charming sight, to behold the martyrs in prison, to see how their misery became them, how they adorned their fetters, and looked as captivating in their chains, as a bride in all her glory upon the day of marriage." (Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1.) Or we may understand this passage in another sense, viz. That the righteous shall shine with glorified bodies, ἐν ἐπισκοπῇ ψυχῶν, (ver. 13.) For the Jews have a tradition, that the bodies of the righteous shall be clothed at the resurrection with a clothing of light, as of a pure flame. This is agreeable to the descriptions made in the Old Testament, of the just rising from their graves, That they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars, for ever and ever, (Dan. xii. 3.) And in the New it is said, That they shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father, (Matt. xiii. 43.) Hence in Scripture, and particularly in the writings of St. Paul, the state and happiness of the blessed is expressed by the word glory. (See also Matt. xvii. 2. Acts ix. 3. Rev. i. 14, 15.)

And run to and fro like sparks among the stubble.] By the stubble it is certain the wicked are meant, called also chaff, by a like metaphor, Psal. i. 5. The expression here is proverbial; and if it be understood of the righteous in this life, and of their conduct, as distinguished from the wicked, the meaning then will be the same with that of St. Paul, Phil. ii. 15. That the sons of God, i. e. the righteous, shine as lights in the world, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation. But if it is applied to the future state of the righteous, it seems to intimate their great swiftness in their heavenly vehicles. Our translation, it must be confessed, which renders διαδραμοῦνται, by running to and fro, conveys but a flat and low idea, the image only of a few random sparks; the sense would be more sublime and just, after this manner, "They (the saints) shall run or pass through the ranks of the wicked (discurrent, says the Syriac version, justi inter impios) as fire spreads through the stubble every where uncontrolled and irresistible." Hereby probably is intimated their power over them; a farther description of which follows in the next verse.

Ver. 8. They shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and their Lord shall reign for ever.] Though the righteous may be said even in this life to judge the nations, i. e. to condemn the wicked, by the conspicuousness of their faith and virtue, in which sense κρίσις is taken by the Arabic version, and is often understood so by St. Jerome, and by St. Austin, (De Civitate Dei, lib. xx. cap. 5. see also John v. 24.) yet I rather incline to apply this passage to the next life, "That in the great and final judgment of the world, the saints shall be assessors with God in judging the wicked:" for it is piously thought by many learned men, that the saints, when crowned themselves by God, shall be invested with the authority of pronouncing sentence even against evil angels and wicked spirits. And it was an opinion that prevailed generally in the early times of Christianity, that at the resurrection every man should rise in order, ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ τάγματι, i. e. according to the degree of his goodness; and that they who were raised and judged first, should themselves have a part in judging those which followed. (See Dan. vii. 18. 22. Matt. xix. 28. 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3. Rev. ii. 26. See note on i. 1. of this book.)

Ver. 9. They that put their trust in him shall understand the truth, and such as be faithful in love shall abide with him.] i. e. Persons so qualified shall happily experience this truth in particular; or the meaning may be, that they are the fittest and most likely to attain the knowledge of Divine truths in general, which is the sense of Messieurs du Port-Royal; for the author seems to point out two ways or conditions for that purpose; the first is, trust in God, or rather a distrust of a man's self, and of his own perfection and abilities, because humility is the surest way to Divine knowledge; the second is, a sincere and unfeigned love of God, which displays itself in obedience and a readiness to do God's will; for an honest and well-disposed heart, free from any corrupt passions or affections, may soonest hope to receive spiritual illuminations, and the knowledge of saving truths, according to that observation of our blessed Saviour's, That if any man will do his will, he shall certainly know of his doctrine, (John vii. 17.) According to the different pointing of the Greek text, the last clause of this passage of our author may be differently understood; either we may render with the margin, and the Geneva Bible, Such as be faithful shall remain with him in love; and thus the oriental versions point the place; or, as our translators take it, Such as be faithful in love shall abide with him; i. e. cleave to him with so firm and unshaken a resolution, that neither tribulation nor distress, life nor death, shall separate them from him: and in this sense προσμένειν τῷ κυρίῳ is taken, Acts xi. 23. The Syriac interpreters seem to understand this clause in the sense of not falling away, Qui sunt fideles, per charitatem permanebunt ipsius; quia gratiam et misericordiam electis suis impertitur.

Ver. 11. Whoso despiseth wisdom and nurture, he is miserable.] This and the former verse refer to those vain reasoners, and wicked libertines, whose character is so justly drawn in chap. ii. The sentiments of this writer agree frequently, we may observe, with the book of Proverbs; and this passage very much resembles that fine advice in the conclusion of the eighth chapter of that inspired writer, particularly the two last verses, where wisdom speaketh thus of herself, Whoso findeth me, findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord; but he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me love death. (See also Psal. ii. 12. in the LXX. version.) St. Cyprian opens his treatise, De habitu Virginum, with an encomium of discipline too fine and remarkable to be here omitted; "Disciplina custos spei, retinaculum fidei, dux itineris salutaris, fomes ac nutrimentum bonæ indolis, magistra virtutis, facit in Christo manere semper, ac jugiter Deo vivere, et ad promissa cœlestia et divina præmia pervenire. Hanc et sectari salubre est, et aversari ac negligere letale." Tertullian, throughout his works, is equally full of its commendation.

Ver. 12. Their wives are foolish, and their children wicked.] It is obvious to observe, that the book of Proverbs not only calls wickedness in general by the name of folly, but seems to brand the sin of uncleanness, or lust, with that name more particularly. What therefore our translators here render foolish, in the marginal reading is, light, or unchaste; and the Arabic version confirms this sense, which reads, Uxores ejus procaces; and the Port-Royal comment, Les femmes sont dereglées. As to what is here observed, that the children of such parents are generally vicious and wicked; this is almost unavoidable: for, as the apocryphal Esdras speaks, Like as the field is, so also is the seed; and as the flowers be, such are also the colours, (2 Esd. ix. 17.) This so natural and constant a resemblance shews the great duty and necessity incumbent on parents to be good and virtuous themselves, upon account of their children, and the good or evil consequences derived to them; for, according to their own conduct and behaviour, they entail either a blessing or a curse upon their children, as it follows in the next words, which the oriental versions join with great judgment to this verse.

Ver. 13. Blessed is the barren, that is undefiled, which hath not known the sinful bed.] This is to be understood of the barren wife, that is chaste and free from adultery, whose great commendation in Scripture is, κοίτη ἀμίαντος, Heb. xiii. 4. And though she may be reproached by some upon account of her barrenness, as was the sentiment of the Jews particularly, through their hopes and expectations of the Messiah, yet shall her virtue be recompensed by God, as far preferable to the most fruitful adultery. In vain have some popish writers endeavoured to ground upon this place, which undoubtedly relates to married persons, the order of perpetual virgins; as if that was established and approved of in the age of this writer, and known to the ancient Jews, which is certainly the invention of more modern times.—In this passage no reflection is intended against marriage, nor any preference given to a continued celibacy; the comparison is between married persons only, viz. a barren wife, and a teeming adulteress. (See Chemnitii Examen. par. iii. p. 17.) Nor does this writer commend a person in general, ἥτις οὐκ ἔγνω κοίτην, but such a chaste wife in particular, who has not defiled the bed, ἐν παραπτώματι. I shall only observe upon the Greek reading of this passage, that the particle ὅτι which introduces it, and seems harsh and ungrammatical, is here, as it is often in the sacred writers, pleonastical. (See instances of this in Blackwall's Sacr. Classics, vol. i. p. 118.)

She shall have fruit in the visitation of souls.] Though she has not the blessing of children, and the fruit of the womb which cometh of the Lord, yet shall she have her fruit, i. e. her recompence and reward, when hereafter she shall be crowned, and reign in glory with other pure and immaculate souls. The writer of this book probably entertained that notion, so frequent to be met with among the rabbins, and even primitive fathers, that after six thousand years there will be a glorious millennium, when the saints shall reign a thousand years upon earth; this they call dies magnus judicii, and is probably the ἐπισκοπὴ ψυχῶν here referred to: in this sense the learned Mr. Mede understands this passage; as likewise ver. 7. and 8. of this chapter. (See Comment. Apocalypt. lib. iii. p. 536.)

Ver. 14. And (blessed is) the eunuch, which with his hands hath wrought no iniquity—unto him shall be given the special gift of faith.] The meaning is not, that the special gift of faith shall be given him, as our version has it, but rather that some special gift or reward shall be given him for his faithfulness: and so the Syriac interpreters render, Dabitur ei pro ipsius gratia et fidelitate hæreditas desiderii. And in this sense of faithfulness we are to understand St. Paul, when he says, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, 2 Tim. iv. 7. And though eunuchs were forbidden under the law to enter into the congregation of the Lord, (Deut. xxiii. 1.) that is, were not admitted to honours and offices either in the church or commonwealth of Israel; yet the inward qualifications, and rare endowments of the soul, shall be sufficient to give such pure persons, as offend not against God by any loose action or impure thought, a title to the communion of saints, and not only take off the outward legal restraint, but give them an honourable place in the temple of the Lord, and even make them, for their victory in overcoming the flesh, pillars in it, (Rev. iii. 12.) The sense of this passage greatly resembles that of Isa. lvi. 4, 5. Thus saith the Lord unto the eunuchs that keep my sabbaths, and choose the things that please me, and take hold of my covenant; Even unto them will I give in my house, and within my walls, a place and a name better than of sons and daughters.

Ver. 15. And the root of wisdom shall never fall away.] i. e. Of chastity, which is the subject of the foregoing verses: and so the Syriac version understands it, Radices castitatis non evellentur. The sense of the whole verse is, that every good work will be attended with a reward; and thus the Arabic version, Bonorum enim operum eximius ac pulcherrimus est fructus; and that chastity in particular, which is a glorious victory over ourselves, hath this pleasing prospect and comfort in reversion, that many blessings and privileges will descend from God upon the branches of a chaste and holy stock; and that the virtue and goodness of parents is a security and treasure to their posterity. We may observe, that as in the book of Proverbs, the adulterer is described to be a man void of understanding, (vi. 32.) so this writer makes chastity to proceed from wisdom; and this possibly St. Paul might intend, Rom. xii. 3. when he advises, φρονεῖν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, which St. Jerome renders, Sapere ad pudicitiam. (Cont. Jov.)

Ver. 16. As for the children of adulterers, they shall not come to their perfection, and the seed of an unrighteous bed shall be rooted out.] Τέκνα μοιχῶν ἀτέλεστα ἔσται, which we may understand in two senses; either that a bastard shall not be partaker of holy things, i. e. shall not be admitted to officiate in the sacred mysteries, nor to hold public dignities, according to the marginal reading, and the Geneva version; and so the sense will be the same with that in Deut. xxiii. 2. A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even unto the tenth generation. And indeed some lawgivers anciently fixed such a mark of infamy upon bastards, as to forbid their coming to the sacred offices: even the heathens themselves excluded bastards, as well as the profane and wicked, from the participation of their mysteries; and according to the old ecclesiastical laws, bastards were not capable of being ordained without a dispensation. (See Watson's Compl. Incum. p. 102.) That ἀτέλεστος will admit this sense, see Hesychius, and Leigh's Critica Sacra, in voce; and thus it is sometimes understood by the ancient Greek fathers.—Or we may understand this place, with our translators, of the short and uncertain continuance of such a spurious offspring, upon whom God may visit the iniquity of their fathers. And indeed we meet with in Scripture a most remarkable instance of the Divine vengeance in this particular, viz. that the darling offspring of David's guilt was smote by God, and perished quickly from before his eyes; and God gives this very reason for it, Because thou hast done this thing, the child that is born unto thee shall surely die. (2 Sam. xii. 14.)

Ver. 18. If they die quickly they have no hope, neither comfort in the day of trial.] Some learned men have thought, (see Usher's Body of Divinity, p. 16.) that what is said here, and in the context, is a hard and uncharitable sentence upon bastards, whose very birth and entrance into the world, though it be indeed by a crime of their parents, yet themselves may be thought guiltless, and, as such, undeserving of punishment: but the observation of this writer will be less liable to exception, if we consider, that there is often a natural and hereditary taint in wicked and debauched families, and that some particular sins run as it were in the blood, the seeds of future wickedness. Hence holy Job, speaking of such wicked parents, says in very strong and significant terms, that they lay or treasure up iniquity for their children, (xxi. 19.) which natural propensity and vicious turn of temper God foreseeing, sometimes has recourse to extremities to stop the infection, and hinder the spreading guilt. Though viciously-disposed children more generally hasten their own death by irregularity and loose living; or if by chance they live long, like the wanton elders that tempted Susanna, being grown old in wickedness, they lose all the respect and reverence otherwise paid to gray hairs. And when they come to die, their case, like that of other wicked men, is most desperate; nor will they have any thing to allege in their favour in the great day of inquiry, διαγνώσεως. Thus the Psalmist describing the end of the wicked says, The ungodly shall not be able to stand in the judgment, Psal. i. 6. where the LXX. read, οὐκ ἀναστήσονται οἱ ἀσεβεῖς ἐν κρίσει, which has been unaccountably perverted in favour of the opinion, that there shall be only a resurrection of the just. But that passage of the son of Sirach, Ecclus. xli. 9. comes nearest the sense of this writer, Woe be unto you, ungodly men; if ye be born, ye shall be born to a curse; and if ye die, a curse shall be your portion.

Ver. 19. Horrible is the end of the unrighteous generation.] Calmet very properly observes, (see Comment. in loc.) that what is said in this and the following chapter, of the sad prospect and miserable fate of the children of adulterers, ought not to be understood as spoken absolutely by this writer, but only of such as, being abandoned and debauched themselves, imitate and follow the vicious courses of their parents; for otherwise, the crimes of their ancestors cannot be imputed to them in the judgment of God, nor will they be answerable for them before his tribunal: for it is very possible, that children thus born in sin, and from a criminal and forbidden commerce, may yet prove virtuous and regular in themselves; and that the children of even good men and saints may be lewd and vicious; as was the case of old Eli's children in particular, who made the Lord's people to transgress through their scandalous uncleanness, (1 Sam. ii. 22.)

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.

In this chapter the author pursues the same subject with which he concluded the former, and shews how much happier upon the comparison chaste and virtuous persons are, though without children, than adulterers and the brood of a sinful and polluted bed: that the former, if they enjoy long life, as they generally do, are in a state of peace and security; and if taken away by an early and untimely death, it is an instance of mercy to them, that they may escape thereby some imminent danger or approaching evil. But the life of the vicious and debauched is, on the contrary, both short and unhappy; their death is dishonourable, their hope desperate, and their future estate full of misery and torment.

Ver. 1. BETTER it is to have no children, and to have virtue: for the memorial thereof is immortal, because it is known with God and with men.] The Vulgate reads, O quam pulchra est casta generatio cum claritate! which is not a just translation of the original words, κρείσσων ἀτεκνία μετ' ἀρετῆς; for ἀτεκνία is very improperly rendered by generatio; and then it seems, as does our version, either to confine chastity to celibacy, or to such as, being married, have no children; as if virtue and fruitfulness were incompatible. Whereas the true meaning is, that though a person hath no children, and seeks not any by acts of incontinence, or unlawful mixtures, his virtue supplies what is wanting to him in that respect, and his good actions shall be like children to him, and hinder his name from being lost in oblivion. Such a virtue as can withstand a criminal passion, and is proof against all the dangerous temptations of it, is approved by God, and will be finally rewarded by him, and cannot fail of being respected and well spoken of by the valuable part of mankind. And however the libertine may pride himself in his spurious issue, and the adulteress value herself on the fruit of her womb, yet incontinence will always differ from barrenness, as a crime does from a misfortune.

Ver. 2. When it is present, men take example at it.] This observation is not true of men in general, that they have an esteem for virtue; for with respect to very many of the species, that reflection of Horace is still too true, "Virtutem incolumem odimus." The meaning therefore must be, that good men esteem, admire, and follow after, virtue; that they will make virtuous men, while they live, the patterns for their imitation, and honour their memory when they are dead.—And even wicked men have been known to regret the loss of good men, and to lament and even pity their suffering fate. Thus Antiochus Epiphanes wept for the death of Onias the high-priest, (2 Macc. iv. 37.) and the Athenians for that of Socrates, though they occasioned it.

It weareth a crown, and triumpheth for ever.] Ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι στεφανηφοροῦσα πομπεύει, or στέφανον φοροῦσα πομπεύει. Junius understands αἰὼν of the present world, and renders, In sæculo hoc triumphat; i. e. that virtue, through a consciousness of having done its duty, through hope anticipates, even in this life, its future reward, and by faith triumphs, as already sure of a crown. And indeed the Syriac and Arabic versions confirm this conjecture, both of which render, In hoc sæculo. There is a manifest allusion in this verse to the Olympic games, and the crowning of the conquerors therein; for in the original the following technical terms are worth noting, viz. στεφανηφορεῖν, πομπεύειν, ἆθλον, ἀγών. From whence the learned, among other reasons, infer, that this book was not written by Solomon, who was dead above two hundred years before the first Olympiad. (See Usher's Annals.)

Having gotten the victory, striving for undefiled rewards.] The sense of these words, as they stand in our translation, seems obvious enough, and is not much unlike that of Horace; "Virtus repulsæ nescia sordidæ, Intaminatis fulget honoribus;" (Carm. lib. iii. od. 2.) but it does not agree with any of the ancient versions. The Vulgate reads, Incoinquinatorum certaminum præmium vincens; St. Cyprian yet more obscurely, Incoinquinatorum certaminum prœlium vincens; and the Greek, τὸν τῶν ἀμιάντων ἄθλων ἀγῶνα νικήσασα. The expression in each of these passages is very unusual and singular; with respect to the first, a conqueror that receives the reward of his services, is not properly said, vincere præmium certaminum, but reportare præmium, or something to that effect: but the next, certaminum prœlium vincens, which is the rendering of St. Cyprian (De Singularitate cleri) and of the Greek, has still less authority to justify it; vincere prœlio is classical, but vincere prœlium certaminum, I believe, is quite without precedent. Nor is ἀμιάντων ἄθλων without its difficulties and objections. If I might be indulged the liberty of proposing a very small alteration, I would read the passage thus, ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι στεφανηφοροῦσα πομπεύει, τὸ τῶν ἀμιάντων ἆθλον, ἀγῶνα νικήσασα; where by ἆθλον I would understand, the reward of the contest, and not the contest itself; and by ἀμιάντων, those that had merited this crown or reward by being undefiled. And I have the pleasure to find this conjecture confirmed by the Syriac version, which renders, Præbet se victricem agonis eorum qui sine macula sunt, applying it manifestly to the persons, to the agoniceta himself, and not to contests, or the nature of their rewards. Calmet's comment is likewise to the same effect, and that of Messieurs du Port-Royal still more explicit; Elle triomphe et elle est couronné comme victorieuse, apres avoir remporté le prix dans les combats pour la chastete.

Ver. 3. The multiplying brood of the ungodly shall not thrive, nor take deep rooting from bastard slips.] Ἐκ νόθων μοσχευμάτων: probably the true reading may be μοσχεύματα, slips from spurious trees, i. e. without a metaphor, children begotten of unlawful beds, as it follows in ver. 6. the sense, as well as ἐπισφαλῶς βεβηκότα, seems to require this. And this reading is confirmed by Coverdale's version, which renders, And the things that are planted with whoredom, shall take no deep root, nor lay any fast foundation. And it has been observed in the vegetable world, that slips from such irregular productions do not thrive to any purpose. The book of Job describes the generation of the wicked in like terms: This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors which they receive of the Almighty: if his children be multiplied, it is for the sword; and his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread: those that remain of him shall be buried in death, and his widow shall not weep, (xxvii. 13—15.) The description in this and the following verses is agreeable to the Scripture dialect, where mankind in general is often represented under the metaphor of trees, or a plantation. (See Psal. i. 3. xcii. 12, &c.) According to the Hebrew style, a bough or branch often denotes a son; the word ben, or son, nearly according with banna, which signifies the root; see Gen. xlix. 22. where the Hebrew word banoth, which we translate branches, literally signifies daughters. In like manner we find the wicked in particular compared to unpromising plants, or withered and decayed trees: thus St. Jude, speaking of such libertines as defile the flesh, emphatically describes them as trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the root, (ver. 12.) The sense of this passage is briefly this, That God will visit the posterity of such loose and debauched persons, and that even their children shall not continue for any long time, but as plants which God hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Besides the instance before given of David's child struck with death, St. Austin's account of his is very particular; he ingenuously acknowledges, that he had a son "carnaliter ex se natum de peccato suo," but that God quickly deprived him of the child, though one of very promising hopes; "Annorum erat fere quindecim, et ingenio præveniebat multos graves et doctos viros." (Confess. lib. ix. cap. 6.)

Ver. 4. For though they flourish in branches for a time, yet standing not fast, they shall be shaken with the wind.] i. e. Though they equal, or even overtop, the prosperity of the good and virtuous, yet having laid their foundation in wickedness, they shall be overthrown by calamities; like a tree that has taken no deep root in the earth, and is violently shaken with storms and tempests: to which agrees that observation of the Psalmist; When all the workers of wickedness do flourish, then shall they be destroyed for ever; i. e. they are then hastening the more to their excision, their flourishing being in order to their destruction, ὅπως ἂν ἐξολοθρευθῶσιν, say the LXX. Psal. xcii. 7. But the righteous are compared to the immoveable cedars in Libanus, ver. 12. according to that of Solomon, A man shall not be established by wickedness, but the root of the righteous shall not be moved, Prov. xii. 13. See also Ecclus. xl. 15. where the children of the ungodly are called, unclean roots upon a hard rock.

Ver. 5. Their fruit unprofitable.] Ὁ καρπὸς αὐτῶν ἄχρηστος. This adjective, though it has indeed this signification of unprofitable, yet it means rather here insuavis; i. e. that the fruit is unpleasant, not of a kindly sort, and has not the right taste or flavour, as fruit will always be that comes from a tree which is wrongly planted, either in a soil that is not proper for it, or where it wants its natural sun, or when the ground is too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, too sour or too stubborn.

Ver. 6. For the children begotten of unlawful beds are witnesses of wickedness against their parents in their trial.] Ἐκ γὰρ ἀνόμων ὕπνων τέκνα γενώμενα. Ὕπνος here does neither mean bed, as our translators render, nor sleep, as the margin and Vulgate have it; it rather means concubitus, in which sense it occurs, vii. 2. and accordingly the Syriac interpreters render, Liberi ex illegitimo congressu procreati; who being monuments of their parents' guilt, are a perpetual brand, while they live, of infamy upon them. Agreeable to the sentiments in this and the foregoing verses is that description of the adulteress, and the punishment of her unlawful offspring, Ecclus. xxiii. 25. 26. Her children shall not take root, and her branches shall bring forth no fruit; she shall leave her memory to be cursed, and her reproach shall not be blotted out: but the reproach does not terminate in the parent only; the children likewise, according to the sense and opinion of the world, are partakers of the shame, according to that farther observation of the same wise writer; The inheritance of sinners' children shall perish, and their posterity shall have a perpetual reproach: for the children will complain of an ungodly father, because they shall be reproached for his sake: (Ecclus. xli. 6, 7.) but such illegitimate children being here mentioned, as witnesses of wickedness against their parents in their trial, which Calmet understands to be the same with ἡμέρα διαγνώσεως, iii. 18. I am inclined to think there is this farther meaning in the words, viz. that such children will be accusers of, and witnesses against, their guilty parents in the other world. And thus the Geneva Bible expressly reads, which is confirmed by the Arabic version, which renders in the future, Testes erunt nequitiæ parentum suorum, cum explorabuntur.

Ver. 7. Though the righteous be prevented with death, yet shall he be in peace.] That the righteous are often snatched away before they arrive at any maturity of age, is evident from observation. This is frequently the effect of God's goodness, which removes them from the evils or dangers of life; but in what time or manner soever they depart, their death ought not to be considered as a personal misfortune, since God fixes them in a place of rest and repose, free from the temptations, as well as troubles and inquietudes of life, waiting with a holy impatience for farther degrees of happiness. The prophet Isaiah has the same reflection, That righteous and merciful men are taken away from the evil to come, and shall enter into peace, (lvii. 1.) And one of the ancients has made the like observation, That he that is a favourite of the gods dies young; ὃν φιλοῦσι ἀποθνήσκει νέος. By the righteous being prevented with death, we are not to understand his being surprised by death when he least thought of it; for the good man can never, properly speaking, be surprised; he is always on the watch, prepared and ready to leave the world and appear before God; his death may be indeed sudden or hasty, but not careless or unguarded.

Ver. 9. But wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age.] Ἡλικία γήρως. Our translators seem not to have expressed ἡλικία at all in their version, which yet has a strong and significant meaning here, viz. That an unspotted life is mature old age, or the standard of old age. Fulgentius quotes this and the preceding verse, and adds most excellently by way of comment, "Ad cognoscendum, quantum possibile est, cujuslibet defuncti meritum, non quantum vixerit, sed qualiter quisque vixerit, intuendum. Sicut enim vita mala, quanto magis fuerit temporaliter prolongata, tanto magis delinquentibus multiplicat pœnam; sic in vita bona, quamvis hic brevi tempore terminata, magnam sempiternamque conquirit bene viventibus gloriam. Vita igitur mala immaturos acerbosque senes demergit in Tartarum, vita vero bona defunctos juvenes maturos perducit ad Regnum." (De Statu Viduali, epist. 2.) Philo observes of their great legislator Moses, τοὺς ἡλικίᾳ προήκοντας, &c. "Ut provectos ætate appellat juvenes et eos qui nondum senuerunt Seniores, non respiciens annorum numerum, aut tempus breve longumve, sed potentius animæ, prout movetur melius aut deterius." (De Resipisc. Noe, et de Vita Contempl.) Agreeably to this the Romans styled their chief council Senatus, and the Lacedemonians called theirs γερουσία, not so much upon account of their age, as the wisdom and prudence of those that composed it: in like manner presbyters in ecclesiastical history, had their name assigned them on the same account. There is hardly any subject on which the sages have moralized more finely than on this; honeste acta ætas is, in the opinion of one of them, the surest way to lengthen our lives, and frustrate the malice of mortality. Cicero has many beautiful sentiments upon this occasion; particularly in his book De Senectute, in the eighteenth chapter there is a thought which is very like what is contained in this and the foregoing verse; "Non cani, non rugæ repente autoritatem arripere possunt, sed honeste acta ætas superior fructus capit autoritatis extremos." And so the poet:—

"Ampliat ætatis spatium sibi vir bonus; hoc est
Vivere bis, vita posse priore frui."

But no reflection of the ancients is more judicious, than that of a learned modern: "Gray hairs (says he) consist not in the multitude of years, but in the number and variety of useful observations that are made; nor is there any reason why wisdom should be peculiarly ascribed to the aged, except such persons, by having lived longer in the world, and having had the opportunity of many and various occurrences to ripen their judgment, have accordingly improved it; for it matters not much, whether a man makes his observations in a longer or a less time, provided he makes them well." (Boyle's Occasional Reflections.)

Ver. 10. So that, living amongst sinners, he was translated.] This passage is undoubtedly to be understood of Enoch, whom, being the first example of eminent sanctity, God was pleased to translate, as he had condemned the first instance of transgression, to shew his great detestation of sin. The great question is, whether these words signify a natural death, or a miraculous translation, as that of Elijah was: from some expressions in the context, many learned men have been inclined to conjecture, that the author of this book thought Enoch died a natural death, and that his translation here mentioned, was only such a translation: one reason in particular, that has induced them to think an ordinary death is here spoken of, is, that the holy Scripture often uses the like expressions to signify death. See 1 Kings xix. 4. Jonah iv. 3. and particularly Job xxii. 16. where the Vulgate renders qui sublati sunt ante tempus, though the writer is speaking of such as die a sudden death. And it must be confessed, that the Hebrew phrase in all these passages is the same with that which Moses makes use of to express the translation of Enoch; and from hence some have inferred, that even Moses's words, Gen. v. 24. may be understood of a natural death, and do not necessarily imply a miraculous translation. But the reasons and arguments for a miraculous translation seem to carry with them much greater weight: for, first, though the text of Moses abovementioned does not absolutely imply the miraculous translation of a man yet living into heaven or another world; nevertheless, when we compare what he says of Enoch with what he relates of the other patriarchs, it is plain he intended to distinguish the manner in which Enoch went out of the world from that in which the other patriarchs left it; for of all the rest mentioned in that chapter it is said, they died, but of Enoch this is not said, but only, that he was not, οὐκ εὑρίσκετο, was not found on earth, because God had translated him from it. Farther, Moses takes notice of the eminent probity of Enoch's life, which made him well-pleasing to God, as this writer does here, and then immediately adds, according to the Vulgate, Et non apparuit, quia tulit eum Deus; implying, that though he was no more seen upon earth, yet he was still alive. This is the sense which the Chaldee paraphrase takes it in, which renders expressly, Subductus est, et ascendit in cœlum coram Domino. Again, it is said of Noah and of Abraham, that they walked with God, Gen. vi. 9. xvii. 1. but it is not said, that they were not, because God took them. This phrase therefore must import something that happened peculiarly to him. Secondly, The holy penman, 2 Kings ii. 3. 5. 9. giving an account of Elijah's translation, which was confessedly miraculous, uses the very same word, viz. taken away, several times, to express it by. Thirdly, The son of Sirach seems most favourable to Enoch's being translated alive, Ecclus. xliv. 16. where, to avoid any equivocalness, the Vulgate reads, translatus est in paradisum, a term not commonly made use of to express the ordinary death of a man. But, fourthly, The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, xi. 5. puts this matter beyond all dispute, and understands it clearly of a miraculous translation; By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death. Lastly, Many of the fathers expressly assert a miraculous translation; the author of the Recognitions, bearing the name of St. Clement, says, "Enoch having pleased God, was translated into immortality." And St. Cyprian, "That he deserved to be taken from the contagion of this world by a singular favour." (De Mortal.) St. Jerome yet more fully, "That he was translated into heaven, and fed with celestial bread." (Epist. 38. ad Pammach. See Calmet's Dissertation more at large.)

Ver. 12. For the bewitching of naughtiness doth obscure things that are honest; and the wandering of concupiscence doth undermine the simple mind.] This seems to refer to the corruptions introduced by Cain and his descendants, by which the holy seed by degrees fell off, and became infected. Calmet observes, that there is a particular beauty in the word βασκανία, here rendered bewitching, and that it is with the greatest propriety applied to sinful pleasures; for as there is a sort of magic or fascination which imposes upon men's eyes, and makes them see false appearances, and obscures what is real; so a like fatal mistake arising from the blindness of men's understandings, or the perverseness of their wills, makes them fancy there is truth and reality in false and imaginary pleasures, and tempts them to overlook the real danger that attends them. Nor is this true only of pleasures in general, but applicable in a more particular manner to the sweets of love or amorous delights; I have therefore sometimes fancied φιλότητος to be the true reading, which seems warranted by what follows. The like observation we may make upon ῥεμβασμὸς, which the Vulgate renders, inconstantia concupiscentiæ; and the lexicographers, who refer to this place, no less imperfectly, occupatio mentis. The meaning is, that a continual round or circle of criminal pleasures turns people's heads; for so ῥεμβασμὸς properly signifies, and transforms things and persons into other natures, like Circe's enchantments; for so μεταλλεύει may be interpreted, which probably too is a technical term. Dr. Grabe thinks the verb μεταλλοιόω would be more agreeable to this place, and likewise more proper in chap. xvi. 25. (See Prolegom. cap. 4. tom. ult.) The sense of this whole verse is not improperly expressed by those words of Tully; "Impedit consilium voluptas, rationi inimica est, ac mentis, ut dicam, præstringit oculos, nec habet ullum cum virtute commercium." (De Senectute, cap. 12.)

Ver. 13. He being made perfect in a short time, fulfilled a long time.] It may be asked, with what propriety Enoch is here said to have fulfilled a long time, since he was the shortest-lived of the patriarchs before the flood, and lived but three hundred and sixty-five years? To this the answer is very obvious, "If we measure not his life by the number of years, but by the perfection of his goodness, δι' ἄκραν ἀρετῆς τελείωσιν, by his consummate virtue and extraordinary sanctity in the corrupt age he lived in, he may be allowed, to all useful purposes of living, to have fulfilled an honourable age." (Euseb. Præp. Evang. lib. vii. cap. 8.) So of Abraham it is said, Gen. xxv. 8. that he died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years: expressions exaggerated on purpose to denote an extraordinary length of life. But here again it may be as justly inquired, how Abraham can properly be said to die in a good old age; when, if we compare his age with those that lived before him, it comes much short of theirs: for one hundred seventy-five years may be considered as a small point of time, with respect to those several hundreds of years that the fathers before the flood arrived at; (see Gen. v.) and in the computation of the lives of the fathers after the flood, (Gen. xi.) we find all of them, except one, to be older than Abraham was. The true answer therefore to this difficulty is, that Abraham died in a good old age, not as to the measure of his life by days or years, but in regard to the great progress he had made in faith and holiness.

Ver. 15. Neither laid they up this in their minds, that his grace and mercy is with his saints, and that he hath respect unto his chosen.] Ἐπισκοπὴ, though it often signifies visitation by punishment, yet here means that favour and regard which God shews to his elect: and the sense of the whole passage is, that the wicked, among whom Enoch conversed, considered not the true reason for which God took him, that it was an act of his mercy, rather than severity, to remove a saint, whose righteous soul was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked, to a state of purity, perfection, and happiness: much less did they consider, that he was taken up alive into heaven, to be an example of that happiness which God has prepared for those who walk with him and please him; and also a proof, that our bodies are capable of immortality. Nor did they make any use or improvement of his translation, though it certainly was the noblest exhortation to piety and virtue that can be imagined. The construction of the Greek in the former part of this verse is singular, λαῶν ἰδόντων is a more usual way of expression.

Ver. 16. Thus the righteous that is dead, shall condemn the ungodly which are living.] Our version and the commentators understand this in the future tense, following the present accenting of the Greek; but the Vulgate reads the passage in the present tense, Condemnat autem justus mortuus vivos impios, which all the ancient English versions follow; Junius also and Calmet render in like manner: so that probably the original reading, at least of some copies, was κατακρίνει. If we follow this reading, the passage may relate to any righteous person speedily taken away, whose good life condemns or leaves without excuse the wicked that outlive him, and grow old in their wickedness: or it may relate to Enoch in particular, who may be said to condemn his contemporaries, either virtually by his word and doctrine, or judicially, by denouncing God's judgments against the ungodly of his time. (See the same expression applied to Noah upon a like occasion, Heb. xi. 7.)

And youth that is soon perfected, the many years and old age of the unrighteous.] This is what the prophet Isaiah means, when he says, (lxv. 20.) That the child that has an early sense of goodness and perfects holiness betimes, shall die a hundred years old; but the sinner, being a hundred years old and confirmed in wickedness, shall die as an overgrown child and be accursed.

Ver. 17. And shall not understand—to what end the Lord hath set him in safety.] The wicked triumph over a godly man suddenly snatched away, as if God had forgotten to be gracious, and was unmindful of his piety, or was induced through some secret fault to cut his life short; not considering, for such have not the knowledge of God or his councils, that it was in mercy to him, and for his greater safety and reward. This is assigned by learned men as the reason why Lazarus is mentioned, Luke xvi. as dying before the rich man—because God graciously removed him from the evils of life, but continued the profligate in order to his repentance, or to fill up the measure of his iniquity.

Ver. 18. They shall see him and despise him, but God shall laugh them to scorn.] Grotius says, that the future is used in this description for the præteritum, and calls it a Hebraism; though it is certain that such changes are not unusual in the best classic writers. The repetition, they shall see him, is beautiful, upon the supposition of this book's being metrical; and is otherwise very defensible, especially as supported by the authority of all the editions;

I should else have thought σκώφονται the true reading, which seems to make the opposition in the words following more beautiful; and so small an alteration might easily be occasioned by the nearness and affinity of the sound.

And they shall hereafter be a vile carcass.] Ἔσονται μετὰ τοῦτο εἰς πτῶμα ἄτιμον. Can all the wicked before referred to with propriety be said to be a vile carcass, or to compose one vile carcass? and is not this sense in some measure comprised in the sentence following? possibly πεσοῦνται may be the true reading here, which opens a new sense, and yet proper to the occasion, viz. that they shall be confounded and fall shamefully; which signification πτῶμα will equally admit of; and it is certain, that εἰς is frequently to be understood in the sense of ἐν: and I have the satisfaction to find this conjecture confirmed by the authority of the Vulgate, which reads, Erunt posthac decidentes sine honore; and by the Syriac version, Erunt posthac in ruinam turpissimam. Junius also is to the same purpose; and to these agrees the Geneva Bible, which renders, They shall fall hereafter without honour.

And a reproach among the dead for evermore.] Εἰς ὕβριν ἐν νεκροῖς δι' αἰῶνος. This expression may seem to relate to the everlasting disgrace of wicked men in infernis, that, like the giants of old, they shall stand upon a lasting record there; but it is more probable, it should be taken in a more limited and confined sense, for the phrase νεκροὶ αἰῶνος, or δι' αἰῶνος, is a Hebraism, and may receive some light from Lament. iii. 6. where the prophet, complaining of his terrible situation in his dungeon, says, He has made me stay in dark places, ὡς νεκροὺς αἰῶνος, veluti mortuos sæculi, as those that have been long dead, as those that lie buried in their graves. And that the term evermore, does not here mean eternity, strictly so called, seems the more probable from the order of the description, because the judgment, or day of accounts, is mentioned after, ver. 20.

Ver. 19. For he shall rend them, and cast them down headlong, that they shall be speechless, &c.] Ῥήξει αὐτοὺς ἀφώνους πρηνεῖς. Calmet observes, that the author here has expressed in three words three different punishments; ῥήξει implies, that God shall beat or dash them against the ground; and the other two probably allude to a more infamous kind of death, viz. that they shall be strangled, and suffocated, and burst asunder. And thus πρηνὴς is used, Acts i. 18. in the description of Judas's death. (See Wall's Critical Notes in loc. and Hammond.) Osiander thinks ἄφνω the true reading, rather than ἀφώνους (see his observations on the Vulgate), but he assigns no reason, and is supported by no authority of MSS. The description of the punishment here is not unlike that supposed to be inflicted upon the Rephaim of old, to whom Enoch in his prophecy refers; and possibly such wicked ones as resembled them in their proud and blasphemous speeches and notorious acts of violence and oppression, are here meant: for can there be a properer punishment for a γιγαντώδης θυμὸς (for so the son of Sirach calls a proud and defying temper), than what is here described to be its fate; or can pride and insolence be represented under stronger circumstances of meanness and disgrace? The opposition is too beautiful in what follows not to be taken notice of: for, were they swollen with pride? the Almighty shall burst them. Disrumpet illos inflatos, says the Vulgate. Did they aspire against heaven? they shall be cast down headlong. Did they use great swelling words and threats of defiance? they shall be speechless. Did they pride themselves in works of greatness, and trust in their strong holds of security? they shall be shaken from their foundations and become desolate. Did they love noise and disturbance, and was their name terrible upon earth? they shall come no more into remembrance, but their memorial shall perish with them. Were they such desperate and bold wretches, as to set every thing at defiance? they shall be afraid even of their own consciences. Did they finally ridicule God and his justice? they shall tremble at the apprehension of their sad punishment.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.

To shew the great difference, in point of happiness, between the virtuous and the wicked, the latter are introduced as groaning under inexpressible misery, and lamenting before the tribunal of God their former ill courses, and the sad consequences of them. From hence the writer takes occasion to shew, that the vengeance of God always pursues sinners, either immediately from himself, or by the agency of second causes, his appointed instruments and executioners. Calmet thinks the six first chapters may be considered as a sort of preface to the rest of this work.

Ver. 1. THEN shall the righteous man stand in great boldness before the face of such as have afflicted him.] At the end of the former chapter, the wicked are represented as trembling under a sense of their guilt and the apprehension of punishment due to it: here, by the way of antithesis, is shewn the holy confidence and sweet security which will arise in the breast of every good man in the day of trial, from the justice of his cause, and the testimony and approbation of his conscience. Thus παῤῥησία is used in many places in the New Testament; see particularly, 1 John ii. 28. and iv. 17. where the righteous man is said to have boldness in the day of judgment.

And made no account of his labours.] We may understand this of such as laughed at the good man's deeds as fruitless, or endeavoured to make them so by their opposition: but St. Austin, and others of the fathers, understand this passage of such oppressors as, by violence, spoiled the righteous man's goods, which he had acquired by his honest labours. Thus St. Cyprian, diripuerunt labores eorum. (Testim. lib. iii. ad Quirin. cap. 16.) And the Vulgate renders accordingly, abstulerunt labores eorum, which Coverdale and the Geneva Bible follow. Calmet explains the passage in both these senses.

Ver. 2. When they see it, they shall be troubled with terrible fear.] The Syriac and Arabic versions read, him. The sense is, The wicked shall be confounded at the sight of him whom they have so much abused, and shall behold with amazement the sudden and wonderful turn of providence in favour of the righteous, beyond what they expected or thought of; and from the happiness conferred upon the righteous, shall conclude and anticipate their own misery. To give the more lively impression of this, the author represents them both as standing together before the judgment-seat of God, and as witnesses of each other's happiness or misery. The circumstances of the surprise upon the signal deliverance of the righteous, are very justly here preserved; and the consternation and despair of the wicked, from the killing reflection of a too late and fruitless repentance, are no less beautifully described, with all the terror and exaggeration of expression. For it will be no small torment to the wicked, to see those, whom they most despised for their great advances in piety and goodness, very highly advanced in honour by God, and rewarded by him as his faithful servants: envy at others' happiness, and despair of their own, will render them completely miserable. This is finely represented in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

Ver. 3. And they, repenting and groaning for anguish of spirit, shall say within themselves, This was he whom we had sometime in derision, and a proverb of reproach.] The prosopopœia here is very natural, and may be considered either as a soliloquy in each repenting sinner's breast, or as a joint reflection made by them all, and a set discourse which they had one to another. The Greek will admit of either sense, but Calmet thinks the latter most agreeable to the context. It is very observable, that there are three words in this verse to express the same thing, viz. γέλως, παραβολὴ, ὀνειδισμὸς, which are designed to denote an excess of abuse and rudeness; but that in Psal. xliv. 14, 15. is still more remarkable, where David uses five synonymous terms upon the like occasion; ἔθου ἡμᾶς ὄνειδος τοῖς γείτοσιν ἡμῶν, μυκτηρισμὸν καὶ καταγέλωτα τοῖς κύκλῳ ἡμῶν· ἔθου ἡμᾶς εἰς παραβολὴν ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι, κίνησιν κεφαλῆς ἐν τοῖς λαοῖς. The confession of these scoffers may be applied to all others of the like turn and denomination; for it has been the unhappy fate of good men in all ages, to be thus ridiculed by libertines. It was the observation of Job long since, that the just upright is laughed to scorn, (xii. 4.) And with respect to himself, he complains particularly, that he was made a by-word of the people; and before them, as the margin reads, he was as a tabret, (xvii. 6.) i. e. for them to make sport with; (see Mercer in loc.) which is no improbable interpretation of the place, the LXX. rendering it by γέλως.

Ver. 4. We fools counted his life madness.] Religious men, and such as retire from the world for the opportunity of a greater piety, are often represented by debauchees as melancholy and disordered; but in the end, such libertines as abuse the world, will be found to be the only fools, and religion acknowledged to be the truest wisdom. The like reflection was thrown upon such of the primitive Christians as were dead to the world; they were looked upon as senseless, for despising the pleasures that courted them, and foolishly credulous, for trusting to invisible rewards: "Let fools and idiots (says Celsus, in his sneering way) come to the Christian mysteries, for such are the most agreeable disciples to the God they worship." (Origen. cont. Cels. lib. iii.) Nor did our Saviour himself escape the censure of having a devil, and being mad, (John x. 20.) So certain an attendant upon extraordinary sanctity is obloquy and reproach. There is, seemingly, the like reflection on him, Mark iii. 21. and even uttered by his own friends, as our translation has faultily rendered it: for, as the learned now generally agree in interpreting the place, ἐξέστη does not relate to our blessed Saviour, but to the clamorous multitude, whose behaviour often gives just occasion for such a suspicion.

Ver. 5. How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints!] How different are the cool reflections of an unbodied spirit, from the wild sallies of a heated fancy; and how do the sentiments of the same persons vary, considered in this different light! The very same scoffers, who rallied the just man upon his glorious title of the Son of God, ii. 18. at length confess the truth of what he said: they perceived the invaluable privileges of such a relation in the next life, and that the true inheritance of the sons of God is among his glorified saints: ἐν ἁγίοις ὁ κλῆρος αὐτοῦ. See Dan. xii. 13. where the angel tells him, that he shall rest in a happy condition, and stand in his lot, at the end of the days; i. e. in the resurrection of the just; which the LXX. render, ἀναστήσῃ εἰς τὸν κλῆρόν σου. The phrase alludes to the division of the land of Canaan (a type of heaven) among the twelve tribes by lot.

Ver. 6. And the Sun of righteousness rose not upon us.] Coverdale's and the other English versions read in like manner, following the Vulgate; but all the Greek copies omit the words, of righteousness, and so likewise do several of the fathers, when they quote this passage. (See particularly St. Gregory, lib. xxxiv. Moral. cap. 6. St. Ambr. Serm. 3. 16. and St. Cyprian in many places.) The Syriac and Arabic versions likewise omit them. They seem either to have been put in the margin by way of explanation, and to have crept from thence into the text, or else to have been added from the former sentence, for they are neither in the Alexandrian, nor any other copy.

Ver. 7. We wearied ourselves in the way of wickedness and destruction.] One cannot help observing, at first sight, how closely wickedness and destruction are here linked together, and that one seems to follow naturally at the heels of the other: nor is sin, however represented to be all pleasure, without its drudgery. The prophet Jeremiah expresses himself like this writer, They weary themselves to work iniquity, ix. 5. (See also Habak. ii. 13.) It is a pretty observation of a very learned writer, that the Greek word πονηρία, which signifies wickedness, comes from another that signifies labour, viz. πόνος. (Sanderson's Sermons, p. 596.) And it is not without great elegance and particular good reason, that the lusts and practices of sinners are so frequently in Scripture styled works, and sinners emphatically called workers of iniquity, and said to work wickedness; expressions all implying the toil and drudgery of wicked courses. St. Chrysostom is very copious on this subject, and shews, both from Scripture and reason, that the life of a wicked man has more real weariness and slavery, than all the mortifications and severity of a godly life. And this truth the wicked here confess, though too late, ambulavimus vias difficiles, as the Vulgate renders. And here again the subject suggests to me the same useful reflection, viz. That when men are about leaving this world, and their soul is a little more at liberty to reflect (which holds much stronger of an unbodied spirit), there will then be a strange alteration in their judgment and opinion concerning the things of this world; they will then be sensible of the extreme vanity and folly of them, and fruitlessly wish for a few hours of their irrevocable time, mispent in a succession of vanities. But bitter will be the remembrance of former pleasures not innocent, and so much the greater will the detestation and cursing of them be, as they have taken more delight in them. But this will appear in a stronger light from what follows. Our version follows the present reading of the Greek, ἐνεπλήσθημεν τρίβοις, but ἐνεπλάγχθημεν seems to be more suitable, viz. We wandered up and down in the paths of wickedness and destruction.

Ver. 8. What hath pride profited us, or what good have riches with our vaunting brought us?] i. e. What good have all our proud and haughty conceits, our admiration of worldly state and riches, our pursuit of vain curiosities and unlawful pleasures, done us, since these admired trifles are so uncertain, and all vanished into nothing? It is obvious to observe, from this self-reflection of a wicked man, very naturally here represented, that the sensual person in a future state will condemn himself in the first place, that, by pursuing with eagerness the uncertain pleasures of this world, he has forfeited his title to more durable and lasting delights. Secondly, that he is for ever incapable of recovering his lost happiness; and the sad prospect or reflection upon that happiness, which he might have enjoyed, but lost through his own folly, will greatly increase his misery. Thirdly, that the remembrance of his imprudence in this respect, will be a part of his future punishment; all his favourite pleasures and enjoyments being past and gone, they will, by a miserable exchange, be succeeded with dreadful and tormenting reflections: for it will be an addition to the torments of the wicked, that they shall not be able to forget all those sins and follies which they have ever been guilty of, but must have always in their remembrance, as it were purposely to haunt and disturb them, all those once dear delights, which they would now willingly, at any rate, purchase the oblivion of.

Ver. 9—12.] We meet with several of these similes and comparisons, with respect to the shortness of life, and its satisfactions; in the book of Job, ix. 25, 26. My days are swifter than a post, they flee away, they see no good: they are passed away as the swift ships, as the eagle that hasteth to the prey. And among the memorable sayings of Agur, (Prov. xxx. 19.) The way of an eagle in the air, and the way of a ship in the midst of the sea, are taken notice of as so obscure and uncertain, as to leave no traces behind them. The comparisons made use of in the course of these verses, to represent the uncertainty of life and its enjoyments, we may observe, thicken apace, as if the wicked, described in this chapter, took pains and were concerned to impress upon others that lively sense of the vanity of worldly pleasures, which, by a sad experience, they had unhappily gained. The images are very natural, and placed in different lights, to be more affecting; they seem compassionately designed as notices to warn others, lest they also come into that place of torment: and they are each of them particularly proper to express what they are brought to illustrate. I shall only observe thus much of them farther,—that though they very naturally describe the licentiousness of the wicked, and the eagerness with which they abandon themselves to their lusts and passions, and the rapidity with which they are carried away by them; yet herein all the images are deficient, that they do not sufficiently point out the destructive consequences and mischievous effects of a mispent life: for can a wicked life be thought as harmless as a shadow? or will it, like that, pass away without any farther notice? Is the speed of a messenger an adequate resemblance, without considering the consequence of his errand, and how he will be received at the end of his journey? Does the soaring of birds into the upper regions, and their aspiring even towards heaven, sufficiently denote the contrary course of sinners, and their certain tendency downwards? Or should a ship be described only as passing swiftly over the sea, and no notice taken of the danger of a shipwreck? And will the great gulf finally be as easily passed over as the waves, or come together like the light air? The propriety of our translation too, in some of the foregoing similes, may be a little suspected; for, (ver. 9.) ἀγγελία παρατρέχουσα, which in our version is rendered, as a post that hasted by, may probably, with more justice, be translated, as a flying report. And thus Calmet explains it, comme une nouvelle qui court; comme la renommée qui vole; and then he quotes Virgil's description of fame, Æneid. iv. And indeed ἀγγελία properly means the rumour itself, and not the messenger that carries it. Again, ver. 11. the light air is said, in our version, to be parted with the violent noise of the bird's wings, σχιζόμενον βίᾳ ῥοΐζου (the next word expresses the motion of them): but certainly this is inaccurate, for the noise does not part the air, but follow from it. Coverdale's, and the other ancient versions, render more justly, parting the air through the vehemency of her going: per vim itineris. Vulgate. Our translators were led into this mistake by the double sense of ῥοῖζος, which signifies both stridor and impetus, but the latter signification is far preferable here: and thus the Syriac and Arabic interpreters understand it. The last observation is upon the Greek text, ver. 12. ὁ ἀὴρ εὐθέως εἰς ἑαυτὸν ἀνελύθη, where I would read with Grotius, ἀνελήλυθε, which seems more proper.

Ver. 13. Even so we, in like manner, as soon as we were born, began to draw to our end.] i. e. Our life has been wasting ever since it was first given us, and we are continually dying by degrees; like that of the poet, "Nascentes morimur," which Seneca seems to explain, "Quotidie morimur, quotidie enim demitur aliqua pars vitæ;" We die daily, for our life is daily decreasing. But that of St. Austin is still closer, "Profecto ex quo esse incipit in hoc corpore, in morte est homo." (De Civit. Dei, lib. xiii.) An expression not unlike that moving one in our burial-service, "In the midst of life we are in death;" for life is continually exposed to so many perils, that what David says of himself, (Psal. cxix. 109.) is true of every man, My soul is always in my hand; i. e. it is always in danger to be taken from me. The Hebrew word signifies the palm of the hand, out of which any thing will easily slip; and intimates, that he esteemed his life always in danger, and always was ready to resign it.

And had no sign of virtue to shew.] Coverdale's translation is much better, And have shewed no token of virtue. The Greek reads in the present tense, We have no sign of virtue to shew; i. e. We have nothing to urge in our defence, no good action to produce in our favour. One cannot help observing from hence, how insignificant, even in his own confession, a wicked man is; he is born and dies, can say no good of himself, nor any body else for him.

But were consumed in our own wickedness.] i. e. We spent our whole life in wickedness; and as we died in our sins, we justly suffer the reward of our evil deeds.—These, and such-like dreadful reflections, will the wicked make in their torments.—Thus far the wicked are introduced speaking: accordingly the Vulgate here inserts, Talia dixerunt in inferno hi, qui peccaverunt. And indeed such a soliloquy from a great sinner, or such repenting strains from a company of them in despair, seem very natural; for such is the power of a guilty conscience, that the wicked shall be self-condemned, even before the books are opened; they will anticipate their doom, and acknowledge the justice of their sentence, before it be passed upon them. The making the scene of this long prosopopœia, which reaches from the beginning of ver. 3. to the end of this, to be in hell, as the Vulgate does; and the representing them, by an ingenious fiction, as really speaking and lamenting there, in the way they would have done if they had power, can never be enough admired in this writer. We have a remarkable and beautiful instance of this in Luke xvi. 24. where an imaginary discourse is carried on between Abraham and the rich man.

Ver. 15. But the righteous live for evermore.] The author, having shewn the dreadful consequences of sin, according to the inward sense and acknowledgment of the wicked themselves, their sad prospect, and the final ruin of all their hopes; and illustrated, by several just comparisons, the shortness of life, especially of one spent in a continual round of sinful pleasures; proceeds, in this and the next verses, to set down, by way of contrast, the glory of the righteous, and their exceeding great reward; that it is not only with, but in the Lord, for so it is in the original; and the Syriac and Arabic translations render accordingly, in Domino. It is also observable, that their reward, and even their future life, is expressed in the present tense, to denote probably the certainty of their reward, and their immediate entrance upon it.

And the care of them is with the Most High.] The true and common acceptation of these words is, that God careth for the righteous, will defend them with his favourable kindness as with a shield, and will provide for them a reward, great even beyond imagination or expression. Stella understands this passage in a different sense, That the chief care of the righteous is about the Most High, and his whole study and endeavour to please the Lord in all instances of duty. "Tota solicitudo et diligentia justorum circa id versatur, ut Deo placeant; illi enim vere justi dici possunt, qui Deo curant placere." (Stell. Enarrat. cap. 1. Lucæ.) This sense would indeed have been very proper, if the original reading was, ἡ φροντὶς αὐτῶν περὶ ὑψίστου, as he seems to have understood it; but the true reading, in all the editions, is, ἡ φροντὶς αὐτῶν παρὰ ὑψίστῳ, Cura eorum penes altissimum, as the Arabic renders. That of the Syriac, Cogitatio illorum in altissimo, may seem to favour either sense.

Ver. 16. Therefore shall they receive a glorious kingdom, and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand.] The Arabic reads, Diadema pulchritudinis, and the Syriac version more explicitly, Diadema bonorum operum. The Greek, τὸ βασίλειον τῆς εὐπρεπείας, καὶ τὸ Διάδημα τοῦ κάλλους· which manner of expression by the substantive is very beautiful. Instances of it are frequent in Scripture and profane authors: thus, i. 10. we have οὖς ζηλώσεως, for the jealous ear; and πνεῦμα δυνάμεως, a mighty wind, v. 23. And in Luke xviii. 6. the unjust judge is, ὁ κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας; and the forgetful hearer, ἀκροατὴς ἐπιλησμονῆς, James i. 25. (See more instances, John xvii. 12. James v. 15. 2 Thess. ii. 8.) This must be allowed to be a fine description of future happiness, and, considering the times of this writer, very clear and distinct. The New Testament, indeed, speaks of the righteous in heaven, under the idea and character of mighty kings and princes; and no wonder if there are better and clearer promises therein; but in the Old Testament, at least under the particular economy of Moses, we meet with no such explicit discovery of the happy and glorious state after death.

For with his right hand shall he cover them.] As by the organs of sense attributed to God, the knowledge of God is set forth; so by the organs or instruments of action is his power deciphered, and most eminently by the hand: so that the hand of God, in Scripture, means ordinarily the power of God; but the right hand being more active than the left, and the more usual instrument in outward works, hence it is taken to intimate the exceeding abundance of the power of God. The sense of this passage is much the same with that of the Psalmist: The righteous shall dwell under the defence of the Most High, and shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty: he will defend them under his wings, and they shall be safe under his feathers; his faithfulness and truth shall be their shield and buckler. (Psal. xci.)

Ver. 17. He shall take to him his jealousy for complete armour.] I have before observed, that sin in Scripture is often compared to spiritual adultery; (see note on chap. i. 10.) so that the sense is, That his jealousy, i. e. his enraged justice, will furnish him with complete armour. The Syriac version expresses this very fully; In gratiam ipsorum in zelo suo armabit omnia. The following descriptions, to the end of the chapter, are full of the sublimest imagery: God is drawn in all that terrible glory with which the strongest imagination can paint him; his whole figure strikes us in the highest and most amazing manner: he is represented as completely armed with terror; we see his helmet, his breast-plate, his invincible shield, his sharp sword, his thunderbolts, and, in fine, his whole artillery of heaven. He is more dreadful than Mars moving to battle, while he commands the creation round him (for so I would render τὴν κτίσιν in the following sentence), to execute his decreed vengeance upon his enemies, and to determine the fate of guilty nations. In Moses's song, the Lord, or Jehovah, is represented, in like manner, as a fierce man of war, (Exod. xv. 3.) Nor is the description of the Psalmist less to be admired, where he says of God, If a man will not turn, he will whet his sword; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready; he hath prepared for him the instruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors. (Psal. vii. 12, 13.)

Ver. 18. He shall put on righteousness as a breast-plate.] The breast-plate is known to cover the heart, which is the source of all the passions: hence this writer says, that God will arm himself with justice as with a breast-plate, to intimate, that he will do nothing out of mere passion, or by an absolute, uncontrolled power, without regard to the rules of equity; but that he will conduct all his proceedings and determinations, even against his enemies, according to the eternal rules of justice: and therefore it follows very properly in the next sentence, that he will put on true judgment instead of a helmet; i. e. as a wise judge, whose infinite wisdom searches into the secrets of every crime and action, and who cannot be mistaken or imposed upon, he will give true and impartial judgment; and, as a just judge, he will observe a strict proportion between the crimes and the punishment. With great propriety therefore is true judgment here described as the ornament of his head. This can only be exceeded by that sublime description in the inspired writer upon the like occasion: He put on righteousness as a breast-plate, and a helmet of salvation upon his head; he put on the garments of vengeance for a clothing, and was clad with zeal as with a cloak. (Isa. lix. 17.) How much more amiable is the description of this writer, representing the Almighty, clothed with the breast-plate of righteousness, than that of Jupiter in Homer, whose ægis grinned terribly with the figures of horror, affright, and discord?

And true judgment instead of a helmet.] Καὶ περιθήσεται κόρυθα κρίσιν ἀνυπόκριτον. The learned editor of Philo Judæus applies the epithet to κόρυθα, rather than κρίσιν, and conjectures the true reading of this place to be, περιθήσεται κόρυθα κρίσιν ἀκαθαίρετον, Accipiet pro galea inexpugnabili judicium; which he justifies by two parallel passages in Philo, where the same sentiment occurs, δύναμιν ἀκαθαίρετον τὸ δίκαιον ἡγούμενος; and in another place, ἀκαθαιρέτῳ χρώμενοι τοῦ δικαίου συμμαχίᾳ. (Phil. de Mose.)

Ver. 19. He shall take holiness for an invincible shield.] St. Bernard observes upon this passage, that at the time when this true judgment is passed, God's equity, as the margin rightly renders, will be so absolutely inflexible, that he will not suffer himself to be overcome by any arguments of pity that can be offered; nor can he possibly relent by any weakness or tenderness of nature. As the wicked have so long abused the riches of his goodness and long-suffering, his dignity calls upon him to do justice to his injured honour. And since this judgment or procedure is founded upon the most perfect equity, it will in all respects be so irreproachable, that even the wicked themselves shall be convinced of the justness of their sentence; and while they experience the greatness of his power, shall acknowledge the justice of all his determinations, and that his equity is no less infinite.

Ver. 20. His severe wrath shall he sharpen for a sword.] This is capable of two senses; either that he shall sharpen the sword of his fierce wrath, as the Syriac version understands it, Mirum in modum exacuet lanceam iræ suæ; or that he shall sharpen his wrath into a destructive sword, εἰς ἀπότομον ῥομφαίαν, as the Arabic renders, Iram suam expoliet in gladium acutum. And thus God punished the transgression of our first parents; he sharpened τὸν θυμὸν τῆς ὀργῆς, (Numb. xiv. 34.) into a flaming sword, to guard the avenue of Paradise against them; "to keep the delinquents (says St. Chrysostom in loc. Hom. 18.) in continual remembrance of what had passed, and to strike frequent terror into them by so menacing an object." The description in this and the following verses is agreeable to the language of Scripture; for when God is mentioned as angry with the wicked, he is represented as standing continually with his bow bent, with his arrow upon the string, as ready to let fly; and with his sword not only drawn, but whetted, as if he was just about to strike. (Psal. vii. 13.)

And the world shall fight with him against the unwise.] This is the same in effect with that sentence in the seventeenth verse, He shall make the creature, i. e. the creation, his weapon for the revenge of his enemies. Not that Almighty God has any need of all, or any, of his creatures, to assist him in executing his vengeance; but he sometimes chooses to make use of them, as instruments of his wrath, to convince the unwise, i. e. the wicked, of their folly, in their immoderate or unlawful pursuit of them; and therefore his wisdom purposely punishes them by such creatures as they have abused, and makes the objects of their pleasures become the instruments of their punishment; "Quia in cunctis deliquimus (says St. Gregory), in cunctis ferimur." (Homil. 35. in Evang.) It is an observation of the book of Job, that all the works of nature are prepared by God to be his instruments, either for judgment or for mercy: thus (xxxvii. 12, 13.) it is said of the clouds in particular, that they are made to do whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the whole earth, either for correction or for plenty. And of the treasures of snow and hail, the same writer observes, that they are reserved by God against the time of trouble, against the day of war and battle; (xxxviii. 23.) In the song of Deborah it is said, that the stars in their courses fought against Sisera. And, indeed, God can make all the elements in their turns to conspire against the wicked: he can discomfit them with thunderbolts and tempests, (ver. 21.) as Livy says it happened to the Romans in the great battle at Cannæ; or command the air to be his destroying angel: he can make the waters to rage and swell horribly, (ver. 22.) and to destroy them by another deluge: he can make the fire to fulfil all the purposes of his providence, and his flame shall burn up the ungodly: or, he can command the earth to open her mouth, and death shall come hastily upon them.

Ver. 21. Then shall the right-aiming thunderbolts go abroad.] Βολίδες ἀστραπῶν, The arrows of the lightnings; and so the Syriac version has it, Jacula lancearum igne arum ac fulgurum. The meaning is, That the Lord shall shew his wrath and indignation against the wicked by terrible thunder from heaven, like that in the days of Samuel, (1 Sam. vii. 10.) when the Lord thundered with a great thunder upon the Philistines, and discomfited them: and that these his instruments of destruction shall be so infallibly directed, as to execute his designed vengeance with an unerring certainty. An ingenious writer observes, "That compound epithets heighten the diction; and that even one of these is itself a short description." (Pope's Pref. to Hom. Iliad.) We see the justness of this observation in εὔστοχοι, or right-aiming; for can any thing convey a finer or more lively idea, than thunderbolts animated as it were with sense, and discharging themselves with judgment and discretion? We see the uplifted hand of vengeance, and the bolt not only grasped and levelled rubente dexterâ, but executing its fated commission with as much certainty, as if each particular stroke had its charge assigned it. Aristotle justly commends Homer, for having found out living words, "His hero's arrow is impatient to be on the wing, and his weapon thirsts to drink the blood of the enemy"—δόρυ μαίνεται. Here the Almighty's thunder is winged with death, and his unerring wisdom guides it to the mark; Jehovah but sends out his arrows, and they know where to go, and what to do; in short, to use the words of another polite writer upon a like occasion, the description here and in the context "is a noble picture, in which the gusts of hail, and flashes of fire, burst out from the clouds with as much spirit and force as in a real tempest."

And from the clouds, as from a well-drawn bow, shall they fly to the mark.] Ὡς ἀπὸ εὐκύκλου τόξου τῶν νεφῶν, i. e. As from the well-arched or well-bent bow of the clouds. Not any well-drawn bow is here alluded to, but that particular bow, the τὸ τόξον ἐν τῇ νεφέλῃ, which was at first set in the cloud, (Gen. ix. 14.) And thus the Vulgate renders, A bene curvato arcu nubium. To which agree the Syriac and Arabic, and most ancient English translations; but Coverdale's is more explicit than the rest, Then shall the thunderbolts come out of the rainbow of the clouds to the place appointed; i. e. to execute God's will, and to fulfil their own commission, as is explained above. There is an expression in the Psalmist, with respect to God's vengeance, which, if rightly understood, is much to this purpose: He (God) made a way to his indignation, (Psal. lxxviii. 50.) ὡδοποίησε τρίβον τῇ ὀργῇ αὐτοῦ, LXX. i. e. He directed his anger where, or to what quarter, it should fall: it does not mean in general only that God was angry, but that he had appointed a certain tract or path for his vengeance, which it must follow and pursue; the Latin version therefore expresses this with great judgment, Libravit semitam iræ suæ. (See 2 Esdr. xvi. 13.) Isaiah describes the surprising massacre of the Assyrian army by the just vengeance of God in the like figurative way, and with a sublimity suitable to his grandeur, which the Vulgate thus expresses: "Auditam faciet Dominus gloriam vocis suæ, et terrorem brachii sui ostendet in comminatione furoris, et flammâ ignis devorantis; allidet in turbine et in lapide grandinis. A voce Domini pavebit Assur, virgâ percussus;" which the LXX. express more properly, τῇ πληγῇ ᾗ ἂν πατάξῃ (κύριος) αὐτούς. (Isa. xxx. 30, 31. see also Psal. xviii. 13, 14.) In the pagan theology the vengeance of the gods is expressed in the like manner: thus Homer describes the wrath of Apollo, according to Mr. Pope's excellent translation:

"Bent was his bow the Grecian hearts to wound;
Fierce as he mov'd, his silver shafts resound:
Breathing revenge, a sudden night he spread,
And gloomy darkness roll'd around his head.
The fleet in view, he twang'd his deadly bow,
And hissing fly the feather'd fates below." (B. i. 63.)

Virgil has expressed the same sentiment:

—— "Arcum intendebat Apollo
Desuper. Omnis eo terrore Ægyptus et Indi,
Omnis Arabs, omnes vertebant terga Sabæi."
(Æneid. viii. 704.)

Ver. 22. And hailstones full of wrath shall be cast (as) out of a stone-bow.] Hailstones, the artillery of heaven, shall likewise come down upon the heads of his enemies, as in the days of Joshua when God sent hailstones and lightnings from heaven in the faces of the enemies of his chosen people; (Josh. x. 11.) which shall come with such fury and vehemence, as if they were discharged by the force of some machine, which our version calls a stone-bow, and among the Romans had the name of balista. The Vulgate renders here, Et à petrosa ira pleuæ mittentur grandines: which is followed by Coverdale's, and Pagnine's interlineary version, and is indeed a close translation of the Greek, as it is pointed in all the editions: but if I might offer a conjecture, I think, by the help of a comma only, the sense might be rendered more complete in this manner, καὶ ἐκ πετροβόλου, θυμοῦ πλήρεις ῥιφθήσονται χάλαζαι, ἐκ πετροβόλου, sc. ὀργάνου, or τόξου, from the preceding verse. I am aware of an objection which may be urged, that the particle ὡς, or some such-like note of comparison, is here omitted; but, besides that ὡς may, without any force, be fetched from the foregoing verse, instances of this ellipsis are very frequent in Scripture and profane writers. See Gen. xvi. 12. Psal. xi. 1. xii. 6. xxii. 13. xlv. 2. Gen. xlix. 9. Cant. i. 15. in all which places this particle is omitted in the Hebrew, and supplied in the versions. Our translators, it is plain, understood the words in the sense which I have given them, and have inserted as, though this particle be not in the original. In the prophetical writings, this metaphor of hailstones is frequently used to denote an enemy's falling on a country. (See Isa. xxviii. 2. xxx. 30.) It conveys a grand and terribly-magnificent idea, and is but imperfectly compared with the volleys from the artillery of walls closely besieged.

And the water of the sea shall rage against them, and the floods shall cruelly drown them.] i. e. God shall take such vengeance of wicked nations, that their enemies shall come pouring upon them like a flood. Rain, showers, storms, floods, and seas, are all symbols of multitudes of men in motion and disorder; or else of armies ravaging and destroying countries: hence Servius has observed, that the sea in a storm, and people in confusion, are reciprocally compared to each other; "Virgilius tempestati populi motum comparat, Tullius populo tempestatem." (Servius in Æneid. lib. i.) In the inspired writings, multitudes are frequently compared to waters, and the invasion of an army to the inundations of the sea, or a rapid river, which carries all before it. It is familiar with David particularly, to represent a vast hostile force under the idea of a flood of waters, a noble instance of which is to be found in Psal. xlvi. (See also Isa. viii. 7. xvii. 12. Dan. ix. 26. xi. 22.)

Ver. 23. A mighty wind shall stand up against them.] Wars and commotions are likewise metaphorically denoted by winds; so here, by a most powerful wind blowing, πνεῦμα δυνάμεως, is signified the storm of war, and the calamity attending it, which shall be brought upon the wicked. The description of the fate of the wicked man, Job xxvii. 20, 21. is so close and parallel to this, that I shall set it down at large; Terrors take hold of him as waters, a tempest stealeth him away in the night, the east-wind carrieth him away, and he departeth, and, as a storm, hurleth him out of his place. The east-wind, which is mentioned particularly in this passage, being a very blasting wind, is most frequently used in Scripture, and especially in the prophetical writings, to denote the calamities of war, and such-like wasting judgments. The prophet Jeremiah often applies this metaphor to those enemies and destroyers whom God makes use of as his instruments of vengeance. (See Jer. iv. 11. xlix. 36. li. 1.) And in Ezekiel, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army is foretold under the figures of stormy winds, and overflowing showers, (xiii.

11. 13.) By these and such-like figurative expressions God's severe judgments upon the wicked are usually denoted in Scripture. But it is not improbable, that the writer of this book had in mind, and herein alluded to, a particular wicked nation, punished in this extraordinary manner, viz. the Egyptians, to whom most of these instances of vengeance happened; for God smote their cattle with hailstones, and their flocks with hot thunderbolts, (Psal. lxxviii. 49.) By the east-wind also he plagued them with the locusts, which laid waste their whole land; and the waters of the Red Sea at last cruelly drowned them. Calmet understands by πνεῦμα δυνάμεως, not a mighty wind, as our version has it, but un vent envoyé par la puissance de Dieu. And the sense of a mighty wind may seem perhaps not so proper here, as it is compared immediately to λαίλαψ, or a whirlwind. If we should understand this expression of the spirit of power, or the powerful breath or spirit of the Almighty, the vengeful breath of God, expressed significantly, and displayed terribly, by the desolation of a whirlwind, furnishes as grand an idea as our imaginations are perhaps capable of. This seems confirmed by xi. 21. where there is the like expression.

And like a storm shall blow them away.] The translators do not seem here fully to have expressed the sense of the Greek word ἐκλικμήσει; it is a technical term, and means, that God will make use of his fan, and thoroughly purge his floor, when the wicked, in the language of the Psalmist, shall be like the chaff, which the wind scattereth away from the face of the earth. (Psal. i. 5.) With what dreadful pomp is the wrath of God here displayed! How magnificently and nobly hath the writer of this book drawn the artillery of heaven, the rapidity of its motion, the terror of its appearance, the desolation occasioned by it, and the certain death attending it! What an assemblage of terrible ideas in a small compass! The earth, the sea, the rivers, the clouds, the winds, the heavens, like so many auxiliary forces, are all listed, and conspire against the wicked. What a lively idea of God's infinite power over all his creatures does this description convey! This latter part of the chapter must certainly be allowed to be a great instance of the hypotyposis, a figure well known to orators and poets.

Thus iniquity shall lay waste the whole earth.] By this expression we may understand all the earth strictly, terram universam, as the Arabic renders; and thus the old world, with its inhabitants, was destroyed by water for their iniquity; and St. Peter seems to intimate, that the present earth, and all the works that are therein, shall at length be burnt up for the same reason; (2 Pet. iii. 7. 10.) or we may understand this sentence, of judgments that shall befal any particular land or country. And thus the Syriac version expounds it, Vastabitque totam terram impiorum; and Coverdale's translation takes it in the same sense, Thus the unrighteous dealing of them shall bring all the land to a wilderness: according to that observation of the Psalmist, A fruitful land maketh he barren, for the wickedness of those that dwell therein. (Psal. cvii. 34.)

And ill-dealing shall overthrow the thrones of the mighty.] The truth of this observation cannot be better exemplified than in the fate of Nebuchadnezzar and Sennacherib; the latter prided himself in being called the great king, the king, by way of excellence, and considered himself as the lord of the earth, and the vanquisher of men and gods: this prince, so proud and haughty, God seems to despise as below an ordinary man; he treats him as a wild beast, puts his hook in his nose, and a bridle in his mouth, and turns him back with disgrace and infamy, by the same way that he came triumphant and glorious. (See Rollin on the Belles Lettres, vol. iii. p. 167.)

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.

Having established the preference of wisdom or religion above vice and wickedness, the author presses upon princes and rulers, whom he addressed in the first chapter, the study and observance of it, as the means of ruling well; that, through a conceit and imagined privilege of their high station, they should attempt nothing injurious; because God careth for all alike, being the common Father of small and great, and will punish them proportionably to the great trust which they abuse. He concludes with a eulogium of wisdom, its general use to mankind, and the means of obtaining it.

Ver. 1. HEAR, therefore, O ye kings.] In Coverdale's translation, this chapter begins, Wisdom is better than strength, and a man of understanding is more worth than one that is strong: which he copied undoubtedly from the Vulgate, which is single in inserting this verse, and renders, Melior est sapientia quàm vires, et vir prudens quàm fortis: but it is not to be found in the Greek, nor in the Syriac or Arabic translations: it seems taken either from Prov. xvi. 32. or from Eccl. ix. 16. but more probably from the latter. However that be, or however true and useful the reflection may be, yet it is certainly quite out of place here; the connexion between the beginning of this chapter and the conclusion of the last, is really better without it; for if ill-dealing or wickedness shall overthrow the thrones of the mighty, (v. 23.) the advice here given to kings, to attend to good instruction, and to conduct themselves with religion and justice, is very seasonable and natural. From the great liberty here taken in giving advice and direction to persons in such high authority, some have inferred, that a king is the writer of this book; for who so proper to take this freedom with kings, as one of their own great rank, or who so able as the wise Solomon? But what foundation there is for this pretence, see in note on chap. ix. 7. of this book.

Ver. 3. For power is given you of the Lord.] By me kings reign, says God, Prov. viii. 15. And to the same high original does this writer ascribe their power. Irenæus very properly remarks, "That the devil never more truly proved himself to be the father of lies, than when he said to our Saviour concerning the kingdoms of the world, All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will, I give it." The hint here given to princes concerning the original of their power is very properly inserted, lest, being exalted so high, they should be ignorant or forgetful of him from whom they received their authority; "For they are accountable to God for the abuse of their power, as well as subjects are for disobedience to it; because it was committed to them, not for their own pleasure or advantage, to gratify their pride, or to enable them to do acts of tyranny and oppression, but for the good of those who are under their charge." (See Homily of Obedience to Magistrates.) Cyrus has not only given in his own person a perfect model of the manner in which princes should govern their nations, and the real use they ought to make of absolute power; but he lays down excellent rules for the conduct of other princes: Ἐγὼ μὲν οἶμαι δεῖν τὸν ἄρχοντα τῶν ἀρχομένων διαφέρειν, οὐ τῷ πολυτελέστερον, κ. τ. λ. "That a king ought not to be distinguished from his subjects by the splendour of riches, the pomp of equipage, or luxury of diet only, but by a superiority of merit of every kind, by an indefatigable application to make his people happy—that the very glory of their character, and the true use of their eminence and greatness, is being devoted to, and studious of, the public good." (Cyrop. lib. i.) Tully has the same opinion of government; "Mihi quidem videntur huc omnia esse referenda ab iis qui præsunt aliis, ut ii, qui eorum in imperio erunt, sint quàm beatissimi." (Cic. epist. 1. lib. i. ad Quint. Fratr.) This has been assigned by critics as the reason why Homer calls his kings by such epithets as διογενεῖς, born of the gods; or διοτρεφεῖς, bred by the gods, viz. to point out to themselves the offices they were ordained for; and to their people, the reverence that should be paid them: expressions correspondent to those places of Holy Scripture where princes are called gods, and the sons of the Most High. (Annot. on book i. ver. 229.) And the like reasoning will hold in proportion with respect to judges, magistrates, ministers of state, generals of armies, governors of provinces, and ecclesiastical superiors, and all other persons in authority.

Ver. 4. Because, being ministers of his kingdom, you have not judged aright, nor kept the law.] Both the Vulgate and St. Austin read, Nec custodistis legem justitiæ. The meaning is, that, being appointed by God, who is your sovereign in a much higher degree, as his ministers and vicegerents, you have acted as if you were absolute and uncontrollable, and accountable to none for your proceedings; ye have made your own wills and passions the rule of your conduct, and have forgot that for this cause God raised you up to such an eminence above the rest of his creatures, that you might resemble him in goodness, and impartially distribute justice. Tully's reproof of Verres upon this occasion, is very remarkable and fine, "Nunquam tibi venit in mentem, non tibi idcirco fasces et secures, et tantam imperii vim, tantamque ornamentorum omnium dignitatem datam, ut earum rerum vi et auctoritate omnia repagula juris, pudoris, et officii perfringeres, et omnium bona prædam tuam duceres?" (Orat. 5.) But nothing can exceed that charge of king Jehoshaphat to the judges which he set over the land, and ought to be considered as the urim and thummim of every public magistrate; Take heed what you do, for ye judge not for man but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment; wherefore, let the fear of the Lord be upon you, and take heed unto it, for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts. (2 Chron. xix. 6.)

Ver. 5. Horribly and speedily shall he come upon you; for a sharp judgment shall be to them that be in high places.] Not that this sharp judgment shall come upon the mighty, and such as are in high places, merely for being mighty; the expression in this sense is too lax and rigorous, for there is no offence in the office, as such, nor would God raise any of his creatures to such an honour and dignity, as to be his vicegerents, and even to be called gods, (Psal. lxxxii. 6.) in resemblance of him, if the office and elevated state itself was faulty or punishable: the meaning is, that, if kings and rulers pervert the order and original design of their institution, and act contrary to the established rules of justice, they will then not only be answerable for this abuse of power to him that entrusted them with it, but be punished in a greater degree, in proportion to their superior station, and the weighty talents committed to them.

Ver. 6. For mercy will soon pardon the meanest.] i. e. God will sooner or more easily pardon a small fault or breach of duty in a private person, from whom so great a perfection is neither expected nor required, as having wanted perhaps opportunities of knowing his duty, and been deprived of the means of instruction: such a person's transgression, being to himself, proceeding rather from ignorance than malice, and not attended with a train of bad consequences to others, will be less regarded: but the sins of kings and rulers are, as St. Austin styles them, contagious and mortal, their bad example has the most powerful influence, it is fatal through their eminence and authority, and they ruin as many as are led away by it. Hence God commanded Moses to apprehend all the princes of the people, and the rulers of thousands and of hundreds, and other principal persons in their tribes, who had been guilty of foul idolatry, and to hang them up before the Lord, i. e. before the sanctuary, as men who had forsaken the worship of their God. And this was to be done openly, or against the sun, that all the people might see and fear, when they saw persons of their distinction and authority made public examples of God's displeasure. (Numb. xxv. 4.) This is the sense of the LXX. who read παραδειγμάτισον αὐτούς. The Vulgate and Symmachus understand it in like manner, and Selden de Synedr. lib. ii. "Nor can we better (says Calmet) account for God's severity to David, for an act of seeming curiosity only in numbering the people, 2 Sam. xxiv. and his threats to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx. for a piece of secret vanity, in shewing his treasures, than by considering them as public persons, who should rather have regarded God's glory than their own." (See Comment. Literal. in loc.)

But mighty men shall be mightily tormented.] Private persons seldom dare take the liberty to represent to kings, and persons in great authority, the wickedness or injustice of their proceedings, much less to remind them of the danger of such steps. This writer therefore very artfully, as St. Bernard observes, assumes the borrowed character of Solomon, to give the greater weight to his reflections: as a king, superior to all others of the same rank in experience and wisdom, he assures them with the greater confidence, that however they may flatter themselves from their high station, that they are out of the reach of danger, and have nothing to fear; their great eminence ought rather to possess them with contrary apprehensions; nothing being more difficult than to fill a high post with sufficiency and credit, nor any thing so easy as to abuse it and miscarry. That God, though he has established them his vicegerents, has not made them independent of himself; he considers them still as his creatures, and, from the nature of their trust, accountable in a greater degree. That if at any time they abuse their authority by notorious acts of violence and oppression, they must expect that God will display his own power by punishing them very remarkably, and make them as terrible instances of his vengeance, as many others of their high rank, whose sufferings are recorded both in sacred and profane history. This is finely illustrated in Isa. xiv. 9. where all the ghosts of deceased tyrants, condemned to the infernal mansions, are represented as rising from their thrones, called so by way of irony, and coming to meet the king of Babylon, and congratulating his arrival among them. Ver. 8. of this chapter our author again adds, A sore trial shall come upon the mighty; which is the very same sentiment, but is not here to be considered as a tautology, but as a repeated warning. It is observable, that all the ancient versions express this sore trial in stronger terms than our translation; the Vulgate reads, Fortioribus instat fortior cruciatus, which all the old English versions follow; but the Arabic expresses it more terribly by the superlative, Potestate præditos rigidissimum obruet examen, ad vos enim spectant sermones mei, O rebelles refractarii. And this sore trial or punishment will be more disagreeable and insupportable to princes, even upon account of their former delicate way of living, and their former absolute sway over others, because disgrace, adversity, and suffering, are far more painful and vexatious to those that have been in high stations, and lived at ease, than to those of an inferior rank, who have been inured to hardships: hence we may imagine Lucifer, the "chieftain of the devils," as Mr. Mede calls him, to be more deeply affected with his sore punishment than any of the rest of his inferior accomplices.

Ver. 7. For he which is Lord over all, shall fear no man's person, neither shall he stand in awe of any man's greatness, for he hath made the small and the great, and careth for all alike.] There is a passage in Job xxxiv. 19. 24. 27. which very much resembles the first part of this verse, and probably this was taken from it; God accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor, for they all are the works of his hands: he shall break in pieces mighty men without number, because they turned back from him, and would not consider any of his ways. And the sense of the latter part is agreeable to that of the Psalmist, The Lord is loving unto every man, and his mercy is over all his works, (Psal. cxlv. 9.) As common Father of all, he is desirous that all should be saved, and not willing that even the meanest should perish. "Magna Dii curant, parva negligunt," was an unbecoming notion of God, and worthy only of a heathen. (Cic. de Nat. Deor.) How much better is that most excellent sentiment of St. Austin, "Tu sic curas unumquemque nostrûm, tanquam solum cures, et sic omnes tanquam singulos:" God takes as much care of every particular person, as if each were all; and as much care of all, as if all were but one. St. Cyprian has a sentiment upon this occasion no less beautiful; "Deus se omnibus ad cœlestis gratiæ consecutionem æqualitate librată præbet parem." "A true knowledge of providence, as it is an attribute of God, is most necessary, and of the greatest importance, as it influences all events both public and private, and every man ought to have it in his view in every circumstance of life, and every action of the day: it makes us more thoroughly sensible of our entire dependence upon God, of our weakness and wants, and presents us with opportunities of exerting the greatest virtues, such as confidence in God, a grateful acknowledgment of his mercies, humility, resignation, and patience; and is the very basis of religion, and of all those holy exercises of prayers, vows, thanksgivings, sacrifices," &c. (Rollin on Sacred History, vol. iii. p. 130.)

Ver. 10. For they that keep holiness holily, shall be judged holy.] Calmet applies this sentence to dignified ecclesiastical persons, to such as composed the Jewish Sanhedrin, and were the judges of their nation; "Le Sage parloit aux Juges de sa nation, qui etoient pour l'ordinaire de l'ordre des Prêtres." St. Bernard and St. Austin (de Pastor. Cur. cap. 4.) both apply what is said of rulers here and in the context to the Christian clergy, whose duty likewise rises in proportion to the high dignity of their office. Moses, who had the care of God's chosen people, was considered by him as their lawgiver and chief ruler; and accordingly we find, that even a small transgression of his (if any can be called so that is committed against God) was the reason, in the judgment of many learned men, of his not being permitted to enter into the land of promise. And the like may be said of the severity which befel the disobedient prophet, 1 Kings xiii. 21. But I think it more agreeable to the context, to understand this of good kings, who are full of zeal for the glory of God, the establishment of religion, and the security of its rights; such as are in Scripture said to be after God's own heart, who consider themselves as his ministers, and whose authority is employed to make their subjects happy, by making them better. It is a reflection very commonly to be met with upon the kings mentioned in the Old Testament, that they did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that their fathers had done; but yet there are some particular exceptions, some instances of illustrious goodness, recorded there, which ought in justice to be remembered, and must with pleasure be related, for the credit of their high calling: let any one but carefully reflect upon the sentiments of piety which David expressed in the translation of the ark; and his magnificent and almost immense preparations for the building of the temple: Jehoshaphat's pious visitation of his kingdom, and his zeal to send Levites with the princes, to instruct the people in the law: (2 Chron. xvii. 7, 8.) Hezekiah's great care and concern to restore religion, to sanctify the house of the Lord God of his fathers, and carry forth the filthiness out of the holy place; and the many other good works which he began in the service of the house of God, and in the law, and in the commandments, to seek his God with all his heart: (2 Chron. xxix. 5. xxxi. 21.) Josiah's indefatigable zeal from the very beginning of his reign to reform religion, and restore the true worship, not only in Judah, but in the ten tribes also: (2 Chron. xxiv.) and he will plainly see, that these princes thought themselves placed on the throne as guardians of the faith, and as nursing fathers of the church, to establish and promote the kingdom of God in their dominions. Such righteous kings, who have kept holiness holily, and been exceedingly zealous for the honour of the Lord God of hosts, will always find what to answer; they may even dare to appeal to him for a reward of their integrity and sincerity, and with humble confidence say, with Nehemiah, Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds, that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof. (Nehem. xiii. 14.)

Ver. 13. She preventeth them that desire her.] There is a fine eulogium of wisdom in this and the following verses, not only to raise men's curiosity after it, but likewise their desire of it; and, to encourage them the more in the pursuit of it, the author shews how easy it is to be obtained, that, though she is glorious and beautiful, yet she is not so coy and backward as to hide herself, or fly away from her pursuers and admirers; but rather desires to be known to them, and even makes the first advances and overtures of familiarity and acquaintance to such as are well-disposed to her. What follows in the context is a close imitation of the book of Proverbs, where wisdom is represented as inviting men to come to her dwelling, as going into the most public places to call them to her, that such as listen to her, and watch at her gates, are happy, and those that find her, find life and happiness; expressions so like this writer, that, were there not stronger arguments to the contrary, one would be almost tempted to pronounce that they came both from the same pen.

Ver. 17. For the very true beginning of her is the desire of discipline.] We have here, and in the context, the several degrees set down, by which a person well-disposed towards wisdom, may rise by little and little to the perfection of it: the first step mentioned is the desire of discipline or instruction, as the first step to a cure is, being sensible that we are out of order; and this desire of instruction in virtue or wisdom, in religion or science, proceeds from the good opinion which a man entertains of it, and the love which he bears to it; and this love is the cause of his perseverance and willing obedience; and his obedience will produce the reward of happiness: which happiness consists in incorruption, i. e. in a state of immortality, and a crown of glory, that fadeth not away. This desire therefore of instruction, by a regular deduction of particulars, and a kind of logical inference and conclusion, may be said to be the principal thing which conducteth men to a kingdom, ad regnum perpetuum, according to the Vulgate; as that which sets the machine a going, may properly be reckoned the cause of all the other motions, and of what is effected in the conclusion by them. In this and the three following verses, the learned will easily discern the beauty of the climax, or regular gradation from one thing to another, like that of St. Paul, Rom. v. 3, 4. Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed. (See also 2 Pet. i. 5.) Not unlike to which is that of St. Austin, "Velle meum tenebat inimicus, ex voluntate perversa facta est libido, et dum servitur libidini, facta est consuetudo, et dum consuetudini non resistitur, facta est necessitas." (Confess. lib. viii. cap. 5.) But that of St. Chrysostom, with respect to baptism, is still more beautiful, and hardly to be paralleled; "You are herein made not only free, but holy; not only holy, but just likewise; not barely just, but children also; not children only, but heirs; not merely heirs, but brethren of Christ; not brethren only, but coheirs; not coheirs only, but members also; not members only, but his temple; not temples only, but organs of the Holy Spirit." (Homil. ad Neophyt.) After which instances, it may seem almost needless to mention that of Tully, "In urbe luxuries creatur, ex luxuria existat avaritia, ex avaritia erumpat audacia necesse est; inde omnia scelera et maleficia nascuntur."

Ver. 21. If your delight be then in thrones and sceptres, O ye kings of the people, honour wisdom.] What has been observed of the usefulness of history by a learned writer, is equally applicable to wisdom, here recommended; "That it is useful both to small and great, to princes and subjects; but more necessary to princes and great men, than to all the world besides. For how can truth approach them amidst the crowd of flatterers which surround them on all sides, and are continually commending and admiring them; or, in other words, corrupting and poisoning their hearts and understandings? How can truth make her modest and feeble voice to be heard amidst such tumult and confusion? How venture to lay before them the duties and slaveries of royalty? How shew them wherein their true glory consists, and represent to them, that if they will look back to the original of their institution, they will clearly find they were made for the people, and not the people for them? How put them in mind of their faults, instil into them a dread of the just judgment of posterity, and disperse the thick cloud which the vain phantom of their greatness has formed around them? How that a Caligula, a Nero, and a Domitian, who were praised to an excess during their lives, became the horror and execration of mankind after their death; whereas Titus, Trajan, Antoninus, and Marcus Aurelius, are still looked upon as the delights of the world, for having made use of their power only to do good." (Rollin, vol. iii. p. 2.)

Ver. 22. And will not hide mysteries from you.] The Vulgate here renders sacramenta Dei, without authority from any of the more ancient versions, or countenance from the original; the true meaning is, that he will reveal or discover the arcana, or secret things of wisdom, as the reason of her name, (see Ecclus. vi. 22.) her original and existence, her nature and properties, her effects and operations, even from the beginning of the creation; for so I would understand the words in the Greek text, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς γενέσεως, viz. that wisdom was present at, concurred in, and is displayed by, the works of the creation, in a much better and loftier sense than that of our version. The Syriac translation seems to carry it still higher, understanding these words of wisdom, eternally existing with, or in, God, before all creation, quod creaturas præcessit investigabo: the author here endeavours to discover and set down the origin of heavenly wisdom, and indirectly confutes the pretences and boastings of the heathen sages, all whose philosophy is but of human invention, the work of a Socrates or a Pythagoras: but wisdom is not of so late a date, is more ancient than any historical monuments of the Greeks, has existed in all ages, may be traced through the times of the patriarchs, and its origin ultimately resolved into God himself. (See Calmet in loc.)

Ver. 23. Nor will I go with consuming envy.] Some Latin translations render, Neque cum eo, qui invidia tabescit, &c. So that the meaning may either be, that he would shew no envy or narrowness of spirit, in his discoveries about wisdom, but as he had learned diligently, he would likewise communicate liberally; (vii. 13.) or, that he would hold no commerce or society with a person of that selfish and inhospitable temper: for envy does not only pine and grieve at the outward prosperity of others, but is vexed at their inward accomplishments, at any attainments or happy discoveries which they may make, or have communicated to them by others: whereas charity, or a beneficent temper, which is kindly disposed towards all, envies no man's merit; nor does it pride itself in the singularity of its own knowledge, nor conceal what may be useful to others; she is not afraid that others may equal, or even exceed, her in knowledge, but with pleasure opens and communicates to them what she apprehends may be of public benefit, and considers not from what quarter a useful discovery comes, only, that its advantage may be made general, and others share in the improvement. St. Basil's observation upon this occasion is very just and useful; "Adepts," says he, or such as have made uncommon discoveries in any science, "should be ready to impart their knowledge without envy; and such as want to be instructed, should offer themselves without any shame," (epist. 12.) And the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal gives the true reason for imparting the treasures of knowledge to others, "C'est pourquoy on les doit communiquer aux autres sans envie, puisque plus on les repand sur eux, plus on en joüit, et qu'elle ne diminue point par la multitude de ceux qui la possedent."

Ver. 24. The multitude of the wise is the welfare of the world, and a wise king is the upholding of the people.] The Greek reads σωτηρία κόσμου, and the Vulgate, Multitudo sapientium sanitas est orbis terrarum; and Calmet's exposition is to the same effect, viz. That wise men are as it were the physicians and recoverers of the world, especially of the wicked part of it; and that their examples and discourses are like powerful medicines to the sick. This is the very language and comparison of Philo; πᾶς σοφὸς λύτρον ἐστὶ τοῦ φαύλου——καθάπερ ἰατρὸς τοῦ νοσοῦντος. (De Sacrific. Abel et Cain.) Plato bears testimony to the truth of the last sentence, when he advises, "that kings should be philosophers, or philosophers kings." "Ille quidem princeps ingenii et doctrinæ Plato, tum denique fore beatas respublicas putavit, si aut docti et sapientes homines eas regere cœpissent, aut, qui regerent, omne suum studium in doctrina ac sapientia collocassent. Hanc conjunctionem, videlicet potestatis et sapientiæ, saluti censuit civitatibus." (Cic. epist. 1. ad Quint. Fratr.) And it was no less piously than excellently wished by Justin Martyr, "that kings and rulers, together with their sovereign power, might be possessed of wisdom and a good mind."

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.

Under the borrowed character of Solomon, the author proceeds to shew the original and powerful effects of wisdom; that though all men agree in this, that all are born, and all must die, it is wisdom that puts the difference between man and man, according as the intermediate time between the cradle and the grave is improved or neglected; that the wisest man was at first as helpless as other children, and attained to the perfection of understanding by a steady pursuit of wisdom, and prayers to God for it, and that it is attainable by all others observing the same method. The chapter concludes with a fine eulogium of wisdom, as essentially inherent in God, and derivative in man, as a ray from his divinity. Calmet says the six first chapters of this book are as the preface to the work, which may be considered as an abridgment or paraphrase of the nine first chapters of the book of Proverbs. (Pref. sur le Livre de la Sagesse.)

Ver. 1. I MYSELF also am a mortal man like unto all.] As nothing is so great an enemy to instruction and improvement as pride, the author, intending to communicate the secrets of wisdom, and the method of obtaining it, begins with shewing man his true original, what he is by nature, and what by grace, thereby to depreciate his conceit and inflame his gratitude: and to humble even kings, and take away all affectation of divinity, a notion which flattery is too apt to insinuate, he assures them that they are equally the children of Adam, sprung from the same first common parent with slaves and the meanest of their subjects; and as liable to corruption and mortality as the very beggars. Well, therefore, may Pliny cry out, "O dementiam hominum, à talibus initiis existimantium ad superbiam se genitos!"

The offspring of him that was first made of the earth.] Eusebius calls Adam πρῶτος γηγενὴς, (Præp. Evang. lib. xi.) and to this St. Paul may be thought to allude, when he says, that the first man is of the earth, earthy: (1 Cor. xv. 47.) the derivation of homo, ab humo, according to the etymologists, seems natural and proper, and the very name Adam denotes the same original. The Greek writers accordingly make use of the term γηγενὴς, to denote the great antiquity and unknown original of their first and earliest heroes. But though all men thus resemble Adam in their origination, yet may his condition in this respect be considered as singular, that he was created perfect at once both in soul and body, quite different from the state here described of his posterity, who arrive slowly, progressively, and with difficulty, to the perfection of either. Philo has the same observation upon Adam, whom he calls emphatically ὁ γηγενὴς, and says, that he far excelled all that came after him in the excellences of soul and body; ἐκεῖνος ὁ πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος ὁ γηγενὴς, ὁ παντὸς τοῦ γένους ἡμῶν ἀρχηγέτης, ἑκάτερα ἄριστος, ψυχήν τε καὶ σῶμα γεγενῆσθαί μοι δοκεῖ, καὶ μακρῷ τινι τοὺς ἔπειτα διενεγκεῖν, κατὰ τὰς ἐν ἀμφοτέροις ὑπερβάσεις. (De Mundi Opificio.)

Ver. 2. And was fashioned to be flesh in the time of ten months.] The Alexandrian MS. and all the other versions, make the comma after flesh, and join the rest to the next sentence. As to the precise time of ten months, mentioned here, the ancient Greek and Latin writers express themselves in like manner: Ovid, speaking of the year of Romulus, which consisted only of ten months, says,

"Quod satis est utero matris dum prodeat infans, Hoc anno statuit temporis esse satis." (Fast. lib. i.)

And Virgil is no less express;

"Matri longa decem tulerunt fastidia menses." (Eclog. iv.)

Upon which Servius makes this observation; "Mares decimo nascuntur mense, fœminæ nono." Plautus often mentions the like time; he is particularly jocular in what follows:

"Nam me illa in alvo menses gestavit decem,
At ego illam [Famem] in alvo gesto plus annos decem."
(Plaut. in Sticho.)

The like time is mentioned by Terence, (Adelph. act. iii. sc. 4.) and by Censorinus, (de Die Natali, cap. 12.) Philo calls τὴν τεσσαρακοντάδα, or forty weeks, τὴν ζωογονικωτάτην ἐν ᾗ διαπλάττεσθαι ἄνθρωπον ἐν τῷ τῆς φύσεως ἐργαστηρίῳ, (de Mose, lib. ii.) And Menander mentions the same time as most usual, γυνὴ κυεῖ δεκάμηνος. Hippocrates reckons such as are born in the tenth month as most perfect and promising. (Lib. de Septimestri partu.) Theocritus accordingly mentions Hercules as born at this age. (Idyll. 24.)

Being compacted in blood.] Παγεὶς ἐν αἵματι. St. Bernard expresses himself in the same manner, alluding, perhaps, to this very passage; "Quid sum ego? Homo de humore liquido: fui enim in momento conceptionis de humano semine conceptus: deinde spuma illa coagulata, modicùm crescendo, caro facta est." (Meditat. cap. 2.) Παγεὶς occurs in the like sense, Job x. 10. in the most correct editions of the LXX. And Pliny uses coagulum upon the like occasion.

And the pleasure that came with sleep.] The modesty and reservedness of this writer are here much to be admired; it is a resemblance of the great decency in the sacred writings upon the like occasion. Ὕπνος in the original, rendered sleep by our translators, here means concubitus; the Syriac version reads, concupiscentia concubitûs. The like expression occurs, iv. 6. where bastards are called, τέκνα ἐξ ἀνόμων ὕπνων· (See note on that passage.) And in this sense, I think, we may understand that expression of Terence, "Interdum propter dormias." (Eunuch. act. ii. sc. 3.) We find sleep understood in the like sense frequently by the Hellenist Jews, and the Platonists, and in the following line of Homer:

Πάντων μὲν κόρος ἐστὶ καὶ ὕπνου καὶ φιλότητος.

Ver. 3. And when I was born, I drew in the common air, and fell upon the earth.] It is the most general opinion, that the fœtus does not respire or breathe in its mother's womb, but as soon as it is born, it then first begins to breathe, and cannot live without it. Galen, among the ancients, thought that it breathed before its birth; but Aristotle (lib. de Spir. cap. 3.) is of a different opinion, and is followed herein by the moderns. This writer likewise seems to favour the negative. To point out the infant's helpless state after its birth, it is added, that he fell upon the earth. The ancient Romans seem to intimate this, by their custom of laying the new-born infant immediately upon the bare ground, and imploring the help of the goddess Ops, to assist and bring it forward. (St. Austin. de Civit. Dei, lib. iv. and Calmet in loc.)

And fell upon the earth, which is of like nature.] Coverdale renders, I fell upon the earth, which is my nature. And the Syriac, Omnium more hominum, super terram decidi. So that probably ὁμοιοπαθὴς may be the true reading; and I have the satisfaction to find this conjecture confirmed by Junius, who renders, in the nominative case, iisdem perpessionibus infestus. The word ὁμοιοπαθὴς, which our translators have in this place very justly rendered, occurs, Acts xiv. 15. καὶ ἡμεῖς ὁμοιοπαθεῖς ἐσμεν ὑμῖν ἄνθρωποι, where they have as remarkably miscarried; the true rendering of it, according to Erasmus, is, We also are of like nature with you; and not, Men of like passions with you, as our version there has it; which destroys the beauty of the antithesis. It is judiciously rendered in the ancient Latin version, Mortales sumus, similes vobis homines, which, in the judgment of a great critic, is far preferable to the rendering of our translators. (Bentley's Boyle's Lect. p. 179.)

And the first voice which I uttered, was crying, as all others do.] Instead of the common reading in all the editions, πρώτην φωνὴν τὴν ὁμοίαν πᾶσιν ἴσα, I would read, πρώτην τε φωνὴν ὁμοίαν πᾶσιν ἦκα· ἴσα seems tautology after ὁμοίαν. We have here, and in the context, a fine picture of human nature, and the state and condition of it very naturally represented in its several stages, viz. "That man is a creature turned naked into the wide world, and cast upon the bare ground, without any covering to shelter or defend him; that, unfurnished with what is fit and necessary for him, he is bound up and swaddled, and requires help and teaching even for the very feeding and supporting himself; that he is perfect in no other instance of nature's teaching, except that of crying; this he brings into the world along with him, and a very fit emblem it is of our fortune and condition; that infirmities and miseries make up his middle state, and rottenness and worms his latter end: and histories of good authority assure us, that some nations welcome their children into the world with this salutation, 'Child, thou art come into this world to suffer, take it patiently, and hold thy peace.'" (See Charron. de la Sagesse.) And therefore Zoroastres's laughing when he was born, instead of crying, as all other children do, is remarked by many writers as a prodigy. (Solin. Mirabil. lib. i.) In this just representation of the condition of human nature, our author imitates the true Solomon, who has drawn man at full length in his true colours and proportions, from the cradle to the grave. St. Chrysostom's observation upon this first stage of life is very apposite, viz. "That nature seems, by the cries of the infant, to foretell its future misery; and when God said to our first parents before the fall, Increase and multiply, he intended it as a blessing; but it was a curse and a punishment upon Eve and her posterity, when he afterward told her, In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children." (De Utilit. Lect. Script.) St. Austin's account is still more melancholy: "Nascuntur homines homine generante, Deo creante, peccato inficiente, diabolo possidente." But Pliny's description of the infant-state is most natural, and comes nearest to this writer: "Natura hominem tantum nudum, et in nuda humo, natali die abjicit, ad vagitus statim et ploratum; nullumque tot animalium aliud ad lacrymas, et has protinus vitæ principio—Ab hoc lucis rudimento (quo ne feras inter nos genitas) vincula excipiunt, et omnium membrorum nexus—infeliciter natus jacet, manibus pedibusque devinctis, flens animal, cæteris imperaturum; et à suppliciis vitam auspicatur, unam tantùm ob causam, quia natum est." (Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. vii. in Procem.)

Ver. 6. For all men have one entrance into life, and the like going out.] The meaning is very plain and obvious, that all are born, and all must die; not that all depart by the same means, or in the same manner, as our version seems to countenance: for though there is but one passage into life, there are, perhaps, a thousand ways out of it, and almost every accident sufficient, though different, to let in death. The word ἔξοδος, in the original, is the term used by sacred and profane writers for death, or a departure out of this life. (See iii. 2. Ecclus. xxxviii. 23. 2 Pet. i. 15.) The connexion of the following verse is intricate; nor is it easy to determine what διὰ τοῦτο, or wherefore, refers to. I take the sense to be, that as his nature was the same with that of others, and wisdom was not a natural gift to him above others, therefore he prayed to God to bestow it on him.

Ver. 7. I called upon God, and the spirit of wisdom came to me.] Calmet observes, that, throughout this book, we are to understand wisdom, or the spirit of wisdom, as synonymous to religion, piety, the fear of God, &c. in a sense far different from that in which wisdom is taken in the writings of the heathen philosophers, where wisdom has no connexion with, or relation to, religion, nor aims at its improvement, by enforcing the practice of virtue; its chief design appears to be only to make men more knowing, to brighten and improve their natural parts, to raise and elevate the genius, and to instil some dry, useless notions of an imperfect morality; "Quelques connoissances steriles d'une morale fort imparfaite." (Pref. sur le Liv. de la Sagesse.)

Ver. 8. I preferred her before sceptres and thrones, and esteemed riches nothing in comparison of her.] The author gives here, says the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal, "une excellent marque pour juger si on a veritablement l'esprit de Sagesse et l'esprit de Dieu," &c. an excellent rule to judge whether a man has the true spirit of wisdom and piety; for a true sincere piety is that which esteems God above every thing, which desires nothing but him, which prefers his favour before thrones and sceptres, and, placing its whole happiness and crown of rejoicing in him, is pleased, easy, and contented, under the loss of all other things besides. Such was that elevated piety of St. Paul, which counted all things but dung, for, or in comparison of, the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus. (Phil. iii. 8.)

Ver. 9. Neither compared I unto her any precious stone.] Λίθον ἀτίμητον, ὅτι ὁ πᾶς χρυσὸς, κ. τ. λ. Perhaps the true reading may be, λίθον ἀτίμητον τοπάζιον, I did not compare unto her the invaluable stone, the topaz: see Job xxviii. 19. where the topaz and gold are joined together in the same verse, as not comparable to wisdom: nor does there seem any occasion for ὅτι or πᾶς; the former, probably, is improper, and the latter unnecessary. But I submit this conjecture to the learned.

Ver. 10. And chose to have her instead of light.] Ἀντὶ φωτός. Our version seems faulty here, for though ἀντὶ is often used in the sense in which it is taken by our translators, it is probably improper in this place. The meaning here is, That I determined to have her for a light or guide; in which sense ἀντὶ often occurs. The Vulgate accordingly reads, Proposui pro luce habere illam, and the Arabic, Elegi ut esset mihi pro luce, which is the sense of Junius. Coverdale follows the Vulgate, and renders, I purposed to take her for my light; to which agree the other ancient English versions. Or the meaning may be, that he chose her for the sake of her light, gratiâ lucis. There may be also another sense, that he chose her præ luce, before light, because, as it immediately follows, The light that cometh from wisdom never goeth out, but after light succeeds darkness. (See ver. 30.) In all these senses ἀντὶ is used by good writers, whose authority will warrant our interpretation: any of which is preferable to that in our version. This and the two preceding verses seem taken from Job xxviii. 15, &c. and are a close imitation of that ancient writer. Or they may refer to Prov. viii. 10. xi. 18, 19.

Ver. 11. All good things together came to me with her, and innumerable riches in her hands.] i. e. Through her hands. So the Vulgate, per manus illius, which the ancient English versions follow. I have before observed, that this writer often personates Solomon, and this long prosopopœia is spoken under that borrowed character. This verse refers to that grant of wisdom which is mentioned 1 Kings iii. where Solomon, upon his advancement to the throne, prays earnestly to God for the direction and assistance of wisdom, without any mention made of wealth, honour, or long life; and God bestows upon him, for his disinterested piety, the two former in great abundance, though unasked, and even unexpected by him, together with wisdom and understanding to discern judgment. The like promise of additional good things occurs in other parts of Scripture, to such as seek God's kingdom in the first place. And, indeed, throughout the whole history of the Old Testament, and particularly under the Mosaic dispensation, rewards and promises are annexed to piety or true wisdom, and almost all temporal advantages distributed in proportion to the degrees of it; as, favourable seasons, plenty, fruitfulness, health, peace, deliverance from dangers, and victory over enemies; which, though very valuable privileges, and such wherein the prosperity and welfare of any nation chiefly consist, are yet very far exceeded by those greater blessings, and more worthy of God's magnificence to bestow, reserved for the righteous in another state. On the other hand, wickedness, especially when it becomes general, draws down all the scourges of God's anger,—famine, plague, war, destruction, bondage; and is the true cause of the ruin of whole kingdoms. After this account, it may seem needless to mention the curse which it brings upon private families, which are often observed to dwindle away insensibly; and their prosperity, like Jonah's gourd, withers through the venom of this worm, which preys upon its vitals.

Ver. 12. And I rejoiced in them all, because wisdom goeth before them.] Αὐτῶν ἡγεῖται σοφία, i. e. Wisdom not only brings them with her, but conducts and heads them, like their leader and commander. The Geneva Bible renders, For wisdom was the author thereof; but the rendering of Vatablus is more exact and judicious, Ut quorum caput sit sapientia, that wisdom was the head, or most valuable, of all the gifts which God gave him. The Vulgate reads, without any authority, Quoniam antecedebat me sapientia, which seems not so proper or agreeable to this place.

Ver. 14. Which they that use become the friends of God, being commended for the gifts that come from learning.] i. e. Recommended to God, which is the better rendering; and thus Coverdale's and the other ancient English versions understand it, which read, And are accepted with him for the gifts of wisdom. Our translators followed a corrupt Greek copy in the first part of this sentence, which read, ὃν οἱ χρησάμενοι, and the Vulgate and Arabic seem to have followed the same; and so do the most ancient English versions: but we need no other argument to prove this a corrupt reading, than the badness of the Greek; for χράομαι does not admit of such a construction. The Alexandrian MS. preserves the true reading, ὃν οἱ κτησάμενοι, and the Syriac renders accordingly, qui possederint eam, i. e. they that possess wisdom enter into friendship with God, as the margin rightly has it (see ver. 27. of this chapter, and vi. 19. where the like sentiment occurs). For incorruption as it is there called, or a life led according to the rules of piety and wisdom, maketh us near to God, and to be allied unto wisdom, is not only the way to obtain immortality, (viii. 13.) but it is called (ver. 17.) immortality itself. But that passage of St. Paul, He that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit, (1 Cor. vi. 17.) which can never enough be admired, points out the nearest intimacy and relation; such a happy and accomplished Christian is mystically one spirit with God, by a spiritual and more noble union than that of flesh. Our author probably refers in this passage to Abraham, who had the singular honour of so high a title, for he was called, says St. James, for his faith or righteousness, the friend of God, (James ii. 2.) and probably he should be so styled, Gen. xviii. 17. where Philo's reading is very observable, μὴ ἐπικαλύψω ἐγὼ ἀπὸ Ἀβραὰμ φίλου μου, which our version wholly omits, and the LXX. express not so fully. The like observation may be made upon the ancient Vulgate, Judith viii. 26. where the rendering is, Pater noster Abraham per multas tribulationes probatus, Dei amicus effectus est; of which there is no mention in the LXX. nor in our translation of the place: it shews, however, the sense of those interpreters. And the like appellation we find given to Abraham by Clemens Romanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and other writers. (See note on ver. 27.)

Ver. 15. God hath granted me to speak as I would.] Ex animi sententia, according to the Vulgate; but Coverdale's rendering is preferable, God hath granted me to talk wisely. Ut consultè loquar, says the Syriac; and Vatablus not less properly, Sententiosè. And so Calmet, de parler d'une maniere sententieuse, et pleine de Sagesse, which the Greek phrase κατὰ γνώμην will well admit of. Some copies express this by way of prayer, ἐμοὶ δῴη ὁ Θεὸς εἰπεῖν, which is the marginal reading, and of the Syriac, and of St. Gregory; (23 Mor. cap. 17.) but there is no reason for such an alteration, the sense of our version, which is followed by Calmet and all the commentators, exactly agreeing with the character of Solomon, whose fame for wisdom was such, that people came from all parts of the world to hear and be instructed by it: and we have the prayer for wisdom at length throughout the whole ninth chapter, so that it may seem here superfluous.

And to conceive, as is meet, for the things that are given me.] Or, more properly, to conceive, as is meet, of the things that are given me: i. e. to have just and worthy sentiments of the gifts which I have received; D'avoir des sentimens dignes des dons que j'ai reçûs, says Calmet. Our translators follow the Vatican copy, which reads διδομένων, which is the sense likewise of the Vulgate, and of the ancient English versions. The Alexandrian MS. prefers λεγομένων, which both the Syriac and Arabic interpreters follow, and seems indeed the truer reading.

Ver. 16. All wisdom also, and knowledge of workmanship.] Even wisdom itself, which men are so apt to value themselves upon, and to boast of as their own, as being the supposed fruit of their own understanding, acquired with much industry and pains, must yet be acknowledged to come from God, τοῦ πατρὸς τῶν φώτων. The heathens themselves ascribed the first invention of the several arts and sciences to supernatural assistance, and looked upon the authors of them as so many gods; as if it were out of the power of unassisted reason, or man's bare ingenuity, to make such useful discoveries. But the honour which they ignorantly ascribed to some deified benefactor, with justice belongs to the true God; for, as Job expresses it, It is the inspiration of the Almighty that giveth men understanding, (xxxii. 8.) But what are we to understand by the knowledge of workmanship, in the following part of the verse? The present reading of the Alexandrian, and the other copies, is ἐργατειῶν ἐπιστήμη, which seems to be a mistake, for no such word is to be met with; I think the true reading is, ἐργασιῶν ἐπιστήμη, which is very properly expressed by, the knowledge of workmanship, in our version. Vatablus renders with great judgment, operum scientia. And the Geneva Bible expresses it accordingly, the knowledge of the works, i. e. works of art. The sense is, that the attainment to a great perfection in these is the gift of God, and cannot be complete without his inspiration and assistance: for I am rather inclined to think, from the manner of expression, that wisdom and knowledge are not to be taken here in their usual high sense, and as they generally are in this writer, and in the book of Proverbs, but mean only extraordinary skill or accomplishment in work. Thus Exod. xxxi. 3. (which I am persuaded this passage refers to, and probably viii. 6.) it is said, that God called Bezaleel for the work of the tabernacle, and filled him with wisdom, and understanding, and knowledge, in all manner of workmanship, where ἐπιστήμη, σύνεσις, σοφία, are all used by the LXX. to express a great perfection in manual skill. And what follows in ver. 6. of that chapter, is very observable, In the hearts of all that are wise-hearted, or ingenious, I have put (says God) wisdom, that they may make all that I have commanded them; i. e. God, by an inspiration from above upon this occasion, endued the minds of all such ingenious persons as were employed with an extraordinary skill, which they could never have attained to by their own industry, at least not so soon, nor so perfectly, as to go immediately and skilfully about the building of the tabernacle in the manner he designed it. (See Patrick in loc.)

Ver. 17. To know how the world was made.] Though philosophy, through the improvements which it has received in every age, may be able to explain the operations of the elements; how the clouds are engendered, the rain and thunder produced, the treasures of the snow and hail collected, and where is the way in which light dwelleth, may judge of the force, qualities, and temperature, of the elements, and the sensible effects which they have upon human bodies, and understand the other phenomena of nature, which follow in this chapter, and are enumerated more at large Job xxxviii. where God proposes the like questions, and challenges Job to answer them; yet this important truth of the creation of the world can only be certainly known, and truly understood, by communication from God, or revelation in his word: for neither can reason, nor philosophy, nor the best account in profane history, which takes in only temporal facts and events, give any satisfaction about the original of the world which we inhabit, whether it had a beginning, how or when it was made, by whom or to what end it was created, how it is supported and governed, whether it is continually decaying, or to last to all eternity: we learn nothing certain from thence, what we really are ourselves, what is our original, nature, design, and end. Whereas Divine wisdom, imparted by God, and contained in sacred history, teaches us in a few words all these great truths; that the world was not the product of chance, but the work of God's power; that it was made in time; that he made it out of nothing, or rather called it into being by his almighty fiat, according to, and in the manner related in, the book of Genesis, so denominated from containing the true account of its creation; that his providence continues it in being, and God is almighty in that respect likewise; that man, the lord of the creation, sprung from the dust, and is resolvable into it at God's pleasure; that his infinite wisdom is no less displayed in the beauty, symmetry, and contrivance, of the world, than his omnipotence in the act of creation; and in this latter sense I find the Vulgate understands this place, which renders dispositionem orbis terrarum, which seems rather to include the nature and constitution of the world, its order and economy, the arrangement and union of the several parts, their wonderful correspondence, relation, harmony, and mutual dependance, for the good of the whole. But in either sense, Divine wisdom is the best instructor; it shews when this beauty and order first existed, who is the ὁ τοῦ κάλλους γενεσιάρχης, (xiii. 3.) and the fountain of all perfection. Calmet observes, that the author here designed by his eulogium, to set forth the superiority of Divine wisdom, and to advance it above the theology or philosophy of the heathens, d'elever la vraye sagesse au dessus de la philosophie des gentils. (Comment. in loc.)

Ver. 18. The beginning, ending, and midst of the times, the alterations of the turnings of the sun, &c.] Origen understands by times here, the most early, the future, and the present times: (Hom. 21. in Luc.) St. Ambrose reads rerum, instead of temporum, and expounds the place, of things done in ancient times, of events to come to pass hereafter, and the transactions of the present age: (lib. ii. de Abrah. cap. 7.) Grotius understands it, of the several seasons of the year, their beginning, continuance, and ending, and their successive and regular returns, which is most agreeable to the context: the sense of the whole seems to be, that Solomon knew the greatest elongation or distance of the sun from the earth, and its nearest approach to it; the solstices, solstitiorum vicissitudines, says Vatablus, the equinoxes, and all the alterations which proceed from its course and motion through the ecliptic; as, the change of the seasons, the vicissitude of day and night, the succession of time, and the revolution of years. As these phenomena succeed one another in the account of this writer, almost as regularly as they do in the heavens, it is surprising that the Vulgate here should translate τρόπων ἀλλαγὰς, morum mutationes, which has no manner of connexion with the subject. Our translators have rightly judged in applying it to the sun, and, by attending to the sense of the context, have avoided the equivocalness of the Greek.

Ver. 19. The circuits of years, and the positions of stars.] Ἐνιαυτῶν κύκλους. By κύκλους in the plural number I would rather understand the cycles of years, the lunar and solar cycles, especially if these were known and used in this writer's time; and ἀστέρων θέσεις I would rather translate the places of the stars, i. e. the longitude and latitude of them, which the word position does not so strictly express.

The violence of winds.] Πνευμάτων βίας. Junius renders, Spirituum vires, by which he understands the powers and faculties of the human soul: he thinks the mention of winds and their force very absurd in this place, and supports his conjecture from the very next sentence, which contains the reasonings of men. Origen reads, Spirituum violentias, and understands the passage, of the power and violence of evil spirits; which is a probable interpretation enough, if there was any foundation for the tradition which he mentions of Solomon's writing several books de Exorcismis. (Homil. 21. in Luc.)

Ver. 20. The natures of living creatures, and the furies of wild beasts.] Calmet renders, L'instinct des bêtes, ou leur penchant; the temper, inclination, or instinct, of beasts. This is agreeable to what is recorded of Solomon, (1 Kings iv. 33.) that he spake of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes. And the account in the latter part of this verse, viz. his great skill in the diversities of plants, and the virtues of roots, answers to the former part of the place referred to, viz. that he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall. It is obvious to observe, that this writer very frequently assumes several particulars in the character of the real Solomon, with an artful design to pass for the same person, and to make his pretences more plausible, and his judgment more infallible.

Ver. 21. And all such things as are either secret or manifest, them I know.] Ὅσα τέ ἐστιν κρυπτὰ καὶ ἐμφανῆ ἔγνων, which is the reading in all the printed copies, and followed by our translators; but there seems to be a mistake in all the editions: for where is the great wonder in Solomon's knowing things that are manifest; or what glory is there or excellency in any man to make such a discovery? the true reading undoubtedly is ἀφανῆ, which is confirmed by the Alexandrian MS. by Eusebius, Præp. Evang. lib. ii. cap. 7. and St. Ambrose, de Abrah. lib. ii. cap. 7. The comment also of Messieurs du Port-Royal takes it in this sense, J'ay appris tout ce qui estoit caché, et qui n' avoit point encore esté decouvert; i.e. such things as have not yet been discovered. The Vulgate very justly renders, Quæcunque sunt abscondita aut improvisa didici, which Coverdale's version follows, All such things as are secret and not looked for, have I learned; which is the rendering likewise of the Doway Bible. Γνῶναι seems also a better reading than ἔγνων, as it agrees with εἰδέναι, which goes before, especially as it is connected with the conjunctive particle τέ.

Ver. 22. For wisdom, which is the worker of all things, taught me.] Wisdom may be considered either as a Divine attribute, the infinite wisdom of God, or as it is in some measure made known to, and participated by, a finite creature, not as the natural property of the creature, but as a superadded gift of God: it is capable therefore of very exalted epithets, as it is the wisdom of God, such as, πάντων τεχνῖτις, μονογενὲς, ἀκώλυτον, παντοδύναμον, παντεπίσκοπον, and all that follow in the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth verses. But wisdom considered in man as the gift of God to him in proportion as he deserves it, will admit of inferior, yet proper, epithets, as διὰ πάντων χωροῦν πνευμάτων νοερῶν, καθαρῶν, καὶ εἰς ψυχὰς ὁσίας μεταβαίνουσα φίλους Θεοῦ καὶ προφήτας κατασκενάζει, (ver. 27.) It is a treasure that never faileth, (ver. 14.) It may be communicated liberally to others, (ver. 13.) It maketh men speak wisely, and conceive as is meet, (ver. 15.) It is more to be desired, as being more profitable, than any thing else, and teaches the cardinal virtues, and every thing useful to be known, (viii. 5—8.) All the other epithets, as νοερὸν, ἅγιον, λεπτὸν, τρανὸν, ἀμόλυντον, σαφὲς, ἀπήμαντον, φιλάγαθον, &c. will suit wisdom, either as original and essential in God, or as it is communicated to, and may be considered as derivative in, man; for, as Calmet very judiciously observes, Ce qui est dit dans ce livre touchant la Sagesse, s'entend tantôt de la Sagesse increée, et tantôt de la Sagesse créée et inspirée aux hommes: this distinction is very necessary for the right understanding this chapter.

Ver. 22, 23.] The author here, in his enumeration of the several excellences and perfections of wisdom, seems to use different words of the same signification, to set forth his description the more copiously, and for the stronger conveyance of his own sentiments: but perhaps, upon a nicer attention to the peculiar force of the Greek words, and to their order and situation, a separate consistent sense may be given to each epithet: thus ἅγιον, and ἀμόλυντον commonly give the same sense, but in strictness are different; as are also ενεργετικὸν and ἀπήμαντον: the negative in either case falls short in sense of the positive epithet. Our translators, indeed, who render ἀπήμαντον, not subject to hurt, i. e. incapable of receiving hurt, have explained away the true meaning of the word (see the note on i. 4. where the like mistake in our version is taken notice of); it means rather, not disposed or inclined to do hurt, and would be better rendered harmless, innocuus, according to Vatablus, the same as ἀπήμων. The Geneva Bible renders, not hurtful; and Coverdale's and the other ancient English versions, following the Vulgate, sweet; which yet falls short of ενεργετικὸν, which means, not only inoffensiveness, but a readiness to do positive acts of kindness. Βέβαιον and ἀσφαλὲς differ likewise in degree; for here the negative expresses more than the positive, viz. such a steadfastness as is not to be moved or shaken. Among the positives, τρανὸν and σαφὲς give commonly one sense, but they may be understood differently; the first may be expounded eloquent, (see x. 21.) the latter clear, or manifest.—The difference between λεπτὸν, εὐκίνητον, and ὀξὺ, will best be explained by a parallel passage, Heb. iv. 12. Ζῶν γὰρ ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ ἐνεργὴς, καὶ τομώτερος ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν μάχαιραν, καὶ διικνούμενος ἄχρι μερισμοῦ ψυχῆς τε καὶ πνεύματος, ἁρμῶν τε καὶ μυελῶν, καὶ κριτικὸς ἐνθυμήσεων καὶ ἐννοιῶν καρδίας. Λεπτὸν, subtle, i. e. piercing into the secrets of men's hearts, answers to the latter part of that verse; εὐκίνητον answers to ἐνεργὴς in the beginning, i. e. active, or operative, which is more expressive than lively; ὀξὺ may as well signify sharp, and so indeed Coverdale's version has it, and the Vulgate, and Junius, and then it answers to τομώτερος ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν μάχαιραν, in the middle; which passage will equally explain the twenty-fourth verse of this chapter.—By μονογενὲς, πολυμερὲς, may be understood, that wisdom is in its origin or fountain simply one and the same in God, la même, says Calmet, en substance et en nature, but variously expressed, and infinitely diversified, in his works. The thought is not very unlike that of St. Paul, There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit; and there are diversities of administrations, but the same Lord; and there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God, that worketh all in all; (1 Cor. xii. 4—6.) in which sense it is farther said of wisdom, (ver. 27.) that, being but one, she can do all things, and remaining in herself, she maketh all things new. (See note on that place.)

Ver. 23. Going through all understanding (i. e. intellectual) pure, and most subtle spirits.] This may be understood in two senses, according to the different reading of the Greek; our version follows the Vatican edition, which reads, διὰ πάντων χωροῦν πνευμάτων νοερῶν, καθαρῶν, λεπτοτάτων. According to that, the sense is, that wisdom, as a Divine attribute, not only penetrates into things corporeal, but things spiritual and intellectual; is not only a discerner of the thoughts and intentions of the heart, but the several orders and degrees of intellectual beings, even the most pure and invisible spirits, how knowing or subtle soever, are subject to it, and within its influence.—The Vulgate reads in the nominative case, intelligibilis, mundus, subtilis, which Coverdale's version and the Syriac follow, from a copy, doubtless, which read, νοερὸν, καθαρὸν, λεπτότατον, still applying each particular epithet to wisdom itself, exclusive of the consideration of other spirits.

Ver. 24. For wisdom is more moving than any motion; she passeth and goeth through all things by reason of her pureness.] The account of Camilla's swiftness, according to Virgil's beautiful description of it, is surprising and incredible:

——"Assueta pedum cursu prævertere ventos:
Illa vel intactæ segetis per summa volaret
Gramina, nec teneras cursu læsisset aristas:
Vel mare per medium, fluctu suspensa tumenti,
Ferret iter, celeres nec tingeret æquore plantas."
(Æneid. lib. vii.)

No bodily motion can be conceived to exceed this in quickness; but the spirit of wisdom being incorporeal, and, by reason of her pureness, not meeting with any sensible resistance or impediment, far surpasses it; nay, she is quicker than thought, because she pervades the mind itself, is not only present to men's thoughts, but prevents and influences them: She meeteth them, as this writer elegantly expresses it, in every thought, (vi. 16.) Elle vient au devant d'eux dans tous les bonnes pensées qu'ils forment; and powerfully acts upon the will to put such good thoughts and resolutions into practice. And this power she exerts in an instant, and carries her view through all things at the same time, which perhaps is Fulgentius's meaning, when he translates this place, Attingit ubique propter suam munditiam, (de Persona Christi, lib. ii.) In this sense wisdom may be said to be, Permeator universitatis; which short sentence of Seneca is more expressive, than the many metaphysical circumlocutions of the schoolmen.

Ver. 25. She is the breath of the power of God.] Ἀτμὶς τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ δυνάμεως, i. e. The afflatus of the Almighty; where ἀτμὶς, even applied to eternal wisdom itself, is not such a degrading or diminutive term, as Capellus, in his strictures upon this book, has represented it; for ἀτμὶς may be considered as equivalent to πνεῦμα; and our translators, we may observe, render accordingly ἀτμὶς by breath: but it certainly stands clear of that objection, if understood of infused or derivative wisdom, communicated from God to his saints and prophets in such degrees and proportions as were necessary. Plato makes use of the same image, and represents wisdom as a vapour, or spark of celestial fire, communicated from heaven to men. (Plato in Protag.) The like thought is to be met with in Philo, de Somniis.

A pure influence flowing from the glory of the Almighty.]

Ἀπόῤῥοια δόξης, i. e. A pure efflux or emanation issuing from God's glory; which is more agreeable to the Greek than influence, which our version uses. The Vulgate reads, Emanatio quædam claritatis, which the ancient English versions follow: or it may be rendered, in fewer words, a glorious emanation of the Deity. Some of the primitive writers express themselves in like manner concerning the Λόγος, whom they style πρόσωπον Θεοῦ: we meet with the like expression, Eccles. v. 6. which a learned writer translates, the personating Schechinah of God. (Tenison on Idol. p. 334.) And for the same reason he is called the angel of his face, by Philo and the ancient Jews, because he truly reflected the glory of his person.

Ver. 26. She is the brightness of the everlasting light.] i. e. Wisdom is an effulgence or ray streaming from the original fountain of light, the resplendence of the eternal glory, and the reflection of its brightness. St. James accordingly styles God, from whom all wisdom and illumination proceed, Πατὴρ τῶν φώτων, (i. 17.) It is observable, that the word used by our author for brightness, is ἀπαύγασμα, the very same that is made use of in the Epistle to the Hebrews, (i. 3.) which by Estius upon the place is very properly rendered deradiatio. (See also Leigh's Critica Sacra in voce ἀπαύγασμα.) This similitude of a ray from the sun, or light from light, must be allowed to be a fine illustration, and a proper representation, of the infinite wisdom of God, considered as a Divine attribute; and the same has been applied to illustrate the consubstantiality of the Λόγος. Thus Justin Martyr says, that he proceeds from the Father, ὡς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου φῶς, as light from the sun; and in another place, ὡς ἀπὸ πυρὸς πυρὰ, as fire from fire. (Dial. cum Tryph.) And by the Nicene council he is called more closely, "Light of Light:" but whether any such notion is here meant, or the Λόγος described by our author, shall be considered under the next words.

The unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his goodness.] Limpidissimum divinæ virtutis speculum, according to Vatablus; i. e. she is the true and unsullied glass, in which we may discern the beauty of God's works, which therefore reflects his power in the strongest and best light, and exhibits the perfection of his goodness. One cannot help observing, that from ver. 21. to the end of the chapter, the epithets thicken, and that the character of wisdom is expressed in a very sublime style, a magnificence and grandeur of language, and in terms seemingly importing divinity itself. Hence some have taken occasion to imagine, that something more and higher is contained herein, than an encomium of wisdom considered in its highest denomination, as a Divine attribute, and have applied therefore these passages to the person of the Λόγος, or to the Holy Spirit. And indeed it must be confessed, that however originally intended, they may, by way of accommodation, be so used and applied, and considered as expressive similes, to illustrate the eternal generation; nor is the manner of expression very unlike that of Heb. i. 3. which is very full and explicit on that occasion: and it must be farther allowed, that these passages have been so understood and explained by most of the commentators, and even some of the fathers, many of whom use expressions concerning the Λόγος, very much resembling these, and endeavour to explain that mystery by the very same similitudes and illustrations. (See Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. Epiphan. in Anomæo. Hæres. cap. 3. et cont. Ætium. Hæres. 76. Holstenii Dissert. 2. in loc. quæd. Concil. Nicæn. and Waterland's Serm. passim.) And some of the primitive writers, to confirm their point, have actually quoted and argued from these very passages. (See particularly Fulgentius de Persona Christi, ad Trasimund. lib. ii.) Philo, who speaks the sentiments of the ancient Jews, and is by some thought the author of this book, from its great resemblance to many of his notions, has some expressions, in relation to the Λόγος, very similar to these, de Confus. Linguar. and de Monarchia, which others, with more probability, contend he borrowed from hence. But as this kind of reasoning, drawn from authorities, is precarious and inconclusive, and slender or suspicious proofs are really disserviceable to a cause; and as that great mystery, of the eternal generation and coequality of the Λόγος, is sufficiently established by canonical and undoubted Scripture, and wants not to be defended by any disputed testimony, non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis: I rather incline to the following sense, viz. That the writer of this book, who personates, and, as far as he can, imitates, Solomon, observing in the book of Proverbs, particularly chap. viii. how wisdom is praised under the character of a Divine female, or celestial beauty, pursues the same figure or image in a more copious and encomiastic way, using indifferently wisdom and the spirit of wisdom, as the same beautiful object, which he loved, and desired to make his spouse, &c. But though he speaks of her as an intelligent person, and personal acts are ascribed to her, yet this seems to be a figurative way of writing, taken, as I said, from Solomon's Proverbs. And if the well-known passages in the chapter above-cited be scarce allowed to be understood of the Λόγος (see Bishop Patrick's argument to that chapter, and the writers in the Trinitarian controversy), much less reason have we to assert these passages of the Book of Wisdom to belong to the Λόγος, or to the Holy Spirit, considered as persons in the Godhead. For if this encomium be supposed to come from any (Hellenistic) Jew, or even from the pen of Solomon, such titles and attributes of the Divinity, if interpreted of the Λόγος or Holy Spirit, seem incompatible with those times. I am therefore more inclined to understand this high encomium of a Divine attribute, the infinite wisdom of God, communicated sometimes, according to the exigence of the occasion, to his saints and prophets in different portions, as a drop from his fulness, (ver. 27.) and then there will be no occasion to suppose these passages to be an addition or interpolation of some Christian writer, who borrowed ideas and expressions from the New Testament, which seems to be the sentiment of Grotius, with respect to many passages of this book; but how far his conjecture is right, and whether it is always safe to follow him, I shall not determine. I shall only subjoin C lmet's remark upon this assertion, and answer in his words: "Grotius s'est imaginé que ces passages y avoient été ajoutez par quelque Chrêtien depuis la mort du Sauveur; ce qui est contre toute sorte d'apparence, ces passages êtant tellement liez avec la suite du discours, qu'on ne peut les en separer sans violence" (Pref. sur le Livre de la Sagesse): i. e. "The passages objected against are so interwoven with the rest of the subject, and have such a necessary relation to the context, that they cannot be separated without manifest violence." And the same learned writer there observes, that this author often speaks of wisdom, considered as an attribute only, even in the most pompous and magnificent terms, and applies to it that which in strictness only belongs to the Deity itself. In his comment upon this place he has this further remark, which will justify my sense of it: "That as it is very common in natural cases, to assign to the effect many properties and attributes of the cause; so in matters spiritual, that perfection is frequently attributed to qualities proceeding from God, which strictly belongs only to the Holy Spirit which communicated them."

Ver. 27. And remaining in herself, she maketh all things new.] i.e. She is the author of all changes and spiritual renovations, though herself remains unchangeable; Toujours immutable en elle-même, elle renouvelle toutes choses. St. Austin explains this renovation, and shews from whence it proceeds; "De plenitudine ejus accipiunt animæ, ut beatæ sint, et participatione manentis in se Sapientiæ renovantur, ut Sapientes sint." (Confess. lib. vii. cap. 9.) The Scripture furnishes us with many instances of her good offices and kindness to men in this particular; all graces are ministered to us by her, and she purifies the soul, to make it fit to receive them; she enlightens men's understandings with the knowledge of saving truths, disposes and inclines their wills to virtuous and holy actions, and comforts and supports them in the discharge of their duty under the greatest difficulties and discouragements. And though her communications are so various, and, with respect to all ages and nations, may be considered as infinite, yet her nature continues unchangeable. What Plato says of God with a very remarkable emphasis, is very applicable to her, οὐδέποτε, οὐδαμῇ, οὐδαμῶς, ἀλλοίωσιν οὐδεμίαν ἐνδέχεται. (Plato in Phæd.)

And in all ages entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God, and prophets.] Κατὰ γενεὰς, which may be interpreted either of ages or nations; the Vulgate takes it in the latter sense. This observation is not only true of Abraham, (see note on ver. 14.) and Moses, whom God favoured in an especial manner, and admitted to a more particular intimacy, (Exod. xxxiii. 11. Philo de Mose, lib. i.) but of David, whom God took away from the sheepfolds, that he might feed Jacob his people and Israel his inheritance. (Psal. lxxviii. 71, 72.) The like may be said of Joseph, and the other instances of this truth, mentioned by this writer in the tenth and eleventh chapters; from whose history it appears, that Divine wisdom, without any respect of persons, in every age and nation, makes choice of such as are well disposed, to confer her favours and blessings on, and sanctifies them, by her inhabitation and presence, for her own great purposes. True religion, indeed, seemed for some time as it were confined to Judea, and the Jews to have been only entrusted with sacred truths; but yet we sometimes find the spirit of wisdom discovering herself to other people, and enlightening them amidst their ignorance and darkness. It is more than probable, that God made uncommon discoveries of himself to Job, and that in proportion to the greatness of his sufferings, he was favoured with a greater degree of light, and larger communications of Divine knowledge. (See Bp. Sherlock, Dissertat. 2.) The like may be observed of Balaam, who, according to Scripture, heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the Most High, (Numb. xxiv. 16.) which implies some discovery of God's will to him; and as a prophet, he foresaw and foretold what should happen in the latter end; and particularly, has left a very remarkable prophecy relating to the Messiah. We are sometimes surprised with uncommon discoveries in the writings of the heathen philosophers, and the several important truths therein scattered, seemingly above the reach of mere unassisted reason, are enough to convince us, that Divine wisdom has communicated itself in all ages, and conversed with her favourites in every generation. As to the gift of prophecy here mentioned, it is certain, that the qualifications that did fit a man for the prophetical spirit, which rendered him habilem ad prophetandum, were inward piety, true wisdom, probity, and virtue. The rabbins universally agree in this, that the spirit of prophecy never rested but upon a wise and good man; and no instance, says Maimonides, (More Nevoc. par. ii.) can be mentioned of its ever dwelling in a vicious person, unless he had first reformed himself; and among the preparatory dispositions for obtaining it, he reckons the perfection of virtuous qualities or manners, a heart purified and free from sinful affections and sensual passions. Hence we find, that anciently many were trained up in the way of school-discipline, and fitted by religious nurture to become Candidati Prophetiæ. (See Smith's Sel. Disc. on Prophecy, chap. 8, 9.) And the several schools of education at Naioth, Jerusalem, Bethel, Jericho, Gilgal, were only so many colleges for disciplining and training up young scholars in those preparatory qualifications which might more dispose them for the gift of prophecy.

Ver. 29. For she is more beautiful than the sun—being compared with light, she is found before it.] This is true of wisdom, considered as a Divine attribute, in many respects: 1st, Because the sun, the stars, and the whole system of inanimate bodies, are not fit to be opposed in value to the human mind or spirit; for the enlarged intellectual powers, and improved faculties of the mind, can arrive at the knowledge, and explain the glories, of the firmament; whereas the sun, though a most glorious body, is utterly insensible, and has no consciousness of that light which he gives to others: which prerogative of the mind, Tully finely remarks; "Nec vero illa parva vis est rationis, quod eorum ipsorum, quæ adspectu sentiuntur, nullum aliud animal pulchritudinem, venustatem, convenientiam partium sentit." (Cic. de Off. lib. i.) 2dly, As Divine wisdom formed and fashioned the glorious body of the sun, it is not only prior to it, or before it in point of time, which is the sense of the Vulgate, but it must be, in the order of causes and effects, more beautiful and excellent than any or all the creatures; Vatablus therefore renders with great judgment, Luci comparata, potior deprehenditur. 3dly, The sun cannot make that which is deformed or ugly to be beautiful, and his light is often hurtful and injurious to tender and diseased eyes; his beams are too bright to be borne sometimes, they not only dazzle and confound, but frequently hurt and weaken the sense: but wisdom never offends by its excess, the brighter and more heavenly it is, the more she pleases, and where she finds any moral defects or imperfections, she removes or amends them. Is the soul polluted and disfigured by trespasses and sin? Divine wisdom purifies it by the infusion of her supernatural grace. Do any wander in darkness and error? she guides and assists them by the brightness of her saving truths. Are any sensible of their sad estate, and really desirous of a cure? she giveth medicine to heal their sickness. So that what was said by Tully of virtue, and has been so justly applauded, is equally applicable to the spirit of wisdom, "That could we behold all her charms, the whole world would be infinitely in love with her." (Cic. Off. lib. i.)

Ver. 30. For after this cometh night.] That wisdom does thus exceed the light, is manifest from this farther argument, because night constantly succeeds the day, and therefore the light is as constantly interrupted by darkness. But Divine wisdom admits of no such privations or inequalities; it has no mixture of light and darkness, of good and evil, but is always the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever. St. Austin reasons in like manner upon the transitoriness of worldly things: "Omnis iste ordo pulcherrimus rerum valdè bonarum, modis suis peractis, transiturus est, mane quippe in eis factum est et vespera." (Confess. lib. xiii. cap. 35.) But St. Chrysostom comes nearest this writer, and has the very same thought applied to grace; οὐχ οὕτως ὁ κόσμός ἐστι λαμπρὸς, κ. τ. λ. "Non sic mundus clarus est oriente sole, ut anima illustratur et splendidior fit, à Spiritu gratiam recipiens: hanc nempe lucem et volentibus nobis et nolentibus nox subsequitur; (τοῦτο μὲν γὰρ διαδέχεται νὺξ, which are the very words of our author) illum verò radium tenebræ non nôrunt." (Homil. 21. ad Pop. Antioch.)

But vice shall not prevail against wisdom.] If we attend only to what passes ordinarily in life, this observation may perhaps seem not to be altogether just or well grounded; for human wisdom, or that which God is pleased to communicate to mankind, is subject to many frailties: as the bewitching of naughtiness will obscure men's reason, so the wandering of concupiscence quite perverts and undermines it, (iv. 12.) Such as have been admired in all other instances for their wisdom, have been hurried away by sinful passions; and the finest understanding has been found a weak fence against a criminal passion. Solomon himself is a lamentable instance of this truth, who fell shamefully, notwithstanding his singular accomplishments; and his wisdom served only to heighten his transgression and disgrace. We must understand this writer, therefore, of Divine wisdom, which sin cannot approach, nor its contagion sully, much less can the power of it prevail over her. Grotius understands this place of adversity, and refers to Matt. vi. 34. where κακία, the term here used, is taken in that sense. According to this acceptation the opposition is no less just and beautiful, for as prosperity is the sunshine of fortune, so adversity may be considered as its shade; in this view, the meaning is, that however dark the cloud may be, which hangs over a good man, yet shall it not overwhelm him; though misery be his lot, as it is too often the fate of goodness, yet shall it not get the better of him: We are troubled on every side (says St. Paul, speaking of himself and other suffering Christians), yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed. (2 Cor. iv. 8, 9.) And even in such a sad catastrophe, when vice is so triumphant and successful as to destroy a good and virtuous man, yet if we take in the consideration of another life, the righteous, however afflicted or tormented, will be found to have come off conqueror.

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.

The praise of wisdom is continued, which, upon a comparison of the most desirable things in life, is shown to be preferable to them, and, from an induction of several valuable and weighty particulars, she appears to be the procurer of such great advantages, and ought, therefore, to be honoured and followed after by such as have the greatest regard to their own happiness. The chapter concludes with the proper dispositions to obtain wisdom.

Ver. 1. WISDOM reacheth from one end to another mightily, and sweetly doth she order all things.] i. e. The Divine wisdom is infinite and immense, extends itself throughout the whole world, and does every thing in it mightily, that is, effectually, in respect of the end, and sweetly, that is, without any violence or difficulty, in the use of the means. This is the sense of the Arabic version: Porrigit autem sese, ab extremo terrarum orbe ad extremum usque integrè. St. Bernard expounds it in the same manner: "Attingit à fine usque ad finem, i. e. à summo cœlo usque ad inferiores partes terræ: à maximo angelo usque ad minimum vermiculum, substantiali quâdam et ubique præsenti fortitudine, quæ utique universa potentissimè movet, ordinat, et administrat suaviter, i. e. sine necessitate aut difficultate." (Bern. Lib. de Grat. et Lib. Arbitr. See also Fulgentius de Persona Christi, lib. ii.) But by sweetly, we may farther understand the manner in which the Divine wisdom works upon men's minds; for she begins the great work of salvation in men's hearts, by overruling them through her motions and impressions, inclining them to their duty, and assisting them in the performance of it; and at length, having happily perfected it, she conducts them to glory and a blessed end of their labours. But though she reaches from one end to the other of this important event, and acts powerfully upon the soul to bring it to pass; yet she does it sweetly, and without any violence or inconsistence with men's free agency; she encourages them by all the endearing methods, and in the most engaging manner, to their duty; and by this amiable mixture of sweetness, tempers and softens the yoke, which would otherwise be complained of as hard and rigorous.—Some have understood these words of God's foreknowledge, that his prescience reacheth to the end of the world, and by it he foresaw, from all eternity, all future events, even to the consummation of all things; so that, when the whole mystery of God's dispensations shall be finished and unravelled, it will appear, that nothing is contained in them but what God had formerly foretold and declared by his prophets. (See Lowth's Preface to his Comments.) And to this purpose he applies what Isaiah says of God's foreknowledge, (xlvi. 10.) that he declares the end from the beginning; an expression, it must be owned, not very unlike that of this writer. I shall only observe farther, that this verse, in some copies, is made the conclusion of the former chapter.

Ver. 3. In that she is conversant with God, she magnifieth her nobility.] This is but indifferently expressed; it would be better rendered literally thus, Herein she displays her high birth, that she exists with God, and is intimately united to him. Elle fait voir la gloire de son origine, en ce qu'elle est étroitement unie à Dieu, says Calmet. Vatablus very properly renders, Nobilitatem gèneris ejus hoc illustrat, quod convictu Dei utitur; συμβίωσιν Θεοῦ ἔχουσα, which is imperfectly rendered in our version, conversant with God, as that phrase is now commonly understood, for it implies much more, viz. that wisdom, as a Divine attribute (for I would understand the place of this principally), is intimately united with God, lives always in and with him, and is inseparable from him, as his spouse and partner; and thus συμβίωσις is used ver. 9. (see more in that note.) Nor is it better expressed in the Vulgate by contubernium. The Syriac version uses consortium; but those interpreters, as if they were sensible of some defect, and that they had not reached the force of the original, add immediately after, by way of explanation, quoniam Deus est pater ejus. Philo, in his allegorical way, explains the nearness of this relation between God and wisdom; his words are a close and excellent comment upon this place, τὸν γοῦν τόδε τὸ πᾶν ἐργασάμενον δημιουργὸν ὁμοῦ καὶ πατέρα εἶναι τοῦ γεγονότος, μητέρα δὲ τὴν τοῦ πεποιηκότος ἐπιστήμην, ᾗ συνὼν ὁ Θεὸς ἔσπειρε γένεσιν. (Phil. de Ebriet. et alibi.) In a lower sense we may understand this passage of human or derivative wisdom, that this likewise shews her great worth, and singular excellence, in that God himself vouchsafes to communicate himself to, and converse with, a truly wise soul, not in dreams by night, as with Joseph; not by an audible voice, as with St. Paul; but with the still small voice, speaking to the soul, in breathings not to be uttered.

Ver. 4. She is privy to the mysteries of God.] The marginal reading is, teacher, which agrees with the Vulgate, Doctrix enim est disciplinæ Dei, and with Μύστις ἐπιστήμης in the Greek; for Μύστις is a technical term, and, according to Budæus, signifies an interpreter of sacred mysteries. The sense here is, that Divine wisdom can best teach the knowledge of God, reveal its mysteries, and initiate men into them, as, knowing the deep things of God, and being in his bosom, cannot but be privy to them. And so the Syriac happily renders, Ipsa est à secretis Dei, et à consiliis ejus.

And a lover of his works.] Αἰρετὶς, with which agrees the marginal reading; and the Vulgate renders in like manner, "Electrix operum ejus," Chooser of his works. Dr. Grabe and Budæus read εὑρετὶς. According to either reading the sense seems to be, that the Divine wisdom designed, contrived, and appointed, God's works, as is declared more explicitly in the two following verses. Calmet understands it in a more extensive sense, of wisdom's superintendency and direction of his works, qui est la directrice de ses ouvrages. The Syriac and Arabic versions understand this passage of wisdom in the most exalted sense; the former reads, Gloria cunctorum operum ejus, and the latter, Sublimior dignitate cunctis operibus ejus.

Ver. 5. What is richer than wisdom, which worketh all things?] Sapientiâ omnium rerum artifice, according to the Arabic; and the Syriac renders, Quandoquidem ipsa fecit omnia. But the meaning probably here is, that skill and wisdom make men successful and thriving in every business and calling, and are the most likely means to procure men reputation and a good fortune. Riches and honour are with wisdom, says the true Solomon, (Prov. viii. 18.) who could confirm this truth from his own plentiful experience of both, which God annexed to his gift of wisdom. But we must observe at the same time of wisdom, that she teaches men rather the contempt, than an immoderate and eager pursuit of riches; to be content with a little, and to esteem spiritual attainments, and the improvements of the soul, as their chiefest good, their truest riches.

Ver. 6. And if prudence work.] Εἰ δὲ φρόνησις ἐργάζεται, i. e. If skill and industry produce the most admired works of art, who is so justly to be esteemed the author of them, as wisdom, the most accomplished, and, I may add, universal artist? and is therefore, with great propriety, called, πάντων τεχνίτις σοφία, (vii. 22.) for she presides over every instance of science, directs and perfects it. Instead of ἐργάζεται, which is the common reading, and followed by our translators, Dr. Grabe reads ἐράζεται, as more agreeable to what goes before and follows after, viz. εἰ δὲ πλοῦτος ἐπιθυμητὸν κτῆμα. (ver. 5.) εἰ δικαιοσύνην ἀγαπᾷ τις. (ver. 7.) εἰ πολυπειρίαν ποθεῖ τις. Expressions all equivalent to ἐράζεται. (See Prolegom. cap. 4.) In the midst of these he thinks it comes in very properly, And if prudence is admired and loved; the only objection with him is, that ἐράζεται is a poetical word, which will indeed have but little weight, if what that learned critic seems to insinuate be true, that the Book of Wisdom was originally wrote in metre. It is certain, he has placed it among the metrical books, and in the Alexandrian MS. it preserves the appearance of verse, as well as the Book of Psalms, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, &c. Calmet also is of opinion, that it was wrote in metre. (See his Dictionary in voce Wisdom.) However the learned may determine about this nicety, still I am of opinion, that ἐργάζεται is not only the true but the better reading; for φρόνησις without it is too general, and may be applied to any thing else as well as work, and for want of it the beauty of the next sentence is lost. The same words very nearly occur together, vii. 16. (see note on that place;) and in Exod. xxxi. where works of different sorts are mentioned; ἐργάζεται is the term used often upon the occasion.

Who of all that are, is a more cunning workman than she?] Τίς αὐτῆς τῶν ὄντων μᾶλλόν ἐστι τεχνίτης; The ancient Vulgate reads, Quis horum quæ sunt magis quam illa est artifex? which can neither relate to persons nor things, as different interpreters have understood the place; not to the former, as our version takes it, for then the reading should be, Quis horum qui sunt, &c. not to the latter, as Coverdale's version and the Geneva Bible have it, for then it should be, Ecquid horum quæ sunt, &c. or something to that effect, and in the Greek, Τί τῶν ὄντων; as in the verse foregoing it is, Τί σοφίας πλουσιώτερον. I think, therefore, the sense of this place has hitherto been mistaken, and that the true rendering of it, as it stands connected with the context, is, If wisdom is so good a worker as to work all things, who has a better claim, or is more likely to be the maker, τῶν ὄντων, of all things existing? This sense the very placing and structure of the Greek points out to us; it is likewise the meaning of the Vulgate quoted above, and probably of Junius, who renders, Quis eorum quæ in natura sunt, artifex potiùs est quàm ipsa? Messieurs du Port-Royal understand it of wisdom, as being the supreme directress and architect, by whom all things were made, Qui a plus de part qu'elle dans cet art, avec lequel toutes choses ont esté faites? (See Rom. iv. 17.)

Ver. 7. If a man love righteousness, her labours are virtues.] This is obscurely expressed: the meaning is, that wisdom produces the several following virtues, or that they are her work; for the very end and scope of wisdom is, to make men just and virtuous, considerate and resigned; and that which does not propose this as its object, may be looked upon as curiosity, folly, or vanity. The pursuit therefore of wisdom, necessarily leads to the four cardinal virtues, as they are distinguished, which compose righteousness, considered in its largest sense; and the following virtues, or graces, are so many branches of it: for temperance teaches men moderation, and a restrained use of pleasures and the good things of the world; fortitude, how to bear and behave under the evils and afflictions of it; prudence is employed in finding out and making use of proper ways and means; and justice, in a fair and impartial rendering to all their dues. Philo has exactly the same thought and distinction, expressed only in his allegorical way, upon Gen. ii. 10. A river went out of Eden, and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads; which he thus allegorizes, Fluvius est virtus generalis, quatuor autem derivationes sunt totidem virtutes ex Edene, id est sapientiâ Dei, effluentes; nimirum, prudentia, temperantia, fortitudo, justitia. Prudentia circa agenda, terminos illis ponens; fortitudo sustinendo; temperantia eligendo; justitia suum cuique tribuendo. (SS. Legum Allegoriarum, lib. i.) Which are the four species here enumerated, arising from one common fountain-head, viz. righteousness.

Ver. 8. If a man desire much experience.] Πολυπειρίαν. The Vulgate renders more justly, Multitudinem scientiæ, to which Coverdale's version agrees, If a man desire much knowledge: the Syriac is to the same effect, Si quis item cupiat admodum esse peritus, which Vatablus also favours. The word experience seems here improper and disagreeable to what follows; for experience cannot possibly relate to what is to come, nor foresee any future events; but wisdom can prognosticate what shall happen, can foresee the change of weather, and foretell eclipses of the sun and moon, which are called here signs and wonders: for anciently such discoveries were extremely rare, and the ignorance of the people was so great, that they looked upon such phenomena as prodigies. Plutarch remarks, that "Anaxagoras, and such as first discovered and explained the cause of them, durst not speak in public, for fear of being thought atheists or magicians, but instructed their disciples in the reason of them privately, and by word of mouth, without committing their observations to writing." (In vit. Niciæ.)

Ver. 9. I purposed to take her to me to live with me.] Ἔκρινα ταύτην ἀγάγεσθαι πρὸς συμβίωσιν. I purposed to take her to be my partner for life, to be my spouse, as is expressed ver. 2. for I understand ἀγάγεσθαι in both places to refer to the marriage ceremony of leading the bride to the bridegroom's house. What follows seems to confirm this acceptation, for she was to be to him his bosom-counsellor, "bona daturam consilia," says Vatablus, one that would faithfully advise him in all difficulties, comfort him tenderly in all afflictions, and kindly divide his cares and griefs with him; which is the description of a happy marriage. The reading of all the copies is, παραίνεσις φροντίδων, possibly παραινετὶς may be the true reading, agreeably to μύστις, εὑρετὶς, σύμβουλος, which go just before, adhortatrix.

Ver. 11. I shall be found of quick conceit, and shall be admired in the sight of great men.] This was eminently true of the real Solomon, as appears by that distinguishing judgment which he shewed in the case of the two contending harlots, when by a nice decision he brought to light what artifice and dissimulation had concealed, and artfully found a way to come at even the bottom of the heart, and to unravel its most secret intentions; for, by an appearance of severity only, without any violence to the parent or the child, nature herself at once declared, by the motions and sentiments of either tenderness or indifference, which were then visible without disguise, which was the counterfeit, and which the real mother; upon which the text adds, That all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment, (1 Kings iii. 28.)

Ver. 12. If I talk much, they shall lay their hands upon their mouth.] It is a proverbial expression, and implies silence. (See the like, Ecclus. v. 12. Prov. xxx. 32.) The poet well expresses it, digito compesce labellum: accordingly Harpocrates, by the ancients feigned to be the god of silence, is pictured with his finger on his mouth, to recommend, by this expressive gesture, either a well-timed silence, or at least a discreet government of the tongue. (See Stephan. Dict. Histor. in voce.)

Ver. 15. I shall be found good among the multitude, and valiant in war.] We have here the two essential qualities to constitute a complete prince, goodness in the care and management of his own people, and valour to head them in any warlike expedition against others. Alexander the Great is said to have studied much, and repeated often, that fine maxim of Homer, which the expression of this writer very much resembles, and is worthy indeed of the true Solomon:

Ἀμφότερον, βασιλεύς τ' ἀγαθὸς, κρατερός τ' αἰχμητής.

Virgil has happily expressed the same thought in the following line;

"Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos:"

Where both those celebrated poets agree with our author, in making the excellence of a king to consist in goodness and clemency to his own subjects, and in martial courage to reduce an insulting enemy; in being amiable to the one, and terrible to the other. So that even according to the notions of paganism, a prince is only so far great, as he is tender and careful of his subjects; nor should he think of his power but with a view to do good, and, in imitation of the title of the gods, to place the character of very good, before very great, to be optimus maximus, like Jupiter, from whom he derives his power. Seneca has an observation to the same purpose, "Proximum Diis locum tenet, qui se ex Deorum natura gerit; hoc affectare, hoc imitari decet, maximum ita haberi, ut optimus simul habeare." (Senec. lib. i. de Clem. cap. 19.) But, upon the comparison, a prince should prefer the amiable name of Pater Patriæ, or father of his country, to all the pompous titles and appellations which victory and triumph can heap upon him, and not so much to aim at his own glory, or the enlargement of his dominions through ambition, as to protect his subjects, and labour to make them happy: for the trophies of even a successful war are not so much to be coveted, as the blessings of a settled peace; nor the conquest of foreign nations, as the love, preservation, and good order, of his own people.

Ver. 18. In the works of her hands are infinite riches.]

Πλοῦτος ἀνεκλιπὴς, i. e. Riches which are durable, and fade not away. Vatablus renders accordingly, perennes divitias, and the Vulgate is to the same effect. Calmet understands it of riches, qui ne manquent jamais. And that this is the true rendering, appears from the like expression upon the same subject, vii. 14. where wisdom is called θησαυρὸς ἀνεκλιπὴς, which our translators rightly there render, A treasure that never faileth. The expression in our version, seems rather to denote the quantity than the quality of the riches, and so it is commonly understood. The sense of the passage is, that true wisdom which is from above, and makes us wise unto salvation, will procure for us riches which fade not away, together with that glory, satisfaction, and pleasure, which preferment, honour, and wealth, the rewards of other studies, are only faint resemblances of. For such is the excellency of Divine knowledge, that it will not only forward our admission into heaven, but accompany us thither: St. Jerome therefore well advises, "Discamus in terris, quorum nobis scientia perseveret in cœlo." (Epist. ad Paulin.)

Ver. 19. For I was a witty child, and had a good spirit.] Παῖς ἤμην εὐφυὴς, ψυχῆς τε ἔλαχον ἀγαθῆς. Εὐφυία answers to bona indoles, and in Junius's version is properly expressed by it; i. e. I was naturally well disposed towards wisdom, and of a good capacity, had a quickness of parts, and readiness of apprehension, and a soul more susceptible of instruction than many others, and superior to them in its natural talents and endowments. That all souls are not equal as to their disposition, nor equally capable of, or inclined to, wisdom, is the sentiment of most writers; particularly St. Austin says, "Alii fatui, alii tardissimi ingenii, et ad intelligendum quodammodo plumbei, alii obliviosi, alii acuti memoresque nascuntur, alii utroque munere præditi." (Aug. lib. iv. cont. Jul. cap. 3.) But I rather choose to understand this of moral dispositions, and of the inclination of the soul to goodness. But Philo's notion comes nearest our author, who acknowledges two sorts or species of souls, placed in the air; "That some always continue there, and others descend into and inhabit bodies; of the latter, some apply themselves to sublime and useful knowledge, which, even after the death of the body, they continue to pursue, to purchase a life incorruptible and eternal; but others, overwhelmed by the weight of the flesh, neglect the care and study of wisdom, are intent upon riches and vanity, and attached wholly to things sensible and corporeal." (De Gigantibus.) Our author mentions it as his good luck and fortune to have a soul well inclined, and of the better sort, with the additional happiness of its being joined to a body pure and undefiled. I say good fortune, for the learned father above observes upon ἔλαχον, which the Vulgate renders sortitus sum, that "it intimates, that he received his good spirit or disposition as it were by accident, by the free donation and undeserved bounty of God's goodness, to exclude and guard against the least surmise of any precedent merit, 'ad auferendam suspicionem præcedentium meritorum sortis nomen accersit.'" (De Gen. ad Lit. lib. x. cap. 18.) How justly this remark is grounded, and whether this writer intended such a sense, the learned will determine.

Ver. 20. Yea, rather, being good, I came into a body undefiled.] This sentence seems to favour the opinion of a pre-existence of souls. It was a notion of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, of the Jewish doctors, and rabbinical writers, and, after them, entertained by Origen, and some other Christian writers, that all souls were created by God at the beginning of the world out of nothing, and were reserved and deposited in some of the heavenly regions; that, according to their good or ill behaviour in the state and region above, antecedent to their being incorporated with mortal and earthly vehicles, they were afterward, as infinite wisdom saw occasion, sent down into bodies ready fitted for, and properly disposed to, receive them, and were accordingly lodged here below, either in sickly or healthful, in vicious or well-inclined bodies. This notion, that souls pre-existed, and descended into suitable bodies, was the opinion of the pharisees particularly, which they are thought to have borrowed from the Platonists. (Joseph. de Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 12.) Philo, who, upon all occasions, speaks the sentiments of the ancient Jews, favours this notion in many places (de Confus. Linguarum, de Gigantibus, de Abraham); but he is most express in the following passage: Τούτων τῶν ψυχῶν, αἱ μὲν κατίασιν ἐνδεθησόμεναι σώμασι θνητοῖς, ὅσαι προσγειόταται καὶ φιλοσώμαται—Harum aliæ descendunt illigandæ corporibus mortalibus, quotquot viciniores sunt terræ, amantioresque corporum. (De Somniis.) To this notion that question of our Saviour's disciples is generally thought to allude, John ix. 2. Did this man sin, or his parents, that he was born blind? And some have interpreted to the same sense, ἀναλῦσαι, Philip. i. 23. and ὁ καιρὸς τῆς ἐμῆς ἀναλύσεως, 2 Tim. iv. 6. but ἀνάλυσις, even though we should understand it in these and other places where it occurs, in the sense of return, rather than departure, does not countenance the notion of a pre-existence, as it is commonly understood. It is farther objected against this passage, that it is inconsistent with the doctrine of original sin; for we cannot suppose the body of any descendant of Adam to be pure, untainted, or undefiled, as is here asserted, nor any soul to enter into an earthly vehicle, that is entirely clean and perfect, and altogether free from any original leaven: Nemo mundus à peccato (says St. Austin,) nec infans, cujus est unius diei vita super terram. (Confess. lib. i. cap. 7.) In the Belgic version, the translators, in their preface prefixed to the Apocrypha, single out this passage as exceptionable on this account. (See Limborch. Theol. Christ. lib. i. cap. 3.) To obviate this objection, founded upon a truth which we must all own, and do sensibly experience, as being equally by nature sinners, and children of wrath, Calmet observes, that this writer is not to be understood as speaking of a body absolutely pure and undefiled, and entirely free from any hereditary infection, but of a body less corrupt and less disposed to evil than many others, Moins corrumpu et moins porté au mal que beaucoup d'autres. (Comment. in loc.) But the justness of this solution itself, will perhaps be disputed; and it may probably be questioned, whether a body less vicious, or less subject to human corruptions, can, with any more propriety, be said to be both pure and undefiled, than a body can be said to be chaste, that is less unclean; or sound and healthful, that is less infirm and sickly. Lyranus, and some other commentators, have attempted another interpretation of the place to the following sense, Increasing more and more in virtue and goodness, I came to have a body chaste and undefiled, which is founded upon the rendering of the Vulgate, Et cum essem magis bonus, veni ad corpus incoinquinatum; i. e. says Tirinus, "Cum magis magisque per virtutum exercitium crescerem in bonitate, eo deveni ut etiam corpus mihi esset bene temperatum, mundum, et castum." (Comment. in loc.) And even Messieurs du Port-Royal take it in the same sense, Devenant bon de plus en plus. But neither does this remedy seem quite to heal the sore, for the true rendering of the Greek, μᾶλλον δὲ ἀγαθὸς ὢν, is not cùm essem magis bonus, but literally magis vero, or rather imo vero cum essem bonus; so that magis is transposed in the Vulgate, either designedly or by accident: nor is μᾶλλον ἀγαθὸς the usual comparative way of expression among the Greeks, but ἀμείνων, or βελτίων; as in the Latin tongue, we do not usually say magis bonus, but melior, or emendatior: nor does ἦλθον εἰς σῶμα ἀμίαντον signify, I came at length to have a body undefiled, but, I entered into a body at first undefiled. Upon the whole, as the expressions here seem to favour a pre-existence, and this writer labours, as it were, to establish that notion, using an ἐπανόρθωσιν, or a rhetorical correction of himself, as if he had said too little, in the words ψυχῆς ἔλαχον ἀγαθῆς:—as the Syriac and Arabic versions both understand and render this passage in a sense rather favouring the notion of a pre-existence; the former very expressly, Propter bonitatem meam veni in corpus purum; and the latter, Imo bonus eram, ideoque immaculatus ingressus sum in corpus:—and, lastly, as the solutions offered to evade the objections urged against this place, seem weak and unsatisfactory,—I must ingenuously acknowledge, that it seems to me to savour of Platonism; nor is it improbable, that this writer, who was undoubtedly a Jew, received a tincture in this and some other instances, to be met with in this book, from the prevailing notions among his countrymen. This, however, is certain, that whether we understand this verse of a body absolutely and originally chaste and undefiled, free from all taint of original sin; or of one, subject to its frailties, lusts, and corruptions, but subdued and freed from the power and dominion of them, by temperance, prayer, and religious exercises; in either respect we cannot well understand or apply this to the true Solomon, whose purity more especially cannot be mentioned to his honour.

Ver. 21. Nevertheless, when I perceived that I could not otherwise obtain her.] Γνοὺς δὲ ὅτι οὐκ ἄλλως ἔσομαι ἐγκρατὴς, which the Vulgate renders, "Ut scivi quoniam aliter non possem esse continens, nisi Deus det, adii Dominum:" And knowing that the gift of continency was from God, and that his grace could alone preserve me chaste, I prayed unto him; which Coverdale follows in his version, When I perceived that I could not keep myself chaste, &c. The Syriac also takes the words in the same sense, Sciens quod non possim me ipsum domare; and St. Austin, Confess. lib. x. cap. 31. It is surprising that an interpretation, which is by no means agreeable to the context, and founded probably upon a mistake, should be supported by so great authorities; for it seems to have taken its rise from a misunderstanding of the meaning of the Greek word ἐγκρατὴς, which signifies both continens and compos; but the latter sense, which is followed by our translators, the Arabic version, Vatablus, and the Geneva Bible, is far preferable, as will appear if we include the nineteenth and twentieth verses in a parenthesis, as indeed they ought to be; and then the true sense of this passage will be clearer, and the connexion more visible; for the meaning will then plainly be,—I went about seeking wisdom, to take her to me, and when I found that I could not otherwise obtain wisdom, "Me non aliter fore compotem illius, nisi Deus dederit," says Junius, I prayed unto the Lord for it. There is the same mistake in the Vulgate, and upon the very same occasion, Ecclus. vi. 27. where ἐγκρατὴς γενόμενος, in the Vulgate, continens factus, is much more justly rendered in our version, When thou hast got hold of her (wisdom), let her not go, in the sense which the context necessarily requires. Vatablus and Junius expound the place in the same manner; the latter expressly renders, Compos factus, eam ne dimittito. See also Ecclus. xv. 1. where there is the like mistake in the Vulgate.

Except God gave her me.] Wisdom, which is here meant, and not the gift of continency (see the note above), like other good and perfect gifts, is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, (James i. 17.) It is a pretty observation which Bishop Sanderson makes on these words, and very applicable, "That those perfections and virtues which the heathen moralists call ἕξεις, or habits, the apostle, by a far better name, calls δόσεις, or gifts, to intimate to us how we came by them, and whom we ought to thank for them:" (Serm. 3. ad Clerum.) and the same inspired writer has a more particular direction as to the very point before us, If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and it shall be given him, (i. 5.) The ingenious Mr. Cowley observes of Virgil, "That his first wish was to be a good philosopher, and that God, whom he seemed to understand better than most of the learned heathens, dealt with him just as he did with Solomon; because he prayed for wisdom in the first place, he added all things else which were subordinately to be desired." (See Martyn's Georgics, lib. ii. p. 198.)

I prayed unto the Lord, and besought him.] To apply to God for the gift of wisdom, who has the sole disposal of it, was not only an instance of it, but a sure and infallible way of obtaining it. Philo has a fine observation upon God's disposal of his gifts and graces, Αἱ τῶν χαρίτων αὐτοῦ πηγαὶ ἄενναοι, οὐ πᾶσι δ' ἀνειμέναι, ἀλλὰ μόνοις ἱκέταις. The efficacy of prayer, was what the heathens themselves greatly depended upon in most of their great undertakings. It has been observed by critics, that Homer hardly ever makes his heroes succeed, unless they have first offered a prayer to heaven; whether they engage in war, go upon an embassy, undertake a voyage, or whatever they enterprise, they almost always supplicate some god; and whenever we find this omitted, we may expect some adversity to befal them in the course of the story. We must likewise mention it to their honour, that they prayed to, and thanked, the gods for the advantages of riches, honour, and health; but I cannot find, that the heathens ever acknowledged God for the author and giver of wisdom, or, indeed, of any virtue. Thus Cotta, in Tully, "Num quis, quod vir bonus esset, gratias diis egit unquam? Jovemque Optimum Maximum appellant, non quod nos justos, temperatos, sapientes efficiat, sed quod salvos, incolumes, opulentos, copiosos. Neque Herculi quisquam decimas vovit unquam, si sapiens factus esset." (De Natura Deor. lib. iii.) How much finer is this writer's description of wisdom, than that of a conceited stoic; and how much more deservedly is he to be admired for referring wisdom so justly to its true original, and acquainting us with its Divine extraction? Herein our author agrees with the Scripture account of the original of wisdom, which assures us, that it is he who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and commandeth the light to shine out of darkness, that must, in this case more particularly, shine in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God. I shall shut up this chapter, with an apposite and fine reflection of Messieurs du Port-Royal, in their comment upon this place; "Happy are those that have this knowledge, that wisdom and all perfection come from God, which may be called the knowledge of the truly humble—they know all things, because they are persuaded and sensible that they know nothing; they can do all things, because they are convinced, that, of themselves, they can do nothing. We ought, therefore, to put up often to God that excellent prayer of St. Austin's, not very unlike the beginning of this, 'Da mihi, Domine, gratiam tuam, quâ potens est omnis infirmus, qui sibi per illam conscius sit infirmitatis suæ.'"

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.

The author's prayer for wisdom is set down, wherein is shewn particularly, how necessary the gift of wisdom is to enable kings and rulers to discharge their high office with sufficiency and credit. The prayer itself is so like that of the real Solomon, (1 Kings iii. 9.) which he made to God in the beginning of his reign, that some from hence have been induced to ascribe this book to him. Calmet says, this prayer is continued from the beginning of this chapter to the end of the book, and is of opinion, that the book itself was never finished, or at least that the conclusion of it is lost; for the author does not conclude his prayer, as it is natural to suppose he should have done, according to his first design. (Preface sur le Livre de la Sagesse.)

Ver. 1. O GOD of my fathers.] It is very observable that Solomon, or rather this writer under that borrowed character, begins his prayer with great humility, and a religious spirit of meekness; he beseeches God to hear him, not for his own merit's sake, but for the worthiness of the ancient patriarchs, for Abraham and David his father's sake. He builds all his hopes upon the pure goodness of God, as knowing that humility is an essential in prayer, and the most likely means of success.

Lord of mercy, who hast made all things with thy word.] Κύριε τοῦ ἐλέους σου. All the editions which retain this pronoun, which may as well be omitted, have the same corrupt reading; the true one probably, instead of σοῦ, may be Κύριε τοῦ ἐλέους, σὺ ὁ ποιήσας, κ. τ. λ. Coverdale seems to have followed a copy which read so, O Lord of mercies, thou that hast made all things with thy word, i. e. who spakest all things into being, and by thy almighty fiat they are and were created. Or, Who madest all things by thy Word, thine eternal Λόγος, that same Word, who was in the beginning with thee, and without whom was not any thing made that was made, (John i. 3.) In this latter sense Calmet understands it, Le seigneur a créé l'univers par son verbe, par son fils; and so do many of the fathers.

Ver. 4. Give me wisdom that sitteth by thy throne.] i. e. The assessor of thy throne, which may mean more than being present with God, viz. assisting in his councils and presiding over them. Sitting here may be considered as a technical forensic term, and not only to imply a right of judicature, in which sense it is used in many places of Scripture, (Prov. xx. 8. Isa. xvi. 5.) but even dominion and sovereignty, according to St. Jerome, (Comm. ad Ephes.) by which supreme dignity of place, wisdom is distinguished from ministering spirits; for when angels, principalities, and powers, are described as attending about the throne of God, they are generally represented as standing, or falling down before it, (2 Chron. xviii. 18. Isa. vi. 2. Rev. iv. 10.) In this high sense some primitive writers have explained this passage, as implying a joint sovereignty of the Λόγος with God: see ver. 9, 10. of this chapter, where the same exalted character is continued, which seems a very close imitation of Prov. viii. especially ver. 27. ἡνίκα ἡτοίμαζε τὸν οὐρανὸν, συμπαρήμην αὐτῷ. But, for the reasons before given, (see note on chap. vii. 26.) I think the meaning rather to be, that wisdom, as a Divine attribute, is always present with God; as his joint-counsellor, his assistant, if I may be allowed the expression, and the partner of his throne or tribunal; that she always exists in the eternal mind, is privy to its sovereign decrees, and influences all its deliberations and actions; that wisdom therefore is not only the ornament, but the support and basis of God's throne, in as high, exalted, and proper a manner, as righteousness and equity are by the Psalmist said to be the habitation of his seat, (Psal. lxxxix. 15.) Philo describes Justice in the same manner, τὸν πάρεδρον Δίκην τοῦ πάντων ἡγεμόνος. (Philo, de Justitia. et de Joseph.) And the heathens made her equally an assessor on Jupiter's throne, Δίκη σύνεδρος Ζηνὸς, (Sophoc. in Œdip.) But Plutarch expresses himself concerning her in a manner which most resembles this writer: "Justice (according to his description) does not only sit like a queen, at the right hand of Jupiter, when he is upon his throne; but she is in his bosom, and one with himself."

Ver. 6. For though a man be never so perfect among the children of men, yet if thy wisdom be not with him, he shall be nothing regarded.] This observation, according to the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal, holds true, applied to rulers in the church, as well as those in the state; "For though a man have all knowledge, and be so consummate in wisdom as to discourse even with the tongue of angels; though he have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries; though he could work miracles, even to the removing mountains; and though he give all his goods to feed the poor,—yet, if he is devoid of the only true wisdom, that wisdom which proceedeth from God, and should be employed in his service, he may appear great indeed in the eyes of men, but, according to St. Paul, he is nothing, or will be accounted as nothing, in the sight of God." (1 Cor. xiii. 2.)

Ver. 7. Thou hast chosen me to be a king of thy people.] Melchior Canus and Sixtus Senensis lay great stress upon this passage, to prove Solomon the writer of this book; but their way of reasoning will prove too much, for if a bare assertion, the mere assuming the person of another, shall be thought sufficient to establish this point, then the Apostolical Canons may for the same reason be pronounced canonical, for in the last of them we meet with these words, πράξεις ἡμῶν τῶν Ἀποστόλων. And yet, notwithstanding this assertion, and though the title itself seemingly bespeaks them to be the authors, they are now generally decried and disclaimed, even by some of the Romanists themselves. (See Rainald's Cens. Libr. Apocr. Præl. 15.) It is most probable this passage of our author is spoken μιμητικῶς, i. e. by a feigned representation of a person, to take away any odium from the speaker, and to give the greater weight to what is delivered. Upon this occasion, no character was so proper to be assumed as that of Solomon, who himself was a king, and eminent above all others for his understanding and wisdom; because instruction offered and inculcated under so great a name, would be more regarded and attended to by persons of the same high rank and authority. Such a rhetorical artifice we often meet with in books of oratory: thus Tully sometimes argues under the person of Cato the elder, "Omnem sermonem tribuimus Catoni Seni, quo majorem autoritatem habeat oratio." But what comes nearest the point is, that Isocrates inscribes a whole oration, Nicocles, and speaks in the person of that king, as if he really was the author, to give the greater sanction, and procure more reverence, to the duties enjoined in it: and yet nobody, from that name or title, supposes it to belong to Nicocles, or that it was any thing else but an ingenious fiction of Isocrates. "The ancients (says Calmet) do often call their works by the names of the persons they introduce as speaking: thus Plato has given to his dialogues the names of Socrates, Timæus, Protagoras, &c. And Cicero, in the same way, gives to one of his pieces the title of Brutus, and to another that of Hortensius. Xenophon styles the history in which he has drawn the model of a complete prince, Cyrus, as being the principal person or character in it: but none will pretend that these were wrote by the persons whose names they bear, for it is agreed on all hands, that Plato, Cicero, Xenophon, were the true authors who composed those pieces under feigned names." (Dissert. sur l'auteur du Livre de la Sagesse.) And in another place the same learned writer gives the reason for this artifice and invention: "It may be considered as a prosopopœia, as a sort of device wherein a person, to give more weight to what is delivered, speaks in the name, and assumes the person, of some other more ancient. The Scripture has some instances of this sort, as that artful fiction of the widow of Tekoah, 2 Sam. xiv. to incline David to fetch home Absalom; that of the prophet, 1 Kings xx. 35. to rebuke Ahab; and that of Nathan, reproving David by that significant and fine parable of the ewe-lamb, 2 Sam. xii. And thus the prophets sometimes introduce God, Moses, Abraham, &c. speaking, to make their discourses more lively and more affecting." (Pref. sur le Livre de la Sagesse.)

Ver. 8. A resemblance of the holy tabernacle, which thou hast prepared from the beginning.] i. e. Upon the model, says Calmet, of the tabernacle, which Moses, by God's direction, erected for the people in the wilderness; and the temple was a true resemblance of it in all respects; only what was small and as it were in miniature in the one, was inconceivably grand and magnificent in the other; but the disposition in both was nearly the same, and framed according to the pattern which God at first exhibited in the Mount, Exod. xxv. 40. The Arabic version understands it in the same sense, "Simile tabernaculo sancto, cujus delineamentum ab initio præmisisti." But Grotius, and other writers, understand these words in a higher sense, viz. that the temple was a resemblance of heaven itself, prepared by God from the beginning for the righteous. And indeed the Jews seem to have had the same notion, for they fancied three heavens, and the third or highest heaven to be the habitation of God, and of the blessed angels; and to this distinction they imagined the atrium, sanctuarium, and sanctum sanctorum, answered in the temple and tabernacle: the encampment of the twelve tribes about the tabernacle, they fancied likewise to be a representation of the angels and heavenly host about the throne of God: Philo has the same sentiment in several places, and Josephus, lib. iii. cap. 7. No wonder therefore that this writer, from the great analogy and agreement which the Jews supposed betwixt them, should call the temple, in which was the sanctum sanctorum, the resemblance or image of heaven itself, prepared by God from everlasting. This is the language of an inspired pen, even the writer to the Hebrews, who, speaking (viii. 5.) of the tabernacle, calls it the exemplar and pattern of heavenly things; and (ix. 24.) he calls the holy places made with hands, the figures of the true, or celestial ones. St. Chrysostom, speaking of the temple, calls it, the great and typical fabric, the image of the whole world, both sensible and intellectual; and he justifies his notion from these canonical passages. (Homil. de Nativ.) And as the comparison in all these places is made to heavenly things, so St. John in the Revelations describes the heavenly sanctuary by representations taken from the Jewish temple; particularly the throne of God, with his ministering spirits, is represented like that over the ark, where the Schechinah, or Divine glory, sat encompassed with the cherubims. (See Spencer de Leg. Hebr. tom. i. p. 215.) It may not be amiss to observe upon the Greek reading of this passage, viz. μίμημα σκηνῆς ἁγίας, ἣν προητοίμασας ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, that however the passage itself be understood, whether of the heavenly or earthly tabernacle, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς seems unnecessary after προητοίμασας. I would therefore carry these words forward to the beginning of the next verse, and read ἀπ' ἀρχῆς καὶ μετά σου ἡ σοφία, κ. τ. λ.

Ver. 13. For what man is he that can know the counsel of God? or who can think what the will of the Lord is?] From this passage some confidently affirm St. Paul borrowed the thirty-fourth verse of the eleventh chapter to the Romans, and therefore they would infer this book to be canonical. But this is a groundless pretence: for, first, we do not perceive in any part of the New Testament, this, or any other ecclesiastical book, cited or referred to as Scripture: secondly, it does not follow by any necessary consequence, that such sentences in Scripture as are like and parallel to some others in apocryphal or ecclesiastical writings, should be really taken from thence; nothing being more common, than for different authors to hit upon and agree in the same moral maxims, without having read or ever seen one another's writings: thirdly, some of those very sentences which are said to be taken out of the Book of Wisdom, or Ecclesiasticus, occur in some part of those books which are confessedly canonical; and particularly this passage of St. Paul is in the same terms, or to the same effect, Isa. xl. 13, 14. where the words are, Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or being his counsellor hath taught him? With whom took he counsel, and who instructed him and taught him in the path of judgment? That St. Paul had this place of the prophet in view is the opinion of many learned men: (Tertull. cont. Marc. lib. v. Basil de Sp. Sanct. cap. 5. Du Pin's Hist. Can.) fourthly, supposing St. Paul does actually refer to this passage in the book of Wisdom, does not the same St. Paul confessedly quote the heathen poets, and some ancient apocryphal book, for the story of Jannes and Jambres? (2 Tim. iii. 8.) And does not our Saviour himself, in the opinion of some learned men, (see Bishop Sherlock, Dissert. 1.) quote another such apocryphal book, under the title of The Wisdom of God, and appeal to it as containing ancient prophecies? (Luke xi. 49.) Did apocryphal writings receive any higher sanction or authority from hence, or ever any one imagine the canon of Scripture imperfect for the want of them? One may easily see the design of the Romanists, in endeavouring to bring the apocryphal books into the canon; they hope by their authority to establish some favourite notions of their church, which yet, if examined and compared with the original, upon which they are pretended to be grounded, will be often found to have no other foundation than in a wrong version, as may be proved more particularly from the books of Maccabees.

Ver. 15. For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things.] Γεώδες σκῆνος. This expression is manifestly borrowed from the Platonists. Thus Clemens Alexandrinus, Τὸ σῶμα, γήϊνόν φησιν ὁ Πλάτων σκῆνος, (Strom. 5.) We meet with the like expression, 2 Pet. i. 14. where death is called ἡ ἀπόθεσις τοῦ σκηνώματος. But the description of the body is most remarkably exaggerated by St. Paul, 2 Cor. v. 1. ἡ ἐπίγειος ἡμῶν οἰκία τοῦ σκήνους. Philo, Hippocrates, and other Greek writers, in like manner, use τὸ σκῆνος for a human body; and Lucretius, in imitation of the Greeks, uses vas in the same sense, (lib. iii. ver. 441.) We may hence, therefore, very properly render ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν, (John i. 14.) he dwelt in a human body amongst us. (See Pearce in Longin. p. 102.) This powerful pressure of the body is so apparent, that it is acknowledged by all the wiser heathens: hence the Platonists frequently impute the diminution of the powers of the soul to its conjunction with the body. And in the ancient academical philosophy, it was much disputed, whether that corporeal and animal life, which was always drawing down the soul into terrene and material things, was not more properly to be styled death than life. (See Smith's Sel. Disc. p. 447.) There is a thought not unlike this in Philo, which he seems to have taken from Plato, in Cratyl. καὶ γὰρ σῆμα τινές φασιν αὐτὸ [σῶμα] εἶναι τῆς ψυχῆς, ὡς τεθαμμένης, ἐν τῷ νῦν παρόντι. (S. Leg. Allegor. lib. i.) The Pythagoreans looked upon the body as no better than the prison of the soul, τῆς ψυχῆς δεσμωτήριον, as Philo expressly calls it, (De Migrat. Abrah.) And to this agrees that of Scipio, "Imo vero, inquit, ii vivunt qui è corporum vinclis, tanquam è carcere, evolaverunt; vestra vero quæ dicitur vita, mors est." (Somn. Scip. cap. 3.) Xenophon introduces Cyrus, speaking after the same manner to his children just before his death; "I could never think that the soul, while in a mortal body, lives, and when departed out of it, dies, or that its consciousness is lost, when it is discharged out of an unconscious habitation; but that it then truly exists, when it is freed from all corporeal alliance." In the same contemptible manner the saints and martyrs speak of the flesh, calling it the chain and burden of the spirit: hence we find them praying and longing with St. Paul, to be dissolved and set at liberty from it, as soon as God pleased. (Theophyl. in Luc. ii. Arnob. adv. Gent. lib. ii. Marc. Anton. lib. iii. Ambrose de Bon. Mortis.) "This state of human imperfection is finely represented (says St. Austin) by that woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, Luke xiii. 11. and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself, who was immediately made straight, and loosed from her infirmity, by the powerful Spirit of our Saviour working on her, whose cure is a figure or emblem of man's recovery from the bondage of sin, through the power of grace. It is for this reason, and because men's thoughts are apt to wander, and grovel upon the earth through the infirmity of the flesh, that the priest calls upon us, in the celebration of the holy mysteries, to lift up our hearts, Sursum Corda." (Aug. De vera Relig. De bono Perseverant.) Horace exactly expresses our author in what follows:—

——"Corpus onustum
Hesternis vitiis animum quoque prægravat unà,
Atque affigit humo divinæ particulam auræ."
(Sat. lib. ii.)

Virgil too has some fine thoughts upon this occasion; he shews how the vigor animæ is impeded by the body in the following lines:

——"Noxia corpora tardant,
Terrenique hebetant artus, moribundaque membra.
Hinc metuunt cupiuntque, dolent gaudentque, neque auras
Respiciunt, clausæ tenebris et carcere cæco."

And even after death, he imagines some sordes, contracted from its union with the body, still to adhere to it, and therefore supposes it to undergo a sort of purgation in another state:

"Quin et supremo cum lumine vita reliquit,
Non tamen omne malum miseris, nec funditùs omnes
Corporeæ excedunt pestes; penitusque necesse est
Multa diu concreta modis inolescere miris.
Ergo exercentur pœnis." (Æn. vi.)

Ver. 16. Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth But the things that are in heaven, who hath searched out?] This writer argues very justly here from our ignorance of natural causes, which we every day see and experience, to our imperfect views and conjectures of things spiritual and invisible; for since the most illuminated understanding in this world sees only in part, and cannot have a perfect or adequate idea of things that shall be revealed more fully hereafter, reason should confine itself within its own province, and not attempt the knowledge or explanation of such arcana as are confessedly out of its reach. If I have told you earthly things (says our blessed Saviour), and ye believe them not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things? (John iii. 12.) It is a very just observation therefore of Lord Bacon's, "That he laboureth in vain, who shall endeavour to draw down heavenly mysteries to human reason; it rather becomes us (says that great philosopher) to bring our reason to the adorable throne of Divine truth." The heathens have prettily couched this moral, in that excellent fable of the golden chain, with which neither gods nor men were able to draw Jupiter down to the earth, but he could with ease draw them up to heaven. If this observation, even of an apocryphal writer, was but well weighed, the great advocates for the all-sufficiency of reason, would surely be more modest and humble, nor would the credibility of mysteries be so obstinately disputed.

Ver. 18. For so the ways of them which lived on the earth were reformed, and men were taught the things that are pleasing unto thee.] Τὰ ἀρεστά σου. Would not this be more correct if we read, τὰ ἀρεστά σοι? The sense is sufficiently clear, viz. that, through the help and instruction of wisdom, mankind, from the beginning of the world, have been informed in their duty, and attained to the knowledge of the Divine will and pleasure, by the careful observance of which they were preserved both from sin and punishment. The Vulgate very properly restrains this to good men, which otherwise might seem too general. This appears from the ancient patriarchs, who lived before and after the flood, and through wisdom kept themselves free from the general corruption, and escaped those evils which others suffered; many of whom, as instances of this truth, are mentioned in the next chapter, which in some editions begins with this verse: the ancient versions differ very much in the rendering of it; some understand it of the future, some of the present, but it seems best to refer these words to the times past, from the very early instances which immediately follow.

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.

The great advantages of wisdom are enumerated from the earliest account of time; that such as would not be conducted by it, have been miserable, exemplified in Cain and his descendants; and such as have followed its guidance have remarkably prospered, from Adam to Moses inclusively.

Ver. 1. SHE preserved the first-formed father of the world that was created alone.] Μόνον κτισθέντα. Does this mean, that Adam alone was created by a true and proper creation, and that all others, as being descended from him, were formed out of him, as from a pre-existing principle? Or does it mean, that Adam was created when nothing else existed? This cannot be the sense, as the works of the former days, and even the serpent amongst the rest, were confessedly before him: or are we to understand this of the creation of Adam, before the existence of Eve, or any of the human species? But is not as much implied in his being called here πρωτόπλαστος and πατὴρ κόσμου? Or is it usual to express one and the same thing by three synonymous terms? I am inclined to conjecture, that the true reading here is, μόνον τιθέντα, and not μόνον κτισθέντα, as all the copies have it, which mistake might easily happen from the likeness and affinity of the sound: i. e. wisdom preserved Adam free from all harm and danger, when he was placed alone and by himself in Paradise; see Gen. ii. 8. where the LXX. read, ἐφύτευσεν ὁ Θεὸς Παράδεισον, καὶ ἔθετο ἐκεῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον. Nor am I quite singular in this interpretation; Tirinus expounds the passage in the same manner, Quamdiu solus fuit, nec à consorte solicitatus ad malum. (See Comment. in loc.)

And brought him out of his fall.] It was wisdom which preserved Adam in Paradise when alone, and, after his fall, by particular grace vouchsafed to him, produced in him humiliation and repentance, proportionate to his great transgression: he was sensible upon his expulsion from Paradise, that all that sad train of evils and miseries which he saw entering into the world, and now are natural and hereditary to the whole species, were so many punishments brought into it, and imposed upon his posterity, purely on his own account; he considered the growing wickedness of the world, as introduced and occasioned by him; he considered the mortality of his descendants, their frequent, and often violent, deaths, as the consequence of his sin. These reflections, arising from his ingratitude to God, and his affectionate concern for his unhappy race, sunk so deep into the mind of the first-formed father of the world, that during the nine hundred and thirty years which he lived upon earth after his fall, he continued under such a lively sense of his sin, and God's just displeasure, that he became an humble and remarkable penitent. This penitence, or recovery of our first parents from their fall, which seems here referred to, has, by some of the fathers, been represented as the effect of the grace of the second Adam, to whom the glory of being the deliverer of the first was justly due, and been maintained by the church in the most early times, as a catholic truth. Irenæus, who lived at the end of the second century, reckons it accordingly (lib. i. cap. 31.) among the heresies of Tatian, that he held, that Adam and Eve were not saved; "For (says that father), as Jesus Christ had undertaken to redeem man from the power and dominion of sin, it is but reasonable to give him the glory of the delivery of our first parents from it; for he would not have been so entirely victorious over the devil, if he had left them under the hands of that apostate spirit, who, by his subtilty, had taken them out of God's hands." (Iren. lib. iii. cap. 34. St. Aug. epist. 99. ad Evod. Tertull. lib. ii. cont. Marcion. Epiphan. Hæres. 46.) This was the sense of antiquity concerning Adam's fall, and his happy recovery from it. Milton has finely represented Adam's tender concern for his unhappy posterity in the following lines:—

> "All that I eat or drink, or shall beget,
> Is propagated curse. O voice once heard
> Delightfully, Increase and multiply,
> Now death to hear! for what can I increase
> Or multiply, but curses on my head?
> Who, of all ages to succeed, but feeling
> The evil on him brought by me, will curse
> My head,—Ill fare our ancestor impure,
> For this we may thank Adam?" (Book x.)

Which concludes with Adam's seeking peace and forgiveness of God, whom he had offended, by supplication and repentance:—

"So spake our father penitent, nor Eve
Felt less remorse: they forthwith to the place
Repairing where he judg'd them, prostrate fell
Before him reverent, and both confess'd
Humbly their faults, and pardon begg'd, with tears
Watering the ground, and with their sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign
Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek."

It is observable that Moses, in the book of Genesis, where he mentions Adam's fall, says nothing of his repentance, which though it be not expressly asserted in the text, yet neither can any thing certain or conclusive to the contrary be inferred from Moses's silence: this author has supplied what is there wanting, and acquainted us with the opinion of those of his time, with respect to this very important inquiry.

Ver. 2. And gave him power to rule all things.] Before his fall, God gave to Adam the dominion over the creation, (Gen. i. 28.) and it is not improbable, that upon his transgression God deprived him of it, by way of punishment, at least for a time, or in part, and, upon his sincere repentance, restored him to his full sovereignty and power. This seems to be the sentiment of this writer, who, after the mention of Adam's recovery from the sad consequences of his fall, says, that God gave him power to rule all things, which cannot relate to the original grant, which was previous to his misfortune. Perhaps, instead of the present reading, ἔδωκέν τε αὐτῷ ἰσχὴν κρατῆσαι ἁπάντων, the true one may be, ἀνέδωκέν τε αὐτῷ ἰσχὴν κρατῆσαι ἁπάντων· or thus, ἔδωκέν τε αὐτῷ ἰσχὴν κρατῆσαι αὖ πάντων, i. e. She restored to him the power of ruling all things, or, She gave him the power again to rule all things. And such a fresh donation of power seems necessary; for, as Calmet judiciously observes, "Avant son peché, toutes choses lui etoient soumises; il exerçoit sur elles un empire libre, aisc, agreable, volontaire, tant de sa part, que de la leur: mais depuis sa chûte, il ne conserva qu'avec peine le reste de domaine que Dieu lui avoit laissé;" i. e. Before the fall, Adam's government of the creatures was free, easy, and agreeable, and their submission voluntary and willing; but after the fall, he with difficulty maintained his sovereignty, and the state of his affairs being altered, called for the same or a greater power. (Comment. in loc.)

Ver. 3. When the unrighteous went away from her in his anger.] i. e. Cain, who had no regard either to wisdom, piety, or even humanity: he is eminently called the unrighteous here, because he committed the first act of violence in the world; as the Scripture calls him, for the same reason, the offspring of the wicked one, who was a murderer from the beginning, ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν, (1 John iii. 12.) And his brother is there denominated, righteous Abel, from his extraordinary and exemplary goodness. (Matt. xxiii. 35.)

He perished also in the fury wherewith he murdered his brother. For whose cause the earth being drowned with the flood.] The Scripture makes no mention of the perishing, or death of Cain; on the contrary, we read, that God prolonged his life in a miserable estate, as an example of his vengeance, and to continue Cain's punishment: and for this reason he gave a strict charge, that no one should for this fact destroy him, threatening to take vengeance sevenfold upon any that should kill him, (Gen. iv. 15.) God is said also to have set a mark upon Cain, i. e. to have given him a sign or token to assure him, that none should take away his life. (See Shuckford's Connex. vol. i. p. 8.) How therefore are we to understand this writer when he says here, that Cain perished also in the fury wherewith he murdered his brother? Did Cain then perish at the same time, and by the sudden and violent effects of the same fury and passion? Or shall we imagine him to allude to a traditional story among the rabbins, that "Lamech being blind, took his son Tubal Cain to hunt with him in the woods, where Cain used to lurk up and down in the thickets, afraid of the commerce and society of men; that the lad mistook him for some beast stirring in the bushes, and that Lamech, by the direction of Tubal Cain, with a dart or arrow killed him." I cannot persuade myself to think that our author refers to this uncertain tradition, which has no countenance from any good history, and is generally exploded as an idle and unsupported conceit. Nor can the meaning be, that Cain perished in the deluge, which happened, as is generally agreed, about Ann. Mun. 1656. (see Usher's Annals) long before which time Cain was dead. Much less reason is there to assert, that the deluge happened purely upon his account, or was occasioned by his single transgression, as the sense seems to be of our present version. I think therefore that our translators have quite mistaken the sense of this place, which is not to be understood of Cain solely or exclusively, which seems manifest from the following reasons: 1st, Ἄδικος is improperly joined with συναπώλετο, except we suppose that more persons perished. 2dly, Ἀδελφοκτόνοι θυμοὶ, expressed in the plural number, relates not to Cain's fury, which is mentioned immediately before, but to persons of the like bloody temper and disposition. 3dly, The Arabic version expressly understands it of such persons, which renders, Periit unà cum animabus fratricidis. 4thly, Coverdale's version, following the ancient Vulgate, renders, the brotherhood perished through the wrath of murder: which means a number of persons, probably a whole fraternity or kindred, that perished on that account. It remains then to inquire next, what wicked and unhappy persons are here meant in particular. This difficulty, Origen, who incidentally mentions this passage, helps us to explain, who understands it of the descendants of Cain: for in the antediluvian world there was not only a general neglect of virtue, and pursuit of wickedness, but there was one reigning crime, which Moses takes notice of in particular, viz. that the earth was filled with violence. This expression, and the severe law made against murder soon after the flood, makes it probable, that the men of this first world, especially the descendants of Cain, had, in imitation of him, and by the evil influence of his example, taken great and unwarrantable liberties in usurping upon, and destroying, the lives of one another: these seem to be the persons whom this writer, for their unnatural and bloody temper, styles ἀδελφοκτόνοι θυμοὶ, for whose sake, and upon account of whose violence and blood-shedding, the deluge really happened. Hence then I am induced to offer a conjecture, that the true reading of the next verse is not, δι' ὃν, but δι' ὃ, and most probably the copy which Origen made use of, read so, for he expressly renders, Hanc ob causam diluvium fit, ut deleatur Cain semen, that God's purpose in bringing the deluge, was to extinguish the posterity of Cain. (Orig. in Evang. Joh. See also St. Basil. Orat. 6. St. Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 24.) And the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal, which understands it, De Cain, et des autres mechans qui l'avoient imité. This is farther confirmed from the testimony of the son of Sirach, (Ecclus. xl. 10.) who, enumerating the several instruments of God's vengeance against the wicked, as the sword, famine, &c. immediately adds, καὶ δι' αὐτοὺς ἐγένετο ὁ κατακλυσμὸς, that for their sakes came the deluge, i. e. for the wickedness of such ungodly and bloody-minded men as went in the ways of Cain, as St. Jude expresses it. For the single fact of Cain, though very shocking, was not a sufficient cause alone of bringing the universal deluge, nor of consequence enough to involve the whole earth in it: but when the earth was filled with violence, through the wicked manners and attempts of Cain's descendants, then, or on that account, God destroyed the earth with a flood. We may lastly add the authority of the Arabic version, to establish this conjecture, which reads, as I before observed, Periit unà cum animabus fratricidis, and then adds, ob id obrutam diluvio terram, &c. and Vatablus, I observe, renders in like manner. Such being then the fate of Cain's descendants, Cain himself may with propriety enough be said to have perished with them, inasmuch as his whole race thereby became extinct. The words, therefore, ἄδικος συναπώλετο are not to be understood of Cain personally, as our version takes them, but as consequentially suffering in the destruction of his posterity. From this general calamity of the flood, we may make this useful reflection,—that it is no security to ungodly persons that there are great numbers of them; they ought rather for that cause to be so much the more apprehensive of speedy and dreadful judgments. For because of the greatness of their number, because all flesh, as the Scripture expresses it, had corrupted themselves, the inhabitants of the old world were so much the nearer destruction, and it involved them for that reason.

Ver. 4. Wisdom again preserved it.] i. e. By preserving Noah and his family, by whom, and their posterity in successive ages, the earth was replenished by degrees, and the several parts of the world at length inhabited: we may also, with Messieurs du Port-Royal, consider this preservation mystically, for the ark was a figure and type of the church, as Noah and his family were of the members of it, whose preservation in the flood prefigured also our redemption by the laver of regeneration or baptism, as St. Peter explains it, 1 Pet. iii. 21. So that the power of one and the same element, may be considered as the end or destruction of vice, and as the original and fountain of virtue.

And directed the course of the righteous in a piece of wood of small value.] Per contemptibile lignum, according to the Vulgate. (See note on xiv. 6.) Our author intends here no reflection on the structure or usefulness of the ark, which was the design of infinite wisdom, and the work of a whole century, and so conveniently contrived, as to contain Noah (whose very name, according to Philo, signifies righteous), and his family, and all living creatures, according to the appointed number of them; he speaks only as to appearance, and as it was then judged; for while it was building it appeared so contemptible, that Noah and his sons were laughed at for their design, as being seemingly unable to endure such a conflux of waters. And, indeed, that such a piece of wood should ride safely when all the high hills were covered, and not be overset by winds or waves, or the many violent shocks it must necessarily meet with; that it should not be dashed to pieces against rocks which were invisible, nor sink under so prodigious a weight as it contained,—displays most illustriously the power and providence of God, who chooses to effect his purposes oftentimes by means the most unpromising and unlikely. Nor is the wisdom of God less to be admired in the contrivance of the ark, which may truly be said to be a world within itself, than his infinite power in directing it; for it has been demonstrated mathematically, that there was sufficient room in it to contain all the things, animate and inanimate, which it was designed for; and that the measure and capacity of the ark, which some sceptics have made use of as an argument against the Scripture, ought rather to be esteemed a most rational confirmation of the truth of it, and of the wisdom that designed it. (See Bishop Wilkins's Essay on a real Character.)

Ver. 5. Moreover, the nations in their wicked conspiracy being confounded.] Our version here is faulty, the true rendering seems to be, When the nations around conspired or joined together in wickedness; Lorsque les nations conspirerent ensemble pour s'abandonner au mal, says Calmet, and with him agree Messieurs du Port-Royal; and the Vulgate renders accordingly, In consensu nequitiæ cùm se nationes contulissent; i. e. when they were overrun with idolatry: for neither the creation of the world, nor the universal deluge, nor the confusion of languages, could preserve the belief of one supreme God only; but the new world was as universally overrun with polytheism and idolatry, as the old world was with violence, and the very dispersion of mankind probably contributed to it. Then, when all the nations around were sunk into idolatry, God called Abraham from Chaldea, whom the context shews to be here meant. This I take to be a truer sense of the place, than with some to interpret it of the conspiracy to build the tower of Babel. The learned Usher, it must be confessed, seems to understand it in this latter sense, for in his account of that bold and presumptuous design, he refers to this very place, which is somewhat surprising; for this cannot be reconciled even with his own chronology, for the building this tower was A. M. 1757. and Abraham was not born till A. M. 2008. Calmet therefore mentions this, in his Preface, as an objection against our author, Il semble croire qu'Abraham étoit au tems de la construction de la tour de Babel: but this anachronism is removed by the sense which I have given of this passage.

She found out the righteous, and preserved him blameless unto God.] Some have asserted, that Abraham not only lived blameless in the midst of idolatrous nations, but that even in his father's house, where he spent the first part of his life, he preserved himself free from the idolatrous worship which infected all the rest of the family. (See Sherlock on Div. Provid. p. 293.) But others, with more probability, say, that he was at first engaged in this wrong way of worship, and, like other Chaldeans, adored the sun (Phil. de Abrah. Clem. Recogn. lib. i. Cyril. cont. Jul. lib. iii. Suidas voce Ἀβραὰμ), but that by God's giving him a better understanding he renounced it: and on this account he is said to have suffered a severe persecution from the Chaldeans, who threw him into a fiery furnace, from which God miraculously rescued him. (Hieron. Tradit. Hebr. in Genes.) And, indeed, the text of the ancient Vulgate Nehem. ix. 7. seems to confirm this tradition, which reads, Eduxisti eum de igne Chaldæorum; and the Jews generally assert the same. However this be, which probably is a mistake from confounding the word Ur, which signifies both fire, and the city, from which God called Abraham, it is certain that Abraham, from the time of his call, A. M. 2083. (see Usher's Annals) became the great restorer and reviver both of natural and revealed religion to a corrupt world; and we cannot have a stronger proof of his extraordinary piety and virtue, than that God thought him the fittest person to reveal himself to, and to begin a new reformation of the world by. It is very likely Abraham demonstrated to his father the vanity of idols, since he engaged him to forsake the city where he was settled. (See Calmet's Dict. in voce Abram.) And by his own sons, and his nephew Lot, he spread the true religion far and wide, and their very numerous descendants carried the knowledge of it still farther. After all this care, we cannot think that Abraham relapsed, but that God preserved him blameless ever after. We are not therefore to understand this passage, as if Abraham was always free from idolatry, for that Terah and all his children were infected with, by living among the Chaldeans and sorcerers, which are synonymous terms in the book of Daniel: (see Usher's Annals, tom. i. p. 7.) but the meaning here is, that when God removed him from the infection of Chaldea, and vouchsafed to him the knowledge of the true religion, through his assistance he continued pure, and was not any more polluted.

And kept him strong against his tender compassion towards his son.] The rendering literally is, She kept him strong in his bowels towards his son, as the marginal reading is; i. e. she gave him strength to vanquish the tenderness which he had for his son; for Abraham was so entirely devoted to God, that he was dead to all the moving calls of nature and instinct. Nor is such an instance of obedience to be wondered at in him, whose faith was so strong, that he was verily persuaded that God was able to raise Isaac from the dead again after the sacrifice, to make good his promise to him of a numerous progeny. "What a number of virtues meet (says St. Ambrose) in this single action! the piety of the patriarch appears, in his readiness to offer up his son at God's command; his courage is displayed, in resisting the sentiments of nature on so trying an occasion; his justice, in returning to God that which he had received from his liberality; and his faith, in believing that God could restore him from the dead, and bring him from the deep of the earth again." (Ambros. de Offic. lib. i. cap. 2.)

Ver. 6, 7. When the ungodly perished, she delivered the righteous man, who fled from the fire which fell down upon the five cities; of whose wickedness, even to this day, the waste land that smoketh is a testimony, and plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness.] Καρποφοροῦντα φυτὰ ἀτελέσιν ὥραις. Philo describes the destruction of the cities where Lot dwelt in the same terms, ἡ φλὸξ, κ. τ. λ. Vim vitalem in summam sterilitatem convertit flamma, ita ut nihil superesset, unde vel fructus vel herba germinaret, in hodiernum usque malo durante; where the learned editor, referring to this place, very judiciously conjectures, that the true reading of it is, ἀτελέσιν ὀπώραις, (Mangey's Philo, de Abrah. vol. ii.) Grotius thinks it probable, that by plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness, may be meant fruits in appearance only: and in this sense the author seems to allude to the apples of Sodom in particular, which are said to have been beautiful in appearance to the eye, but within were full of rottenness. Messieurs du Port-Royal understand it in like manner of trees, Qui portent des fruits bastards semblables aux autres en apparence, mais qui se reduissent en cendre lors qu'on les ouvre. (Comment. in loc.) And this Tertullian confirms, Sodomam et Gomorram igneus imber exussit, olet adhuc incendio terra, et si qua illic arborum poma, oculis tenus, cæterùm contactu cinerescunt: and thus Solinus describes them: Pomum quod gignitur, habeat licet speciem maturitatis, mandi tamen non potest, nam fuliginem intrinsecus favillaceam, ambitus tantùm extimæ cutis cohibet, quæ vel levi pressa tactu, fumum exhalat, et fatiscit in vagum pulverem. (Solin. Polyhistor. cap. 37.) But Josephus's account comes nearest our author, who, speaking of this once-happy region, says, Φασὶ ὡς δι' ἀσέβειαν οἰκητόρων κεραυνοῖς καταφλέγη, κ. τ. λ. Fertur eam ob incolarum impietatem fulminibus conflagrasse. Adhuc ignis à Deo immissi reliquias, et oppidorum quinque isthic videre licet umbram: insuper et fructus, specie quidem et colore edulibus similes sunt, manibus autem decerpti, in favillam et cinerem resolvuntur. (Lib. v. de Bello Jud. cap. 8.) Nothing was more known or celebrated among authors, sacred and profane, than this fire which fell down upon Pentapolis, or the five cities of Sodom. Diodorus Siculus, (lib. xix.) Strabo, (lib. xvi.) and Philo, speak of it as burning in their times: and some have thought St. Jude alludes to the continuance of this fire, ver. 7. and that he calls it πῦρ αἰώνιος, because it continued burning. (See Tacit. Hist. lib. v. Chrysost. Hom. 19. ad pop. Antioch. Maccab. lib. iii.) But I shall not be so disingenuous, as to omit what Mr. Maundrell, who was upon that spot, says, viz. "That he never saw or heard of any such fruit hereabouts; nor was there any tree to be seen, from whence one might expect such a fruit; and adds, that he believes its very being, as well as its beauty, is a fiction." (Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 85.) The Vulgate renders, Incerto tempore fructus habentes arbores, intimating, that the fruit growing here was, on this account, unlike all other fruit, which has a certain and fixed season of being ripe, but this never came to perfection. (See Tirin. in loc.) We find that Homer had a notion of this great truth, that God sometimes exerts his judgments upon guilty cities, by sending a real fire from heaven upon them in a signal and terrible manner. (See Iliad. lib. xxi.) And the fate of these cities suggests a very useful reflection—that though the patience of God bears with the crimes and impenitence of mankind, even for several ages, yet when his justice shews itself at last, it is so destructive and inexorable, that nothing can withstand or avert it. From this destruction of Sodom we may likewise farther see the truth of our author's observation, that the punishment is usually proportioned and adapted to the nature of the crime, for these wretched cities burning with unnatural lust, and impure fires, are, by a correspondent vengeance, overthrown and consumed by fire.

And a standing pillar of salt.] The Vulgate renders, figmentum salis, others call it cumulus, and some columna salis; the last is most agreeable to the Greek, στήλη ἁλός.

Sulpicius Severus says, "Reflexit oculos, statimque in molem conversa traditur." It has been thought by some authors probable, that the statue retained her own form; so St. Cyprian seems to have imagined,

——"stetit ipsa sepulchrum,
Ipsaque imago sibi, formam sine corpore servans."

This pillar was subsisting in the time of Josephus, who says that it was then standing, and that he himself saw it, ἱστόρηκα δὲ αὐτὴν, ἔτι γὰρ νῦν διαμένει, (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 11.) Later writers attest the same of their times; Benjamin the Jew, who lived in the twelfth century, mentions it in his Itinerary; and some more modern authors speak of it as yet existing, "Suo quasi sale condita," as Bishop Fell jocularly speaks of it. Adricomius quotes three authors that were eye-witnesses of it, and he particularly tells us its situation, that it stands between En-gaddi and the Dead Sea. (Theatrum terræ sanctæ, p. 55.) Mr. Maundrell, on the other side, gives so little credit to the reality of this pillar, that, though he wanted not curiosity, yet he wanted faith to induce him to go see this monument of Lot's metamorphosed wife. (Journey from Aleppo, p. 85.) Various have been the conjectures of learned men about the reality of this pillar of salt; some, with much subtilty, understand a pillar of salt to signify only an everlasting pillar, of what matter soever made, in the same sense as they interpret the covenant of salt, Numb. xviii. 19. Others have fancied that this history, like that of Nabal, 1 Sam. xxv. 37. is to be understood comparatively, that Lot's wife was as a pillar of salt; as Niobe, according to the fable, which most probably took its rise from this history, is said to have been turned, through grief, into a sort of stone: but there is more reason to understand this literally. But it will then perhaps be asked, how it happened that this woman was not destroyed with fire and consumed to nothing, as the Sodomites were, but was converted by the powerful wrath of God into this pillar of salt, a perpetual spectacle for all beholders? To this inquiry I shall return an answer in the words of a polite writer, who explains this accident in the following manner; "That as thunder, or rather lightning, stiffens all animals it strikes in an instant, and leaves them dead in the same posture in which it found them alive, this unhappy woman's body, being prepared by heat, and penetrated and encrusted with salt, which fell down from heaven in great quantities upon this devoted region, might long subsist as a statue of salt, in the very posture in which this judgment from heaven found her. Nor is there much difficulty in conceiving how salt should continue so long undissolved in the open air, since it is well known to naturalists, that rocks of salt are as lasting as any other rocks." (Revelation examined, vol. ii. p. 229.) Pliny mentions a mineral kind of salt, which never melts, and serves for building as well as stone, (lib. xxxi. cap. 7.) The reason which Tertullian assigns for the durableness of this pillar, "Quod perpetuis temporibus reparetur, et si quis advena formam mutilaverit, vulnera ex sese complet," is so surprising and incredible, that it can be considered in no other light, than as a fable or legend, handed down by an imperfect tradition, upon no better foundation than another story relating to this woman, which for decency's sake I forbear to mention.

A monument of an unbelieving soul.] It would be better rendered, A monument of the unbelieving soul. And so Coverdale's and the ancient English versions render, A token of remembrance of the unfaithful soul. The transgression of Lot's wife is greatly aggravated by the following particulars:—1. She was delivered, with her husband and daughters, out of Sodom, and brought forth by the angel's own hands. 2. She was warned that she should not look back, nor abide in all the plain, lest she perished. 3. There was a city very near to them appointed, which she might easily have reached and been in safety. 4. She had her husband and children with her, whom she ought to have accompanied; but she neglects these, and not believing the angels, that Sodom would be so soon destroyed, would indulge a criminal curiosity of looking back; her punishment, therefore, for these reasons, was just. Many useful reflections, for the conduct of others, have been raised from the signal misfortune of this woman. Our Saviour, we may observe, to guard his disciples against any hardness of heart, bids them to remember Lot's wife, (Luke xvii. 32.) lest they also should perish through unbelief. St. Austin says, "That God chose this public punishment for the sake of others, to proclaim to them to beware, by her example, not to look back to a wicked Sodom, i. e. not to return to their old vices from which they have been called away by some gracious means that God hath afforded them; 'Quo pertinet quod prohibiti sunt, qui liberabantur ab angelis, retro respicere, nisi quia non est animo redeundum ad veterem vitam, qua per gratiam regenerati exuimur?'" (De Civit. Dei, lib. xvi. cap. 30.) The like useful inference St. Cyprian draws from this accident, (epist. 11.) But St. Clement most fully expresses the sense of this and the former verse, and how we should improve by the history of their misfortunes: "By hospitality and godliness was Lot saved out of Sodom, when all the country round about was destroyed by fire and brimstone; the Lord thereby making it manifest, that he will not forsake those that trust in him, but will bring the disobedient to punishment and correction: for his wife, who went out with him, being of a distrustful mind, and not continuing in the same obedience, was for that reason set forth for an example, being turned into a pillar of salt unto this day; that so all men may know, that those that are double-minded, and distrustful of the power of God, are prepared for condemnation." (Clement. epist. 1. cap. 11. See also Cyr. Cathechet. Mystag. i.)

Ver. 8. So that in the things wherein they offended, they could not so much as be hid.] This reflection refers not to Lot's wife only, but regards equally the Sodomites, Cain, and his descendants, and the several faulty instances beforementioned; all of whom, through their ignorance of, or disregard for, true wisdom, fell into very grievous transgressions, and are recorded as so many standing monuments of the just judgment of God against such abominable practices, the shame whereof they inherit even at this day. Calmet applies this even to Lot himself, who, slighting the direction of the angels, who ordered him to escape to the mountains, retired into a cave, was overtaken with drunkenness, and committed incest with his daughters; crimes which arose from his neglect of true wisdom, and are a lasting reproach upon this otherwise righteous man.

Ver. 10. When the righteous fled from his brother's wrath, she guided him in right paths.] i. e. When Jacob fled from the wrath of Esau into Mesopotamia, he was delivered from great dangers through wisdom that attended upon him, according to God's promise to him,—Behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of. (Gen. xxviii. 15.) Herein Jacob is an image of all the faithful, whom God separates from the rest of mankind, protects with his favourable kindness, and conducts, as his chosen, in the right way to happiness; which the wicked, through a fatal mistake and irregular wandering out of the true path, cannot arrive at.

Shewed him the kingdom of God.] i. e. When he beheld in his dream a ladder, the foot whereof stood upon the earth, and the top reached to heaven, and the angels of God were ascending and descending upon it; at the sight whereof, awaking from his sleep, and being amazed at the glory of the vision, he could not contain himself from crying out, How dreadful is this place! for the Lord is here, though I knew it not: this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven. (Gen. xxviii. 12. 17.) This mystical ladder, according to the sense of the fathers, represents to us the care which the Divine Providence, in all ages, takes of the righteous; that God is present with them in the time of their affliction, and in the place of their exile and pilgrimage; and that in their sad and solitary condition, in a state of desertion as to all outward appearance, they shall not want the assistance and comfort of the holy angels, who are God's ministering spirits, to attend and succour the saints in all their difficulties and necessities whatsoever.

And gave him knowledge of holy things.] This contains something more than the former sentence, for wisdom taught Jacob moreover things relating to the service of God. It is probable, that in this vision he received from God himself, who then appeared to him, (Gen. xxviii. 13.) instruction of this nature, by his erecting a pillar instantly, that very stone upon which he had rested his weariness, and pouring oil upon the top of it, to consecrate it as a monument of God's great mercy to him; by his dedicating the place to God's service under the name of Beth-el, or God's house; by his vowing a vow, the first probably of that nature, and promising to restore to God the tenth of all that he should give him.

Made him rich in his travels, and multiplied (the fruit of) his labours.] Καὶ ἐπλήθυνε τοὺς πόνους αὐτοῦ. The literal rendering of the place is, That wisdom multiplied his labours, and made him rich by them: and so Junius understands it, Locupletavit eum in ærumnis, quum multiplicaret labores ejus. All the commentators and ancient versions take it in another sense, That she prospered the fruits of his labours; which is apparently the sense of our translators. This blessing Jacob happily experienced, as a reward of his hard and continual labour; for though Laban defrauded him of his wages ten times, when he had served him twenty years faithfully in his house, and through constant and painful watching was consumed by the drought in the day, and by the frost in the night, yet God suffered him not to be sent away thus empty, but gave him success and riches equal to his labours: for it was he that gave that extraordinary blessing to the artifice of laying the rods before the cattle, and, as the learned think, (see Bishop Patrick in loc.) directed him by an angel to that invention, and promised to give success to it, (Gen. xxxi. 10—12.) intending to transfer unto Jacob a good share of the wealth of Laban; which was accordingly effected by this contrivance, and Laban's injustice hereby punished, and his policy overruled. And to this agrees the Arabic version of this place, Sinus ejus implevit opibus eorum qui insultaverant ipsi. In this sense one cannot help observing the propriety of the word ἐπλήθυνε, which seems to intimate the manner of Jacob's coming by his riches, viz. that it was by the multiplying, or surprising fruitfulness, of the cattle.

Ver. 11. In the covetousness of such as oppressed him, she stood by him, and made him rich.] Ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ κατισχυόντων αὐτὸν παρέστη. Calmet says, the true reading of the Greek is, αὐτῷ παρέστη, and explains it accordingly, Elle l'assista contre l'avarice de ceux que vouloient user de violence, ou qui avoient l'avantage. In the book of Genesis we meet with the several ways and stratagems by which Laban, who had a greater regard to his own interest than to justice, endeavoured to surprise Jacob, and hinder him from receiving the fruits of his labours: for when Laban, to his surprise, found the contract very advantageous to Jacob, and had the mortification to see the cattle bring forth their young directly against his interest, he dissolved his own agreement, and made a new one with Jacob. Coverdale, therefore, very properly renders, In the deceitfulness of such as defrauded him, she stood by him, which is more agreeable to what Jacob himself says, (Gen. xxxi. 7.) Your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times, but God suffered him not to hurt me. For it was impossible but Jacob must have been greatly injured by a man of that profound subtilty, had not the extraordinary interposition of God wonderfully prevented it, and disappointed the deceiver, which the patriarch very gratefully acknowledges.

Ver. 12. She defended him from his enemies, and kept him safe from those that lay in wait.] i. e. Either by turning away the wrath of his brother Esau, which, through his prudent conduct and humble submission, was at length mollified and changed into love and tenderness; or by God's threatening Laban in a dream from attempting any thing against Jacob, or seizing upon any of his possessions, when he pursued after him. In Gen. xxxii. we read, that the angels of God met Jacob in his journey, to encourage and comfort him, no doubt, with the assurance that God was with him; and that he called the name of the place Mahanaim, i. e. two hosts or camps: for it is probably supposed, that the angels might appear to him as distinguished into two armies, the better to defend him against his enemies on all sides. (See Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. i. p. 361.)

And in a sore conflict gave him the victory, that he might know that godliness is stronger than all.] This relates to that conflict or wrestling which Jacob had with the angel, over whom he was at last victorious; nor would he quit his hold till he had obtained a blessing. The struggling of an angel with a man may seem impar congressus, and the victory of the latter is still more surprising: but many worthy ends were implied in this combat, and several useful reflections may be drawn from it. 1. Jacob having such power with God, as to be able to prevail over one of his ministers, was hence reminded not to fear his brother Esau, nor any attempt that he should make against him. 2. God enabled Jacob to prevail over the angel whom he contended with, to shew the great power that those saints have, who put their whole trust and confidence in him. 3. We farther from hence learn, that when God suffers his saints to be exposed to great trials and severe temptations, it is with a design to teach them, by an experience of their own weakness and his might, that it is he alone that makes them victorious; and that he whom they have preferred to the world, is greater than the world, and more powerful than all things and persons in it. The fine observation contained in the conclusion of the verse, viz. that godliness is stronger than all, though true in an eminent degree of Jacob, as has been shewn, and is indeed implied in his victory, need not be confined to his single person; there are many other signal instances in the Old Testament to confirm this truth: it was by godliness that Jonathan, with his armour-bearer alone, put a whole garrison to flight; that David, unarmed, overthrew Goliath, and prevailed against the artifices and violence of Saul; that Jehoshaphat, without drawing a sword, triumphed over three confederate nations; that Hezekiah saved Jerusalem, and the kingdom of Judah, against a hundred fourscore and five thousand Assyrians that came against it: it was piety that determined constantly the fate of the Jewish people, and according to their observance of this, was the public happiness and condition of that state. And the same observation will hold with respect to any other nation or people, who will be always found to be successful, or otherwise, according as they regard God, and encourage and promote a true sense of piety. So that the advice of the Psalmist is at all times best to be followed, and will be found, upon trial, to be even the truest policy: Some put their trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will remember the name of the Lord our God. (Psal. xx. 7.) This power of piety, or truth, as it is called, is finely displayed by the apocryphal Esdras, in that contest before Darius, 1 Esdras iii. iv. where, after the arguments used in favour of wine, women, and kings, at length truth beareth away the victory, as being stronger than all things, for truth endureth, and is always strong, it liveth and conquereth for evermore; neither in her judgment is any unrighteousness; she is the strength, kingdom, power, and majesty, of all ages. And all the people shouted, and said, Great is truth, and mighty above all things.

Ver. 13. When the righteous was sold, she forsook him not.] Joseph, who is here emphatically called the righteous, is another remarkable instance of God's protection and care of his afflicted servants; Joseph was sent to his brethren upon a friendly message, and his coming was even beneficial to them; but the recompence he met with was treachery and violence; it was unnatural to sell their brother, but it was an aggravation of their cruelty to sell him, an innocent and tender youth, to rough barbarians, and by them to be carried away into such a country as Egypt. Ephraim Syrus is very pathetic upon this occasion; he makes the unhappy Joseph to stop at his mother Rachel's monument, as he was going with the merchants into Egypt; his complaint there, and the deep and melting impression it made, even upon his Ishmaelite masters, is very moving and affecting. (De Laud. Jos.) Nor are his eloquence and invention less to be admired upon the other parts of Joseph's sad history. The affliction of Joseph is a common allusion in Scripture, and the standard, as it were, to try others' afflictions by. It is recorded of him, that he was but seventeen years old when his troubles first began; and though the patriarchs that were before him, underwent their respective trials and calamities, yet the Holy Spirit mentions none of their afflictions with the same emphasis as that of Joseph, as if they were to be the badge and characteristic by which he was to be distinguished from the rest: but, through the favour of Providence, and its secret but wonderful economy, his very afflictions were made the means of his advancement. This so remarkable an instance of the guidance of Divine Providence, another father applies to the afflicted and unfortunate, for their comfort and encouragement: "Joseph, a single person, sold a bondsman into Egypt, there destitute, imprisoned, enslaved; at length went forth a multitude from thence, even to the number of six hundred thousand souls, which grew up to be a great and very powerful people." (Greg. Nazian. Orat. 32.)

But delivered him from sin.] This relates to Joseph withstanding the solicitations of his mistress, Potiphar's wife, who, through a criminal love, would have tempted him to adultery; but by a strict regard to chastity, and a religious adherence to his duty, he was deaf to her entreaties, and proof against her amorous violence. The reflection of Rollin upon this part of Joseph's character is so fine, and the advice therein given of such consequence to young and unguarded minds, that I cannot better illustrate this place, or more please well-disposed readers, than by transcribing it: "We find in his (Joseph's) conduct an excellent model of what we should do when we are tempted. Joseph defends himself at first by the remembrance of God and his duty; How, says he to that bold and shameless woman, can I commit such an action, who have God for my witness and my judge? It is in his sight that you and I shall both become criminal: it is he who commands me to disobey you upon this occasion. How can I escape his view, or corrupt his justice, or be covered from his indignation? How then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God? But when the temptation became so strong, that he had cause to fear his weakness might yield to it, he prudently betakes himself to flight, rather than parley any longer, or continue in such a state of danger or temptation, as might at length incline him to offend against God." (Method of studying Belles Lettres, vol. iii. p. 141.)

She went down with him into the pit.] Joseph's noble resistance provoked his impudent mistress, who wrongfully accused him to her husband, and was the occasion of his being cast into the prison; over whom God was, under this unhappy circumstance, more abundantly watchful. For the Scripture seems to be particularly careful to make us take notice, how God protected this his servant, by informing us, that the Lord was with Joseph; or, according to the Chaldee paraphrase of the place, that the Word of the Lord was with him, (Gen. xxxix. 21.) This expression, that the Lord was with Joseph in the prison, seems to intimate, that when Joseph was thrown into it, and seemingly forsaken of all, God descended with him into the obscure dungeon; and the expression of our author, that wisdom went down with him into the pit, and left him not in bonds, is to the same purpose, viz. that the eternal wisdom became in a manner prisoner with him; i. e. according to the same polite writer, " she softened the tediousness of his nights, which were spent in watching and suffering; she was a light in that darkness where the rays of the sun could not penetrate; she took away from the solitude of his confinement, which neither reading nor business could amuse or suspend the disagreeable sense of; and she diffused a calmness and serenity over his mind, which arose from an invisible and inexhaustible spring. In this his miserable confinement she was nearest to Joseph, as she is to every man in adversity that has faith: nor is it said, when Joseph was made a partner in the throne of Pharaoh, that wisdom ascended with him thither, as it is said, that she descended with him into prison, and assisted him in his bonds." (Vol. iii. p. 139.) St. Ambrose has the like reflection upon the same occasion: " Non turbantur innocentes, cùm falsis criminibus impetuntur, et oppressa innocentia detruduntur in carcerem; visitat Deus et in carcere suos, et ibi est plus auxilii, ubi est plus periculi." (De Joseph. cap. 5.)

Ver. 14. And left him not in bonds, till she brought him the sceptre of the kingdom.] This is no where mentioned in the books of Moses; it is there only said, that Joseph was made governor over all the land of Egypt: Philo says, indeed, speaking of Joseph, that Pharaoh made him his viceroy, or, to speak more truly, says he, king; μᾶλλον δὲ, εἰ χρὴ τ' ἀληθὲς εἰπεῖν, βασιλέα. But we are not to understand our author, as if he meant by the sceptre of the kingdom, a truly royal power, a sovereignty strictly so called, un regne, un empire absolu, says Calmet; but only, that he was the second person in the kingdom, and had a most extensive power and authority. Some make him to be a partner in the throne with Pharaoh, and think he was invested with this power when Pharaoh took off his ring, which was the royal seal, from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's, and they cried before him, Bow the knee. But notwithstanding these ceremonies, and the supreme honours paid him therein, Joseph was still a subject; he was indeed his prime or chief minister, governor over all the country; but as his power came from Pharaoh, so was it subject to him. Grotius says, it was usual with the Hebrews to give the name of king to such as were raised to some very extraordinary honour, and invested with great authority; and refers to ver. 16. of this chapter, which he understands in the like sense. (Comment. in loc.) And thus governors of provinces, and persons of chief note and authority in countries of small extent, are called in Scripture: see Judg. i. 7. where the threescore and ten kings, mentioned to have had their thumbs and their great toes cut off by Adoni-bezek, are not to be understood as real kings and princes, but as so many rulers of cities or small territories, called indeed kings, as having a resemblance of kingly power, by their jurisdiction in such places. Many such petty kings were in Canaan in Joshua's time, who were very numerous: Tous les seigneurs qui gouvernoient une ville, (says Calmet in loc.) s'appelloient du nom de rois: till at length the greater overcame, and as it were devoured the rest. The like may be said of the thirty and two kings which went up with Ben-hadad the king of Syria to besiege Samaria. (1 Kings xx. 1. Isa. xix. 2.) And some of the ancients have given this name even to Abraham, Moses, and Israel. (See Justin, lib. xxxvi. cap. 2. and Nicol. Damascen. apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7. and Calmet in loc.) This seems confirmed likewise by the new name which Pharaoh gave him; which he conferred, not only because he was a foreigner, and intended to honour him, but to denote him to be his subject, though ruler of every body else: (see Pat. in loc.) a name which, according to St. Jerome and the Vulgar Latin, signified, the saviour of the world; (see Gregory's notes, p. 65.) probably in allusion to the services done by him in the time of the famine. But perhaps this name may mystically include something higher; for some learned men have remarked, that there are few saints of the Old Testament, in whom God has been pleased to express so many circumstances of resemblance with his Son, as in Joseph. (See the particulars of the agreement, and the parallel drawn by Rollin, vol. iii. on the Belles Lettres, p. 155.) This is doing the greatest honour to Joseph, and strictly giving him perpetual glory.
